abroad; for the coachman himself is their pan-
der.

Rog. Is 'a so? In truth I have almost forgot, for want of exercise. But how if I fetch this [95 citizen's wife to that gull, and that madonna to that gallant, how then?

Mis. F. Why then, Roger, you are to have sixpence a lane;<sup>3</sup> so many lanes, so many sixpences. [100

Rog. Is't so? Then I see we two shall agree, and live together.

Mis. F. Ay, Roger, so long as there be any taverns and bawdy-houses in Milan. Exeunt.

SCENE [III].<sup>4</sup>

Enter BELLAFRONT with lute, pen, ink, and paper being placed before her.

[Bell.]

SONG.

The courtier's flattering jewels,
Temptation's only fuels;

The lawyer's ill-got moneys,
That suck up poor bees' honeys;
The citizen's son's riot,
The gallant's costly diet:
Silks and velvets, pearls and ambers,
Shall not draw me to their chambers.
Silks and velvets, &c.

She writes.

Oh, 't is in vain to write! it will not please; [10
Ink on this paper would ha' but presented
The foul black spots that stick upon my soul,
And rather made me loathsomer, than wrought
My love's impression in Hippolito's thought. [14
No, I must turn the chaste leaves of my breast,
And pick out some sweet means to breed my rest.

Hippolito, believe me, I will be
As true unto thy heart, as thy heart to thee,
And hate all men, their gifts and company! [18

Enter MATHEO, CASTRUCHIO, FLUELLO, and PIORATTO.

Mat. You, goody punk, subaudi<sup>5</sup> cockatrice, oh y'are a sweet whore of your promise, are you not, think you? How well you came to supper to us last night! Mew, a whore, and break her word! Nay, you may blush, and hold down your head at it well enough. 'Sfoot, [25 ask these gallants if we stay'd not till we were as hungry as sergeants.

Flu. Ay, and their yeomen too.

Cas. Nay, faith, acquaintance, let me tell you, you forgot yourself too much. We had [30 excellent cheer, rare vintage, and were drunk
after supper.

Pio. And when we were in, our woodcocks,<sup>6</sup> sweet rogue, a brace of gulls, dwelling here in the city, came in, and paid all the shot. [35

Mat. Pox on her! let her alone.

Bell. Oh, I pray do, if you be gentlemen;
I pray, depart the house. Beshrew the door
For being so easily entreated! Faith,
I lent but little ear unto your talk; [40
My mind was busied otherwise, in troth,
And so your words did unregarded pass.
Let this suffice, — I am not as I was.

Flu. I am not what I was? No, I'll be sworn thou art not; for thou wert honest at five, [45 and now th'art a punk at fifteen. Thou wert yesterday a simple whore, and now th'art a cunning, cony-catching<sup>7</sup> baggage to-day.

Bell. I'll say I'm worse; I pray, forsake me
then:

I do desire you leave me, gentlemen, [50
And leave yourselves. O be not what you are,
Spendthrifts of soul and body!

Let me persuade you to forsake all harlots,
Worse than the deadliest poisons, they are worse:

For o'er their souls hangs an eternal curse. [55
In being slaves to slaves, their labours perish;
They're seldom blest with fruit; for ere it blossoms,

Many a worm confounds it.
They have no issue but foul ugly ones, [60
That run along with them, e'en to their graves;

For, 'stead of children, they breed rank diseases,
And all you gallants can bestow on them
Is that French infant, which ne'er acts, but speaks.

What shallow son and heir, then, foolish gallants,

Would waste all his inheritance, to purchase <sup>65</sup>
A filthy, loath'd disease? and pawn his body
'To a dry evil: that usury's worst of all,
When th' interest will eat out the principal.

Mat. [Aside.] 'Sfoot, she gulls 'em the best!
This is always her fashion, when she would be <sup>70</sup> rid of any company that she cares not for, to enjoy mine alone.

Flu. What's here? Instructions, admonitions, and caveats? Come out, you scabbard of vengeance. <sup>75</sup>

Mat. Fluello, spurn your hounds when they foist,<sup>1</sup> you shall not spurn my punk, I can tell you: my blood is vext.

Flu. Pox a' your blood! make it a quarrel. <sup>79</sup>
Mat. You're a slave! Will that serve turn?

All. 'Sblood, hold, hold!

Cas. Matheo, Fluello, for shame, put up!

Bell. O how many thús
Mov'd with a little folly, have let out Their souls in brothel houses! fell down and died. <sup>85</sup>

Just at their harlot's foot, as 't were in pride.

Flu. Matheo, we shall meet.

Mat. Ay, ay; any where, saving at church;
Pray take heed we meet not there.

Flu. Adieu, damnation!

Cas. Cockatrice, farewell! <sup>90</sup>

Pio. There's more deceit in women, than in hell.

Exeunt [CASTRUCHIO, FLUELLO, and PIORATTO].

Mat. Ha, ha, thou dost gull 'em so rarely, so naturally! If I did not think thou hadst been in earnest!

Thou art a sweet rogue for 't i' faith. <sup>95</sup>

Bell. Why are not you gone too, Signor
Matheo?

I pray depart my house: you may believe me,
In troth, I have no part of harlot in me.

Mat. How's this?

Bell. Indeed, I love you not: but hate you worse. <sup>100</sup>

Than any man, because you were the first
Gave money for my soul: you brake the ice,
Which after turn'd a puddle; I was led
By your temptation to be miserable.

I pray, seek out some other that will fall, <sup>105</sup>
Or rather, I pray seek out none at all.

Mat. Is 't possible to be impossible! An honest whore! I have heard many honest wenches turn strumpets with a wet finger,<sup>2</sup> but for a harlot to turn honest is one of Hercules' labours. [<sup>110</sup>
It was more easy for him in one night to make fifty queans, than to make one of them honest again in fifty years. Come, I hope thou dost but jest.

Bell. 'T is time to leave off jesting; I had almost <sup>115</sup>

Jested away salvation. I shall love you,
If you will soon forsake me.

Mat. God be with thee!

Bell. O tempt no more women! Shun their weighty curse!

Women, at best, are bad, make them not worse.
You gladly seek our sex's overthrow; <sup>120</sup>
But not to raise our states. For all your wrongs,
Will you vouchsafe me but due recompense,
To marry with me?

Mat. How! marry with a punk, a cockatrice,
a harlot? Marry, faugh, I'd be burnt through the nose first. <sup>125</sup>

Bell. Why, la, these are your oaths! you love to undo us,

To put Heaven from us, whilst our best hours
waste;

You love to make us lewd, but never chaste.

Mat. I'll hear no more of this, this ground upon; <sup>130</sup>

Thou'rt damn'd for alt'ring thy religion. Exit.

Bell. Thy lust and sin speak so much. Go thou, my ruin,

The first fall my soul took! By my example
I hope few maidens now will put their heads Under men's girdles; who least trusts is most wise: <sup>135</sup>

Men's oaths do cast a mist before our eyes.

My best of wit, be ready! Now I go,

By some device to greet Hippolito.

[ACT IV]

SCENE [I].<sup>3</sup>

Enter a Servant, setting out a table, on which he places a skull, a picture [of INFELICE], a book, and a taper.

Ser. So, this is Monday morning, and now must I to my huswifery. Would I had been created a shoemaker, for all the gentle craft are gentlemen every Monday by their copy,<sup>4</sup> and scorn then to work one true stitch. My <sup>5</sup> master means sure to turn me into a student, for here's my book, here my desk, here my light, this my close chamber, and here my punk:
so that this dull drowsy first day of the week makes me half a priest, half a chandler, half <sup>10</sup> a painter, half a sexton, ay, and half a bawd;
for all this day my office is to do nothing but keep the door. To prove it, look you, this good face and yonder gentleman, so soon as ever my back is turn'd, will be naught together. <sup>15</sup>

Enter HIPPOLITO.

Hip. Are all the windows shut?

Ser. Close, sir, as the fist of a courtier that hath stood in three reigns.

Hip. Thou art a faithful servant, and observ'<sup>t</sup>

The calendar both of my solemn vows, <sup>20</sup>
And ceremonious sorrow. Get thee gone;

I charge thee on thy life, let not the sound
Of any woman's voice pierce through that door.

Ser. If they do, my lord, I'll pierce some of
them;

What will your lordship have to breakfast? <sup>25</sup>

Hip. Sighs.

Ser. What to dinner?

Hip. Tears.

Ser. The one of them, my lord, will fill you too full of wind, the other wet you too much. <sup>[50]</sup>
What to supper?

Hip. That which now thou canst not get me,
the constancy of a woman.

Ser. Indeed that's harder to come by than ever was Ostend. <sup>1</sup> <sup>25</sup>

Hip. Prithee, away.

Ser. I'll make away myself presently, which few servants will do for their lords; but rather help to make them away. Now to my door-keeping; I hope to pick something out of it. <sup>40</sup>

Exit.

Hip. [taking up INFELICE's picture.] My Infelice's face, her brow, her eye,
The dimple on her cheek! and such sweet skill,
Hath from the cunning workman's pencil flown,
These lips look fresh and lively as her own, <sup>44</sup>
Seeming to move and speak. 'Las! now I see,
The reason why fond<sup>2</sup> women love to buy Adulterate complexion! Here, 't is read:
False colours last after the true be dead.

Of all the roses grafted on her cheeks, <sup>50</sup>

Of all the graces dancing in her eyes,

Of all the music set upon her tongue,

Of all that was past woman's excellence,

In her white bosom, — look! a painted board

Circumscribes all. Earth can no bliss afford,

Nothing of her but this. This cannot speak, <sup>55</sup>

It has no lap for me to rest upon,

No lip worth tasting; here the worms will feed,

As in her coffin. Hence, then, idle art!

True love's best pictur'd in a true-love's heart.

Here art thou drawn, sweet maid, till this be dead; <sup>60</sup>

So that thou liv'st twice, twice art buried.

Thou figure of my friend, lie there. What's here? <sup>[Takes up the skull.]</sup>

Perhaps this shrewd pate was mine enemy's:

'Las! say it were; I need not fear him now!

For all his braves, his contumelious breath, <sup>65</sup>

His frowns, though dagger-pointed, all his plot,

Though ne'er so mischievous, his Italian pills,

His quarrels, and that common fence, his law,

See, see, they're all eaten out! Here's not left

one:

How clean they're pickt away to the bare bone! <sup>70</sup>

How mad are mortals, then, to rear great

names

On tops of swelling houses! or to wear out

Their fingers' ends in dirt, to scrape up gold!

Not caring, so that sumpter-horse, the back,

Be hung with gaudy trappings, with what

<sup>1</sup> Ostend held out for three years and ten weeks, and was eventually captured by the Marquis of Spinola on Sept. 8, 1604.

Yea, rags most beggarly, they clothe the soul:

Yet, after all, their gayness looks thus foul.

What fools are men to build a garish tomb,

Only to save the carcass whilst it rots,

To maintain 't long in stinking, make good carrion, <sup>80</sup>

But leave no good deeds to preserve them

sound!

For good deeds keep men sweet, long above ground.

And must all come to this? fools, wise, all hither?

Must all heads thus at last be laid<sup>3</sup> together?

Draw me my picture then, thou grave neat workman, <sup>85</sup>

After this fashion, not like this; these colours

In time, kissing but air, will be kist off:

But here's a fellow; that which he lays on

Till doomsday alters not complexion.

Death's the best painter then: they that draw shapes, <sup>90</sup>

And live by wicked faces, are but God's apes.

They come but near the life, and there they stay;

This fellow draws life too: his art is fuller,

The pictures which he makes are without colour. <sup>94</sup>

Re-enter Servant.

Ser. Here's a person would speak with you,
sir.

Hip. Hab!

Ser. A parson, sir, would speak with you.

Hip. Vicar?

Ser. Vicar! No, sir; has too good a face to be a vicar yet; a youth, a very youth.

Hip. What youth? Of man or woman?

Lock the doors.

Ser. If it be a woman, marrow-bones<sup>4</sup> and potato pies<sup>4</sup> keep me from meddling with her, for the thing has got the breeches! 'T is a <sup>[105]</sup> male-varlet sure, my lord, for a woman's tailor ne'er measur'd him.

Hip. Let him give thee his message and be gone.

Ser. He says he's Signor Matheo's man, but

I know he lies. <sup>110</sup>

Hip. How dost thou know it?

Ser. 'Cause he has ne'er a beard. 'T is his boy, I think, sir, whosoe'er paid for his nursing.

Hip. Send him and keep the door.

[Exit Servant.]

(Reads.) "Fata si liceat mihi,

Fingere arbitrio meo,

Temperem zephyro levi

Vela." <sup>70</sup>

I'd sail were I to choose, not in the ocean;

Cedars are shaken, when shrubs do feel no

bruise. <sup>120</sup>

Enter BELLAFRONT, like a Page, [with a letter].

How? from Matheo?

Bell. Yes, my lord.

Bell. Not all in health, my lord.
Hip. Keep off.
Bell. I do.—
 [Aside.] Hard fate when women are compell'd to woo.
Hip. This paper does speak nothing.
Bell. Yes, my lord,
 Matter of life, it speaks, and therefore writ<sup>125</sup>
 In hidden character: to me instruction
 My master gives, and, 'less you please to stay
 Till you both meet, I can the text display.
Hip. Do so; read out.
Bell. I am already out.<sup>129</sup>
 Look on my face, and read the strangest story!
Hip. What, villain, ho?—

Re-enter Servant.

Ser. Call you, my lord?
Hip. Thou slave, thou hast let in the devil!
Ser. Lord bless us, where? He's not cloven, my lord, that I can see: besides the devil goes<sup>135</sup> more like a gentleman than a page. Good my lord, Buon coraggio.<sup>2</sup>
Hip. Thou hast let in a woman in man's shape.
 And thou art damn'd for 't.
Ser. Not damn'd I hope for putting in a woman to a lord,
Hip. Fetch me my rapier,—do not; I shall kill thee.

Purge this infected chamber of that plague,
 That runs upon me thus. Slave, thrust her hence.<sup>144</sup>

Ser. Alas, my lord, I shall never be able to thrust her hence without help! Come, mermaid, you must to sea again.

Bell. Hear me but speak, my words shall be all music;

Hear me but speak. [Knocking within.
Hip. Another beats the door,
 T'other she-devil! look.

Ser. Why, then, hell's broke loose.<sup>150</sup>
Hip. Hence; guard the chamber: let no more come on, Exit [Servant].

One woman serves for man's damnation—
 Beshrew thee, thou dost make me violate
 The chastest and most sanctimonious vow,
 That e'er was ent'red in the court of Heaven!
 I was, on meditation's spotless wings,<sup>156</sup>
 Upon my journey thither; like a storm
 Thou beat'st my ripened cogitations,
 Flat to the ground; and like a thief dost stand,
 To steal devotion from the holy land.<sup>160</sup>

Bell. If woman were thy mother—if thy
 heart,

Be not all marble, or if 't marble be,
 Let my tears soften it, to pity me—
 I do beseech thee, do not thus with scorn
 Destroy a woman!

Hip. Woman, I beseech thee,<sup>165</sup>
 Get thee some other suit, this fits thee not;
 I would not grant it to a kneeling queen,
 I cannot love thee, nor I must not: see

[Points to INFELICE'S picture.]
 The copy of that obligation,
 Where my soul's bound in heavy penalties.<sup>170</sup>

Bell. She's dead, you told me; she'll let fall her suit.

Hip. My vows to her fled after her to Heaven.

Were thine eyes clear as mine, thou might'st behold her,

Watching upon yon battlements of stars,—
 How I observe them! Should I break my bond,
 This board would rive in twain, these wooden lips<sup>170</sup>

Call me most perjurd villain. Let it suffice,
 I ha' set thee in the path; is 't not a sign
 I love thee, when with one so most most dear,
 I'll have thee fellows? All are fellows there.<sup>180</sup>

Bell. Be greater than a king; save not a body,
 But from eternal shipwreck keep a soul.
 If not, and that again sin's path I tread,
 The grief be mine, the guilt fall on thy head!

Hip. Stay, and take physic for it; read this book,<sup>185</sup>

Ask counsel of this head, what's to be done;
 He'll strike it dead, that 't is damnation
 If you turn Turk again. Oh, do it not!

Though Heaven cannot allure you to do well,
 From doing ill let hell fright you; and learn this,<sup>190</sup>

The soul whose bosom lust did never touch,
 Is God's fair bride, and maidens' souls are such:

The soul that leaving chastity's white shore,
 Swims in hot sensual streams, is the devil's
 whore.—

Re-enter Servant [with letter].

How now, who comes?<sup>195</sup>

Ser. No more knaves, my lord, that wear smocks: here's a letter from Doctor Benedict.
 I would not enter his man, though he had hairs
 at his mouth, for fear he should be a woman, for some women have beards; marry, they<sup>200</sup> are half-witches. 'Slid! you are a sweet youth to wear a cod-piece, and have no pins to stick upon 't.

Hip. I'll meet the doctor, tell him; yet tonight

I cannot: but at morrow rising sun<sup>205</sup>
 I will not fail.—Go, woman; fare thee well.

Exit [HIPOLITO and Servant].
Bell. The lowest fall can be but into hell;

It does not move him: I must therefore fly
 From this undoing city, and with tears
 Wash off all anger from my father's brow:<sup>210</sup>

He cannot sure but joy, seeing me new born.
 A woman honest first, and then turn whore,

Is, as with me, common to thousands more;<sup>215</sup>
 But from a strumpet to turn chaste, that sound
 Has oft been heard, that woman hardly found.

Exit.

SCENE [II].<sup>3</sup>

Enter FUSTIGO, CRAMBO, and POLI.

Fus. Hold up your hands, gentlemen, here's one, two, three [giving money]—nay, I warrant they are sound pistoles, and without flaws; I had them of my sister and I know she uses to put [up] nothing that's crackt — four, five, [5] six, seven, eight, and nine; by this hand bring me but a piece of his blood, and you shall have nine more. I'll lurk in a tavern not far off, and provide supper to close up the end of the tragedy. The linen-draper's, remember. Stand [10] to 't, I beseech you, and play your parts perfectly.

Cram. Look you, signor, 't is not your gold that we weigh —

Fus. Nay, nay, weigh it and spare not; if [15] it lack one grain of corn, I'll give you a bushel of wheat to make it up.

Cram. But by your favour, signor, which of the servants is it? because we'll punish justly.

Fus. Marry, 't is the head man; you shall [20] taste him by his tongue; a pretty, tall, prating fellow, with a Tuscalonian beard.

Poli. Tuscalonian? Very good.

Fus. God's life, I was ne'er so thrummed since I was a gentleman. My cockcomb was [25] dry beaten, as if my hair had been hemp.

Cram. We'll dry-beat some of them.

Fus. Nay, it grew so high, that my sister cried out murder, very manfully. I have her consent, in a manner, to have him pepper'd; [30] else I'll not do 't, to win more than ten cheaters do at a rifling.<sup>1</sup> Break but his pate, or so, only his mazer,<sup>2</sup> because I'll have his head in a cloth as well as mine; he's a linen-draper, and may take enough. I could enter mine action [35] of battery against him, but we may perhaps be both dead and rotten before the lawyers would end it.

Cram. No more to do, but ensconce yourself i' th' tavern; provide no great cheer, a [40] couple of capons, some pheasants, plovers, an orangeado<sup>3</sup>-pie, or so: but how bloody howsoever the day be, sally you not forth.

Fus. No, no; nay, if I stir, somebody shall stink. I'll not budge; I'll lie like a dog in [45] a manger.

Cram. Well, well, to the tavern, let not our supper be raw, for you shall have blood enough, your bellyful.

Fus. That's all, so God sa' me, I thirst [50] after; blood for blood, bump for bump, nose for nose, head for head, plaster for plaster; and so farewell. What shall I call your names? because I'll leave word, if any such come to the bar. [55]

Cram. My name is Corporal Crambo.

Poli. And mine, Lieutenant Poli. Exit.

Cram. Poli is as tall a man as ever opened oyster; I would not be the devil to meet Poli. [60] Farewell.

Fus. Nor I, by this light, if Poli be such a Poli. Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]

Enter Candido's wife [VIOLA] in her shop, and the two Prentices.

Vio. What's a'clock now?

Vio. That's well, The Senate will leave wording presently: But is George ready?

2 Pren. Yes, forsooth, he's furbisht.

Vio. Now, as you ever hope to win my favour, Throw both your duties and respects on him [5]

With the like awe as if he were your master;

Let not your looks betray it with a smile

Or jeering glance to any customer;

Keep a true settled countenance, and beware

You laugh not, whatsoever you hear or see. [10]

2 Pren. I warrant you, mistress, let us alone for keeping our countenance: for, if I list,

there's ne'er a fool in all Milan shall make me laugh, let him play the fool never so like an ass, whether it be the fat court-fool, or the lean [15]

city-fool.

Vio. Enough then, call down George.

2 Pren. I hear him coming.

Enter GEORGE [in CANDIDO'S apparel].

Vio. Be ready with your legs<sup>4</sup> then; let me

see

How courtesy would become him. — Gallantly!

Beshrew my blood, a proper seemly man. [20]

Of a choice carriage, walks with a good port!

Geo. I thank you, mistress, my back's broad enough, now my master's gown's on.

Vio. Sure, I should think it were the least of sin,

To mistake the master, and to let him in. [25]

Geo. 'T were a good Comedy of Errors that, i' faith.

2 Pren. Whist, whist! my master.

Enter CANDIDO, [dressed as before in the carpet

he stares at GEORGE,] and exit presently.

Vio. You all know your tasks. — God's my life, what's that he has got on 's back? Who can tell?

Geo. [Aside.] That can I, but I will not. [30]

Vio. Girt about him like a madman! What, has he lost his cloak too? This is the maddest fashion that e'er I saw. What said he, George,

when he passed by thee? [35]

Geo. Troth, mistress, nothing: not so much as a bee, he did not hum; not so much as a bawd, he did not hem; not so much as a cuck-old, he did not ha; neither hum, hem, nor ha;

only stared me in the face, passed along, and made haste in, as if my looks had worked [40]

with him, to give him a stool.

Vio. Sure he's vext now, this trick has mov'd his spleen,

He's anger'd now, because he utt'ed nothing;

And wordless wrath breaks out more violent.

May be he'll strive for place, when he comes down, [45]

But if thou lov'st me, George, afford him none.

Geo. Nay, let me alone to play my master's prize,<sup>5</sup> as long as my mistress warrants me. I'm sure I have his best clothes on, and I scorn to give place to any that is inferior in apparel [50]

to me; that's an axiom, a principle, and is ob-

<sup>5</sup> A quibble. There were three degrees in fencing, the master's, the provost's, and the scholar's, for each of which a "prize was played."

serv'd as much as the fashion. Let that persuade you then, that I'll shoulder with him for the upper hand in the shop, as long as this chain will maintain it. <sup>55</sup>

Vio. Spoke with the spirit of a master, though with the tongue of a prentice.

Re-enter CANDIDO like a Prentice.

Why how now, madman? What in your trickys-coats?

Cand. O peace, good mistress.

Enter CRAMBO and POLL.

See, what you lack? What is't you buy? <sup>60</sup> Pure calicoes, fine hollands, choice cambrics, neat lawns? See, what you buy? Pray come near, my master will use you well, he can afford you a penny-worth.

Vio. Ay, that he can, out of a whole piece of lawn, i' faith. <sup>65</sup>

Cand. Pray see your choice here, gentlemen.

Vio. O fine fool! what, a madman! a patient madman! Who ever heard of the like? Well, sir, I'll fit you and your humour presently. <sup>70</sup> What, cross-points? I'll untie 'em all in a trice:

I'll vex you i' faith: boy take your cloak, quick, come. Exit [with 1 Prentice].

Cand. Be covered, George, this chain and welted<sup>1</sup> gown

Baro to this coat? Then the world's upside down.

Geo. Umh, umh, hum. <sup>75</sup>

Cram. That's the shop, and there's the fellow.

Poli. Ay, but the master is walking in there.

Cram. No matter, we'll in.

Poli. 'Sblood, dost long to lie in limbo?

Cram. An limbo be in hell, I care not. <sup>80</sup>

Cand. Look you, gentlemen, your choice: cambrics?

Cram. No, sir, some shirting.

Cand. You shall.

Cram. Have you none of this strip'd canvas for doublets? <sup>85</sup>

Cand. None strip'd, sir, but plain.

2 Pren. I think there be one piece strip'd within.

Geo. Step, sirrah, and fetch it, hum, hum, hum.

[Exit 2 Pren., and returns with the piece.]

Cand. Look you, gentleman, I'll make but one spreading, here's a piece of cloth, fine, <sup>90</sup> yet shall wear like iron. 'Tis without fault; take this upon my word, 'tis without fault.

Cram. Then 't is better than you, sirrah.

Cand. Ay, and a number more. Oh, that each soul

Were but as spotless as this innocent white, <sup>95</sup> And had as few breaks in it!

Cram. 'T would have some then:

There was a fray here last day in this shop.

Cand. There was, indeed, a little flea-biting.

Poli. A gentleman had his pate broke; call you that but a flea-biting? <sup>100</sup>

Cand. He had so.

Cram. Zounds, do you stand to it?

He strikes him.

Geo. 'Sfoot, clubs, clubs! Prentices, down with 'em!

[Enter several Prentices with clubs, who disarm CRAMBO and POLL.]

Ah, you rogues, strike a citizen in 's shop?

Cand. None of you stir, I pray; forbear, good George. <sup>105</sup>

Cram. I beseech you, sir, we mistook our marks; deliver us our weapons.

Geo. Your head bleeds, sir; cry clubs!

Cand. I say you shall not; pray be patient, Give them their weapons. Sirs, y' are best be gone; <sup>110</sup>

I tell you here are boys more tough than bears. Hence, lest more fists do walk about your ears.

Cram., Poli. We thank you, sir. Exeunt.

Cand. You shall not follow them;

Let them alone, pray; this did me no harm.

Troth, I was cold, and the blow made me warm, I thank 'em for 't: besides, I had decreed <sup>115</sup>

To have a vein prick'd, I did mean to bleed: So that there's money sav'd. They're honest men,

Pray use 'em well when they appear again. <sup>120</sup>

Geo. Yes, sir, we'll use 'em like honest men.

Cand. Ay, well said, George, like honest men, though they be arrant knaves, for that's the phrase of the city. Help to lay up these wares.

Re-enter his Wife with Officers.

Vio. Yonder he stands.

1 Off. What in a prentice-coat?

Vio. Ay, ay; mad, mad; pray take heed. <sup>125</sup>

Cand. How now! what news with them?

What make they with my wife?

Officers, is she attach'd? — Look to your wares.

Vio. He talks to himself: oh, he's much gone indeed.

1 Off. Pray, pluck up a good heart, be not so fearful: <sup>130</sup>

Sirs, hark, we'll gather to him by degrees.

Vio. Ay, ay, by degrees I pray. Oh me! What makes he with the lawn in his hand?

He'll tear all the ware in my shop. <sup>135</sup>

1 Off. Fear not, we'll catch him on a sudden.

Vio. Oh! you had need do so; pray take heed of your warrant.

1 Off. I warrant, mistress. Now, Signor Candido.

Cand. Now, sir, what news with you, sir?

Vio. What news with you? he says: oh, he's far gone! <sup>140</sup>

1 Off. I pray, fear nothing; let's alone with him.

Signor, you look not like yourself, methinks, — Steal you a' t' other side; — you're chang'd, you're alt' red.

Cand. Chang'd sir, why true, sir. Is change strange? 'T is not

The fashion unless it alter! Monarchs turn 145
To beggars, beggars creep into the nests
Of princes, masters serve their prentices,
Ladies their serving-men, men turn to women.

1 Off. And women turn to men.

Cand. Ay, and women turn to men, you say true. Ha, ha, a mad world, a mad world. 151

[Officers seize CANDIDO.]

1 Off. Have we caught you, sir?

Cand. Caught me? Well, well, you have caught me.

Vio. He laughs in your faces.

Geo. A rescue, prentices! my master's catch-poll'd. 155

1 Off. I charge you, keep the peace, or have your legs

gartered with irons! We have from the duke
A warrant strong enough for what we do.

Cand. I pray, rest quiet, I desire no rescue.

Vio. La, he desires no rescue, 'las poor heart, 160

He talks against himself.

Cand. Well, what's the matter?

1 Off. Look to that arm. Pray, make sure work, double the cord. [Officers bind CANDIDO.]

Cand. Why, why?

Vio. Look how his head goes. Should he get but loose, 165

Oh 't were as much as all our lives were worth!

1 Off. Fear not, we'll make all sure for our own safety.

Cand. Are you at leisure now? Well, what's the matter?

Why do I enter into bonds thus, ha?

1 Off. Because y'are mad, put fear upon your wife. 170

Vio. Oh ay, I went in danger of my life every minute.

Cand. What, am I mad, say you, and I not know it?

1 Off. That proves you mad, because you know it not.

Vio. Pray talk to him as little as you can, 175
You see he's too far spent.

Cand. Bound, with strong cord!

A sister's thread, i' faith, had been enough,
To lead me anywhere. — Wife, do you long?

You are mad too, or else you do me wrong.

Geo. But are you mad indeed, master?

Cand. My wife says so, 180

And what she says, George, is all truth, you know. —

And whither now, to Bethlem Monastery?

Ha! whither?

1 Off. Faith, e'en to the madmen's pound.

Cand. A! God's name! still I feel my patience sound. Exeunt [Officers with CANDIDO].

Geo. Come, we'll see whither he goes. If 185 the master be mad, we are his servants, and must follow his steps; we'll be mad-caps too. Farewell, mistress, you shall have us all in Bedlam.

Exeunt (GEORGE and Prentices).

Vio. I think I ha' fitted you now, you and your clothes,

If this move not his patience, nothing can; 190
I'll swear then I've a saint, and not a man.

[Exit.]

SCENE [IV].<sup>1</sup>

Enter DUKE, Doctor [BENEDICT], FLUELLO, CASTRUCHIO, and PIORATTO.

Duke. Give us a little leave.

[Exeunt FLUELLO, CASTRUCHIO, and PIORATTO.]

Doctor, your news.

Doct. I sent for him, my lord; at last he came,

And did receive all speech that went from me,
As gilded pills made to prolong his health.

My credit with him wrought it; for some men
Swallow even empty hooks, like fools that fear

No drowning where 'tis deepest, 'cause 'tis clear.
In th' end we sat and eat: a health I drank

To Infelice's sweet departed soul.

This train<sup>2</sup> I knew would take.

Duke. 'T was excellent. 10

Doct. He fell with such devotion on his knees,
To pledge the same —

Duke. Fond, superstitious fool!

Doct. That had he been inflam'd with zeal of prayer,

He could not pour 't out with more reverence.
About my neck he hung, wept on my cheek, 15

Kist it, and swore he would adore my lips,
Because they brought forth Infelice's name.

Duke. Ha, ha! alack, alack.

Doct. The cup he lifts up high, and thus he said;

“Here, noble maid!” — drinks, and was poisoned. 20

Duke. And died?

Doct. And died, my lord.

Duke. Thou in that word

Hast piec'd mine aged hours out with more years
Than thou hast taken from Hippolito.

A noble youth he was, but lesser branches 24
Hind'ring the greater's growth, must be lopt off,

And feed the fire. Doctor, we're now all thine,
And use us so: be bold.

Doct. Thanks, gracious lord —

My honoured lord: —

Duke. Hum.

Doct. I do beseech your grace to bury deep,
This bloody act of mine.

Duke. Nay, nay, for that, 30

Doctor, look you to 't, me it shall not move;
They're curs that ill do, not that ill do love.

Doct. You throw an angry forehead on my face:

But be you pleas'd backward thus far to look,
That for your good, this evil I undertook — 35

Duke. Ay, ay, we conster<sup>3</sup> so.

Doct. And only for your love.

Duke. Confest: 'tis true.

Doct. Nor let it stand against me as a bar
To thrust me from your presence; nor believe

As princes have quick thoughts, that now my finger 40

Being dipt in blood, I will not spare the hand,
But that for gold, — as what can gold not do? —
I may be hir'd to work the like on you.

Duke. Which to prevent —

Doct. 'T is from my heart as far.

Duke. No matter, doctor; 'cause I'll fearless sleep, 45

And that you shall stand clear of that suspicion, I banish thee for ever from my court.

This principle is old, but true as fate, Kings may love treason, but the traitor hate.

Doct. Is 't so? Nay then, duke, your stale principle, 60

With one as stale, the doctor thus shall quit. He falls himself that digs another's pit.

Enter the Doctor's Man.

How now! where is he? will he not meet me?

Man. Meet you, sir? He might have met with three fencers in this time, and have received 55 less hurt than by meeting one doctor of physic. Why, sir, he has walkt under the old abbey-wall yonder this hour, till he's more cold than a citizen's country house in Janivere. You may smell him behind, sir: la, you, yonder he comes.

Enter HIPPOLITO.

Doct. Leave me. 61

Man. I'th' lurch, if you will. Exit.

Doct. O my most noble friend!

Hip. Few but yourself, Could have entic'd me thus, to trust the air With my close sighs. You sent for me; what news? 65

Doct. Come, you must doff this black, dye that pale cheek

Into his own colour, go, attire yourself Fresh as a bridegroom when he meets his bride. The duke has done much treason to thy love; 'T is now reveal'd, 't is now to be reveng'd. 70 Be merry, honour'd friend, thy lady lives.

Hip. What lady?

Doct. Infelice, she's reviv'd. Reviv'd? Alack! death never had the heart, To take breath from her.

Hip. Umh: I thank you, sir, Physic prolongs life, when it cannot save; 75 This helps not my hopes, mine are in their grave,

You do some wrong to mock me.

Doct. By that love Which I have ever borne you, what I speak Is truth: the maiden lives; that funeral, 79 Duke's tears, the mourning, was all counterfeit. A sleepy draught coz'ned the world and you: I was his minister, and then chamb' red up, To stop discovery.

Hip. O treacherous duke!

Doct. He cannot hope so certainly for bliss, As he believes that I have poison'd you. 85 He woo'd me to 't; I yielded, and confirm'd him

In his most bloody thoughts.

Hip. A very devil!

Doct. Her did he closely coach to Bergamo, And thither —

Hip. Will I ride. Stood Bergamo 89 In the low countries of black hell, I'll to her.

Doct. You shall to her, but not to Bergamo.

How passion makes you fly beyond yourself! Much of that weary journey I ha' cut off; For she by letters hath intelligence Of your supposed death, her own interment, 95 And all those plots which that false duke, her father,

Has wrought against you; and she'll meet you —

Hip. Oh, when?

Doct. Nay, see; how covetous are your desires. Early to-morrow morn.

Hip. Oh where, good father? 100

Doct. At Bethlem Monastery: are you pleas'd now?

Hip. At Bethlem Monastery! The place well fits;

It is the school where those that lose their wits Practise again to get them. I am sick Of that disease; all love is lunatic. 105

Doct. We'll steal away this night in some disguise.

Father Anselmo, a most reverend friar, Expects our coming; before whom we'll lay Reasons so strong, that he shall yield in bands Of holy wedlock to tie both your hands. 110

Hip. This is such happiness,

That to believe it, 't is impossible.

Doct. Let all your joys then die in misbelief; I will reveal no more.

Hip. O yes, good father, I am so well acquainted with despair, 115 I know not how to hope: I believe all.

Doct. We'll hence this night. Much must be done, much said;

But if the doctor fail not in his charms, Your lady shall ere morning fill these arms.

Hip. Heavenly physician! for thy fame shall spread, 120

That mak'st two lovers speak when they be dead. Exeunt.

[ACT V]

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter Candido's wife [VIOLA with a petition] and GEORGE. PIORATTO meets them.

Vio. Oh watch, good George, watch which way the duke comes.

Geo. Here comes one of the butterflies; ask him.

Vio. Pray, sir, comes the duke this way?

Pio. He's upon coming, mistress. 5

Vio. I thank you, sir. [Exit PIORATTO.] George, are there many mad folks where thy master lies?

Geo. Oh yes, of all countries some; but especially mad Greeks, they swarm. Troth, 10 mistress, the world is altered with you; you had not wont to stand thus with a paper humbly complaining; but you're well enough serv'd; provender prickt<sup>2</sup> you, as it does many of our city wives besides. 15

Vio. Dost think, George, we shall get him forth?

Geo. Truly, mistress, I cannot tell; I think you 'll hardly get him forth. Why, 'tis strange! 'Sfoot, I have known many women that <sup>20</sup> have had mad rascals to their husbands, whom they would belabour by all means possible to keep 'em in their right wits; but of a woman to long to turn a tame man into a madman, why the devil himself was never us'd so by his dam. <sup>25</sup>

Vio. How does he talk, George? Ha! good George, tell me.

Geo. Why, you 're best go see.

Vio. Alas, I am afraid!

Geo. Afraid! you had more need be <sup>30</sup> asham'd. He may rather be afraid of you.

Vio. But, George, he 's not stark mad, is he? He does not rave, he is not horn-mad, George, is he?

Geo. Nay I know not that, but he talks <sup>35</sup> like a justice of peace, of a thousand matters, and to no purpose.

Vio. I 'll to the monastery. I shall be mad till I enjoy him, I shall be sick until I see him; yet when I do see him I shall weep out mine eyes. <sup>40</sup>

Geo. I 'd fain see a woman weep out her eyes! That 's as true as to say, a man's cloak burns, when it hangs in the water. I know you 'll weep, mistress, but what says the painted cloth? <sup>1</sup>

Trust not a woman when she cries, <sup>45</sup>
For she 'll pump water from her eyes
With a wet finger, <sup>2</sup> and in faster showers
Than April when he rains down flowers.

Vio. Ay, but George, that painted cloth is worthy to be hanged up for lying. All women <sup>50</sup> have not tears at will, unless they have good cause.

Geo. Ay, but mistress, how easily will they find a cause, and as one of our cheese-trenchers <sup>3</sup> says very learnedly, <sup>55</sup>

As out of wormwood bees suck honey,
As from poor clients lawyers firk money,
As parsley from a roasted cony:
So, though the day be ne'er so funny,
If wives will have it rain, down then it drives, <sup>60</sup>
The calmest husbands make the stormiest wives.

Vio. Tame, George. But I ha' done storming now.

Geo. Why that 's well done. Good mistress, throw aside this fashion of your humour, be <sup>65</sup> not so fantastical in wearing it; storm no more, long no more. This longing has made you come short of many a good thing that you might have had from my master. Here comes the duke.

Enter DUKE, FLUELLO, PIORATTO, and SINEZI.

Vio. O, I beseech you, pardon my offence, <sup>70</sup> In that I durst abuse your grace's warrant; Deliver forth my husband, good my lord.

Duke. Who is her husband?

Flu. Candido, my lord.

Duke. Where is he?

Vio. He 's among the lunatics;

He was a man made up without a gall; <sup>75</sup>
Nothing could move him, nothing could convert
His meek blood into fury; yet like a monster,
I often beat at the most constant rock
Of his unshaken patience, and did long
To vex him.

Duke. Did you so?

Vio. And for that purpose <sup>80</sup>
Had warrant from your grace, to carry him
To Bethlem Monastery, whence they will not free him

Without your grace's hand that sent him in.

Duke. You have long'd fair; 'tis you are mad,
I fear;

It 's fit to fetch him thence, and keep you
there. <sup>85</sup>

If he be mad, why would you have him forth?
Geo. An please your grace, he 's not stark mad, but only talks like a young gentleman, somewhat fantastically, that 's all. There 's a thousand about your court, city, and coun- <sup>90</sup> try madder than he.

Duke. Provide a warrant, you shall have our
hand.

Geo. Here 's a warrant ready drawn, my lord.

Duke. Get pen and ink, get pen and ink.
[Exit GEORGE.]

Enter CASTRUCHIO.

Cas. Where is my lord the duke?

Duke. How now! more madmen? <sup>95</sup>

Cas. I have strange news, my lord.

Duke. Of what? Of whom?

Cas. Of Infelice, and a marriage.

Duke. Ha! where? with whom?

Cas. Hippolito.

Re-enter GEORGE, with pen and ink.

Geo. Here, my lord.

Duke. Hence, with that woman! Void the room! <sup>100</sup>

Flu. Away! the duke 's next.

Geo. Whoop, come, mistress, the duke 's mad
too.

Exeunt [VIOLA and GEORGE].

Duke. Who told me that Hippolito was dead?

Cas. He that can make any man dead, the doctor: but, my lord, he 's as full of life as wild-<sup>105</sup> fire, and as quick. Hippolito, the doctor, and one more rid hence this evening; the inn at which they light is Bethlem Monastery; Infelice comes from Bergamo and meets them there.
Hippolito is mad, for he means this day to <sup>110</sup> be married; the afternoon is the hour, and Friar Anselmo is the knitter.

Duke. From Bergamo? Is 't possible? it cannot be.

It cannot be.

Cas. I will not swear, my lord;

But this intelligence I took from one <sup>115</sup>
Whose brains work in the plot.

What 's he?

Cas.

Matheo.

Flu. Matheo knows all.

Pior. He 's Hippolito's bosom.

Duke. How far stands Bethlem hence?

All.

Six or seven miles.

Duke. Is't so? Not married till the afternoon:
Stay, stay, let's work out some prevention.
How!

This is most strange; can none but mad men serve

To dress their wedding dinner? All of you Get presently to horse, disguise yourselves
Like country-gentlemen,
Or riding citizens, or so: and take
Each man a several path, but let us meet
At Bethlem Monastery; some space of time
Being spent between the arrival each of other,
As if we came to see the lunatics.

To horse, away! Be secret on your lives.
Love must be punisht that unjustly thrives.

Exeunt [all but FLUELLO].

Flu. Be secret on your lives! Castruchio,
You're but a scurvy spaniel. Honest lord, Good lady! Zounds, their love is just, 't is good,
And I'll prevent you, though I swim in blood.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter Friar ANSELMO, HIPPOLITO, MATHEO, and INFELICE.

Hip. Nay, nay, resolve,<sup>2</sup> good father, or deny.

Ans. You press me to an act both full of danger

And full of happiness; for I behold
Your father's frowns, his threats, nay, perhaps death

To him that dare do this: yet, noble lord,
Such comfortable beams break through these clouds

By this blest marriage, that your honour'd word
Being pawn'd in my defence, I will tie fast
The holy wedding-knot.

Hip. Tush, fear not the duke.

Ans. O son! wisely to fear, is to be free from fear.

Hip. You have our words, and you shall have our lives,

To guard you safe from all ensuing danger.

Mat. Ay, ay, chop 'em up, and away.

Ans. Stay, when is't fit for me, and safest for
you,

To entertain this business?

Hip. Not till the evening.

Ans. Be't so, there is a chapel stands hard
by,

Upon the west end of the abbey wall;
Thither convey yourselves, and when the sun
Hath turn'd his back upon this upper world,
I'll marry you; that done, no thund'ring voice
Can break the sacred bond: yet, lady, here
You are most safe.

Inf. Father, your love's most dear.

Mat. Ay, well said; lock us into some little room by ourselves, that we may be mad for an hour or two.

Hip. O, good Matheo, no, let's make no noise.

Mat. How! no noise! Do you know where you are? 'Sfoot, amongst all the madcaps in Milan; so that to throw the house out at window will be the better, and no man will suspect that we lurk here to steal mutton.<sup>3</sup> The more sober we are, the more scurvy 't is. And though the friar tell us that here we are safest,
I am not of his mind; for if those lay here that had lost their money, none would ever look after them; but here are none but those that have lost their wits, so that if hue and cry be made, hither they'll come; and my reason is, because none goes to be married till he be stark
mad.

Hip. Muffle yourselves, yonder's Fluello.

Enter FLUELLO.

Mat. Zounds!
Flu. O my lord, these cloaks are not for this rain! The tempest is too great. I come sweating to tell you of it, that you may get out of it.

Mat. Why, what's the matter?

Flu. What's the matter? You have matter'd it fair; the duke's at hand.

All. The duke?

Flu. The very duke.

Hip. Then all our plots
Are turn'd upon our heads and we're blown up With our own underminings. 'Sfoot, how comes he?

What villain durst betray our being here?

Flu. Castruchio told the duke, and Matheo here told Castruchio.

Hip. Would you betray me to Castruchio?

Mat. 'Sfoot, he damn'd himself to the pit of hell, if he spake on't again.

Hip. So did you swear to me: so were you damn'd.

Mat. Pox on 'em, and there be no faith in men, if a man shall not believe oaths. He took bread and salt, by this light, that he would never open his lips.

Hip. O God, O God!

Ans. Son, be not desperate,
Have patience, you shall trip your enemy
Down by his own slights.<sup>5</sup> How far is the duke
hence?

Flu. He's but new set out; Castruchio, Pioratto, and Sinezi come along with him. You have time enough yet to prevent<sup>6</sup> them, if you have but courage.

Ans. Ye shall steal secretly into the chapel,
And presently be married. If the duke
Abide here still, spite of ten thousand eyes,
You shall scape hence like friars.

Hip. O blest disguise! O happy man!

Ans. Talk not of Happiness till your clos'd
hand
Have her by th' forehead, like the lock of
Time.

Be nor too slow, nor hasty, now you climb
Up to the tower of bliss; only be wary
And patient, that's all. If you like my plot,
Build and despatch; if not, farewell, then not.

Hip. O yes, we do applaud it! we'll dispute
No longer, but will hence and execute.
Flu. You'll stay here: let us be gone.
The ground that frightened lovers tread upon
Is stuck with thorns.

Ans. Come, then, away, 't is meet,
To escape those thorns, to put on winged feet. [15
Execut [ANSELMO, HIPPOLITO, and INFELICE].

Mat. No words, I pray, *Flu.*ello, for 't stands us upon.

Flu. Oh, sir, let that be your lesson!
[Exit MATHEO.]

Alas, poor lovers! On what hopes and fears Men toss themselves for women! When she's got,
The best has in her that which pleaseth not.

Enter to FLUELLO the DUKE, CASTRUCHIO, PIORATTO, and SINEZI from several doors, muffled.

Duke. Who's there?

Cas. My lord.

Duke. Peace; send that "lord" away.
A lordship will spoil all; let's be all fellows.
What's he?

Cas. *Flu.*ello, or else, Sinezi, by his little [20 legs.

All. All friends, all friends.

Duke. What? Met upon the very point of time?

Is this the place?

Pio. This is the place, my lord.

Duke. Dream you on lordships? Come no more "lords," I pray: [20

You have not seen these lovers yet?

All. Not yet.

Duke. Castruchio, art thou sure this wedding feat

Is not till afternoon?

Cas. So 't is given out, my lord.

Duke. Nay, nay, 't is like; thieves must observe their hours;

Lovers watch minutes like astronomers; [25
How shall the interim hours by us be spent?

Flu. Let's all go to see the madmen.

All. Mass, content.

Enter a Sweeper.<sup>1</sup>

Duke. Oh, here comes one; question him, question him. [25

Flu. Now, honest fellow? dost thou belong to the house?

Sweep. Yes, forsooth, I am one of the implements; I sweep the madmen's rooms, and fetch straw for 'em, and buy chains to tie 'em, [25 and rods to whip 'em. I was a mad wag myself here, once, but I thank Father Anselmo, the lasht me into my right mind again.

Duke. Anselmo is the friar must marry them;
Question him where he is. [25

Cas. And where is Father Anselmo now?

Sweep. Marry, he's gone but e'en now.

Duke. Ah, well done. — Tell me, whither is he gone?

<sup>1</sup> Qq. Enter Towne like a Sweeper.

Sweep. Why to God a'mighty.

Flu. Ha, ha! this fellow's a fool, talks [15 idly.

Pio. Sirrah, are all the mad folks in Milan brought hither?

Sweep. How, all? There's a question indeed! Why if all the mad folks in Milan [15 should come hither, there would not be left ten men in the city.

Duke. Few gentlemen or courtiers here, ha?

Sweep. O yes, abundance, abundance!
Lands no sooner fall into their hands, [15
but straight they run out a' their wits. Citizens' sons and heirs are free of the house by their fathers' copy.<sup>2</sup> Farmers' sons come hither like geese, in flocks, and when they ha' sold all their cornfields, here they sit and pick the [15 straws.

Sin. Methinks you should have women here
as well as men.

Sweep. Oh, ay, a plague on 'em, there's no ho!<sup>3</sup> with 'em; they're madder than March [15
hares.

Flu. Are there no lawyers amongst you?

Sweep. Oh no, not one; never any lawyer.
We dare not let a lawyer come in, for he'll make 'em mad faster than we can recover [15
'em.

Duke. And how long is't ere you recover any of these?

Sweep. Why, according to the quantity of the moon that's got into 'em. An alderman's [15 son will be mad a great while, a very great while, especially if his friends left him well. A whore will hardly come to her wits again. A puritan, there's no hope of him, unless he may pull down the steeple, and hang himself i' [15 th' bell-ropes.

Flu. I perceive all sorts of fish come to your
net.

Sweep. Yes, in truth, we have blocks<sup>4</sup> for all heads; we have good store of wild-oats [15 here; for the courtier is mad at the citizen, the citizen is mad at the countryman; the shoemaker is mad at the cobbler, the cobbler at the carman; the punk is mad that the merchant's wife is no whore, the merchant's wife is mad [15 that the punk is so common a whore. Gods so, here's Father Anselmo; pray say nothing that I tell tales out of the school. [Exit.

Re-enter ANSELMO [and Servants].

All. God bless you, father.

Ans. I thank you, gentlemen.

Cas. Pray, may we see some of those wretched souls, [15

That here are in your keeping?

Ans. Yes, you shall;

But gentlemen, I must disarm you then.

There are of mad men, as there are of tame,
All humour'd not alike: we have here some,
So apish and fantastic, play with a feather, [15
And, though 't would grieve a soul to see God's image

So blemisht and defac'd, yet do they act

Such antic and such pretty lunacies,
That spite of sorrow they will make you smile.
Others again we have like hungry lions, <sup>125</sup>
Fierce as wild-bulls, untameable as flies,
And these have oftentimes from strangers' <sup>sides</sup>

Snatcht rapiers suddenly, and done much harm,
Whom if you 'll see, you must be weaponless.
All. With all our hearts.

Ans. [Giving their weapons to ANSELMO.]
Here, take these weapons in.—<sup>130</sup>
[Exit Servant with weapons.]

Stand off a little, pray; so, so, 't is well.
I'll show you here a man that was sometimes
A very grave and wealthy citizen;
Has serv'd a prenticeship to this misfortune,
Been here seven years, and dwelt in Bergamu. <sup>135</sup>

Duke. How fell he from his wits?

Ans. By loss at sea;
I'll stand aside, question him you alone,
For if he spy me, he'll not speak a word,
Unless he's th'roughly vext.

Discovers an old man, wrapt in a net.

Flu. Alas, poor soul!

Cas. A very old man. <sup>200</sup>

Duke. God speed, father!

1 Mad. God speed the plough, thou shalt not speed me.

Pio. We see you, old man, for all you dance in a net. <sup>205</sup>

1 Mad. True, but thou wilt dance in a halter, and I shall not see thee.

Ans. Oh do not vex him, pray.

Cas. Are you a fisherman, father?

1 Mad. No, I am neither fish nor flesh. <sup>210</sup>

Flu. What do you with that net then?

1 Mad. Dost not see, fool? There's a fresh salmon in 't; if you step one foot further, you'll be over shoes, for you see I'm over head and ears in the salt-water: and if you fall into <sup>[215]</sup> this whirl-pool where I am, y' are drown'd:
y' are a drown'd rat. I am fishing here for five ships, but I cannot have a good draught, for my net breaks still, and breaks; but I'll break some of your necks an I catch you in my clutches. <sup>[220]</sup> Stay, stay, stay, stay, where 's the wind?
where 's the wind? where 's the wind? where 's the wind? Out, you gulls, you goose-caps,<sup>1</sup> you gudgeon-eaters!<sup>2</sup> Do you look for the wind in the heavens? Ha, ha, ha, ha! no, no! Look <sup>[225]</sup> there, look there, look there! the wind is always at that door: hark how it blows, puff, puff, puff!

All. Ha, ha, ha!

1 Mad. Do you laugh at God's creatures? <sup>[230]</sup>
Do you mock old age, you rogues? Is this gray beard and head counterfeit that you cry, ha, ha, ha? Sirrah, art not thou my eldest son?

Pio. Yes, indeed, father.

1 Mad. Then th'art a fool, for my eldest <sup>[235]</sup> son had a polt-foot,<sup>3</sup> crooked legs, a verjuice<sup>4</sup> face, and a pear-colour'd beard. I made him a scholar, and he made himself a fool.—Sirrah, thou there: hold out thy hand.

Duke. My hand? Well, here 't is. <sup>240</sup>

1 Mad. Look, look, look, look! Has he not long nails, and short hair?

Flu. Yes, monstrous short hair, and abominable long nails.

1 Mad. Ten-penny nails, are they not? <sup>245</sup>

Flu. Yes, ten-penny nails.

1 Mad. Such nails had my second boy. Kneel down, thou varlet, and ask thy father's blessing. Such nails had my middlemost son, and I made him a promoter:<sup>5</sup> and he scrapt, and <sup>[250]</sup> scrapt, and scrapt, till he got the devil and all:
but he scrapt thus, and thus, and thus, and it went under his legs, till at length a company of kites, taking him for carrion, swept up all, all, all, all, all, all. If you love your <sup>[255]</sup> lives, look to yourselves: see, see, see, see, the Turks' galleys are fighting with my ships!
Bounce goes the guns! Oooh! cry the men!
Rumble, rumble, go the waters! Alas, there;
't is sunk, 't is sunk: I am undone, I am undone! You are the damn'd pirates have undone me: you are, by the Lord, you are, you are! — Stop 'em — you are!

Ans. Why, how now sirrah! Must I fall to tame you? <sup>265</sup>

1 Mad. Tame me! No, I'll be madder than a roasted cat. See, see, I am burnt with gunpowder, — these are our close fights!

Ans. I'll whip you, if you grow unruly thus.

1 Mad. Whip me? Out you toad! Whip <sup>[270]</sup> me? What justice is this, to whip me because I am a beggar? Alas! I am a poor man: a very poor man! I am starv'd, and have had no meat by this light, ever since the great flood; I am a poor man. <sup>275</sup>

Ans. Well, well, be quiet, and you shall have meat.

1 Mad. Ay, ay, pray do; for, look you, here be my guts: these are my ribs — you may look through my ribs — see how my guts come out! <sup>[280]</sup>
These are my red guts, my very guts, oh, oh!

Ans. Take him in there.

[Servants remove 1 Madman.]

All. A very piteous sight.

Cas. Father, I see you have a busy charge.

Ans. They must be us'd like children, pleas'd with toys. <sup>285</sup>

And anon whipt for their unruliness.

I'll show you now a pair quite different From him that 's gone. Here was all words; and these

Unless you urge 'em, seldom spend their speech,
But save their tongues.

[*Opens another door, from which enter
2 and 3 Madmen.*]

La, you; this hithermost
Fell from the happy quietness of mind. <sup>291</sup>

About a maiden that he lov'd, and died.

He followed her to church, being full of
tears,

And as her body went into the ground,
He fell stark mad. This is a married man, <sup>295</sup>
Was jealous of a fair, but, as some say,
A very virtuous wife; and that spoil'd him.

3 Mad.<sup>1</sup> All these are whoremongers, and lay with my wife: whore, whore, whore, whore, whore! 300

Flu. Observe him.

3 Mad. Gaffer shoemaker, you pull'd on my wife's pumps, and then crept into her pantofles:<sup>2</sup> lie there, lie there! — This was her tailor. 304
You cut out her loose-bodied gown, and put in a yard more than I allowed her; lie there by the shoemaker. O master doctor! are you here? You gave me a purgation, and then crept into my wife's chamber to feel her pulses, and 309 you said, and she said, and her maid said, that they went pit-a-pat, pit-a-pat, pit-a-pat. Doctor, I'll put you anon into my wife's urinal. Heigh, come aloft, Jack! This was her school-master, and taught her to play upon the virginals, 314 and still his jacks<sup>3</sup> leapt up, up. You prickt<sup>4</sup> her out nothing but bawdy lessons, but I'll prick you all, fiddler — doctor — tailor — shoemaker — shoemaker — fiddler — doctor — tailor! So I lie with my wife again, now. 319

Cas. See how he notes the other, now he feeds.

3 Mad. Give me some porridge.

2 Mad. I'll give thee none.

3 Mad. Give me some porridge.

2 Mad. I'll not give thee a bit. 325

3 Mad. Give me that flap-dragon.<sup>5</sup>

2 Mad. I'll not give thee a spoonful. Thou liest, it's no dragon, 't is a parrot that I bought for my sweetheart, and I'll keep it.

3 Mad. Here 's an almond for parrot.<sup>6</sup> 330

2 Mad. Hang thyself!

3 Mad. Here 's a rope for parrot.<sup>6</sup>

2 Mad. Eat it, for I'll eat this.

3 Mad. I'll shoot at thee, an thou 't give me none. 335

2 Mad. Wu't thou?

3 Mad. I'll run a tilt at thee, an thou 't give me none.

2 Mad. Wu't thou? Do an thou dar'st.

3 Mad. Bounce! [Strikes him.] 340

2 Mad. O — oh! I am slain! Murder, murder, murder! I am slain; my brains are beaten out.

Ans. How now, you villains! Bring me whips: I'll whip you. 345

2 Mad. I am dead! I am slain! ring out the bell, for I am dead.

Duke. How will you do now, sirrah? You ha' kill'd him. 349

3 Mad. I'll answer 't at sessions: he was eating of almond-butter, and I long'd for 't. The child had never been delivered out of my belly, if I had not kill'd him. I'll answer 't at sessions, so my wife may be burnt i' th' hand, too. 354

Ans. Take 'em in both: bury him, for he's dead.

2 Mad. Indeed, I am dead; put me, I pray, into a good pit-hole.

3 Mad. I'll answer 't at sessions. 350
[Servants remove 2 and 3 Madmen.]

Enter BELLAFRONT mad.

Ans. How now, huswife, whither gad you?

Bell. A-nutting forsooth. How do you, gaffer? How do you, gaffer? There's a French curtesy for you, too.

Flu. 'T is Bellafront!

Pio. 'T is the punk, by th' Lord! 365

Duke. Father, what's she, I pray?

Ans. As yet I know not, She came in but this day; talks little idly, And therefore has the freedom of the house.

Bell. Do not you know me? — nor you? — nor you? 370

All. No, indeed.

Bell. Then you are an ass, — and you an ass, — and you are an ass, — for I know you.

Ans. Why, what are they? Come, tell me, what are they? 375

Bell. They're fish-wives, will you buy any gudgeons?

God's santy!<sup>7</sup> yonder come friars, I know them too. —

Enter HIPPOLITO, MATHEO, and INFELICE disguised in the habits of Friars.

How do you, friar?

Ans. Nay, nay, away, you must not trouble friars. — 379

[Aside to HIPPOLITO, etc.] The duke is here, speak nothing.

Bell. Nay, indeed, you shall not go: we'll run at barley-break first, and you shall be in hell.<sup>8</sup> 384

Mat. My punk turn'd mad whore, as all her fellows are!

Hip. Say nothing; but steal hence, when you spy time.

Ans. I'll lock you up, if you're unruly: fie!
Bell. Fie! Marry, so, they shall not go indeed, till I ha' told 'em their fortunes. 389

Duke. Good father, give her leave.

Bell. Ay, pray, good father, and I'll give you my blessing.

Ans. Well then, be brief, but if you're thus unruly,

I'll have you lockt up fast. 395

Pio. Come, to their fortunes.

Bell. Let me see, one, two, three, and four. I'll begin with the little friar<sup>9</sup> first. Here's a fine hand, indeed! I never saw friar have such a dainty hand: here's a hand for a lady! 400
Here's your fortune: —

You love a friar better than a nun;
Yet long you'll love no friar, nor no friar's son.
Bow a little, the line of life is out, yet I'm afraid,

<sup>8</sup> In the game of barley-break the ground was divided into three compartments, the middle one of which was called "hell."

For all you 're holy, you 'll not die a maid. 405
God give you joy!

Now to you, Friar Tuck.

Mat. God send me good luck!

Bell. You love one, and one loves you:

You 're a false knave, and she 's a Jew, 410
Here is a dial that false ever goes —

Mat. O your wit drops!

Bell. Troth, so does your nose —
Nay let 's shake hands with you too; pray open, here 's a fine hand!

Ho friar, ho! God be here! 415

So he had need. You 'll keep good cheer,

Here 's a free table,<sup>1</sup> but a frozen breast,

For you 'll starve those that love you best;

Yet you have good fortune, for if I 'm no liar,

Then you are no friar, nor you, nor you no friar,
Haha, haha! Discovers them. 421

Duke. Are holy habits cloaks for villany?

Draw all your weapons!

Hip. Do; draw all your weapons.

Duke. Where are your weapons? Draw! 425

All. The friar has gull'd us of 'em.

Mat. O rare trick!

You ha' learnt one mad point of arithmetic.

Hip. Why swells your spleen so high?

Against what bosom

Would you your weapons draw? Her's? 'Tis your daughter's? 429

Mine? 'Tis your son's.

Duke. Son?

Mat. Son, by yonder sun.

Hip. You cannot shed blood here but 't is your own;

To spill your own blood were damnation.

Lay smooth that wrinkled brow, and I will throw

Myself beneath your feet:

Let it be rugged still and flinted ore, 435

What can come forth but sparkles, that will burn

Yourself and us? She's mine; my claim's most
good;

She's mine by marriage, though she 's yours by blood.

[Ans. kneeling.] I have a hand, dear lord,
deep in this act,

For I foresaw this storm, yet willingly 440

Put forth to meet it. Oft have I seen a father

Washing the wounds of his dear son in tears.

A son to curse the sword that struck his father,

Both slain 't th' quarrel of your families. 444

Those scars are now ta'en off; and I beseech you

To seal our pardon! All was to this end,

To turn the ancient hates of your two houses

To fresh green friendship, that your loves might look

Like the spring's forehead, comfortably sweet;

And your vext souls in peaceful union meet. 450

Their blood will now be yours, yours will be theirs,

And happiness shall crown your silver hairs.

Flu. You see, my lord, there 's now no remedy.

All. Beseech your lordship!

Duke. You beseech fair, you have me in place
fit 455

To bride me. — Rise friar, you may be glad

You can make madmen tame, and tame men mad.

Since Fate hath conquer'd, I must rest content;

To strive now, would but add new punishment.

I yield unto your happiness; be blest, 460

Our families shall henceforth breathe in rest.

All. Oh, happy change!

Duke. Your's now is my content,
I throw upon your joys my full consent.

Bell. Am not I a good girl, for finding 464

“the friar in the well?”<sup>2</sup> Gods so, you are a brave man! Will not you buy me some sugarplums, because I am so good a fortune-teller?

Duke. Would thou hadst wit, thou pretty soul, to ask,

As I have will to give. 469

Bell. Pretty soul? A pretty soul is better than a pretty body. Do not you know my pretty soul? I know you. Is not your name Matheo?

Mat. Yes, lamb.

Bell. Baa! lamb! there you lie, for I am mutton.<sup>3</sup> — Look, fine man! he was mad for me 475 once, and I was mad for him once, and he was mad for her once, and were you never mad?

Yes, I warrant; I had a fine jewel once, a very fine jewel, and that naughty man stole it away from me, — a very fine and a rich jewel. 480

Duke. What jewel, pretty maid?

Bell. Maid? Nay, that 's a lie. O, 't was a very rich jewel, called a maidenhead, and had not you it, leerer?

Mat. Out, you mad ass! away. 485

Duke. Had he thy maidenhead?

He shall make thee amends, and marry thee.

Bell. Shall he? O brave Arthur of Bradley<sup>4</sup>
then!

Duke. And if he bear the mind of a gentleman,

I know he will. 491

Mat. I think I rifled her of some such paltry

jewel.

Duke. Did you? Then marry her; you see the wrong

Has led her spirits into a lunacy. 495

Mat. How? Marry her, my lord? 'Sfoot, marry a madwoman? Let a man get the tame-st wife he can come by, she 'll be mad enough afterward, do what he can.

Duke. Nay then, Father Anselmo here shall do his best, 500

To bring her to her wits; and will you then?

Mat. I cannot tell, I may choose.

Duke. Nay, then, law shall compel. I tell you,

sir,

So much her hard fate moves me, you should not breathe

Under this air, unless you married her. 505

Mat. Well, then, when her wits stand in their right place,

I 'll marry her.

Bell. I thank your grace. — Matheo, thou art

I am not mad, but put on this disguise,
 Only for you, my lord; for you can tell <sup>510</sup>
 Much wonder of me; but you are gone: farewell.
 Matheo, thou didst first turn my soul black,
 Now make it white again. I do protest,
 I'm pure as fire now, chaste as Cynthia's breast.
Hip. I durst be sworn, Matheo, she's indeed.
Mat. Cony-catcht, gull'd! Must I sail in your fly-boat, <sup>516</sup>
 Because I helpt to rear your main-mast first?
 Plague 'found<sup>1</sup> you for 't, 'tis well.
 The cuckold's stamp goes current in all nations,
 Some men ha' horns giv'n them at their creations; <sup>520</sup>

If I be one of those, why so: 't is better
 To take a common wench, and make her good,
 Than one that simpers, and at first will scarce
 Be tempted forth over the threshold door,
 Yet in one se'n'night, zounds, turns arrant
 whore! <sup>525</sup>
 Come wench, thou shalt be mine, give me thy golls,<sup>2</sup>
 We 'll talk of legs hereafter.— See, my lord,
 God give us joy!
All. God give you joy! <sup>529</sup>

Enter Candido's wife [VIOLA] and GEORGE.

Geo. Come mistress, we are in Bedlam now;
 mass and see, we come in pudding-time, for here's the duke.

Vio. My husband, good my lord!

Duke. Have I thy husband? <sup>534</sup>

Cast. It's Candido, my lord, he's here among the lunatics. Father Anselmo, pray fetch him forth. [Exit ANSELMO.] This mad woman is his wife, and though she were not with child, yet did she long most spitefully to have her <sup>[539]</sup> husband mad; and because she would be sure he should turn Jew, she placed him here in Bethlem. Yonder he comes.

Enter CANDIDO with ANSELMO.

Duke. Come hither, signor; are you mad?

Cand. You are not mad.

Duke. Why, I know that. <sup>545</sup>

Cand. Then may you know I am not mad, that know

You are not mad, and that you are the duke.
 None is mad here but one.— How do you, wife?
 What do you long for now?— Pardon, my lord: <sup>549</sup>

She had lost her child's nose else. I did cut out Pennyworths of lawn, the lawn was yet mine
 own:

A carpet was my gown, yet 't was mine own:
 I wore my man's coat, yet the cloth mine own:

Had a crackt crown, the crown was yet mine
 own. <sup>554</sup>

She says for this I'm mad: were her words true,
 I should be mad indeed. O foolish skill!<sup>3</sup>
 Is patience madness? I'll be a madman still.

Vio. Forgive me, and I'll vex your spirit no more. [Kneels.]

Duke. Come, come, we'll have you friends;
 join hearts, join hands. <sup>560</sup>

Cand. See, my lord, we are even,—

Nay, rise, for ill deeds kneel unto none but Heaven.

Duke. Signor, methinks patience has laid on
 you

Such heavy weight, that you should loathe it—
Cand. Loathe it!

Duke. For he whose breast is tender, blood so cool, <sup>565</sup>

That no wrongs heat it, is a patient fool.

What comfort do you find in being so calm?

Cand. That which green wounds receive from sovereign balm. <sup>568</sup>

Patience, my lord! why, 't is the soul of peace;
 Of all the virtues, 't is nearest kin to Heaven;
 It makes men look like gods. The best of men
 That e'er wore earth about him, was a sufferer,
 A soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit,
 The first true gentleman that ever breath'd.

The stock of patience, then, cannot be poor; <sup>575</sup>
 All it desires, it has; what monarch more?

It is the greatest enemy to law

That can be; for it doth embrace all wrongs,
 And so chains up lawyers' and women's tongues.

'T is the perpetual prisoner's liberty, <sup>580</sup>
 His walks and orchards: 't is the bond slave's

freedom,
 And makes him seem proud of each iron chain,
 As though he wore it more for state than pain:

It is the beggars' music, and thus sings, <sup>584</sup>
 Although their bodies beg, their souls are kings.

O my dread liege! It is the sap of bliss
 Rears us aloft, makes men and angels kiss.

And last of all, to end a household strife,
 It is the honey 'gainst a waspish wife.

Duke. Thou giv'st it lively colours: who dare say <sup>590</sup>

He's mad, whose words march in so good array?
 'T were sin all women should such husbands

have,
 For every man must then be his wife's slave.

Come, therefore, you shall teach our court to shine,

So calm a spirit is worth a golden mine. <sup>596</sup>
 Wives with meek husbands that to vex them

long,
 In Bedlam must they dwell, else dwell they wrong. Exeunt.

ACT I

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter at one door BERALDO, CAROLO, FONTINELL, and ASTOLFO, with Serving-men, or Pages, attending on them; at another door enter LODOVICO, meeting them.

Lod. Good day, gallants.

All. Good morrow, sweet Lodovico.

Lod. How dost thou, Carolo?

Car. Faith, as the physicians do in a plague, see the world sick, and am well myself.

Font. Here's a sweet morning, gentlemen.

Lod. Oh, a morning to tempt Jove from his ningle,<sup>2</sup> Ganymede; which is but to give dairymenches green gowns as they are going a-milking. What, is thy lord stirring yet?

Ast. Yes, he will not be horst this hour, sure.

Ber. My lady swears he shall, for she longs to be at court.

Car. Oh, we shall ride switch and spur; would we were there once.

Enter BRYAN, the Footman.

Lod. How now, is thy lord ready?

Bry. No, so crees sa'<sup>3</sup> me; my lady will have some little ting in her pelly first.

Car. Oh, then they'll to breakfast.

Lod. Footman, does my lord ride i'th' coach with my lady, or on horseback?

Bry. No, foot, la; my lady will have me lord sheet wid her, my lord will sheet in de one side, and my lady sheet in de toder side. Exit.

Lod. My lady sheet in de toder side! Did you ever hear a rascal talk so like a pagan? Is 't not strange that a fellow of his star, should be seen here so long in Italy, yet speak so from a Christian?

Enter ANTONIO GEORGIO, a poor scholar [with a book].

Ast. An Irishman in Italy! that so strange! Why, the nation have running heads.

Exchange walk.<sup>5</sup>

Lod. Nay, Carolo, this is more strange, I ha' been in France, there's few of them. Marry, England they count a warm chimney corner, and there they swarm like crickets to the crevice of a brew-house; but sir, in England I have noted one thing.

All. What's that, what's that of England?

Lod. Marry this, sir, — What's he yonder?

Ber. A poor fellow would speak with my lord.

Lod. In England, sir, — troth, I ever laugh when I think on't: to see a whole nation should be markt i'th' forehead, as a man may say, with one iron: why, sir, there all costermongers are Irishmen.

Car. Oh, that's to show their antiquity, as coming from Eve, who was an apple-wife, and they take after the mother.

All. Good, good! ha, ha!

Lod. Why, then, should all your chimney-sweepers likewise be Irishmen? Answer that now; come, your wit.

Car. Faith, that's soon answered; for St. Patrick, you know, keeps purgatory; he makes

the fire, and his countrymen could do nothing, [56
if they cannot sweep the chimneys.

All. Good again.

Lod. Then, sir, have you many of them, like this fellow, especially those of his hair, footmen to noblemen and others, and the knaves are [60 very faithful where they love. By my faith, very proper men, many of them, and as active as the clouds,—whirr, hah!

All. Are they so?

Lod. And stout! exceeding stout; why, I [65 warrant, this precious wild villain, if he were put to 't, would fight more desperately than sixteen Dunkirks.<sup>1</sup>

Ast. The women, they say, are very fair.

Lod. No, no, our country bona-robas,<sup>2</sup> [70 oh! are the sugarest, delicious rogues!

Ast. Oh, look, he has a feeling of them!

Lod. Not I, I protest. There's a saying when they commend nations. It goes, the Irishman for his hand, the Welshmen for a leg, [75 the Englishman for a face, the Dutchman for a beard.

Fon. I' faith, they may make swabbers<sup>3</sup> of them.

Lod. The Spaniard,—let me see,—for a little foot, I take it; the Frenchman,—what [81 a pox hath he? And so of the rest. Are they at breakfast yet? Come walk.

Ast. This Lodovico is a notable tongued fellow.

Fon. Discourses well. [85

Ber. And a very honest gentleman.

Ast. Oh! he's well valued by my lord.

Enter BELLAFRONT, with a petition.

Fon. How now, how now, what's she?

Ber. Let's make towards her.

Bell. Will it be long, sir, ere my lord come [90 forth?

Ast. Would you speak with my lord?

Lod. How now, what's this, a nurse's bill? Hath any here got thee with child and now will not keep it? [95

Bell. No, sir, my business is unto my lord.

Lod. He's about his own wife's now, he'll hardly dispatch two causes in a morning.

Ast. No matter what he says, fair lady; he's a knight, there's no hold to be taken at his words. [101

Fon. My lord will pass this way presently.

Ber. A pretty, plump rogue.

Ast. A good lusty, bouncing baggage.

Ber. Do you know her? [105

Lod. A pox on her, I was sure her name was in my table-book once. I know not of what cut her die is now, but she has been more common than tobacco; this is she that had the name of the Honest Whore. [110

All. Is this she?

Lod. This is the blackamoor that by washing was turned white; this is the birding-piece new scoured; this is she that, if any of her religion can be saved, was saved by my lord Hippolito.

Ast. She has been a goodly creature. [115

Lod. She has been! that's the epitaph of all whores. I'm well acquainted with the poor gentleman her husband. Lord! what fortunes that man has overreached! She knows not [120 me, yet I have been in her company; I scarce know her, for the beauty of her cheek hath, like the moon, suff'ered strange eclipses since I beheld it: but women are like medlars,—no sooner ripe but rotten: [125

A woman last was made, but is spent first, Yet man is oft proved in performance worst.

All. My lord is come.

Enter HIPPOLITO, INFELICE, and two Waiting women.

Hip. We ha' wasted half this morning. Morrow, Lodovico. [130

Lod. Morrow, madam.

Hip. Let's away to horse.

All. Ay, to horse, to horse.

Bell. I do beseech your lordship, let your eye read o'er this wretched paper. [135

Hip. I'm in haste; pray thee, good woman, take some apter time.

Inf. Good woman, do.

Bell. Oh, 'las! it does concern a poor man's life. [140

Hip. Life!—Sweetheart, seat yourself, I'll but read this and come.

Lod. What stockings have you put on this morning, madam? If they be not yellow,<sup>4</sup> change them; that paper is a letter from some wench to your husband. [145

Inf. Oh sir, that cannot make me jealous.

Exeunt [all except HIPPOLITO, BELLAFRONT, and ANTONIO].

Hip. Your business, sir? To me?

Ant. Yes, my good lord. [149

Hip. Presently, sir.—Are you Matheo's wife?

Bell. That most unfortunate woman.

Hip. I'm sorry these storms are fallen on him; I love Matheo, And any good shall do him; he and I Have seal'd two bonds of friendship, which are strong [155

In me, however fortune does him wrong. He speaks here he's condemned. Is't so?

Bell. Too true.

Hip. What was he whom he killed? Oh, his name's here;

Old Giacomo, son to the Florentine; Giacomo, a dog, that, to meet profit, [160

Would to the very eyelids wade in blood Of his own children. Tell Matheo,

The duke, my father, hardly shall deny His signed pardon. 'T was fair fight, yes,

If rumour's tongue go true; so writes he here.— [165

To-morrow morning I return from court, Pray be you here then.—I'll have done, sir, straight:— [To ANTONIO.]

But in troth say, are you Matheo's wife? You have forgot me.

Bell. No, my lord.

That made you smooth to run an even bias, 170
 You know I lov'd you when your very soul
 Was full of discord: art not a good wench still?
Bell. Umph, when I had lost my way to Heaven, you show'd it:
 I was new born that day.

Re-enter LODOVICO.

Lod. 'Sfoot, my lord, your lady asks if [175 you have not left your wench yet? When you get in once, you never have done. Come, come, come, pay your old score, and send her packing;
 come.

Hip. Ride softly on before, I'll o'ertake
 you. 181
Lod. Your lady swears she'll have no riding on before, without ye.

Hip. Prithee, good Lodovico.

Lod. My lord, pray hasten. 185

Hip. I come. [Exit LODOVICO.]

To-morrow let me see you, fare you well;
 Commend me to Matheo. Pray one word more:
 Does not your father live about the court?

Bell. I think he does, but such rude spots of shame 190
 Stick on my cheek, that he scarce knows my name.

Hip. Orlando Friscobaldo, is 't not?

Bell. Yes, my lord.

Hip. What does he for you?

Bell. All he should: when children
 From duty start, parents from love may swerve.
 He nothing does; for nothing I deserve. 195

Hip. Shall I join him unto you, and restore you to wanted grace?

Bell. It is impossible. [Exit BELLAFRONT.]

Hip. It shall be put to trial: fare you well.
 The face I would not look on! Sure then 't was rare, 201

When, in despite of grief, 't is still thus fair.

Now, sir, your business with me.

Ant. I am bold

T'express my love and duty to your lordship
 In these few leaves.

Hip. A book!

Ant. Yes, my good lord. 205

Hip. Are you a scholar?

Ant. Yes, my lord, a poor one.

Hip. Sir, you honour me.
 Kings may be scholars' patrons, but, faith, tell
 me,

To how many hands besides hath this bird
 flown,

How many partners share with me?

Ant. Not one, 210

In troth, not one: your name I held more dear.
 I'm not, my lord, of that low character.

Hip. Your name I pray?

Ant. Antonio Georgio.

Hip. Of Milan?

Ant. Yes, my lord,

Hip. I'll borrow leave
 To read you o'er, and then we'll talk: till then Drink up this gold; good wits should love good wine; 215

This of your loves, the earnest that of mine. —
 [Gives money.]

Re-enter BRYAN.

How now, sir, where's your lady? Not gone yet?

Bry. I fart di lady is run away from dee, a mighty deal of ground; she sent me back [220 for dine own sweet face. I pray dee come, my lord, away, wu't tow go now?

Hip. Is the coach gone? Saddle my horse, the sorrel. 224

Bry. A pox a' de horse's nose, he is a lousy rascally fellow. When I came to gird his belly, his scurvy guts rumbled; di horse farted in my face, and dow knowest, an Irishman cannot abide a fart. But I have saddled de hobby-horse, di fine hobby is ready. I pray dee, my good [230 sweet lord, wu't tow go now, and I will run to de devil before dee?

Hip. Well, sir. — I pray let 'a see you, master scholar. 234

Bry. Come, I pray dee, wu't come, sweet face? Go. Exeunt.

SCENE II.<sup>1</sup>

Enter LODOVICO, CAROLO, ASTOLFO, and BER-ALDO.

Lod. Godso, gentlemen, what do we forget?

All. What?

Lod. Are not we all enjoined as this day, — Thursday is 't not? Ay, as that day to be at the linen-draper's house at dinner? 5

Car. Signor Candido, the patient man.

Ast. Afore Jove, true, upon this day he's married.

Ber. I wonder, that being so stung with a wasp before, he dares venture again to [10 come about the eaves amongst bees.

Lod. Oh 't is rare sucking a sweet honey comb!
 Pray Heaven his old wife be buried deep enough, that she rise not up to call for her dance! The poor fiddlers' instruments would crack for [15 it; she'd tickle them. At any hand let's try what mettle is in his new bride; if there be none, we'll put in some. Troth, it's a very noble citizen, I pity he should marry again; I'll walk along, for it is a good old fellow. 20

Car. I warrant the wives of Milan would give any fellow twenty thousand ducats, that could but have the face to beg of the duke, that all the citizens in Milan might be bound to the peace of patience, as the linen-draper is. 25

Lod. Oh, fie upon 't! 't would undo all us that are courtiers; we should have no whoo with the wenches then.

Enter HIPOLITO.

All. My lord's come.

Hip. How now, what news? 30

All. None.

Lod. Your lady is with the duke, her father.

Hip. And we'll to them both presently —

Enter ORLANDO FRISCOBALDO.

Who's that!

All. Signor Friscobaldo. 35

<sup>1</sup> An apartment in the Duke's Palace.

Hip. Friscobaldo, oh! pray call him, and leave me; we two have business.

Car. Ho Signor! Signor Friscobaldo! The Lord Hippolito.

Ereunt [all but HIPPOLITO and FRISCOBALDO].

Orl. My noble lord: my Lord Hippolito! [40 the duke's son! his brave daughter's brave husband! how does your honour'd lordship! Does your nobility remember so poor a gentleman as Signor Orlando Friscobaldo! old mad Orlando!

Hip. Oh, sir, our friends! they ought to be [40 unto us as our jewels, as dearly valued, being locked up, and unseen, as when we wear them in our hands. I see, Friscobaldo, age hath not command of your blood; for all Time's sickle has gone over you, you are Orlando still. 50

Orl. Why, my lord, are not the fields mown and cut down, and stript bare, and yet wear they not pied coats again? Though my head be like a leek, white, may not my heart be like the blade, green? 55

Hip. Scarce can I read the stories on your brow,
Which age hath writ there; you look youthful still.

Orl. I eat snakes,<sup>1</sup> my lord, I eat snakes. My heart shall never have a wrinkle in it, so long as I can cry "Hem," with a clear voice. 60

Hip. You are the happier man, sir.

Orl. Happy man? I'll give you, my lord, the true picture of a happy man. I was turning leaves over this morning, and found it; an excellent Italian painter drew it; if I have it in [65 the right colours, I'll bestow it on your lordship.

Hip. I stay for it.

Orl. He that makes gold his wife, but not his whore,

He that at noon-day walks by a prison door, 70

He that i' th' sun is neither beam nor mote,

He that's not mad after a petticoat,

He for whom poor men's curses dig no grave,

He that is neither lord's nor lawyer's slave,

He that makes this his sea, and that his shore, 75

He that in's coffin is richer than before,

He that counts youth his sword, and age his staff,

He whose right hand carves his own epitaph,

He that upon his deathbed is a swan,

And dead, no crow — he is a happy man. 80

Hip. It's very well; I thank you for this picture.

Orl. After this picture, my lord, do I strive to have my face drawn: for I am not covetous, am not in debt; sit neither at the duke's [85 side, nor lie at his feet. Wenching and I have done; no man I wrong, no man I fear, no man I fee; I take heed how far I walk, because I know yonder's my home; I would not die like a rich man, to carry nothing away save a [90 winding sheet; but like a good man, to leave Orlando behind me. I sowed leaves in my youth, and I reap now books in my age. I fill this hand, and empty this; and when the bell shall toll for me, if I prove a swan, and go [95 singing to my nest, why so! If a crow! throw me out like a carrion, and pick out mine eyes. May not old Friscobaldo, my lord, be merry now! ha?

Hip. You may; would I were partner in [100 your mirth.

Orl. I have a little, have all things, I have nothing; I have no wife, I have no child, have no chick; and why should not I be in my jocundare? 2 105

Hip. Is your wife then departed?

Orl. She's an old dweller in those high countries, yet not from me. Here, she's here: but, before me, when a knave and a quean are married, they commonly walk like serjeants [110 together: but a good couple are seldom parted.

Hip. You had a daughter too, sir, had you not?

Orl. O my lord! this old tree had one branch, and but one branch growing out of it. It was young, it was fair, it was straight; I prun'd [115 it daily, drest it carefully, kept it from the wind, help'd it to the sun, yet for all my skill in planting, it grew crooked, it bore crabs. I hewed it down; what's become of it, I neither know, nor care. 120

Hip. Then I can tell you what's become of it; That branch is wither'd.

Orl. So 't was long ago.

Hip. Her name I think was Bellafront; she's dead.

Orl. Ha? dead?

Hip. Yes; what of her was left, not worth the keeping, 125

Even in my sight was thrown into a grave.

Orl. Dead! my last and best peace go with her! I see Death's a good trencherman; he can eat coarse homely meat, as well as the daintiest. 130

Hip. Why, Friscobaldo, was she homely?

Orl. O my lord! a strumpet is one of the devil's vines; all the sins, like so many poles, are stuck upright out of hell, to be her props, that she may spread upon them. And when [135 she's ripe, every slave has a pull at her, then must she be prest. The young beautiful grape sets the teeth of lust on edge, yet to taste that lickerish<sup>2</sup> wine, is to drink a man's own damnation. Is she dead? 140

Hip. She's turned to earth.

Orl. Would she were turn'd to Heaven! Umph, is she dead? I am glad the world has lost one of his idols; no whoremonger will at midnight beat at the doors. In her grave [145 sleep all my shame, and her own; and all my sorrows, and all her sins!

Hip. I'm glad you're wax, not marble; you are made

Of man's best temper; there are now good hopes

That all these heaps of ice about your heart, 150
By which a father's love was frozen up,
Are thaw'd in these sweet showers, fetcht from your eyes;

We are ne'er like angels till our passion dies.
She is not dead, but lives under worse fate; <sup>154</sup>
I think she's poor; and, more to clip her wings,
Her husband at this hour lies in the jail,
For killing of a man. To save his blood, Join all your force with mine: mine shall be shown:

The getting of his life preserves your own. <sup>159</sup>
Orl. In my daughter, you will say! Does she live then? I am sorry I wasted tears upon a harlot; but the best is I have a handkercher to drink them up; soap can wash them all out again. Is she poor?

Hip. Trust me, I think she is. <sup>165</sup>
Orl. Then she's a right strumpet; I ne'er knew any of their trade rich two years together.
Sieves can hold no water, nor harlots hoard up money; they have many vents, too many shuces to let it out; taverns, tailors, bawds, <sup>170</sup> panders, fiddlers, swaggerers, fools, and knaves do all wait upon a common harlot's trencher.
She is the gallipot to which these drones fly, not for love to the pot, but for the sweet sucket <sup>1</sup> within it, her money, her money. <sup>176</sup>

Hip. I almost dare pawn my word, her bosom Gives warmth to no such snakes. When did you see her?

Orl. Not seventeen summers.

Hip. Is your hate so old? <sup>179</sup>

Orl. Older; it has a white head, and shall never die till she be buried: her wrongs shall be my bedfellow.

Hip. Work yet his life, since in it lives her fame.

Orl. No let him hang, and half her infamy departs out of the world. I hate him for her; <sup>185</sup> he taught her first to taste poison; I hate her for herself, because she refused my physic.

Hip. Nay, but Friscobaldo! —

Orl. I detest her, I defy <sup>2</sup> both; she's not mine, she's — <sup>190</sup>

Hip. Hear her but speak.

Orl. I love no mermaids, I'll not be caught with a quail-pipe. <sup>3</sup>

Hip. You're now beyond all reason. <sup>194</sup>

Orl. I am then a beast. Sir, I had rather be a beast, and not dishonour my creation, than be a doting father, and like Time, be the destruction of mine own brood.

Hip. Is't dotage to relieve your child, being poor? <sup>199</sup>

Orl. Is't fit for an old man to keep a whore?

Hip. 'T is charity, too.

Orl. 'T is foolery; relieve her!

Were her cold limbs stretcht out upon a bier,
I would not sell this dirt under my nails
To buy her an hour's breath, nor give this hair,
Unless it were to choke her. <sup>206</sup>

Hip. Fare you well, for I'll trouble you no more. Exit.

Orl. And fare you well, sir. Go thy ways;
we have few lords of thy making, that love wenches for their honesty. 'Las my girl! <sup>210</sup> art thou poor? Poverty dwells next door to despair, there's but a wall between them. Despair is one of hell's catch-poles; and lest that devil arrest her, I'll to her. Yet she shall not know me; she shall drink of my wealth, <sup>215</sup> as beggars do of running water, freely, yet never know from what fountain's head it flows.

Shall a silly bird pick her own breast to nourish her young ones, and can a father see his child starve? That were hard; the pelican does <sup>220</sup> it, and shall not I? Yes, I will victual the camp for her, but it shall be by some stratagem.
That knave there, her husband, will be hanged,
I fear; I'll keep his neck out of the noose if I can, he shall not know how. <sup>225</sup>

Enter two Serving-men.

How now, knaves? Whither wander you?

1 Ser. To seek your worship.

Orl. Stay, which of you has my purse? What money have you about you? <sup>230</sup>

2 Ser. Same fifteen or sixteen pounds, sir.

Orl. Give it me. [Takes purse.] — I think
I have some gold about me; yes, it's well. Leave my lodging at court, and get you home. Come, sir, though I never turned any man out of doors, yet I'll be so bold as to pull your coat over your ears. <sup>235</sup>

[*ORLANDO puts on the coat of 1
Serving-man, and gives him in exchange his cloak.*]

1 Ser. What do you mean to do, sir?

Orl. Hold thy tongue, knave; take thou my cloak. I hope I play not the paltry merchant in this bart'ring; bid the steward of my <sup>240</sup> house sleep with open eyes in my absence, and to look to all things. Whatsoever I command by letters to be done by you, see it done. So, does it sit well? <sup>244</sup>

2 Ser. As if it were made for your worship.

Orl. You proud varlets, you need not be ashamed to wear blue, <sup>4</sup> when your master is one of your fellows. Away, do not see me.

Both. This is excellent. Exeunt. <sup>249</sup>

Orl. I should put on a worse suit, too; perhaps I will. My vizard is on; now to this masque. Say I should shave off this honour of an old man, or tie it up shorter. Well, I will spoil a good face for once.

My beard being off, how should I look? Even like <sup>255</sup>

A winter cuckoo, or unfeather'd owl;
Yet better lose this hair, than lose her soul.

Exit.

[SCENE III.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter CANDIDO, LODOVICO, CAROLO, [ASTOL-FO], other guests, and Bride with Prentices.

Cand. O gentlemen, so late! Y' are very welcome, pray sit down.

Lod. Carolo, did'st e'er see such a nest of caps? <sup>6</sup>

Ast. Methinks it's a most civil and most comely sight.

Lod. What does he i' th' middle look like? :

As. Troth, like a spire steeple in a country village overpeering so many thatcht houses.

Lod. It's rather a long pike-staff against so many bucklers without pikes; <sup>1</sup> they sit for all the world like a pair of organs, <sup>2</sup> and he's the tall great roaring pipe i' th' midst. <sup>11</sup>

As. Ha, ha, ha, ha!

Cand. What's that you laugh at, signors?

Lod. Troth, shall I tell you, and aloud I'll tell it;

We laugh to see, yet laugh we not in scorn, <sup>15</sup>
Amongst so many caps that long hat worn.

[1 Guest.] Mine is as tall a felt as any is this day in Milan, and therefore I love it, for the block <sup>3</sup> was cleft out for my head, and fits me to a hair. <sup>20</sup>

Cand. Indeed you're good observers; it shows strange:

But gentlemen, I pray neither contemn,
Nor yet deride a civil ornament;
I could build so much in the round cap's praise,
That 'bove this high roof, I this flat would raise.

Lod. Prithee, sweet bridegroom, do 't. <sup>25</sup>

Cand. So all these guests will pardon me, I'll do 't.

All. With all our hearts.

Cand. Thus, then, in the cap's honour:
To every sex, and state, both nature, time, <sup>30</sup>
The country's laws, yea, and the very clime
Do allot distinct habits; the spruce courtier
Jests <sup>4</sup> up and down in silk; the warrior
Marches in buff; the clown plods on in gray:
But for these upper garments thus I say, <sup>35</sup>
The seaman has his cap, par'd without brim;
The gallant's head is feather'd, that fits him;
The soldier has his morion, <sup>5</sup> women ha' tires; <sup>6</sup>
Beasts have their head-pieces, and men ha' theirs.

Lod. Proceed. <sup>40</sup>

Cand. Each degree has his fashion, it's fit then,

One should be laid by for the citizen,
And that's the cap which you see swells not high,

For caps are emblems of humility.
It is a citizen's badge, and first was worn <sup>45</sup>
By th' Romans; for when any bondman's turn
Came to be made a freeman, thus 't was said,
He to the cap was call'd, that is, was made
Of Rome a freeman; but was first close shorn:
And so a citizen's hair is still short worn. <sup>50</sup>

Lod. That close shaving made barbers a company,

And now every citizen uses it.
Cand. Of geometric figures the most rare,
And perfect'st, are the circle and the square;
The city and the school much build upon <sup>55</sup>
These figures, for both love proportion.
The city-cap is round, the scholar's square,
To show that government and learning are
The perfect'st limbs i' th' body of a state;
For without them, all's disproportionate. <sup>60</sup>
If the cap had no honour, this might rear it,

The reverend fathers of the law do wear it.
It's light for summer, and in cold it sits
Close to the skull, a warm house for the wits;
It shows the whole face boldly, 't is not made
As if a man to look on 't were afraid, <sup>65</sup>
Nor like a draper's shop with broad dark shed,
For he's no citizen that hides his head.
Flat caps as proper are to city gowns,
As to armours helmets, or to kings their crowns.
Let then the city-cap by none be scorn'd, <sup>71</sup>
Since with it princes' heads have been adorn'd.
If more the round cap's honour you would know,
How would this long gown with this steeple's show?

All. Ha, ha, ha! most vile, most ugly. <sup>75</sup>

Cand. Pray, signor, pardon me, 't was done in jest.

Bride. A cup of claret wine there.

1 Prem. Wine? yes, forsooth, wine for the bride.

Car. You ha' well set out the cap, sir.

Lod. Nay, that's flat. <sup>80</sup>

Cand. A health!

Lod. Since his cap's round, that shall go round. Be bare,

For in the cap's praise all of you have share.

As 1 Prentice offers the wine to the Bride,] she hits him on the lips, [breaking the glass].

The bride's at cuffs.

Cand. Oh, peace, I pray thee; thus far off I stand, <sup>85</sup>

I spied the error of my servants;
She call'd for claret, and you fill'd out sack.
That cup give me, 't is for an old man's back,
And not for hers. Indeed, 't was but mistaken;
Ask all these else.

Guests. No faith, 't was but mistaken.

1 Prem. Nay, she took it right enough. <sup>91</sup>

Cand. Good Luke, reach her that glass of claret.

Here mistress bride, pledge me there.

Bride. Now I'll none. Exit.

Cand. How now?

Lod. Look what your mistress ails.

1 Prem. Nothing, sir, but about filling a wrong glass, — a scurvy trick. <sup>95</sup>

Cand. I pray you, hold your tongue. — My servant there tells me she is not well.

Guests. Step to her, step to her.

Lod. A word with you: do ye hear? This wench, your new wife, will take you down in <sup>101</sup> your wedding shoes, unless you hang her up in her wedding garters?

Cand. How, hang her in her garters? <sup>104</sup>

Lod. Will you be a tame pigeon still? Shall your back be like a tortoise shell, to let carts go over it, yet not to break? This she-cat will have more lives than your last puss had, and will scratch worse, and mouse you worse: look to 't. <sup>110</sup>

Cand. What would you have me do, sir?

Lod. What would I have you do? Swear, swagger, brawl, fling! for fighting it's no matter, we ha' had knocking pusses enow already; you know, that a woman was made of the rib of a man, and that rib was crooked. The [118] moral of which is, that a man must from his beginning be crooked to his wife. Be you like an orange to her; let her cut you never so fair, be you sour as vinegar. Will you be ruled by me?

Cand. In any thing that's civil, honest, and just. 122

Lod. Have you ever a prentice's suit will fit me? 123

Cand. I have the very same which myself wore. 125

Lod. I'll send my man for 't within this half hour, and within this two hours I'll be your prentice. The hen shall not overerow the cock; I'll sharpen your spurs. 130

Cand. It will be but some jest, sir?
Lod. Only a jest: farewell, come, Carolo.

Exeunt (LODOVICO, CAROLO, and ASTOLFO).

All. We'll take our leaves, sir, too.
Cand. Pray conceit not ill

Of my wife's sudden rising. This young knight, Sir Lodovico, is deep seen in physic, 135
And he tells me, the disease, called the mother,<sup>1</sup> Hangs on my wife, it is a vehement heaving
And beating of the stomach, and that swelling
Did with the pain thereof cramp up her arm,
That hit his lips, and brake the glass, — no harm, 140
It was no harm!

Guests. No, signor, none at all.

Cand. The straightest arrow may fly wide by chance.

But come, we'll close this brawl up in some dance. Exeunt.

[ACT II]

[SCENE I.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter BELLAFRONT and MATHEO.

Bell. O my sweet husband! wert thou in thy grave and art alive again? Oh welcome, welcome!

Mat. Dost know me? My cloak, prithee, lay 't up. Yes, faith, my winding-sheet was taken [5] out of lavender, to be stuck with rosemary: <sup>3</sup> I lackt but the knot here, or here; yet if I had had it, I should ha' made a wry mouth at the world like a plaice: but, sweetest villain, I am here now and I will talk with thee soon. 10

Bell. And glad am I th' art here.

Mat. Did these heels caper in shackles? Ah! my little plump rogue, I'll bear up for all this, and fly high. Caiso caiso.<sup>4</sup>

Bell. Matheo? 15

Mat. What sayest, what sayest? O brave fresh air! a pox on these grates and gingling of keys, and rattling of iron. I'll bear up, I'll fly high, wench, hang toff.<sup>5</sup>

Bell. Matheo, prithee, make thy prison thy glass, 20
And in it view the wrinkles and the scars
By which thou wert disfigur'd: viewing them, mend them.

Mat. I'll go visit all the mad rogues now, and the good roaring boys.<sup>6</sup>

Bell. Thou dost not hear me? 25

Mat. Yes, faith, do I.

Bell. Thou has been in the hands of misery, and ta'en strong physic; prithee now be sound.
Mat. Yes. 'Sfoot, I wonder how the inside of a tavern looks now. Oh, when shall I [30] bizzle, bizzle.<sup>7</sup>

Bell. Nay, see, thou 'rt thirsty still for poison! Come,
I will not have thee swagger.

Mat. Honest ape's face!
Bell. 'Tis that sharp'ned an axe to cut thy throat.

Good love. I would not have thee sell thy substance 35

And time, worth all, in those damn'd shops of hell;

Those dicing houses, that stand never well
But when they stand most ill; that four-squar'd sin<sup>8</sup>

Has almost lodg'd us in the beggar's inn.
Besides, to speak which even my soul does grieve, 40

A sort<sup>9</sup> of ravens have hung upon thy sleeve,
And fed upon thee: good Mat, if you please, Scorn to spread wing amongst so base as
these;

By them thy fame is speckled, yet it shows Clear amongst them; so crows are fair with crows. 45

Custom in sin, gives sin a lovely dye;
Blackness in Moors is no deformity.

Mat. Bellafront, Bellafront, I protest to thee, I swear, as I hope for my soul, I will turn over a new leaf. The prison I confess [50] has bit me; the best man that sails in such a ship, may be lousy. [Knocking within.]

Bell. One knocks at door.

Mat. I'll be the porter. They shall see a jail cannot hold a brave spirit, I'll fly high. 55

Bell. How wild is his behaviour! Oh, I fear He's spoil'd by prison, he's half damn'd comes there.

But I must sit all storms: when a full sail
His fortunes spread, he lov'd me; being now
poor,

I'll beg for him, and no wife can do more. 60

Re-enter MATHEO, with ORLANDO like a Serving-man.

Mat. Come in, pray! would you speak with me, sir?

Orl. Is your name Signor Matheo?

Mat. My name is Signor Matheo.

Orl. Is this gentlewoman your wife, sir? 65

Mat. This gentlewoman is my wife, sir.

Orl. The Destinies spin a strong and even thread of both your loves!—[Aside.] The mother's own face, I ha' not forgot that.—I'm an old man, sir, and am troubled with a [70] whoreson salt rheum, that I cannot hold my water.—Gentlewoman, the last man I served was your father.

Bell. My father? Any tongue that sounds his name, Speaks music to me; welcome, good old man!
How does my father? Lives he? Has he health?
How does my father?—[Aside.] I so much do shame him,
So much do wound him, that I scarce dare name him.

Orl. I can speak no more.

Mat. How, old lad, what, dost cry? 80

Orl. The rheum still, sir, nothing else; I should be well season'd, for mine eyes lie in brine. Look you, sir, I have a suit to you.

Mat. What is 't, my little white-pate?

Orl. Troth, sir, I have a mind to serve your worship. 86

Mat. To serve me? Troth, my friend, my fortunes are, as a man may say—

Orl. Nay, look you, sir, I know, when all sins are old in us, and go upon crutches, that covetousness does but then lie in her cradle; 'tis not so with me. Lechery loves to dwell in the fairest lodging, and covetousness in the oldest buildings, that are ready to fall: but my white head, sir, is no inn for such a gossip. If a [95] serving-man at my years be not stored with biscuit enough, that has sailed about the world, to serve him the voyage out of his life, and to bring him East home, ill pity but all his days should be fasting days. I care not so much [100] for wages, for I have scraped a handful of gold together. I have a little money, sir, which I would put into your worship's hands, not so much to make it more— 104

Mat. No, no, you say well, thou sayest well; but I must tell you,—How much is the money, sayest thou?

Orl. About twenty pound, sir.

Mat. Twenty pound? Let me see: that shall bring thee in, after ten per centum per annum,— 111

Orl. No, no, no, sir, no: I cannot abide to have money engender: fie upon this silver lechery, fie! If I may have meat to my mouth, and rags to my back, and a flock-bed to [115] snort upon when I die, the longer liver take all.

Mat. A good old boy, i' faith! If thou servest me, thou shalt eat as I eat, drink as I drink, lie as I lie, and ride as I ride.

Orl. [Aside.] That's if you have money [120] to hire horses.

Mat. Front, what dost thou think on't? This good old lad here shall serve me.

Bell. Alas, Matheo, wilt thou load a back That is already broke? 125

Mat. Peace, pox on you, peace. There's a trick in 't, I fly high; it shall be so, Front, as I tell you. Give me thy hand, thou shalt serve me i' faith: welcome. As for your money—

Orl. Nay, look you, sir, I have it here. 130
Mat. Pish, keep it thyself, man, and then thou 'rt sure 't is safe.

Orl. Safe! an't were ten thousand ducats, your worship should be my cash-keeper. I have heard what your worship is, an excellent [135] dunghill cock, to scatter all abroad; but I'll venture twenty pounds on 's head.

[Gives money to MATHEO.]
Mat. And didst thou serve my worshipful father-in-law, Signor Orlando Friscobaldo, that madman, once? 140

Orl. I served him so long, till he turned me out of doors.

Mat. It's a notable chuff; I ha' not seen him many a day.

Orl. No matter an you ne'er see him; [145] it's an arrant grandee, a churl, and as damn'd a cut-throat.

Bell. Thou villain, curb thy tongue! Thou art a Judas,

To sell thy master's name to slander thus.
Mat. Away, ass! He speaks but truth, thy father is a— 161

Bell. Gentleman.

Mat. And an old knave. There's more deceit in him than in sixteen 'pothecaries: it's a devil; thou may'st beg, starve, hang, damn! does he send thee so much as a cheese? 166

Orl. Or so much as a gammon of bacon; he'll give it his dogs first.

Mat. A jail, a jail.

Orl. A Jew, a Jew, sir. 169

Mat. A dog!

Orl. An English mastiff, sir.

Mat. Pox rot out his old stinking garbage!

Bell. Art not asham'd to strike an absent man thus?

Art not asham'd to let this vild dog bark, 165
And bite my father thus? I'll not endure it.
Out of my doors, base slave!

Mat. Your doors? a vengeance! I shall live to cut that old rogue's throat, for all you take his part thus. 170

Orl. [Aside.] He shall live to see thee hang'd first.

Enter HIPPOLITO.

Mat. Gods, so, my lord, your lordship is most welcome.

I'm proud of this, my lord.

Hip. Was bold to see you.

Is that your wife?

Mat. Yes, sir.

Hip. I'll borrow her lip. 175

[Kisses BELLAFRONT.]

Mat. With all my heart, my lord.

Orl. Who's this, I pray, sir.

Mat. My Lord Hippolito: what's thy name?

Orl. Pacheco.

Mat. Pacheco, fine name: thou seest, Pacheco, I keep company with no scoundrels, nor base fellows. 180

Hip. Came not my footman to you?

Bell. Yes, my lord.

1 Notorious churl.

2 Vile.

Hip. I sent by him a dismond and a letter,
Did you receive them?

Bell. Yes, my lord, I did.

Hip. Read you the letter?

Bell. O'er and o'er 't is read.

Hip. And, faith, your answer?

Bell. Now the time 's not fit, <sup>188</sup>
You see, my husband 's here.

Hip. I 'll now then leave you,
And choose mine hour; but ere I part away,
Hark you, remember I must have no nay. —
Matheo, I will leave you.

Mat. A glass of wine.

Hip. Not now, I 'll visit you at other times.
You 're come off well, then? <sup>191</sup>

Mat. Excellent well, I thank your lordship. I owe you my life, my lord; and will pay my best blood in any service of yours.

Hip. I 'll take no such dear payment. <sup>195</sup>
Hark you, Matheo, I know the prison is a gulf.
If money run low with you, my purse is yours:
call for it.

Mat. Faith, my lord, I thank my stars, they send me down some; I cannot sink, so long as these bladders hold. <sup>201</sup>

Hip. I will not see your fortunes ebb; pray, try.
To starve in full barns were fond ' modesty.

Mat. Open the door, sirrah.

Hip. Drink this, and anon, I pray thee, <sup>205</sup> give thy mistress this.

[Gives to FRISCOBALDO, who opens the door, first money, then a purse, and] exit.

Orl. O noble spirit, if no worse guests here
dwell,

My blue coat sits on my old shoulders well.

Mat. The only royal fellow, he 's bounteous as the Indies. What 's that he said to thee, <sup>210</sup> Bellafront?

Bell. Nothing.

Mat. I prithee, good girl.

Bell. Why, I tell you, nothing.

Mat. Nothing? It 's well. Tricks! that I <sup>215</sup> must be beholden to a scald hot-liver'd goatish gallant, to stand with my cap in my hand, and vail ' bonnet, when I ha' spread as lofty sails as himself. Would I had been hanged. Nothing? Pacheco, brush my cloak. <sup>220</sup>

Orl. Where is 't, sir?

Mat. Come, we 'll fly high.

Nothing? There 's a whore still in thy eye.

Exit.

Orl. [Aside.] My twenty pounds fly high. O wretched woman! <sup>224</sup>

This varlet 's able to make Lucrece common. —
How now, mistress?

Has my master dy'd you into this sad colour?

Bell. Fellow, begone I pray thee; if thy tongue

itch after talk so much, seek out thy master.

Thou 'rt a fit instrument for him. <sup>230</sup>

Orl. Zounds, I hope he will not play upon me!

Bell. Play on thee? No, you two will fly together,

Because you 're roving arrows of one feather.

Would thou wouldst leave my house; thou ne'er shalt please me!

Weave thy nets ne'er so high, <sup>235</sup>

Thou shalt be but a spider in mine eye.

Thou 'rt rank with poison: poison temper'd
well

Is food for health; but thy black tongue doth swell

With venom, to hurt him that gave thee bread.
To wrong men absent, is to spurn the dead; <sup>240</sup>
And so did'st thou thy master, and my father.

Orl. You have small reason to take his part;
for I have heard him say five hundred times,
you were as arrant a whore as ever stiff'ned tiffany neckcloths in water-starch upon a <sup>245</sup>
Saturday i' th' afternoon.

Bell. Let him say worse. When for the earth's offence

Hot vengeance through the marble clouds is driven,

Is 't fit earth shoot again those darts at heaven?

Orl. And so if your father call you whore <sup>250</sup> you 'll not call him old knave. — [Aside.] Friscobaldo, she carries thy mind up and down;

she 's thine own flesh, blood, and bone. — Troth, mistress, to tell you true, the fireworks that ran from me upon lines against my good <sup>255</sup> old master, your father, were but to try how my young master, your husband, loved such squibs: but it 's well known, I love your father as myself; I 'll ride for him at midnight, run for you by owl-light; I 'll die for him, <sup>260</sup> drudge for you; I 'll fly low, and I 'll fly high, as my master says, to do you good, if you 'll forgive me.

Bell. I am not made of marble; I forgive thee. <sup>264</sup>

Orl. Nay, if you were made of marble, a good stone-cutter might cut you. I hope the twenty pound I delivered to my master is in a sure
hand.

Bell. In a sure hand, I warrant thee, for spending.

Orl. I see my young master is a mad-cap, <sup>270</sup> and a bonus socius.<sup>3</sup> I love him well, mistress:
yet as well as I love him, I 'll not play the knave with you. Look you, I could cheat you of this purse full of money; but I am an old lad, and I scorn to cony-catch: <sup>275</sup> yet I ha' been dog at a cony in my time. [Gives purse.]

Bell. A purse? Where hadst it?

Orl. The gentleman that went away whisper'd in mine ear, and charged me to give it
you. <sup>280</sup>

Bell. The Lord Hippolito?

Orl. Yes, if he be a lord, he gave it me.

Bell. 'T is all gold.

Orl. 'T is like so. It may be, he thinks you want money, and therefore bestows his alms <sup>285</sup> bravely, like a lord.

Bell. He thinks a silver net can catch the
poor;

Here 's bait to choke a nun, and turn her
whore.

Wilt thou be honest to me? <sup>289</sup>

Orl. As your nails to your fingers, which I think never deceived you.

Bell. Thou to this lord shalt go, commend me to him,

And tell him this, the town has held out long, Because within 't was rather true than strong; To sell it now were base. Say 't is no hold Built of weak stuff, to be blown up with gold. He shall believe thee by this token, or this; If not, by this. [Giving purse, ring, and letters.]

Orl. Is this all?

Bell. This is all.

Orl. [Aside.] Mine own girl still!

Bell. A star may shoot, not fall. Exit.

Orl. A star? nay, thou art more than the moon, for thou hast neither changing quarters, nor a man standing in thy circle with a bush of thorns. Is 't possible the Lord Hippolito, whose face is as civil as the outside of a dedicatory book, should be a muttonmonger? A poor man has but one ewe, and this grandee sheep-biter leaves whole flocks of fat wethers, whom he may knock down, to devour this. I'll trust neither lord nor butcher with quick flesh for this trick; the cuckoo, I see now, sings all the year, though every man cannot hear him; but I'll spoil his notes. Can neither love-letters, nor the devil's common pick-locks, gold, nor precious stones make my girl draw up her perennis? Hold out still, wench. All are not bawds, I see now, that keep doors, Nor all good wenches that are markt for whores. [Exit.]

[SCENE II.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter CANDIDO, and LODOVICO like a Prentice.

Lod. Come, come, come, what do ye lack, sir? What do ye lack, sir? What is 't ye lack, sir? Is not my worship well suited? Did you ever see a gentleman better disguised?

Cand. Never, believe me, signor.

Lod. Yes, but when he has been drunk. There be prentices would make mad gallants, for they would spend all, and drink, and whore, and so forth; and I see we gallants could make mad prentices. How does thy wife like me? Nay, I must not be so saucy, then I spoil all. Pray you how does my mistress like me?

Cand. Well; for she takes you for a very simple fellow.

Lod. And they that are taken for such are commonly the arrantest knaves: but to our comedy, come.

Cand. I shall not act it; chide, you say, and fret,

And grow impatient: I shall never do 't.

Lod. 'Sblood, cannot you do as all the world does, counterfeit?

Cand. Were I a painter, that should live by drawing

Nothing but pictures of an angry man, I should not earn my colours; I cannot do 't.

Lod. Remember you're a linen-draper, and that if you give your wife a yard, she'll take an ell: give her not therefore a quarter of your yard, not a nail.

Cand. Say I should turn to ice, and nip her love

Now 't is but in the bud.

Lod. Well, say she's nipt.

Cand. It will so overcharge her heart with grief,

That like a cannon, when her sighs go off, She in her duty either will recoil, Or break in pieces and so die: her death, By my unkindness might be counted murder.

Lod. Die? never, never. I do not bid you beat her, nor give her black eyes, nor pinch her sides; but cross her humours. Are not baker's arms the scales of justice? Yet is not their bread light? And may not you, I pray, bridle her with a sharp bit, yet ride her gently?

Cand. Well, I will try your pills.

Do you your faithful service, and be ready Still at a pinch to help me in this part, Or else I shall be out clean.

Lod. Come, come, I'll prompt you.

Cand. I'll call her forth now, shall I?

Lod. Do, do, bravely.

Cand. Luke, I pray, bid your mistress to come hither.

Lod. Luke, I pray, bid your mistress to come hither.

Cand. Sirrah, bid my wife come to me: why, when?

1 Pren. (within.) Presently, sir, she comes.

Lod. La, you, there's the echo! She comes.

Enter BRIDE.

Bride. What is your pleasure with me?

Cand. Marry, wife, I have intent; and you see this stripping here, He bears good will and liking to my trade, And means to deal in linen.

Lod. Yes, indeed, sir, I would deal in linen, if my mistress like me so well as I like her.

Cand. I hope to find him honest, pray; good wife, Look that his bed and chamber be made ready.

Bride. You're best to let him hire me for his maid.

I look to his bed? Look to 't yourself.

Cand. Even so?

I swear to you a great oath—

Lod. (Aside.) Swear, cry "Zounds!"—

Cand. I will not—go to, wife—I will not—

Lod. (Aside.) That your great oath?

Cand. Swallow these gudgeons!

Lod. (Aside.) Well said!

Bride. Then fast, then you may choose.

Cand. You know at table What tricks you play'd, swagger'd, broke glasses, fie!

Fie, fie, fie! and now before my prentice here, You make an ass of me, thou—what shall I call thee?

Bride. Even what you will.

<sup>5</sup> Be so imposed upon.

Lod. [Aside.] Call her arrant whore.

Cand. [Aside.] Oh fie, by no means! then she'll call me cuckold.—

Sirrah, go look to th' shop.—How does this show?

Lod. [Aside.] Excellent well—I'll go look to the shop, sir.

Fine cambrics, lawns; what do you lack?

Exit [into the shop].

Cand. A curst cow's milk I ha' drunk once before,

And 't was so rank in taste, I'll drink no more. Wife, I'll tame you.

Bride. You may, sir, if you can, 80

But at a wrestling I have seen a fellow Limb'd like an ox, thrown by a little man.

Cand. And so you'll throw me?—Reach me, knaves, a yard!

Lod. A yard for my master.

[LODOVICO returns from the shop with a yard-wand and followed by Prentices.]

1 Pren. My master is grown valiant. 85

Cand. I'll teach you fencing tricks.

Lod. What will you do, sir?

Cand. Marry, my good prentice, nothing but breathe my wife. 90

Bride. Breathe me with your yard?

Lod. No, he'll but measure you out, forsooth.

Bride. Since you'll needs fence, handle your weapon well,

For if you take a yard, I'll take an ell.

Reach me an ell!

Lod. An ell for my mistress. 95

[Brings an ell-wand from the shop.]

Keep the laws of the noble science, sir, and measure weapons with her; your yard is a plain heathenish weapon. 'Tis too short, she may give you a handful, and yet you'll not reach her. 100

Cand. Yet I ha' the longer arm.—Come fall to 't roundly,

And spare not me, wife, for I'll lay 't on soundly:

If o'er husbands their wives will needs be masters,

We men will have a law to win 't at wasters.<sup>2</sup>

Lod. 'Tis for the breeches, is 't not?

Cand. For the breeches! 105

Bride. Husband, I'm for you, I'll not strike in jest.

Cand. Nor I.

Bride. But will you sign to one request?

Cand. What's that?

Bride. Let me give the first blow.

Cand. The first blow, wife? [Aside to LOD.]

Shall I? Prompt?

Lod. Let her ha' 't: 109

If she strike hard, in to her, and break her pate.

Cand. A bargain: strike!

Bride. Then guard you from this blow, For I play all at legs, but 't is thus low.

She kneels.

Behold, I'm such a cunning fencer grown,

I keep my ground, yet down I will be thrown With the least blow you give me; I disdain 115 The wife that is her husband's sovereign.

She that upon your pillow first did rest, They say, the breeches wore, which I detest:

The tax which she impos'd on you, I abate you; If me you make your master, I shall hate you. 120

The world shall judge who offers fairest play; You win the breeches, but I win the day.

Cand. Thou win'st the day indeed, give me thy hand;

I'll challenge thee no more. My patient breast Play'd thus the rebel, only for a jest. 125

Here's the rank rider that breaks colts; 't is he Can tame the mad folks, and curst wives.

Bride. Who? Your man?

Cand. My man? My master, though his head be bare,

But he's so courteous, he'll put off his hair.

Lod. Nay, if your service be so hot a [130 man cannot keep his hair on, I'll serve you no longer. [Takes off his false hair.]

Bride. Is this your schoolmaster?

Lod. Yes, faith, wench, I taught him to take thee down. I hope thou canst take him down [135 without teaching;

You ha' got the conquest, and you both are friends.

Cand. Bear witness else.

Lod. My prenticeship then ends.

Cand. For the good service you to me have done,

I give you all your years.

Lod. I thank you, master. 140

I'll kiss my mistress now, that she may say My man was bound, and free all in one day.

Exeunt.

ACT III

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter INFELICE, and ORLANDO [disguised as a Serving-man].

Inf. From whom say'st thou?

Orl. From a poor gentlewoman, madam, whom I serve.

Inf. And what's your business?

Orl. This madam: my poor mistress has a [15 waste piece of ground, which is her own by inheritance, and left to her by her mother. There's a lord now that goes about not to take it clean from her, but to enclose it to himself, and to join it to a piece of his lordship's. 10

Inf. What would she have me do in this?

Orl. No more, madam, but what one woman should do for another in such a case. My honourable lord your husband, would do any thing in her behalf, but she had rather put herself [15 into your hands, because you, a woman, may do more with the duke, your father.

Inf. Where lies this land?

Orl. Within a stone's cast of this place. My mistress, I think, would be content to let [20 him enjoy it after her decease, if that would serve his turn, so my master would yield too; but she cannot abide to hear that the lord should meddle with it in her lifetime.

Inf. Is she then married? Why stirs not [25 her husband in it?

Orl. Her husband stirs in it underhand: but because the other is a great rich man, my master is loth to be seen in it too much.

Inf. Let her in writing draw the cause at large, [30

And I will move the duke.

Orl. 'Tis set down, madam, here in black and white already. Work it so, madam, that she may keep her own without disturbance, grievance, molestation, or meddling of any [35 other; and she bestows this purse of gold on your ladyship.

Inf. Old man, I'll plead for her, but take no fees.

Give lawyers them, I swim not in that flood; I'll touch no gold, till I have done her good. [40

Orl. I would all proctors' clerks were of your mind, I should law more amongst them than I do then. Here, madam, is the survey, not only of the manor itself, but of the grange-house, with every meadow pasture, plough-land, [45 cony-burrow, fish-pond, hedge, ditch, and bush, that stands in it. [Gives a letter.]

Inf. My husband's name, and hand and seal at arms

To a love letter? Where hadst thou this writing?

Orl. From the foresaid party, madam, that [50 would keep the foresaid land out of the foresaid lord's fingers.

Inf. My lord turn'd ranger now?

Orl. You're a good huntress, lady; you ha' found your game already. Your lord would [55 fain be a ranger, but my mistress requests you to let him run a course in your own park. If you'll not do 't for love, then do 't for money! She has no white money, but there's gold; or else she prays you to ring him by this token, [60 and so you shall be sure his nose will not be rooting other men's pastures.

Inf. This very purse was woven with mine own hands;

This diamond on that very night, when he Untied my virgin girdle, gave I him; [65

And must a common harlot share in mine? Old man, to quit thy pains, take thou the gold.

Orl. Not I, madam, old serving-men want no money.

Inf. Cupid himself was sure his secretary; '70 These lines are even the arrows love let flies, The very ink dropt out of Venus' eyes.

Orl. I do not think, madam, but he fetcht off some poet or other for those lines, for they are parlous hawks to fly at wenches. [75

Inf. Here's honied poison! To me he ne'er thus writ;

But lust can set a double edge on wit.

Orl. Nay, that's true, madam, a wench will whet any thing, if it be not too dull.

Inf. Oaths, promises, preferments, jewels, gold, [80

What snares should break, if all these cannot hold?

What creature is thy mistress?

Orl. One of those creatures that are contrary to man; a woman.

Inf. What manner of woman? [85

Orl. A little tiny woman, lower than your ladyship by head and shoulders, but as mad a wench as ever unlaced a petticoat: these things should I indeed have delivered to my lord, your husband. [90

Inf. They are delivered better: why should she

Send back these things?

Orl. 'Ware, 'ware, there's knavery.

Inf. Strumpets, like cheating gamesters, will not win

At first; these are but baits to draw him in.

How might I learn his hunting hours?

Orl. The Irish footman can tell you all his hunting hours, the park he hunts in, the doe he would strike; that Irish shackatory [95 beats the bush for him, and knows all; he brought that letter, and that ring; he is the carrier. [100

Inf. Knowest thou what other gifts have past between them?

Orl. Little Saint Patrick knows all.

Inf. Him I'll examine presently.

Orl. Not whilst I am here, sweet madam. [105

Inf. Be gone then, and what lies in me command. Exit ORLANDO.

Enter BRYAN.

Inf. How much cost those satins, And cloth of silver, which my husband sent By you to a low gentlewoman yonder? [110

Bry. Faat satins? faat silvers, faat low gentlefolks? Dow pratest dow knowest not what, i' faat, la.

Inf. She there, to whom you carried letters.

Bry. By dis hand and bod dow saist true, if I did so, oh how? I know not a letter a' de [115 book i' faat, la.

Inf. Did your lord never send you with a ring, sir,

Set with a diamond?

Bry. Never, sa crees sa' me, never! He may run at a towsand rings i' faat, and I never [120 hold his stirrup, till he leap into de saddle. By St. Patrick, madam, I never touch my lord's diamond, nor ever had to do, i' faat, la, with any of his precious stones. [124

Enter HIPPOLITO.

Inf. Are you so close, you bawd, you pander's slave? [Strikes BRYAN.]

Hip. How now? Why, Infelice; what's your quarrel?

Inf. Out of my sight, base varlet! get thee gone.

Hip. Away, you rogue!

Bry. Slawne loot, fare de well, fare de well. Exit.
Ah marragh frofat boddah breen! [125

Hip. What, grown a fighter? Prithee, what's the matter? <sup>141</sup>

Inf. If you'll needs know, it was about the clock.

How works the day, my lord, pray, by your watch?

Hip. Lest you cuff me, I'll tell you presently: <sup>1</sup> I am near two.

Inf. How, two? I'm scarce at one. <sup>155</sup>

Hip. One of us then goes false.

Inf. Then sure 't is you, Mine goes by heaven's dial, the sun, and it goes true.

Hip. I think, indeed, mine runs somewhat too fast.

Inf. Set it to mine at one then.

Hip. One? 't is past:

'T is past one by the sun.

Inf. Faith, then, belike, <sup>140</sup>

Neither your clock nor mine does truly strike; And since it is uncertain which goes true, Better be false at one, than false at two.

Hip. Y' are very pleasant, madam.

Inf. Yet not merry.

Hip. Why, Infelice, what should make you sad? <sup>145</sup>

Inf. Nothing, my lord, but my false watch. Pray, tell me,—

You see, my clock or yours is out of frame, Must we upon the workmen lay the blame, Or on ourselves that keep them?

Hip. Faith on both.

He may by knavery spoil them, we by sloth. <sup>150</sup>

But why talk you all riddle thus? I read

Strange comments in those margins of your looks. Your cheeks of late are like bad printed books,

So dimly charact'ed, I scarce can spell One line of love in them. Sure all's not well. <sup>155</sup>

Inf. All is not well indeed, my dearest lord; Lock up thy gates of hearing, that no sound

Of what I speak may enter.

Hip. What means this?

Inf. Or if my own tongue must myself betray, Count it a dream, or turn thine eyes away, <sup>160</sup>

And think me not thy wife. She kneels.

Hip. Why do you kneel?

Inf. Earth is sin's cushion: when the sick soul feels

Herself growing poor, then she turns beggar, <sup>cries,</sup>

And kneels for help. Hippolito, for husband I dare not call thee, I have stolen that jewel <sup>165</sup>

Of my chaste honour, which was only thine, And given it to a slave.

Hip. Ha?

Inf. On thy pillow

Adultery and lust have slept; thy groom Hath climb'd the unlawful tree, and pluckt the sweets;

A villain hath usurp'd a husband's sheets. <sup>170</sup>

Hip. S'death, who? — a cuckold! — who?

Inf. This Irish footman.

Hip. Worse than damnation! a wild kerne, <sup>2</sup> a frog,

A dog: whom I'll scarce spurn. Long'd you for shamrock?

Were it my father's father, heart, I'll kill him, Although I take him on his death-bed gasping

'Twixt Heaven and hell! A shag-hair'd cur! <sup>175</sup>

Bold strumpet, Why hang'st thou on me? Think'st I'll be a bawd

To a whore, because she's a noble?

Inf. I beg but this, Set not my shame out to the world's broad eye,

Yet let thy vengeance, like my fault, soar high, So it be in dark'ned clouds.

Hip. Dark'ned! my horns <sup>181</sup> Cannot be dark'ned, nor shall my revenge.

A harlot to my slave? The act is base, Common, but foul, so shall not thy disgrace.

Could not I feed your appetite? O women <sup>185</sup> You were created angels, pure and fair;

But since the first fell, tempting devils you are. You should be men's bliss, but you prove their rods:

Were there no women, men might live like gods.

You ha' been too much down already; rise, <sup>190</sup> Get from my sight, and henceforth shun my bed;

I'll with no strumpet's breath be poisoned. As for your Irish lubrican,<sup>3</sup> that spirit

Whom by prepost'rous charms thy lust hath raised

In a wrong circle, him I'll damn more black <sup>195</sup> Than any tyrant's soul.

Inf. Hippolito!

Hip. Tell me, didst thou bait hooks to draw him to thee,

Or did he bewitch thee?

Inf. The slave did woo me.

Hip. Tu-whoos in that screech-owl's language! Oh, who'd trust

Your cork-heel'd sex? I think to sate your lust You'd love a horse, a bear, a croaking toad, <sup>201</sup>

So your hot itching veins might have their bound:

Then the wild Irish dart was thrown? Come, how?

The manner of this fight?

Inf. 'T was thus, he gave me this battery <sup>205</sup> first.— Oh, I Mistake — believe me, all this in beaten gold; Yet I held out, but at length thus was charm'd.

[Gives letter, purse and ring.]

What? change your diamond, wench? The act is base,

Common, but foul, so shall not your disgrace. Could not I feed your appetite? O men <sup>210</sup>

You were created angels, pure and fair, But since the first fell, worse than devils you are.

You should our shields be, but you prove our rods.

Were there no men, women might live like gods.

Guilty, my lord?

Hip. Yes, guilty, my good lady. <sup>215</sup>

Inf. Nay, you may laugh, but henceforth shun my bed,
With no whore's leavings I'll be poisoned.

Exit.
Hip. O'er-reached so finely? 'Tis the very diamond

And letter which I sent. This villainy <sup>210</sup>
Some spider closely weaves, whose poison'd bulk
I must let forth. Who's there without?

Ser. (within.) My lord calls?

Hip. Send me the footman.

Ser. (within.) Call the footman to my lord. —
Bryan, Bryan! <sup>224</sup>

Re-enter BRYAN.

Hip. It can be no man else, that Irish Judas,
Bred in a country where no venom prospers
But in the nation's blood, hath thus betray'd
me. —

Slave, get you from your service.

Bry. Faat meanest thou by this now?

Hip. Question me not, nor tempt my fury, villain! <sup>230</sup>

Couldst thou turn all the mountains in the land
To hills of gold, and give me, here thou stayest
not.

Bry. I' faat, I care not.

Hip. Prate not, but get thee gone, I shall send else. <sup>234</sup>

Bry. Ay, do prey, I had rather have thee make a scabbard of my guts, and let out all de Irish puddings in my poor belly, den to be a false knave to de, i' faat! I will never see dine own sweet face more. A mawhid deer a gra,<sup>1</sup> fare dee well, fare dee well; I will go steal <sup>240</sup> cows again in Ireland. Exit.

Hip. He's damn'd that raised this whirlwind, which hath blown

Into her eyes this jealousy: yet I'll on,
I'll on, stood armed devils staring in my face.
To be pursued in flight, quickens the race, <sup>246</sup> Shall my blood-streams by a wife's lust be barr'd?

Fond<sup>2</sup> woman, no: iron grows by strokes more hard;

Lawless desires are seas scorning all bounds,
Or sulphur, which being ramn'd up, more con-
founds;

Struggling with madmen madness nothing
tames; <sup>250</sup>

Winds wrestling with great fires incense the flames. Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter BELLAFRONT, and ORLANDO [disguised as a Serving-man], MATHEO [following].

Bell. How now, what ails your master?

Orl. Has taken a younger brother's purge, forsooth, and that works with him.

Bell. Where is his cloak and rapier?

Orl. He has given up his cloak, and his ra-<sup>5</sup> pier is bound to the peace. If you look a little higher, you may see that another hath ent'red into hatband for him too. Six and four<sup>4</sup> have put him into this sweat.

Bell. Where's all his money? <sup>10</sup>

Orl. 'Tis put over by exchange; his doublet was going to be translated, but for me. If any man would ha' lent but half a ducat on his beard, the hair of it had stuff a pair of breeches by this time. I had but one poor penny, and <sup>15</sup> that I was glad to niggle out,<sup>5</sup> and buy a holly-wand to grace him through the street. As hap was, his boots were on, and them I dustied, to make people think he had been riding, and I had run by him. — <sup>20</sup>

Bell. Oh me! — How does my sweet Matheo?
[MATHEO comes forward.]

Mat. Oh rogue, of what devilish stuff are these dice made of, — the parings of the devil's corns of his toes, that they run thus damnably?

Bell. I prithee, vex not. <sup>25</sup>

Mat. If any handicraft's-man was ever suff'ered to keep shop in hell, it will be a dice-maker; he's able to undo more souls than the devil; I play'd with mine own dice, yet lost.
Ha' you any money? <sup>30</sup>

Bell. 'Las, I ha' none.

Mat. Must have money, must have some, must have a cloak, and rapier, and things. Will you go set your lime-twigs, and get me some birds, some money? <sup>35</sup>

Bell. What lime-twigs should I set?

Mat. You will not then? Must have cash and pictures, do ye hear, frailty? Shall I walk in a Plymouth cloak,<sup>6</sup> that's to say, like a rogue, in my hose and doublet, and a crabtree cudgel <sup>40</sup> in my hand, and you swim in your satins? Must have money, come! [Taking off her gown.]

Orl. Is 't bed-time, master, that you undo my mistress?

Bell. Undo me? Yes, yes, at these rifings I Have been too often.

Mat. Help to flay, Pacheco. <sup>45</sup>

Orl. Flaying call you it?

Mat. I'll pawn you, by th' lord, to your very eyebrows.

Bell. With all my heart, since Heaven will have me poor;
As good be drown'd at sea, as drown'd at shore.

Orl. Why, hear you, sir? I 'faith, do not make away her gown. <sup>51</sup>

Mat. Oh! it's summer, it's summer; your only fashion for a woman now is to be light, to be light.

Orl. Why, pray sir, employ some of that <sup>55</sup> money you have of mine.

Mat. Thine? I'll starve first, I'll beg first; when I touch a penny of that, let these fingers end rot.

Orl. [Aside.] So they may, for that's past <sup>60</sup> touching. I saw my twenty pounds fly high.

Mat. Knowest thou never a damn'd broker about the city?

Orl. Damn'd broker? Yes, five hundred.

ducats; borrow ten of<sup>1</sup> it. Cannot live without silver.

Orl. I'll make what I can of it, sir, I'll be your broker, —

[Aside] But not your damn'd broker. Oh thou scurvy knave!

What makes a wife turn whore, but such a slave? Exit [with BELLAFRONT'S gown].

Mat. How now, little chick, what ailest? Weeping for a handful of tailor's shreds? Pox on them, are there not silks enow at mercer's?

Bell. I care not for gay feathers, I.

Mat. What dost care for then? Why dost grieve?

Bell. Why do I grieve? A thousand sorrows strike

At one poor heart, and yet it lives. Matheo, Thou art a gamester; prithee, throw at all,

Set all upon one cast. We kneel and pray, And struggle for life, yet must be cast away.

Meet misery quickly then, split all, sell all, And when thou 'st sold all, spend it; but, I beseech thee,

Build not thy mind on me to coin thee more; Toget it wouldst thou have me play the whore?

Mat. 'T was your profession before I married you.

Bell. Umh? it was indeed. If all men should be branded

For sins long since laid up, who could be saved? The quarter-day 's at hand, how will you do

To pay the rent, Matheo?

Mat. Why, do as all of our occupation do against<sup>2</sup> quarter-days: break up house, remove, shift your lodgings: pox a' your quarters!

Enter LODOVICO.

Lod. Where 's this gallant?

Mat. Signor Lodovico? how does my little Mirror of Knighthood? 's This is kindly done, i' faith: welcome, by my troth.

Lod. And how dost, frolic? — Save you fair lady. —

Thou lookest smug and bravely, noble Mat.

Mat. Drink and feed, laugh and lie warm.

Lod. Is this thy wife?

Mat. A poor gentlewoman, sir, whom I make use of a' nights.

Lod. Pay custom to your lips, sweet lady.

Mat. Borrow some shells<sup>4</sup> of him. — Some wine, sweetheart.

Lod. I'll send for 't then, i' faith.

Mat. You send for 't! — Some wine, I prithee.

Bell. I ha' no money.

Mat. 'Sblood, nor I. — What wine love you, signor?

Lod. Here! [offering money] or I'll not stay, I protest; trouble the gentlewoman too much?

Exit BELLAFRONT.

Mat. Troth, none. Oh, signor, we ha' been merry in our days.

Lod. And no doubt shall again.

The divine powers never shoot darts at men Mortal, to kill them.

Mat. You say true.

Lod. Why should we grieve at want? Say the world made thee

Her minion, that thy head lay in her lap, And that she danc'd thee on her wanton knee,

She could but give thee a whole world: that 's all,

And that all's nothing; the world's greatest part Cannot fill up one corner of thy heart.

Say the three corners were all fill'd, alas! Of what art thou possess'd? A thin blown glass,

Such as is by boys puft into the air! Were twenty kingdoms thine, thou 'dst live in care:

Thou couldst not sleep the better, nor live longer,

Nor merrier be, nor healthfuller, nor stronger. If, then, thou want'st, thus make that want thy pleasure,

No man wants all things, nor has all in measure.

Mat. I am the most wretched fellow: sure some left-handed priest hath christ'ned me. I am so unlucky; I am never out of one puddle or another; still falling.

Re-enter BELLAFRONT [with wine] and ORLANDO.

Fill out wine to my little finger. — With my heart, i' faith.

Lod. Thanks, good Matheo. To your own sweet self.

Re-enter ORLANDO.

Orl. All the brokers' hearts, sir, are made of flint. I can with all my knocking strike but six sparks of fire out of them; here 's six ducats, if you 'll take them.

Mat. Give me them! [Taking money.] An evil conscience gnaw them all! Moths and plagues hang upon their lousy wardrobes!

Lod. Is this your man, Matheo?

[Mat.] An old serving-man.

Orl. You may give me t' other half too, sir; that 's the beggar.

Lod. What hast there, — gold?

Mat. A sort<sup>5</sup> of rascals are in my debt, God knows what, and they feed me with bits, with crumbs, a pox choke them.

Lod. A word, Matheo; be not angry with me; Believe it that I know the touch of time,

And can part copper, though it be gilded o'er, From the true gold: the sails which thou dost spread,

Would show well if they were not borrowed. The sound of thy low fortunes drew me hither, I give my self unto thee; prithee, use me,

I will bestow on you a suit of satin, And all things else to fit a gentleman,

Because I love you.

Mat. Thanks, good, noble knight!

Lod. Call on me when you please; till then farewell.

Mat. Hast angled? Hast cut up this fresh salmon?

Bell. Wouldst have me be so base?

Mat. It's base to steal, it's base to be a whore: Thou'lt be more base, I'll make thee keep a door.<sup>1</sup> Exit.

Orl. I hope he will not sneak away with all the money, will he? 175

Bell. Thou seest he does.

Orl. Nay then, it's well. I set my brains upon an upright last;<sup>2</sup> though my wits be old, yet they are like a wither'd pippin, wholesome. Look you, mistress, I told him I had but six [180] ducats of the knave broker, but I had eight, and kept these two for you.

Bell. Thou should'st have given him all.

Orl. What, to fly high?

Bell. Like waves, my misery drives on misery. Exit.

Orl. Sell his wife's clothes from her back?<sup>3</sup> [185] Does any poulterer's wife pull chickens alive? He riots all abroad, wants all at home: he dices, whores, swaggers, swears, cheats, borrows, pawns. I'll give him hook and line, a little more for all this; 190 Yet sure i'th' end he'll delude all my hopes, And show me a French trick danc'd on the ropes.<sup>3</sup> Exit. 185

[SCENE III.]

Enter at one door LODOVICO and CAROLO; at another BOTS, and Mistress HORSELEECH. CANDIDO and his Wife appear in the Shop.

Lod. Hist, hist, Lieutenant Bots! How dost, man?

Car. Whether are you ambling, Madam Horseleech?

Mis. H. About worldly profit, sir: how [5] do your workshops?

Bots. We want tools, gentlemen, to furnish the trade: they wear out day and night, they wear out till no metal be left in their back. We hear of two or three new wenches are come [10] up with a carrier, and your old goshawk here is flying at them.

Lod. And, faith, what flesh have you at home?

Mis. H. Ordinary dishes; by my troth, [15] sweet men, there's few good i'th' city. I am as well furnisht as any, and, though I say it, as well custom'd.

Bots. We have meats of all sorts of dressing; we have stew'd meat for your Frenchman, [20] pretty light picking meat for your Italian, and that which is rotten roasted for Don Spaniard.

Lod. A pox on't.

Bots. We have poulterer's ware for your sweet bloods, as dove, chicken, duck, teal, [25] woodcock, and so forth: and butcher's meat for the citizen: yet muttons<sup>4</sup> fall very bad this year.

Lod. Stay, is not that my patient linen-draper yonder, and my fine young smug mistress, [30] his wife?

fee twenty crowns, if thou canst but procure me the wearing of you velvet cap.

Mis. H. You'd wear another thing besides the cap. You're a wag.

Bots. Twenty crowns? We'll share, and I'll be your pully to draw her on.

Lod. Do't presently; we'll ha' some sport.

Mis. H. Wheel you about, sweet men: [40] do you see? I'll cheapen wares of the man, whilst Bots is doing with his wife.

Lod. To't: if we come into the shop to do you grace, we'll call you madam.

Bots. Fox a' your old face, give it the [45] badge of all surry faces, a mask.

[Mistress HORSELEECH puts on a mask.]

Cand. What is't you lack, gentlewoman? Cambric or lawns, or fine hollands? Pray draw near; I can sell you a pennyworth.

Bots. Some cambric for my old lady. 50

Cand. Cambric? You shall, the purest thread in Milan.

Lod., Car. Save you, Signor Candido.

Lod. How does my noble master? How my fair mistress? 55

Cand. My worshipful good servant. — View it well, for't is both fine and even.

[Shows cambric.]

Car. Cry you mercy, madam; though mask'd, I thought it should be you by your man. — Pray, signor, show her the best, for she commonly deals for good ware. 61

Cand. Then this shall fit her. — This is for your ladyship.

Bots. [to Bride.] A word, I pray. There is a waiting gentlewoman of my lady's — her [65] name is Ruyna — says she's your kinswoman, and that you should be one of her aunts.

Bride. One of her aunts? Troth, sir, I know her not. 69

Bots. If it please you to bestow the poor labour of your legs at any time, I will be your convoy thither.

Bride. I am a snail, sir, seldom leave my house. If't please her to visit me, she shall be welcome. 75

Bots. Do you hear? The naked truth is, my lady hath a young knight, her son, who loves you; you're made, if you lay hold upon't; this jewel he sends you. [Offers jewel.] 79

Bride. Sir, I return his love and jewel with scorn. Let go my hand, or I shall call my husband. You are an arrant knave. Exit.

Lod. What will she do?

Bots. Do? They shall all do if Bots sets upon them once. She was as if she had profest [85] the trade, squeamish at first; at last I showed her this jewel, said a knight sent it her.

Lod. Is't gold, and right stones?

Bots. Copper, copper; I go a fishing with these baits. She nibbled, but would not swallow the hook, because the conger-head, her [91] husband, was by; but she bids the gentleman name any afternoon, and she'll meet him at her garden house,<sup>6</sup> which I know.

<sup>6</sup> Gardens with summer-houses were very common in the suburbs of London at the time, and were often used as places of intrigue. (Dyce.)

Lod. Is this no lie now? 95
Bots. Damme, if—
Lod. Oh, prithee, stay there.
Bots. The twenty crowns, sir.
Lod. Before he has his work done?—But on my knightly word he shall pay 't thee. 100

Enter ASTOLFO, BERALDO, FONTINELL, and the Irish footman [BRYAN].

Ast. I thought thou hadst been gone into thine own country.

Bry. No, faat, la, I cannot go dis four or tree days. 104

Ber. Look thee, yonder 's the shop, and that 's the man himself.

Fon. Thou shalt but cheapen, and do as we told thee, to put a jest upon him, to abuse his patience, 109

Bry. I' faat, I doubt my pate shall be knocked: but, sa crees sa' me, for your shakes, I will run to any lineu-draper in hell. Come, predee.

All. Save you, gallants.

Lod., Car. Oh, well met! 115

Cand. You 'll give no more, you say? I cannot take it.

Mis. H. Truly, I 'll give no more.

Cand. It must not fetch it.

What would you have, sweet gentlemen. 120

Ast. Nay, here 's the customer.

Exeunt BOTS and Mistress HORSE-LEECH.

Lod. The garden-house, you say? We 'll bolt 't out your roguery.

Cand. I will but lay these parcels by—my men

Are all at custom house unloading wares. 125
 If cambric you would deal in, there 's the best; All Milan cannot sample it.

Lod. Do you hear it? one, two, three,— 'Sfoot, there came in four gallants! Sure your wife is slipt up, and the fourth man, I hold my life, is grafting your warden tree.<sup>2</sup> 131

Cand. Ha, ha, ha! you gentlemen are full of jest,

If she he up, she 's gone some wares to show; I have above as good wares as below.

Lod. Have you so? Nay, then— 135

Cand. Now, gentlemen, is 't cambrics?

Bry. I predee now, let me have de best wares.

Cand. What 's that he says, pray, gentlemen?

Lod. Marry, he says we are like to have the best wars. 141

Cand. The best wars? All are bad, yet wars do good,

And, like to surgeons, let sick kingdom's blood,

Bry. Faat a devil pratest tow so? a pox on dee! I predee, let me see some hollen, to make linen shirts, for fear my body be lousy. 146

Cand. Indeed, I understand no word he speaks.

Car. Marry, he says that at the siege in Holland

There was much bawdry us'd among the soldi-
 diers,

Though they were lousy. 150

Cand. It may be so, that 's likely.—True, indeed,

In every garden, sir, does grow that weed.

Bry. Fox on de gardens, and de weeds, and de fool's cap dere, and de clouts! Hear? dost make a hobby-horse of me. 155

[Tearing the cambric.]

All. Oh, fie! he has torn the cambric.

Cand. 'T is no matter.

Ast. It frets me to the soul.

Cand. So does 't not me.

My customers do oft for remnants call,

These are two remnants, now, no loss at all.

But let me tell you, were my servants here, 160
 It would ha' cost more.—Thank you, gentlemen,

I use you well, pray know my shop again.

All. Ha, ha, ha! come, come, let 's go, let 's go. Exit.

Exeunt.

[ACT IV]

[SCENE I.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter MATHEO brave,<sup>4</sup> and BELLAFRONT.

Mat. How am I suited, Front? Am I not gallant, ha?

Bell. Yes, sir, you are suited well.

Mat. Exceeding passing well, and to the time.<sup>5</sup>

Bell. The tailor has play'd his part with you.

Mat. And I have play'd a gentleman's part with my tailor, for I owe him for the making of it.

Bell. And why did you so, sir?

Mat. To keep the fashion; it's your only [10 fashion now, of your best rank of gallants, to make their tailors wait for their money; neither were it wisdom indeed to pay them upon the first edition<sup>6</sup> of a new suit; for commonly the suit is owing for, when the linings [15 are worn out, and there's no reason, then, that the tailor should be paid before the mercer.

Bell. Is this the suit the knight bestowed upon you?

Mat. This is the suit, and I need not shame to wear it, for better men than I would be [21 glad to have suits bestowed on them. It's a generous fellow,—but—pox on him—we whose pericranions are the very limbecks and stillatories of good wit and fly high, must drive liquor out of stale gaping oysters. Shallow [25 knight, poor squire Tinacheo: I'll make a wild Cataian<sup>7</sup> of forty such: hang him, he's an ass, he's always sober.

Bell. This is your fault to wound your friends still. 31

<sup>7</sup> "It would take forty such knights to make a thief." Cataia is China; the Chinese were supposed to be great thieves.

Slavonian: it's more rare to see him in a woman's company, than for a Spaniard to go into England, and to challenge the English fencers there. — [Knocking within.] One knocks, — see. — [Exit BELLAFRONT.] — La, fa, sol, la, fa, la, [sings] rustle in silks and satins! There's music in this, and a taffeta petticoat, it makes both fly high. Catso.

Re-enter BELLAFRONT; after her ORLANDO, like himself, with four men after him.

Bell. Matheo! 't is my father.

Mat. Ha! father? It's no matter, he finds no tatter'd prodigals here.

Orl. Is not the door good enough to hold your blue coats? Away, knaves, wear not your clothes threadbare at knees for me; beg Heaven's blessing, not mine. [Exeunt Servants.] — Oh cry your worship mercy, sir; was somewhat bold to talk to this gentlewoman, your wife here.

Mat. A poor gentlewoman, sir.

Orl. Stand not, sir, bare to me; I ha' read oft That serpents who creep low, belch ranker poison

Than winged dragons do that fly aloft.

Mat. If it offend you, sir, 't is for my pleasure.

Orl. Your pleasure be 't, sir. Umb, is this your palace?

Bell. Yes, and our kingdom, for 't is our content.

Orl. It's a very poor kingdom then; what, are all your subjects gone a sheep-shearing? Not a maid? not a man? not so much as a cat? You keep a good house belike, just like one of your profession, every room with bare walls, and a half-headed bed to vault upon, as all your bawdy-houses are. Pray who are your upholsters? Oh, the spiders, I see, they bestow hangings upon you.

Mat. Bawdy-house? Zounds, sir —

Bell. Oh sweet Matheo, peace. Upon my knees

I do beseech you, sir, not to arraign me For sins, which Heaven, I hope, long since hath pardoned!

Those flames, like lightning flashes, are so spent, The heat no more remains, than where ships went,

Or where birds cut the air, the print remains.

Mat. Fox on him, kneel to a dog.

Bell. She that's a whore,

Lives gallant, fares well, is not, like me, poor. I ha' now as small acquaintance with that sin, As if I had never known 't, that never been.

Orl. No acquaintance with it? What maintains thee then? How dost live then? Has thy husband any lands, any rents coming in, any stock going, any ploughs jogging, any ships sailing? Hast thou any wares to turn, <sup>1</sup> so much as to get a single penny by?

Yes thou hast ware to sell;

Knaves are thy chapmen, and thy shop is hell.

Mat. Do you hear, sir?

Orl. So, sir, I do hear, sir, more of you than you dream I do.

Mat. You fly a little too high, sir.

Orl. Why, sir, too high?

Mat. I ha' suff'red your tongue, like a barr'd cater-tray, <sup>2</sup> to run all this while, and ha' not stopt it.

Orl. Well, sir, you talk like a gamester.

Mat. If you come to bark at her because she's a poor rogue, look you, here's a fine path, sir, and there, there, the door.

Bell. Matheo!

Mat. Your blue coats stay for you, sir. I love a good honest roaring boy, and so —

Orl. That's the devil.

Mat. Sir, sir, I'll ha' no Joves in my house to thunder avaut. She shall live and be maintained when you, like a keg of musty sturgeon, shall stink. Where? In your coffin. How? Be a musty fellow, and lousy.

Orl. I know she shall be maintained, but how? She like a quean, thou like a knave; she like a whore, thou like a thief.

Mat. Thief? Zounds! Thief?

Bell. Good, dearest Mat! — Father!

Mat. Fox on you both! I'll not be braved. New satin scorns to be put down with bare bawdy velvet. Thief!

Orl. Ay, thief, th' art a murderer, a cheater, a whoremonger, a pot-hunter, a borrower, a beggar —

Bell. Dear father —

Mat. An old ass, a dog, a churl, a chuff, an usurer, a villain, a moth, a mangy mule, with an old velvet foot-cloth on his back, sir.

Bell. Oh me!

Orl. Varlet, for this I'll hang thee.

Mat. Ha, ha, alas!

Orl. Thou keepest a man of mine here, under my nose.

Mat. Under thy beard.

Orl. As arrant a smell-smock, for an old mutton-monger as thyself.

Mat. No, as yourself.

Orl. As arrant a purse-taker as ever cried, Stand! yet a good fellow I confess, and valiant; but he'll bring thee to th' gallows. You both have robb'd of late two poor country pedlars.

Mat. How's this? How's this? Dost thou fly high? Rob pedlars? — Bear witness, Front — rob pedlars? My man and I a thief?

Bell. Oh, sir, no more.

Orl. Ay, knave, two pedlars. Hue and cry is up, warrants are out, and I shall see thee climb a ladder.

Mat. And come down again as well as a bricklayer or a tiler. — [Aside.] How the vengeance knows be this? — If I be hanged, I'll tell the people I married old Friscobaldo's daughter; I'll frisco you, and your old carcass.

Orl. Tell what you canst; if I stay here longer, I shall be hang'd too, for being in thy company; therefore, as I found you, I leave you —

Mat. Kneel, and get money of him.

Orl. A knave and a quean, a thief and a strumpet, a couple of beggars, a brace of baggages. <sup>155</sup>

Mat. Hang upon him — Ay, ay, sir, fare you well; we are so — follow close — we are beggars — in satin — to him.

Bell. Is this your comfort, when so many years <sup>160</sup>

You ha' left me frozen to death?

Orl. Freeze still, starve still!
Bell. Yes, so I shall: I must: I must and will.

If, as you say, I'm poor, relieve me then,
Let me not sell my body to base men.

You call me strumpet, Heaven knows I am none: <sup>165</sup>

Your cruelty may drive me to be one:

Let not that sin be yours; let not the shame

Of common whore live longer than my name.

That cunning bawd, Necessity, night and day

Plots to undo me; drive that hag away, <sup>170</sup>

Lest being at lowest ebb, as now I am,

I sink for ever.

Orl. Lowest ebb, what ebb?

Bell. So poor, that, though to tell it be my

shame,

I am not worth a dish to hold my meat;

I am yet poorer, I want bread to eat. <sup>175</sup>

Orl. It's not seen by your cheeks.

Mat. [Aside.] I think she has read an homily to tickle the old rogue.

Orl. Want bread! There's satin: bake that.

Mat. 'Sblood, make pasties of my clothes? <sup>180</sup>

Orl. A fair new cloak, stew that; an excellent gilt rapier.

Mat. Will you eat that, sir?

Orl. I could feast ten good fellows with these hangers. <sup>1</sup>

Mat. The pox, you shall! <sup>185</sup>

Orl. I shall not, till thou begg'st, think thou art poor;

And when thou begg'st I'll feed thee at my door,

As I feed dogs, with bones; till then beg, borrow,

Pawn, steal, and hang, turn bawd, when thou art whore, —

[Aside.] My heart-strings sure would crack, were they strain'd more. Exit. <sup>190</sup>

Mat. This is your father, your damn'd — Confusion light upon all the generation of you!

He can come bragging hither with four white herrings at's tail in blue coats, without roes in their bellies; but I may starve ere he give me

so much as a cob. <sup>2</sup> <sup>195</sup>

Bell. What tell you me of this? alas!

Mat. Go, trot after your dad, do you capitulate;

I'll pawn not for you; I'll not steal to be hanged for such an hypocritical, close, common harlot: away, you dog! — <sup>201</sup>

Brave i' faith! Udsfoot, give me some meat.

Bell. Yes, sir. Exit.

Mat. Goodman slave, my man too, is gallop'd

to the devil a' the t' other side: Pacheco, I'll checo you. Is this your dad's day? Eng-<sup>200</sup> land, they say, is the only hell for horses, and only paradise for women: pray get you to that paradise, because you're called an honest whore; there they live none but honest whores with a pox. Marry, here in our city, all your <sup>211</sup> sex are but foot-cloth nags:<sup>2</sup> the master no sooner lights but the man leaps into the saddle.

Re-enter BELLAFRONT [with meat and drink].

Bell. Will you sit down, I pray, sir?

Mat. [Sitting down.] I could tear, by th' Lord, his flesh, and eat his midriff in salt, as I eat <sup>215</sup> this: — must I choke? — My father Friscobaldo, I shall make a pitiful hog-louse of you, Orlando, if you fall once into my fingers — Here's the savourest meat! I ha' got a stomach with chafing.<sup>4</sup> What rogue should tell him of those <sup>222</sup> two pedlars? A plague choke him, and gnaw him to the bare bones! — Come fill.

Bell. Thou sweatest with very anger, good sweet. Vex not, 'las, 'tis no fault of mine. <sup>225</sup>

Mat. Where didst buy this mutton? I never felt better ribs.

Bell. A neighbour sent it me.

Re-enter ORLANDO [disguised as a Serving-man].

Mat. Hah, neighbour? Foh, my mouth stinks. You whore, do you beg victuals for me? Is this satin doublet to be bombasted<sup>5</sup> with broken <sup>231</sup> meat? Takes up the stool.

Orl. What will you do, sir?

Mat. Beat out the brains of a beggarly — <sup>234</sup>

Orl. Beat out an ass's head of your own. —

Away, Mistress! [Exit BELLAFRONT.] Zounds,

do but touch one hair of her, and I'll so quilt your cap with old iron, that your coxcomb shall ache the worse these seven years for't. Does she look like a roasted rabbit, that you must have the head for the brains? <sup>241</sup>

Mat. Ha, ha! go out of my doors, you rogue!

Away, four marks; trudge.

Orl. Four marks? No, sir, my twenty pound that you ha' made fly high, and I am gone. <sup>245</sup>

Mat. Must I be fed with chippings? You're best get a clapdish,<sup>6</sup> and say y' are proctor to some spittle-house.<sup>7</sup> — Where hast thou been,

Pacheco? Come hither my little turkey-cock.

Orl. I cannot abide, sir, to see a woman

wrong'd, not I. <sup>251</sup>

Mat. Sirrah, here was my father-in-law to-day.

Orl. Fish, then y' are full of crowns.

Mat. Hang him! he would ha' thrust crowns upon me, to have fall'n in again, but I scorn cast clothes, or any man's gold. <sup>255</sup>

Orl. [Aside.] — But mine. How did he brook that, sir?

Mat. Oh, swore like a dozen of drunken tinkers; at last growing foul in words, he and <sup>260</sup> four of his men drew upon me, sir.

to attract notice.

Orl. In your house? Would I had been by!

Mat. I made no more ado, but fell to my old lock,<sup>1</sup> and so thrashed my blue-coats and old crab-tree-face my father-in-law, and then walkt like a lion in my grate.<sup>2</sup> 269

Orl. O noble master!

Mat. Sirrah, he could tell me of the robbing the two pedlars, and that warrants are out for us both. 270

Orl. Good sir, I like not those crackers.<sup>3</sup>

Mat. Crackhalter,<sup>4</sup> wou't set thy foot to mine? Orl. How, sir? at drinking.

Mat. We'll pull that old crow my father: rob thy master. I know the house, thou [275] the servants: the purchase<sup>5</sup> is rich, the plot to get it is easy; the dog will not part from a bone.

Orl. Pluck't out of his throat, then. I'll snarl for one, if this<sup>6</sup> can bite.

Mat. Say no more, say no more, old coal; [280] meet me anon at the sign of the Shipwrack.

Orl. Yes, sir.

Mat. And dost hear, man? — the Shipwrack. Exit.

Orl. Th' art at the shipwrack now, and like a swimmer, Bold, to unexpert, with those waves dost play, 285 Whose dalliance, whorelike, is to cast thee away.

Enter HIPPOLITO and BELLAFRONT.

And here's another vessel, better fraught, But as ill-mann'd; her sinking will be wrought, If rescue come not: like a man of war I'll therefore bravely out; somewhat I'll do, And either save them both, or perish too. 291 Exit.

Hip. It is my fate to be bewitched by those eyes.

Bell. Fate? your folly.

Why should my face thus mad you? 'Las, those colours 295

Are wound up long ago, which beauty spread; The flowers that once grew here, are withered. You turn'd my black soul white, made it look new,

And should I sin, it ne'er should be with you.

Hip. Your hand, I'll offer you fair play. When first 300

We met i' th' lists together, you remember You were a common rebel; with one parley I won you to come in.

Bell. You did.

Hip. I'll try

If now I can beat down this chastity With the same ordnance. Will you yield this fort, 305

If the power of argument now, as then, I get of you the conquest: as before I turn'd you honest, now to turn you whore, By force of strong persuasion?

Bell. If you can,

I yield. Hip. The alarum's struck up; I'm your man.

Bell. A woman gives defiance.

Hip. Sit. [They seat themselves.]

Bell. Begin: 311

'Tis a brave battle to encounter sin.

Hip. You men that are to fight in the same war

To which I'm prest, and plead at the same bar,

To win a woman, if you'd have me speed, 315 Send all your wishes!

Bell. No doubt you're heard; proceed.

Hip. To be a harlot, that you stand upon, The very name's a charm to make you one.

Harlotta<sup>7</sup> was a dame of so divine 319

And ravishing touch<sup>8</sup> that she was concubine To an English king; her sweet bewitching eye Did the king's heart-strings in such love-knots tie

That even the coyest was proud when she could hear

Men say, "Behold, another Harlot there!"

And after her all women that were fair 325

Were harlots call'd, as to this day some are:

Besides, her dalliance she so well does mix,

That she's in Latin call'd the Meretrix.

Thus for the name; for the profession, this:

Who lives in bondage, lives lac'd; the chief bliss 330

This world below can yield, is liberty: And who, than whores, with looser wings dare fly?

As Juno's proud bird spreads the fairest tail,

So does a strumpet hoist the loftiest sail,

She's no man's slave; men are her slaves; her eye 335

Moves not on wheels screw'd up with jealousy, She, hors'd or coach'd, does merry journeys make,

Free as the sun in his gilt zodiac:

As bravely does she shine, as fast she's driven,

But stays not long in any house of heaven; 340

But shifts from sign to sign, her amorous prizes

More rich being when she's down, than when she rises.

In brief, gentlemen haunt them, soldiers fight for them,

Few men but know them, few or none abhor them.

Thus for sport's sake speak I, as to a woman Whom, as the worst ground, I would turn to common: 345

But you I would enclose for mine own bed.

Bell. So should a husband be dishonour'd.

Hip. Dishonour'd? Not a whit: to fall to one

Besides your husband is to fall to none, 350 For one no number is.

Bell. Faith, should you take

One in your bed, would you that reckoning make?

'Tis time you found retreat.

Hip. Say, have I won, Is the day ours?

Bell. The battle's but half done,
None but yourself have yet sounded alarms, <sup>355</sup>
Let us strike too, else you dishonour arms.

Hip. If you can win the day, the glory's yours.

Bell. To prove a woman should not be a
whore:

When she was made, she'd one man, and no
more; <sup>359</sup>

Yet she was tied to laws then, for even than, <sup>1</sup>
'T is said, she was not made for men, but man.

Anon, t' increase earth's brood, the law was varied,

Men should take many wives: and though they married

According to that act, yet 't is not known
But that those wives were only tied to one. <sup>365</sup>

New parliaments were since: for now one
woman

Is shar'd between three hundred, nay she's common,

Common! as spotted leopards, whom for sport
Men hunt to get the flesh, but care not for 't.

So spread they nets of gold, and tune their calls, <sup>370</sup>

To enchant silly women to take falls;
Swearing they're angels, which that they may win

They'll hire the devil to come with false dice
in.

Oh Sirens' subtle tunes! yourselves you flatter,
And our weak sex betray: so men love water;
It serves to wash their hands, but being once foul, <sup>375</sup>

The water down is pour'd, cast out of doors;
And even of such base use do men make whores.

A harlot, like a hen, more sweetness reaps,
To pick men one by one up, than in heaps: <sup>380</sup>
Yet all feeds but confounding. <sup>2</sup> Say you should taste me,

I serve but for the time, and when the day
Of war is done, am cashier'd out of pay:
If like lame soldiers I could beg, that's all,
And there's lust's rendezvous, an hospital. <sup>385</sup>

Who then would be a man's slave, a man's
woman?

She's half starv'd the first day that feeds in common.

Hip. You should not feed so, but with me
alone.

Bell. If I drink poison by stealth, is 't not all one?

Is 't not rank poison still with you alone? <sup>390</sup>
Nay, say you spi'd a courtesan, whose soft side
To touch you 'd sell your birth-right, for one kiss
Be rack'd; she's won, you're sated: what follows this?

Oh, then you curse that bawd that toll'd <sup>3</sup> you
in,

The night; you curse your lust, you loathe the
sin, <sup>395</sup>

You loathe her very sight, and ere the day
Arise, you rise glad when y' are stol'n away.
Even then when you are drunk with all her sweets,

There's no true pleasure in a strumpet's sheets.
Women whom lust so prostitutes to sale, <sup>400</sup>

Like dancers upon ropes, once seen, are stale.

Hip. If all the threads of harlot's lives are spun,
So coarse as you would make them, tell me
why

You so long lov'd the trade?

Bell. If all the threads
Of harlot's lives be fine as you would make them, <sup>405</sup>

Why do not you persuade your wife turn
whore,

And all dames else to fall before that sin?
Like an ill husband, though I knew the same
To be my undoing, followed I that game.

Oh, when the work of lust had earn'd my bread, <sup>410</sup>

To taste it how I trembled, lest each bit.
Ere it went down, should choke me chewing it!
My bed seem'd like a cabin hung in hell,
The bawd, hell's porter, and the lick'erish <sup>4</sup>
wine

The pander fetch'd, was like an easy fine, <sup>415</sup>
For which, methought, I leas'd away my soul;
And oftentimes, even in my quaffing bowl,
Thus said I to myself, I am a whore,
And have drunk down thus much confusion
more. <sup>419</sup>

Hip. It is a common rule, and 't is more true,
Two of one trade ne'er love: no more do you.

Why are you sharp 'gainst that you once pro-fess't?

Bell. Why dote you on that, which you did once detest?

I cannot, seeing she's woven of such bad stuff,
Set colours on a harlot base enough. <sup>425</sup>

Nothing did make me, when I lov'd them best,
To loathe them more than this: when in the street

A fair young modest damsel I did meet,
She seem'd to all a dove, when I pass'd by,
And I to all a raven: every eye <sup>430</sup>
That followed her went with a bashful glance,
At me each bold and jeering countenance
Darted forth scorn; to her as if she had been Some tower unvanquished, would they vail, <sup>5</sup>
'Gainst me swoln rumour hoisted every sail;
She, crown'd with reverend praises, pass'd by them, <sup>435</sup>

I, though with face mask'd, could not scape
the "Hem!"

For, as if Heaven had set strange marks on
whores,

Because they should be pointing stocks to
man,

Drest up in civilet shape, a courtesan — <sup>440</sup>
Let her walk saint-like, noteless, and unknown,
Yet she's betray'd by some trick of her own.
Were harlots therefore wise, they'd be sold
dear:

For men account them good but for one year,
And then like almanacs whose dates are gone, <sup>445</sup>

They are thrown by, and no more look'd upon.

Who 'll therefore backward fall, who will launch forth

In seas so foul, for ventures no more worth?
Lust's voyage hath, if not this course, this cross,

Buy ne'er so cheap, your ware comes home with loss.

What, shall I sound retreat? The battle's done:

Let the world judge which of us two have won.

Hip. I!

Bell. You? nay then as cowards do in fight,
What by blows cannot, shall be sav'd by flight.

Hip. Fly to earth's fixed centre: to the caves
Of everlasting horror, I 'll pursue thee,
Though loaden with sins, even to hell's brazen doors.

Thus wisest men turn fools, doting on whores.

Enter the DUKE, LODOVICO, and ORLANDO [disguised as a Serving-man]; after them INFELICE, CAROLO, ASTOLFO, BERALDO, and PONTINELL.

Orl. I beseech your grace, though your eye be so piercing as under a poor blue coat to cull out an honest father from an old serving-man, yet, good my lord, discover not the plot to any, but only this gentleman that is now to be an actor in our ensuing comedy.

Duke. Thou hast thy wish, Orlando, pass unknown,

Sforza shall only go along with thee,
To see that warrant serv'd upon thy son.

Lod. To attach him upon felony, for two pedlars: is 't not so?

Orl. Right, my noble knight: those pedlars were two knaves of mine; he fleec'd the men before, and now he purposes to flay the master. He will rob me; his teeth water to be nibbling at my gold; but this shall hang him by th' gills, till I pull him on shore.

Duke. Away: ply you the business.

Orl. Thanks to your grace: but, my good lord, for my daughter—

Duke. You know what I have said.

Orl. And remember what I have sworn. She's more honest, on my soul, than one of the Turks' wenches, watcht by a hundred eunuchs.

Lod. So she had need, for the Turks make them whores.

Orl. He's a Turk that makes any woman a whore; he's no true Christian, I'm sure. I commit your grace.

Duke. Infelice.

Inf. Here, sir.

Lod. Signor Friscebald.

Orl. Frisking again? Pacheco.

Lod. Uds so, Pacheco! We'll have some sport with this warrant: 'tis to apprehend all suspected persons in the house. Besides, there's one Bots, a pander, and one Madam Horseleech, a bawd, that have abus'd my friend;

those two conies will we ferret into the purse-net.<sup>2</sup>

Orl. Let me alone for dabbling them o' th' neck. Come, come.

Lod. Do ye hear, gallants? Meet me anon at Matheo's.

All. Enough.

Exeunt LODOVICO and ORLANDO.

Duke. Th' old fellow sings that note thou didst before,

Only his tunes are, that she is no whore,
But that she sent his letters and his gifts,
Out of a noble triumph o'er his lust,
To show she trampled his assaults in dust.

Inf. 'T is a good honest servant, that old man.

Duke. I doubt no less.

Inf. And it may be my husband,
Because when once this woman was unmaskt,
He levell'd all her thoughts, and made them fit,
Now he 'd mar all again, to try his wit.

Duke. It may be so too, for to turn a harlot honest, it must be by strong antidotes;
'T is rare, as to see panthers change their spots.
And when she's once a star fix'd and shines bright,

Though 't were impiety then to dim her light,
Because we see such tapers seldom burn,
Yet 't is the pride and glory of some men,
To change her to a blazing star again,
And it may be, Hippolito does no more.—
It cannot be but you're acquainted all
With that same madness of our son-in-law,
That dotes so on a courtesan.

All.

Yes, my lord.

Car. All the city thinks he's a whoremonger.
Ast. Yet I warrant he 'll swear no man marks him.

Ber. 'T is like so, for when a man goes a wenching, is as if he had a strong stinking breath, every one smells him out, yet he feels it not, though it be ranker than the sweat of sixteen bear wardens.

Duke. I doubt then you have all those stinking breaths;

You might be all smelt out.
Car. Troth, my lord, I think we are all as you ha' been in your youth when you went a-maying; we all love to hear the cuckoo sing upon other men's trees.

Duke. It's well; yet you confess. But, girl, thy bed

Shall not be parted with a courtesan.

'T is strange,

No frown of mine, no frown of the poor lady,
My abus'd child, his wife, no care of fame,
Of honour, heaven, or hell, no not that name
Of common strumpet, can affright, or woo him
To abandon her; the harlot does undo him;
She has bewitcht him, robb'd him of his shape,
Turn'd him into a beast; his reason's lost;
You see he looks wild, does he not?

Car.

I ha' noted

New moons in 's face, my lord, all full of change.
Duke. He's no more like unto Hippolito

Than dead men are to living—never sleeps, 95
Or if he do, it's dreams: and in those dreams
His arms work, and then cries, "Sweet"— what's her name.

What's the drab's name?

Ast. In troth, my lord, I know not,
I know no drabs, not I.

Duke. Oh, Bellafront!— 99
And, catching her fast, cries, "My Bellafront!"

Car. A drench that's able to kill a horse, cannot kill this disease of smooek-smelling, my lord, if it have once eaten deep.

Duke. I'll try all physic, and this medicine
first: 104

I have directed warrants strong and peremptory
To purge our city Milan, and to cure
The outward parts, the suburbs, for the attaching

Of all those women, who, like gold, want weight:

Cities, like ships, should have no idle freight. 109

Car. No, my lord, and light wenches are no idle freight; but what's your grace's reach<sup>1</sup> in this?

Duke. This, Carolo. If she whom my son dotes on,

Be in that muster-book enroll'd, he'll shame
Ever t' approach one of such noted name. 115

Car. But say she be not?

Duke. Yet on harlots' heads
New laws shall fall so heavy, and such blows
Shall give to those that haunt them, that Hippolitio

If not for fear of law, for love to her,
If he love truly, shall her bed forbear. 120

Car. Attach all the light heels i' the city and clap 'em up? Why, my lord, you dive into a well unsearchable: all the whores within the walls, and without the walls? I would not be [124 he should meddle with them for tensuch dukedoms; the army that you speak on is able to fill all the prisons within this city, and to leave not a drinking-room in any tavern besides.

Duke. Those only shall be caught that are of note;

Harlots in each street flow: 130

The fish being thus i' th' net, ourself will sit,
And with eye most severe dispose of it.

Come, girl. [Exeunt DUKE and INFELICE.]

Car. Arraign the poor whores!

Ast. I'll not miss that sessions. 135

Font. Nor I.

Ber. Nor I, though I hold up my hand there myself. Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter MATHEO, LODOVICO, and ORLANDO [disguised as a Serving-man].

Mat. Let who will come, my noble chevalier; I can but play the kind host, and bid 'em
welcome.

Lod. We'll trouble your house, Matheo, but as Dutchmen do in taverns, driuk, be merry, [5 and be gone.

Orl. Indeed, if you be right Dutchmen; if you fall to drinking, you must be gone.

Mat. The worst is, my wife is not at home;
but we'll fly high, my generous knight, for all that. There's no music when a woman is in [11
the concert.

Orl. No; for she's like a pair of virginals,
Always with jacks at her tail.

Enter ASTOLFO, CAROLO, BERALDO, and FON-TINELL.

Lod. See, the covey is sprung. 15

All. Save you, gallants.

Mat. Happily encounter'd, sweet bloods.

Lod. Gentlemen, you all know Signor Can-dido, the linen-draper, he that's more patient than a brown baker upon the day when he heats his oven, and has forty scolds about him. 21

All. Yes, we know him all; what of him?

Lod. Would it not be a good fit of mirth, to make a piece of English cloth of him, and to stretch him on the tenters,<sup>3</sup> till the threads of his own natural humour crack, by making [25 him drink healths, tobacco, dance, sing bawdy songs, or to run any bias<sup>4</sup> according as we think good to cast him? 22

Car. 'T were a morris-dance worth the seeing.

Ast. But the old fox is so crafty, we shall hardly hunt him out of his den.

Mat. To that train I ha' given fire already;
and the hook to draw him hither, is to see certain pieces of lawn, which I told him I have [35 to sell, and indeed have such; fetch them down, Pacheco.

Orl. Yes, sir, I'm your water-spaniel, and will fetch any thing—[Aside.] but I'll fetch one dish of meat anon shall turn your stomach, and that's a constable. Exit. 41

Enter BOTS ushering Mistress HORSELEECH.

All. How now? how now?

Car. What galley-foist<sup>5</sup> is this?

Lod. Peace, two dishes of stewed prunes,<sup>6</sup> a bawd and a pander. My worthy lieutenant Bots;
why, now I see thou'rt a man of thy word, [45
welcome.—Welcome Mistress Horseleech.—
Pray, gentlemen, salute this reverend matron.

Mis. H. Thanks to all your worships. 49

Lod. I bade a drawer send in wine, too: did none come along with thee, grannam, but the lieutenant?

Mis. H. None came along with me but Bots, if it like your worship.

Bots. Who the pox should come along with you but Bots. 53

Enter two Vintners [with wine].

All. Oh brave! march fair.

Lod. Are you come? That's well.

Mat. Here's ordnance able to sack a city.

Lod. Come, repeat, read this inventory. 60
1 Vint. Imprimis, a pottle<sup>7</sup> of Greek wine, a

Lod. You're paid?

2 Vint. Yes, Sir.

Ereunt Vintners.

Mat. So shall some of us be anon, I fear.

Bots. Here's a hot day towards: but zounds, this is the life out of which a soldier sucks sweetness! When this artillery goes off roundly, some must drop to the ground: cannon, demi-cannon, saker, and basilisk.<sup>4</sup>

Lod. Give fire, lieutenant.

Bots. So, so: must I venture first upon the breach? To you all, gallants; Bots sets upon you all.

All. It's hard, Bots, if we pepper not you, as well as you pepper us.

Enter CANDIDO.

Lod. My noble linen-draper!—Some wine!—Welcome, old lad!

Mat. You're welcome, signor.

Cand. These lawns, sir?

Mat. Presently; my man is gone for them. We ha' rigged a fleet, you see here, to sail about the world.

Cand. A dangerous voyage, sailing in such ships.

Bots. There's no casting over board yet.

Lod. Because you are an old lady, I will have you be acquainted with this grave citizen. Pray bestow your lips upon him, and bid him welcome.

Mis. H. Any citizen shall be most welcome to me:—I have used to buy ware at your shop.

Cand. It may be so, good madam.

Mis. H. Your prentices know my dealings well; I trust your good wife be in good case. If it please you, bear her a token from my lips, by word of mouth.

Cand. I pray, no more; forsooth, 't is very well;

Indeed I love no sweetmeats.—[Aside.] Sh'as a breath

Stinks worse than fifty polecats.—Sir, a word, is she a lady?

Lod. A woman of a good house, and an ancient; she's a bawd.

Cand. A bawd? Sir, I'll steal hence, and see your lawns

Some other time.
Mat. Steal out of such company? Pacheco, my man, is but gone for 'em. Lieutenant Bots, drink to this worthy old fellow, and teach him to fly high.

All. Swagger; and make him do 't on his knees.

Cand. How, Bots? Now bless me, what do I with Bots?

No wine in sooth, no wine, good master Bots.

Bots. Gray-beard, goat's pizzle, 't is a health; have this in your guts, or this, there [touching his sword]. I will sing a bawdy song, sir, be-

cause your verjuice<sup>5</sup> face is melancholy, to make liquor go down glib. Will you fall on your marrowbones, and pledge this health? 'T is to my mistress, a whore.

Cand. Here's ratsbane upon ratsbane, Master Bots.

I pray, sir, pardon me: you are a soldier, Press me not to this service, I am old,

And shoot not in such pot-guns.<sup>6</sup>
Bots. Cap, I'll teach you.

Cand. To drink healths, is to drink sickness.

—Gentlemen,
Pray rescue me.

Bots. Zounds, who dare?

All. We shall ha' stabbing then?

Cand. I ha' reckonings to cast up, good Master Bots.

Bots. This will make you cast 'em up better.

Lod. Why does your hand shake so?

Cand. The palsy, signors, danceth in my blood.

Bots. Pipe with a pox, sir, then, or I'll make your blood dance—

Cand. Hold, hold, good Master Bolts, I drink, [Kneels.]

All. To whom?

Cand. To the old countess there. [Drinks.]

Mis. H. To me, old boy? This is he that never drunk wine! Once again to 't.

Cand. With much ado the poison is got down, Though I can scarce get up; never before Drank I a whore's health, nor will never more.

Re-enter ORLANDO with lawns.

Mat. Hast been at gallows?

Orl. Yes, sir, for I make account to suffer to-day.

Mat. Look, signor; here's the commodity.

Cand. Your price?

Mat. Thus.

Cand. No; too dear: thus.

Mat. No. O fie, you must fly higher. Yet take 'em home, trifles shall not make us quarrel; we'll agree; you shall have them, and a pennyworth. I'll fetch money at your shop.

Cand. Be it so, good signor, send me going.

Mat. Going? A deep bowl of wine for Signor Candido.

Orl. He would be going.

Cand. I'll rather stay than go so: stop your bowl.

Enter Constable and Billmen.

Lod. How now?

Bots. Is 't Shrove-Tuesday, that these ghosts walk?

Mat. What's your business, sir?

Const. From the duke: you are the man we look for, signor. I have warrant here from [sic] the duke, to apprehend you upon felony for robbing two pedlars. I charge you i' th' duke's name, go quickly.

<sup>8</sup> On Shrove Tuesday the city authorities made a search for brothel-keepers.

Mat. Is the wind turn'd? Well, this is that old wolf, my father-in-law.—Seek out your mistress, sirrah.

Orl. Yes, Sir.—[Aside.] As shafts by piecing are made strong,
So shall thy life be straight'ned by this wrong.

All. In troth, we are sorry.
Mat. Brave men must be crost; pish, it's but Fortune's dice roving<sup>1</sup> against me. Come, sir, pray use me like a gentleman; let me not be carried through the streets like a pageant.

Const. If these gentlemen please, you shall go along with them.

All. Be't so: come.
Const. What are you, sir?
Bots. I, sir? Sometimes a figure, sometimes a cipher, as the State has occasion to cast up her accounts. I'm a soldier.

Const. Your name is Bots, is't not?
Bots. Bots is my name; Bots is known to this company.

Const. I know you are, sir: what's she?
Bots. A gentlewoman, my mother.

Const. Take 'em both along.
Bots. Me, sir?

Billmen. [Ay,] sir!
Const. If he swagger, raise the street.
Bots. Gentlemen, gentlemen, whither will you drag us?

Lod. To the garden house. Bots, are we even with you?

Const. To Bridewell with 'em.
Bots. You will answer this.

Const. Better than a challenge. I have warrant for my work, sir.

Lod. We'll go before.
Const. Pray do.—

Exeunt [MATHEO with LODOVICO, AS-TOLFO, CAROLO, BERALDO, and FONTINELL; BOTS and Mistress
HORSELEECH, with Billmen.]

Who, Signor Candido? a citizen
Of your degree consorted thus, and revelling
In such a house?

Cand. Why, sir? what house, I pray?
Const. Lewd, and defam'd.

Cand. Is't so? thanks, sir: I'm gone.
Const. What have you there?

Cand. Lawns which I bought, sir, of the gentleman

That keeps the house.

Const. And I have warrant here,
To search for such stol'n ware: these lawns
are stol'n,

Cand. Indeed!
Const. So he's the thief, you the receiver:

I'm sorry for this chance, I must commit you.

Cand. Me, sir, for what?
Const. These goods are found upon you,
And you must answer't.

Cand. Must I so?
Const. Most certain.

Cand. I'll send for bail.
Const. I dare not: yet because

You are a citizen of worth, you shall not
Be made a pointing stock, but without guard,
Pass only with myself.

Cand. To Bridewell too?
Const. No remedy.

Cand. Yes, patience. Being not mad,
They had me once to Bedlam, now I'm drawn
To Bridewell, loving no whores.

Const. You will buy lawn! Exeunt.

[ACT V]

[SCENE I.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter at one door HIPPOLITO; at another, LODOVICO, AS-TOLFO, CAROLO, BERALDO, and FONTINELL.

Lod. Yonder's the Lord Hippolito; by any means leave him and me together. Now will I turn him to a madman.

All. Save you my lord.
Exeunt [all except HIPPOLITO and LODOVICO].

Lod. I ha' strange news to tell you.

Hip. What are they?
Lod. Your mare's i' th' pound.

Hip. How's this?
Lod. Your nightingale is in a limebush.

Hip. Ha?
Lod. Your puritanical honest whore sits in a blue gown.<sup>3</sup>

Hip. Blue gown!
Lod. She'll chalk out your way to her now: she beats chalk.<sup>4</sup>

Hip. Where? who dares?—

Lod. Do you know the brick-house of castigation, by the river side that runs by Milan,—the school where they pronounce no letter well but O?

Hip. I know it not.
Lod. Any man that has borne office of constable or any woman that has fallen from a horse-load to a cart-load,<sup>5</sup> or like an old hen that has had none but rotten eggs in her nest, [<sup>25</sup> can direct you to her: there you shall see your punk amongst her back-friends.<sup>6</sup>

There you may have her at your will,
For there she beats chalk, or grinds in the mill,
With a whip deedle, deedle, deedle, deedle; <sup>30</sup>
Ah, little monkey!

Hip. What rogue durst serve that warrant, knowing I loved her?

Lod. Some worshipful rascal, I lay my life.

Hip. I'll beat the lodgings down about their ears <sup>35</sup>

That are her keepers.

Lod. So you may bring an old house over her head.

Hip. I'll to her—
I'll to her, stood armed fiends to guard the doors.

Exit.

<sup>2</sup> A street.

Lod. Oh me! what monsters are men made by whores!<sup>40</sup>
If this false fire do kindle him, there's one fag-
got
More to the bonfire. Now to my Bridewell birds;
What song will they sing? Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter DUKE, INFELICE, CAROLO, ASTOLFO, BERALDO, FONTINELL, and three or four Masters of Bridewell.

Duke. Your Bridewell? that the name? For beauty, strength,
Capacity and form of ancient building,
Besides the river's neighbourhood, few houses
Wherein we keep our court can better it.

1 Mast. Hither from foreign courts have princes come,<sup>5</sup>

And with our duke did acts of State commence.
Here that great cardinal had first audience,
The grave Campaigne; that duke dead, his son
That famous prince, gave free possession
Of this, his palace, to the citizens,<sup>10</sup>
To be the poor man's ware-house; and endow'd
it

With lands to th' value of seven hundred mark,<sup>2</sup>
With all the bedding and the furniture, once proper,

As the lands then were, to an hospital
Belonging to a Duke of Savoy. Thus<sup>15</sup>
Fortune can toss the world; a prince's court
Is thus a prison now.

Duke. 'T is Fortune's sport:
These changes common are: the wheel of fate
Turns kingdoms up, till they fall desolate.
But how are these seven hundred marks by th'
year<sup>20</sup>
Employ'd in this your work-house?

1 Mast. War and peace
Feed both upon those lands: when the iron doors

Of war burst open, from this house are sent
Men furnisht in all martial complement.
The moon hath through her bow scarce drawn<sup>25</sup>
to th' head,

Like to twelve silver arrows, all the months,
Since sixteen hundred soldiers went aboard.
Here providence and charity play such parts,
The house is like a very school of arts;
For when our soldiers, like ships driven from sea,<sup>30</sup>

With ribs all broken, and with tatter'd sides,
Cast anchor here again, their ragged backs
How often do we cover! that, like men,
They may be sent to their own homes again.<sup>34</sup>
All here are but one swarm of bees, and strive
To bring with wearied thighs honey to the hive.
The sturdy beggar, and the lazy loon,<sup>3</sup>
Gets here hard hands, or lac'd<sup>4</sup> correction.
The vagabond grows staid and learns t' obey,

The drone is beaten well, and sent away.<sup>40</sup>
As other prisons are, some for the thief,
Some, by which undone credit gets relief
From bridled debtors; others for the poor,
So this is for the bawd, the rogue, the whore.
Car. An excellent team of horse!

1 Mast. Nor is it seen<sup>45</sup>
That the whip draws blood here, to cool the spleen

Of any rugged bench; <sup>5</sup> nor does offence
Feel smart on spiteful or rash evidence;
But pregnant testimony forth must stand,
Ere justice leave them in the beadle's hand.<sup>50</sup>
As iron, on the anvil are they laid,
Not to take blows alone, but to be made
And fashion'd to some charitable use.

Duke. Thus wholsom'st laws spring from the worst abuse.

Enter ORLANDO, [disguised as a Serving-man,] before BELLAFRONT.

Bell. Let mercy touch your heart-strings, gracious lord,<sup>55</sup>
That it may sound like music in the ear
Of a man desperate, being i' th' hands of law.

Duke. His name?
Bell. Matheo.
Duke. For a robbery?
Where is he?

Bell. In this house.
Exeunt BELLAFRONT and one of the Masters of Bridewell.

Duke. Fetch you him hither—
Is this the party?<sup>60</sup>
Orl. This is the hen, my lord, that the cock with the lordly comb, your son-in-law, would crow over, and tread.

Duke. Are your two servants ready?
Orl. My two pedlars are pack'd together, my good lord.<sup>65</sup>

Duke. 'T is well; this day in judgment shall be spent:
Vice, like a wound lanc'd, mends by punishment.

Inf. Let me be gone, my lord, or stand unseen;
'T is rare when a judge strikes and that none
die,

And 't is unfit then women should be by.<sup>70</sup>

1 Mast. We'll place you, lady, in some private room.
Inf. Pray do so.

Exit [with a Master, who returns alone].
Orl. Thus nice dames swear, it is unfit their eyes

Should view men carv'd up for anatomies,<sup>6</sup>
Yet they'll see all, so they may stand unseen;
Many women sure will sin behind a screen.<sup>76</sup>

Enter LODOVICO.

Lod. Your son, the Lord Hippolito, is ent'red.
Duke. Tell him we wish his presence. A word,
Sforza;

On what wings flew he hither?<sup>78</sup>

Lod. These:—I told him his lark whom he loved, was a Bridewell-bird; he's mad that this cage should hold her, and is come to let her out.

Duke. 'Tis excellent: away, go call him hither. Exit LODOVICO. [85]

Re-enter one of the Governors of the House; BELLAFRONT after him with MATHEO; after him the Constable; enter at another door LODOVICO and HIPPOLITO. ORLANDO steps forth and brings in two [of his Servants disguised as] Pedlars.

Duke. You are to us a stranger, worthy lord; 'Tis strange to see you here.

Hip. It is most fit That where the sun goes, atomies<sup>1</sup> follow it.

Duke. Atomies neither shape nor honour bear:

Be you yourself, a sunbeam to shine clear. — 90
Is this the gentleman? Stand forth and hear Your accusation.

Mat. I'll hear none; I fly high in that: rather than kites shall seize upon me, and [94] pick out mine eyes to my face, I'll strike my talons through mine own heart first, and spit my blood in theirs. I am here for shriving those two fools of their sinful pack. When those jack-daws have caw'd over me, then must I cry [99] guilty, or not guilty. The law has work enough already and therefore I'll put no work of mine into his hands; the hangman shall ha't first. I did pluck those ganders, did rob them.

Duke. 'Tis well done to confess. 104

Mat. Confess and be hanged, and then I fly high, is 't not so? That for that; a gallows is the worst rub<sup>2</sup> that a good bowler can meet with; I stumbled against such a post, else this night I had play'd the part of a true son in [109] these days, undone my father-in-law; with him would I ha' run at leap-frog, and come over his gold, though I had broke his neck for 't: but the poor salmon-trout is now in the net.

Hip. And now the law must teach you to fly high. 114

Mat. Right, my lord, and then may you fly low; no more words: — a mouse, murr, you are stopp'd.

Bell. Be good to my poor husband, dear my lords.

Mat. Ass! 119

Why shouldst thou pray them to be good to me, When no man here is good to one another?

Duke. Did any hand work in this theft but yours?

Mat. O yes, my lord, yes: — the hangman has never one son at a birth, his children always come by couples. Though I cannot give [125] the old dog, my father, a bone to gnaw, the daughter shall be sure of a choke-pear. — Yes, my lord, there was one more that fiddled my fine pedlars, and that was my wife.

Bell. Alas, I? 130

Orl. [Aside.] O everlasting, supernatural, superlative villain!

All. Your wife, Matheo?

Hip. Sure it cannot be. 134

Mat. Oh, sir, you love no quarters of mutton

that hang up, you love none but whole mutton. She set the robbery, I perform'd it; she spur'd me on, I gallop'd away.

Orl. My lords, —
Bell. My lords, — fellow, give me speech, — if my poor life 140

May ransom thine, I yield it to the law. Thou hurt'st thy soul, yet wip'st off no offence, By casting blots upon my innocence.

Let not these spare me, but tell truth; no, see Who slips his neck out of the misery, 145

Though not out of the mischief. let thy servant That shar'd in this base act accuse me here,

Why should my husband perish, he go clear?

Orl. [Aside.] A good child, hang thine own father!

Duke. Old fellow, was thy hand in too? 150

Orl. My hand was in the pie, my lord, I confess it. My mistress, I see, will bring me to the gallows, and so leave me; but I'll not leave her so: I had rather hang in a woman's company, than in a man's; because if we should go to hell together, I should scarce be letten in, for all the devils are afraid to have any women come amongst them. As I am true thief, she neither consented to this felony, nor knew of it. 160

Duke. What fury prompts thee on to kill thy wife?

Mat. It is my humour, sir, 'tis a foolish bag-pipe that I make myself merry with. Why should I eat hemp-seed at the hangman's thirteen-pence halfpenny<sup>3</sup> ordinary, and have this whore laugh at me, as I swing, as I totter? 166

Duke. Is she a whore?

Mat. A six-penny mutton pasty, for any to cut up.

Orl. Ah, toad, toad, toad. 169

Mat. A barber's cittern<sup>4</sup> for every serving-man to play upon; that lord, your son, knows it.

Hip. I, sir? Am I her bawd then?

Mat. No, sir, but she's your whore then.

Orl. [Aside.] Yea, spider; dost catch at great flies?

Hip. My whore? 176

Mat. I cannot talk, sir, and tell of your rems and your rees and your whirligigs and devices: but, my lord, I found 'em like sparrows in one nest, billing together, and bulling of me. I took 'em in bed, was ready to kill him, was up [180] to stab her —

Hip. Close thy rank jaws: — pardon me, I am vex'd. —

Thou art a villain, a malicious devil; Deep as the place where thou art lost, thou liest. Since I am thus far got into this storm, 185

I'll through, and thou shalt see I'll through untoucht,

When thou shalt perish in it.

Re-enter INFELICE.

Inf. 'Tis my cue To enter now. — Room! let my prize<sup>5</sup> be play'd;

<sup>3</sup> The amount of the hangman's fee.

I ha' lurked in clouds, yet heard what all have said ;

What jury more can prove sh'as wrong'd my bed,

Than her own husband ? She must be punished. I challenge law, my lord ; letters and gold And jewels from my lord that woman took.

Hip. Against that black-mouth'd devil, against letters and gold,

And against a jealous wife, I do uphold
Thus far her reputation ; I could sooner
Shake th' Appenine and crumple rocks to dust
Than, though Jove's shower rain'd down, tempt her to lust.

Bell. What shall I say ?

Orl. (discovers himself.) Say thou art not a [200
whore, and that's more than fifteen women amongst five hundred dare swear without lying, this shalt thou say — no, let me say 't for thee ;
— thy husband 's a knave, this lord 's an honest man ; thou art no punk, this lady 's a right [205 lady. Pacheco is a thief as his master is, but old Orlando is as true a man as thy father is. I ha' seen you fly high, sir, and I ha' seen you fly low, sir, and to keep you from the gallows, sir, a blue coat have I worn, and a thief did I turn. [210 Mine own men are the pedlars, my twenty pounds did fly high, sir, your wife's gown did fly low, sir : whether fly you now, sir ? You ha' scap'd the gallows, to the devil you fly next, sir.
Am I right, my liege ?

Duke. Your father has the true physician
play'd.

Mat. And I am now his patient.

Hip. And be so still ;

'T is a good sign when our cheeks blush at ill.

Const. The linen-draper, Signor Candido,
He whom the city terms the patient man, [220
Is likewise here for buying of those lawns
The pedlars lost.

Inf. Alas, good Candido !

Duke. Fetch him ; and when these payments up are cast,

Exit Constable.

Weigh out your light gold, but let 's have them last.

Enter CANDIDO and Constable, [who presently goes out.]

Duke. In Bridewell, Candido ?

Cand. Yes, my good lord. [225

Duke. What make you here ?

Cand. My lord, what make you here ?

Duke. I 'm here to save right, and to drive wrong hence.

Cand. And I to bear wrong here with patience.

Duke. You ha' bought stol'n goods.

Cand. So they do say, my lord,

Yet bought I them upon a gentleman's word,
And I imagine now, as I thought then, [231

That there be thieves, but no thieves, gentlemen.
Hip. Your credit 's crack'd, being here.

Cand. No more than gold,

Being crack'd, which does his estimation hold.
I was in Bedlam once, but was I mad ? [235

They made me pledge whores' healths, but am
I bad

Because I 'm with bad people ?

Duke.

Well, stand by ;
If you take wrong, we 'll cure the injury.

Re-enter Constable, after him BOTS, after them two Beadles, one with hemp, the other with a beeble.<sup>1</sup>

Duke. Stay, stay, what 's he ? A prisoner ?

Const. Yes, my lord. [240

Hip. He seems a soldier ?

Bots. I am what I seem, sir, one of fortune's bastards, a soldier and a gentleman, and am brought in here with master constable's band of billmen, because they face me down that I [245 live, like those that keep bowling alleys, by the sins of the people, in being a squire of the body.

Hip. Oh, an apple-squire.<sup>2</sup>

Bots. Yes, sir, that degree of scurvy squires ;
and that I am maintained by the best part [250 that is commonly in a woman, by the worst players of those parts ; but I am known to all this company.

Lod. My lord, 't is true, we all know him ;
't is lieutenant Bots. [255

Duke. Bots, and where ha' you served, Bots ?

Bots. In most of your hottest services in the Low-countries : at the Groyne I was wounded in this thigh, and halted upon 't, but 't is now sound. In Cleveland I mist but little, having the bridge of my nose broken down with [260 two great stones, as I was scaling a fort. I ha' been tried, sir, too, in Gelderland, and scap'd hardly there from being blown up at a breach :
I was fired, and lay i' th' surgeon's hands [265
for 't, till the fall of the leaf following.

Hip. All this may be, and yet you no soldier.

Bots. No soldier, sir ? I hope these are services that your proudest commanders do venture upon, and never come off sometimes. [270

Duke. Well, sir, because you say you are a soldier,

I 'll use you like a gentleman. — Make room
there,

Plant him amongst you ; we shall have anon
Strange hawks fly here before us. If none light
On you, you shall with freedom take your flight ;
But if you prove a bird of baser wing, [275
We 'll use you like such birds, here you shall sing.

Bots. I wish to be tried at no other weapon.

Duke. Why, is he furnisht with those implements ?

1 Master. The pander is more dangerous to a
State [280

Than is the common thief ; and though our laws
Lie heavier on the thief, yet that the pander
May know the hangman's ruff should fit him
too,

Therefore he 's set to beat hemp.

Duke. This does savour

Of justice ; basest slaves to basest labour. [285
Now pray, set open hell, and let us see
The she-devils that are here.

Inf. Methinks this place

Should make e'en Lais honest.

1 Mast. Some it turns good,

<sup>1</sup> A heavy mallet.

<sup>2</sup> A pander.

But as some men, whose hands are once in blood,
Do in a pride spill more, so, some going hence
Are, by being here, lost in more impudence. 291
Let it not to them, when they come, appear
That any one does as their judge sit here;
But that as gentlemen you come to see,
And then perhaps their tongues will walk more
free. 205

Duke. Let them be marshall'd in. — [Exeunt Masters, Constable, and Beadles.] — Be cover'd all,

Fellows, now to make the scene more comical.

Car. Will not you be smelt out, Bots?

Bots. No, your bravest whores have the worst noses.

Re-enter two of the Masters; a Constable after them, then DOROTHEA TARGET, brave;<sup>1</sup> after her two Beadles, th' one with a wheel, the other with a blue gown.

Lod. Are not you a bride, forsooth? 300

Dor. Say ye?

Car. He would know if these be not your bride-men.

Dor. Vuh! yes, sir: and look ye, do you see? the bride-laces that I give at my wedding, will serve to tie rosemary to both your coffins when you come from hanging — Scab! 305

Orl. Fie, punk, fie, fie, fie!

Dor. Out, you stale, stinking head of garlic,
foh, at my heels,

Orl. My head's cloven. 310

Hip. O, let the gentlewoman alone, she's going to shrift.

Ast. Nay, to do penance.

Car. Ay, ay, go, punk, go to the cross and be whipt. 315

Dor. Marry mew, marry muff,<sup>2</sup> marry, hang you, Goodman dog. Whipt? do ye take me for a base, spital-whore? In troth, gentlemen, you wear the clothes of gentlemen, but you carry not the minds of gentlemen, to abuse [320
a gentlewoman of my fashion.

Lod. Fashion? Pox a' your fashions! Art not a whore?

Dor. Goodman slave.

Duke. O fie, abuse her not, let us two talk,
What might I call your name, pray? 325

Dor. I'm not ashamed of my name, sir; my name is Mistress Doll Target, a Western gentle-
woman. 325

Lod. Her target against any pike in Milan.

Duke. Why is this wheel borne after her?

1 Mast. She must spin.

Dor. A coarse thread it shall be, as all threads
are.

Ast. If you spin, then you'll earn money here
too? 335

Dor. I had rather get half-a-crown abroad, than ten crowns here.

Orl. Abroad? I think so.

Inf. Dost thou not weep now thou art here?

Dor. Say ye? weep? Yes, forsooth, as you did when you lost your maidenhead. Do you [340 not hear how I weep? Sings.

Lod. Farewell, Doll.

Dor. Farewell, dog.

Exit.

Duke. Past shame: past penitence! Why is that blue gown? 345

1 Mast. Being stript out of her wanton loose attire,

That garment she puts on, base to the eye,
Only to clothe her in humility.

Duke. Are all the rest like this?

1 Mast. No, my good lord.

You see, this drab swells with a wanton rein. 350
The next that enters has a different strain.

Duke. Variety is good, let's see the rest.

Exit 1 Master.

Bots. Your grace sees I'm sound yet, and no bullets hit me.

Duke. Come off so, and 'tis well.

All. Here's the second mess. 355

Re-enter the two Masters, after them Constable, after him PENELOPE WHOREHOUND, like a Citizen's Wife; after her two Beadles, one with a blue gown, another with chalk and a mallet.

Pen. I ha' worn many a costly gown, but I was never thus guarded<sup>3</sup> with blue coats, and beadles, and constables, and —

Car. Alas, fair mistress, spoil not thus your eyes. 360

Pen. Oh, sweet sir, I feel the spoiling of other places about me that are dearer than my eyes;
if you be gentlemen, if you be men, or ever came of a woman, pity my case! Stand to me, stick to me, good sir, you are an old man. 365

Orl. Hang not on me, I prithee; old trees bear no such fruit.

Pen. Will you bail me, gentlemen?

Lod. Bail thee? Art in for debt? 365

Pen. No; God is my judge, sir, I am in for no debts; I paid my tailor for this gown, the last five shillings a-week that was behind, yesterday.

Duke. What is your name. I pray?

Pen. Penelope Whorehound, I come of the Whorehounds. How does lieutenant Bots? 370

All. Aha, Bots?

Bots. A very honest woman, as I'm a soldier
— a pox Bots ye.

Pen. I was never in this pickle before; and yet if I go amongst citizens' wives, they [380 jeer at me; if I go among the loose-bodied gowns,<sup>4</sup> they cry a pox on me, because I go civilly attired, and swear their trade was a good trade, till such as I am took it out of their [385 hands. Good lieutenant Bots, speak to these captains to bail me.

1 Mast. Begging for bail still? You are a trim gossip. Go give her the blue gown, set her to her chare. Work,<sup>5</sup> huswife, for your bread, away. 390

Pen. Out, you dog! — a pox on you all! — women are born to curse thee — but I shall live to see twenty such flat-caps shaking dice for a penny-worth of pippins. Out, you blue-eyed rogue! Exit. 395

<sup>3</sup> A play upon the word, which also signifies "trimmed."

<sup>2</sup> A term of contempt.

All. Ha, ha, ha.

Duke. Even now she wept, and pray'd; now does she curse?

1 Mast. Seeing me; if still she had stay'd, this had been worse. 400

Hip. Was she ever here before?

1 Mast. Five times at least, And thus, if men come to her, have her eyes Wrung, and wept out her bail.

All. Bots, you know her?

Bots. Is there any gentleman here, that knows not a whore, and is he a hair the worse for that? 405

Duke. Is she a city-dame? She's so attired.

1 Mast. No, my good lord, that's only but the veil

To her loose body. I have seen her here In gayer masking suits; as several sauces 410

Give one dish several tastes, so change of habits

In whores is a bewitching art: to-day

She's all in colours to besot gallants, then

In modest black, to catch the citizen,

And this from their examination's drawn. 415

Now shall you see a monster both in shape

And nature quite from these, that sheds no tear

Nor yet is nice, 'tis a plain ramping bear;

Many such whales are cast upon this shore. 419

All. Let's see her.

1 Mast. Then behold a swaggering whore.

Exeunt [Masters and Constable].

Orl. Keep your ground, Bots.

Bots. I do but traverse to spy advantage how to arm myself.

Re-enter the two Masters first; after them the Constable; after them a Beadle beating a basin,<sup>1</sup>

then CATHERINA BOUNTINALL, with Mistress

HORSELEECH; after them another Beadle with a blue head guarded<sup>2</sup> with yellow.

Cat. Sirrah, when I cry, hold your hands, hold, you rogue-catcher, hold. — Bawd, are [425]

the French chilblains in your heels, that you can come no faster? Are not you, bawd, a whore's ancient,<sup>3</sup> and must not I follow my colours?

Mis. H. O Mistress Catherine, you do me wrong to accuse me here as you do, before [430]

the right worshipful. I am known for a motherly, honest woman, and no bawd.

Cat. Marry foh, honest? Burnt<sup>4</sup> at fourteen, seven times whipt, six times carted, nine times duck'd, search'd by some hundred and [435]

fifty constables, and yet you are honest? Honest Mistress Horseleech, is this world a world to keep bawds and whores honest? How many times hast thou given gentlemen a quart of wine in a gallon pot? How many twelve-penny fees, nay two shillings fees, nay, when any [441]

ambassadors ha' been here, how many half-crown fees hast thou taken? How many carriers hast thou bribed for country wenches? How often have I rins't your lungs in aqua vitae, and yet

you are honest? 445

Duke. And what were you the whilst?

1 At the carting of bawds and prostitutes they were preceded by a mob beating basins and performing other rough music. (Rhys.)

2 Head-dress trimmed. 3 Ensign. 4 Branded.

— Cat. Marry hang you, master slave, who made you an examiner?

Lod. Well said! belike this devil spares no man. 451

Cat. What art thou, prithee? [To Bots.]

Bots. Nay, what art thou, prithee?

Cat. A whore, art thou a thief? 454

Bots. A thief, no, I defy<sup>5</sup> the calling; I am a soldier, have borne arms in the field, been in many a hot skirmish, yet come off sound.

Cat. Sound, with a pox to ye, ye abominable rogue! You a soldier? You in skirmishes? [459]

Where? Amongst pottle pots in a bawdy-house? Look, look here, you Madam Worm-eaten, do you not know him?

Mis. H. Lieutenant Bots, where have ye been this many a day?

Bots. Old bawd, do not discredit me, seem not to know me. 465

Mis. H. Not to know ye, Master Bots? As long as I have breath, I cannot forget thy sweet face.

Duke. Why, do you know him? He says he is a soldier. 471

Cat. He a soldier? A pander, a dog that will lick up sixpence. Do ye hear, you master swines'-snout, how long is't since you held the door for me, and cried, "To 't again, no [475] body comes!" Ye rogue, you?

All. Ha, ha, ha! y' are smelt out again, Bots.

Bots. Pox ruin her nose for 't! An I be not revenged for this — um, ye bitch!

Lod. D' ye hear ye, madam? Why does your ladyship swagger thus? You're very brave, [481] methinks.

Cat. Not at your cost, master cod's-head; Is any man here blear-eyed to see me brave? 485

As't. Yes, I am,

Because good clothes upon a whore's back Is like fair painting upon a rotten wall.

Cat. Marry muff, master whoremaster, you come upon me with sentences.

Ber. By this light, has small sense for 't. 490

Lod. O fie, fie, do not vex her! And yet methinks a creature of more scurvy conditions should not know what a good petticoat were.

Cat. Marry, come out; you're so busy [494] about my petticoat, you'll creep up to my placket, an ye could but attain the honour: but an the outsiders offend your rogue-ships, look o' the lining, 'tis silk.

Duke. Is't silk 'tis lined with, then? 499

Cat. Silk? Ay, silk, master slave, you would be glad to wipe your nose with the skirt on 't.

This 'tis to come among a company of cod's-heads<sup>6</sup> that know not how to use a gentle-

woman.

Duke. Tell her the duke is here. 505

1 Mast. Be modest, Kate, the duke is here.

Cat. If the devil were here, I care not. Set forward, ye rogues, and give attendance according to your places! Let bawds and whores [509] be sad, for I'll sing an the devil were a-dying.

Exit [with Mistress HORSELEECH and Beadles].

Duke. Why before her does the basin ring?

1 Must. It is an emblem of their revelling.

The whips we use let forth their wanton blood, Making them calm; and, more to calm their pride,

Instead of coaches they in carts do ride. 515

Will your grace see more of this bad ware?

Duke. No, shut up shop, we'll now break up the fair.

Yet ere we part — you, sir, that take upon ye

The name of soldier, that true name of worth,

Which, action, not vain boasting, best sets forth,

To let you know how far a soldier's name 521

Stands from your title, and to let you see

Soldiers must not be wrong'd where princes be;

This be your sentence: —

All. Defend yourself, Bots. 525

Duke. First, all the private sufferance that the house

Inflicts upon offenders, you, as the basest,

Shall undergo it double, after which

You shall be whipt, sir, round about the city,

Then banisht from the land. 530

Bots. Beseech, your grace!

Duke. Away with him, see it done. Panders and whores

Are city-plagues, which, being kept alive,

Nothing that looks like goodness ere can thrive.

Now good Orlando, what say you to your bad

son-in-law? 535

Orl. Marry this, my lord, he is my son-in-law, and in law will I be his father: for if law can pepper him, he shall be so parboil'd, that he shall stink no more i' th' nose of the commonwealth. 540

Bell. Be yet more kind and merciful, good

father.

Orl. Dost thou beg for him, thou precious man's meat, thou? Has he not beaten thee, kickt thee, trod on thee, and dost thou fawn [544 on him like his spaniel? Has he not pawn'd thee to thy petticoat, sold thee to thy smock, made ye leap at a crust, yet wouldst have me save

him?

Bell. Oh yes, good sir, womenshall learn of me,
To love their husbands in greatest misery; 550
Then show him pity, or you wrack myself.

[Orl.] Have ye eaten pigeons, that you're so kindhearted to your mate? Nay, you're a couple of wild bears, I'll have ye both baited at one stake: but as for this knave, the gal- [555

lows is thy due, and the gallows thou shalt have.

I'll have justice of the duke, the law shall have thy life. — What, dost thou hold him? Let go his hand. If thou dost not forsake him, a [560 father's everlasting blessing fall upon both your heads! Away, go, kiss out of my sight, play thou the whore no more, nor thou the thief again; my house shall be thine, my meat shall be thine, and so shall my wine, but my money shall be mine, and yet when I die, so thou dost not fly high, take all; 565

Yet, good Matheo, mend.

Thus for joy weeps Orlando, and doth end.

Duke. Then hear, Matheo: all your woes are stayed

By your good father-in-law: all your ills 570

Are clear purg'd from you by his working

pills. —

Come, Signor Candido, these green young wits,

We see by circumstance, this plot have laid

Still to provoke thy patience, which they find

A wall of brass; no armour's like the mind. 575

Thou hast taught the city patience, now our

court

Shall be thy sphere, where from thy good report,

Rumours this truth unto the world shall sing,

A patient man's a pattern for a king. Exeunt.

TO THE READER

I AM an ill orator; and, in truth, use to indite more honestly than eloquently, for it is my custom to speak as I think, and write as I speak.

In plainness, therefore, understand that in some things I have willingly erred, as in supposing a Duke of Genoa, and in taking names different from that city's families: for which some may wittily accuse me: but my defence shall be as honest as many reproofs unto me have been most malicious; since, I heartily protest, it was my care to write so far from reasonable offence, that even strangers, in whose state I laid my scene, should not from thence draw any disgrace to any, dead or living. Yet, in despite of my endeavours, I understand some have been most unadvisedly over-cunning in misinterpreting me, and with subtlety as deep as hell have maliciously spread ill rumours, which, springing from themselves, might to themselves have heavily returned. Surely I desire to satisfy every firm spirit, who, in all his actions, proposeth to himself no more ends than God and virtue do, whose intentions are always simple: to such I protest that, with my free understanding, I have not glanced at disgrace of any, but of those whose unquiet studies labour innovation, contempt of holy policy, reverence, comely superiority, and establish unity: for the rest of my supposed tartness, I fear not but unto every worthy mind it will be approved so general and honest as may modestly pass with the freedom of a satire. I would fain leave the paper; only one thing afflicts me, to think that scenes, invented merely to be spoken, should be enforcedly published to be read, and that the least hurt I can receive is to do myself the wrong. But, since others otherwise would do me more, the least inconvenience is to be accepted. I have myself, therefore, set forth this comedy; but so, that my enforced absence must much rely upon the printer's discretion: but I shall entreat slight errors in orthography may be as slightly over-passed, and that the unhandsome shape which this trifle in reading presents, may be pardoned for the pleasure it once afforded you when it was presented with the soul of lively action.

TO

KING'S MAJESTY'S SERVANTS.

WRITTEN BY JOHN WEBSTER

Enter W. SLY, a Tire-man following him with a stool.

Tire-man. Sir, the gentlemen will be angry
if you sit here.

Sly. Why, we may sit upon the stage at the private house. Thou dost not take me for a country gentleman, dost? Dost think I fear [<sup>5</sup> hissing? I'll hold my life thou tookest me for one of the players.

Tire-man. No, sir.

Sly. By God's slid,<sup>3</sup> if you had, I would have given you but sixpence for your stool. Let [<sup>10</sup> them that have stale suits sit in the galleries.
Hiss at me! He that will be laught out of a tavern or an ordinary, shall seldom feed well, or be drunk in good company. — Where's Harry Condell, Dick Burbadge, and William Sly? [<sup>15</sup>
Let me speak with some of them.

Tire-man. An't please you to go in, sir, you
may.

Sly. I tell you, no: I am one that hath seen this play often, and can give them intelli- [<sup>20</sup> gence for their action. I have most of the jests here in my table-book.<sup>4</sup>

Enter SINKLO.

Sinklo. Save you coz!

Sly. O, cousin, come, you shall sit between my legs here. [<sup>25</sup>

Sinklo. No, indeed, consin: the audience then will take me for a viol-de-gambo, and think that you play upon me.

Sly. Nay, rather that I work upon you, coz.

Sinklo. We stayed for you at supper last [<sup>30</sup> night at my cousin Honeymoon's, the woollen-draper. After supper we drew cuts for a score of apricocks, the longest cut still to draw an apricock: by this light, 't was Mistress Frank Honeymoon's fortune still to have the long- [<sup>35</sup> est cut: I did measure for the women. — What be these, coz?

Enter D. BURBADGE, H. CONDELL, and J.
LOWIN.

Sly. The players. — God save you!

Burbadge. You are very welcome.

Sly. I pray you, know this gentleman, my [<sup>40</sup> cousin; 'tis Master Doomsday's son, the usurer.

Condell. I beseech you, sir, be cover'd.

Sly. No, in good faith, for mine ease. Look you, my hat's the handle to this fan. God's [<sup>45</sup> so, what a beast was I, I did not leave my feather at home! Well, but I'll take an order with you. Puts his feather in his pocket.

Burbadge. Why do you conceal your feather,
sir? [<sup>50</sup>

Sly. Why, do you think I'll have jests broken upon me in the play, to be laught at? This play hath beaten all your gallants out of the feathers. Blackfriars hath almost spoiled
Blackfriars for feathers. [<sup>55</sup>

Sinklo. God's so, I thought 't was for somewhat our gentlewomen at home counsell'd me to wear my feather to the play: yet I am loth to spoil it.

Sly. Why, coz? [<sup>60</sup>

Sinklo. Because I got it in the tilt-yard;
there was a herald broke my pate for taking it up: but I have worn it up and down the Strand, and met him forty times since, and yet he dares not challenge it. [<sup>65</sup>

Sly. Do you hear, sir? this play is a bitter play.

Condell. Why, sir, 't is neither satire nor moral, but the mean passage of a history: yet there are a sort of discontented creatures that [<sup>70</sup> bear a stingless envy to great ones, and these will wrest the doings of any man to their base, malicious aplyment; <sup>6</sup> but should their interpretation come to the test, like your marmoset, they presently turn their teeth to their tail [<sup>75</sup> and eat it.

Sly. I will not go so far with you; but I say, any man that hath wit may censure, <sup>7</sup> if he sit in the twelve-penny room; <sup>8</sup> and I say again, the play is bitter. [<sup>80</sup>

Burbadge. Sir, you are like a patron that, presenting a poor scholar to a benefice, enjoins him not to rail against anything that stands within compass of his patron's folly. Why should not we enjoy the ancient freedom of poesy? [<sup>85</sup> Shall we protest to the ladies that their painting makes them angels? or to my young gallant that his expense in the brothel shall gain him reputation? No, sir, such vices as stand not accountable to law should be cured as [<sup>90</sup> men heal tetter, <sup>9</sup> by casting ink upon them.
Would you be satisfied in anything else, sir?

<sup>5</sup> The meaning is that in The Malcontent, which had been originally acted in Blackfriars Theatre, the practice of wearing feathers had been so ridiculed that the feather-makers of Blackfriars had suffered injury in their business. See V. iv. (Bullen.)

Sly. Ay, marry, would I: I would know how you came by this play?

Condell. Faith, sir, the book was lost; and [95 because 't was pity so good a play should be lost, we found it, and play it.

Sly. I wonder you would play it, another company having interest in it.

Condell. Why not Malevole in folio with [100 us, as Jeronimo in decimo-sexto with them? <sup>1</sup> They taught us a name for our play; we call it One For Another.

Sly. What are your additions?

Burbadge. Sooth, not greatly needful; only [105 as your salad to your great feast, to entertain a little more time, and to abridge the not-received custom of music in our theatre. I must leave you, sir. Exit.

Sinklo. Doth he play the Malcontent? 110

Condell. Yes, sir.

Sinklo. I durst lay four of mine ears the play is not so well acted as it hath been.

Lowin. Have you lost your ears, sir, that you are so prodigal of laying them?

Sinklo. Why did you ask that, friend?

Lowin. Marry, sir, because I have heard of a fellow would offer to lay a hundred-pound [120 wager, that was not worth five baubees: <sup>3</sup> and in this kind you might venture four of your elbows; yet God defend <sup>4</sup> your coat should have so many!

Sinklo. Nay, truly, I am no great censurer; <sup>5</sup> and yet I might have been one of the college of critics once. My cousin here hath an excellent memory, indeed, sir.

Sly. Who? I? I'll tell you a strange thing of myself; and I can tell you, for one that [130 never studied the art of memory, 'tis very strange too.

Condell. What's that, sir?

Sly. Why, I'll lay a hundred pound, I'll walk but once down by the Goldsmith's [135 Row in Cheap, take notice of the signs, and tell you them with a breath instantly.

Lowin. 'T is very strange.

Sly. They begin as the world did, with Adam and Eve. There's in all just five and fifty. [140 I do use to meditate much when I come to plays too. What do you think might come into a man's head now, seeing all this company?

<sup>1</sup> I. e. Why should not the King's company of grown up (folio) actors play The Malcontent (which was the property of the children's company playing at Blackfriars), since the children (16mo actors) have appropriated The Spanish Tragedy, in which the King's company had rights?

<sup>2</sup> " 'T is reported that Parmeno, being very famous for imitating the grunting of a pig, some endeavoured to rival and outdo him. And when the hearers, being prejudiced, cried out, 'Very well, indeed, but nothing comparable to Parmeno's sow,' one took a pig under his arm and came upon the stage; and when, tho' they heard the very pig, they still continued, 'This is nothing comparable to Parmeno's sow,' he threw the pig among them to show that they judged according to opinion and not truth." (Plutarch's Symposium, V. I., cited by "L. S." and Bullen.)

Condell. I know not, sir.

Sly. I have an excellent thought. If some [145 fifty of the Grecians that were cramm'd in the horse' belly had eaten garlic, do you not think the Trojans might have smelt out their knavery?

Condell. Very likely.

Sly. By God, I would [they] had, for I [150 love Hector horribly.

Sinklo. O, but, coz, coz!

"Great Alexander, when he came to the tomb of Achilles, Spake with a big loud voice, O thou thrice blessed and happy!"<sup>6</sup>

Sly. Alexander was an ass to speak so well [155 of a filthy cullion.<sup>7</sup>

Lowin. Good sir, will you leave the stage? I'll help you to a private room.

Sly. Come, coz, let's take some tobacco. — Have you never a prologue? 160

Lowin. Not any, sir.

Sly. Let me see, I will make one extempore. Come to them, and fencing of a congee<sup>8</sup> with arms and legs, be round with them.

Gentlemen, I could wish for the women's sakes you had all soft cushions; and gentlewomen, I could wish that for the men's sakes you [165 had all more easy standings.

What would they wish more but the play now? and that they shall have instantly.

[Exeunt.]

ACT I<sup>9</sup>

SCENE I.<sup>10</sup>

The vilest out-of-tune music being heard, enter BILIOSO AND PRERASSO.

Bil. Why, how now! Are ye mad, or drunk, or both, or what?

Pre. Are ye building Babylon there?

Bil. Here's a noise in court? You think you are in a tavern, do you not? 5

Pre. You think you are in a brothel-house, do you not? — This room is ill-scented.

Enter One with a perfume.

So, perfume, perfume: some upon me, I pray thee.

The duke is upon instant entrance; so, make place there!

SCENE II.<sup>11</sup>

Enter the DUKE PIETRO, FERRARDO, COUNT EQUATO, COUNT CELSO before, and GUERRINO.

Pietro. Where breathes that music?

Bil. The discord rather than the music is heard from the malcontent Malevole's chamber.

Fer. [calling.] Malevole!

Mal. (out of his chamber.) Yaugh, god-a- [5 man, what dost thou there? Duke's Ganymede, Juno's jealous of thy long stockings.

Shadow of a woman, what wouldst, weasel?
Thou lamb o' court, what dost thou bleat for?
Ah, you smooth chimn'd catamite!<sup>1</sup>

Pietro. Come down, thou rugged<sup>2</sup>, cur, and smarl here; I give thy dogged sullenness free liberty; trot about and bespurtle<sup>3</sup> whom thou pleasest.

Mal. I'll come among you, you goat-<sup>4</sup> ish-blooded toderers,<sup>4</sup> as gum into taffeta, to fret, to fret. I'll fall like a sponge into water, to suck up, to suck up. Howl again;<sup>5</sup> I'll go to church and come to you. [Exit above.]

Pietro. This Malevole is one of the most<sup>6</sup> prodigious affections that ever conversed with nature: a man, or rather a monster, more discontent than Lucifer when he was thrust out of the presence. His appetite is insatiable as the grave; as far from any content as from<sup>7</sup> heaven. His highest delight is to procure others vexation, and therein he thinks he truly serves heaven; for 't is his position, whosoever in this earth can be contented is a slave and damned; therefore does he afflict all in<sup>8</sup> that to which they are most affected.<sup>8</sup> The elements struggle within him; his own soul is at variance [within herself];<sup>7</sup> his speech is halter-worthy at all hours. I like him, faith: he gives good intelligence to my spirit, makes<sup>9</sup> me understand those weaknesses which others' flattery palliates. Hark! they sing.

SCENE III.<sup>8</sup>

A Song.

Enter MALEVOLE after the song.

[Pietro.] See, he comes. Now shall you hear the extremity of a malcontent: he is as free as air; he blows over every man.—And, sir, whence come you now?<sup>4</sup>

Mal. From the public place of much dissimulation, [the church].<sup>9</sup>

Pietro. What didst there?

Mal. Talk with a usurer; take up at interest.<sup>9</sup>

Pietro. I wonder what religion thou art
[of]?<sup>9</sup>

Mal. Of a soldier's religion.

Pietro. And what dost thou think makes most infidels now?<sup>14</sup>

Mal. Sects, sects. I have seen seeming Piety change her robes oft, that sure none but some arch-devil can shape her a new petticoat.

Pietro. O, a religious policy.

Mal. But, damnation on a politic religion!
I am weary: would I were one of the duke's hounds now!<sup>21</sup>

Pietro. But what's the common news abroad, Malevole? Thou dogg'st rumour still.

Mal. Common news? Why, common words are, "God save ye,"<sup>11</sup> "Fare ye well;"<sup>11</sup> common<sup>12</sup> actions, flattery and cozenage; common things, women and cuckolds.—And how does my little Ferrard? Ah, ye lecherous animal!—my little ferret, he goes sucking up and down the pal-lace into every hen's nest, like a weasel:—<sup>10</sup> and to what dost thou addict thy time to now more than to those antique painted drabs that are still affected of<sup>10</sup> young courtiers, Flattery, Fride, and Venery?<sup>34</sup>

Fer. I study languages. Who dost think to be the best linguist of our age?

Mal. Phew! the devil: let him possess thee;
he'll teach thee to speak all languages most readily and strangely; and great reason, marry, he's travel'd greatly i' the world, and is everywhere.<sup>41</sup>

Fer. Save i' th' court.

Mal. Ay, save i' th' court.—(To BILIOSO.)
And how does my old muckhill, overspread with fresh snow? Thou half a man, half a<sup>45</sup> goat, all a beast! how does thy young wife, old huddle?

Bil. Out, you improvident rascal!

Mal. Do, kick thou hugely-horn'd old duke's ox, good Master Make-pleas.<sup>60</sup>

Pietro. How dost thou live nowadays, Ma-levole?

Mal. Why, like the knight, Sir Patrick Pen-liolians, with killing o' spiders for my lady's monkey.<sup>66</sup>

Pietro. How dost spend the night? I hear thou never sleep'st.

Mal. O, no; but dream the most fantastical!
O heaven! O fubbery, fubbery!<sup>11</sup>

Pietro. Dream! What dream'st?<sup>60</sup>

Mal. Why, methinks I see that signior pawn his footcloth,<sup>12</sup> that metrezza,<sup>13</sup> her plate: this madam takes physic that t' other monsieur may minister to her: here is a pander jewel'd;
there a fellow in shift of satin this day, that<sup>65</sup> could not shift a shirt t' other night: here a Paris supports that Helen; there's a Lady Guinever bears up that Sir Lancelot. Dreams, dreams, visions, fantasies, chimeras, imaginations, tricks, conceits!—(To PREPASSO.) Sir<sup>70</sup> Tristram, Trimtram, come aloft, Jack-an-apes,<sup>14</sup> with a whim-wham: here's a knight of the land of Catito shall play at trap<sup>15</sup> with any page in Europe; do the sword-dance with any morn-dancer in Christendom; ride at the ring till<sup>75</sup> the fin<sup>16</sup> of his eyes look as blue as the welkin;
and run the wildgoose-chase even with Pompey the Hoge.

Pietro. You run!

Mal. To the devil. Now, signior Guerrino, that thou from a most pitied prisoner shouldst grow a most loath'd flatterer!—Alas, poor Celso, thy star's opprest: thou art an honest lord: 't is pity.

Pietro. Leave us, leave us.

Execute all saving PIETRO and MALEVOLE.

Now, sir, what is 't?

Mal. Duke, thou art a becco,<sup>1</sup> a cornuto.<sup>2</sup>

Pietro. How!

Mal. Thou art a cuckold. 95

Pietro. Speak, unshale<sup>3</sup> him quick.

Mal. With most tumbler-like nimbleness.

Pietro. Who? By whom? I burst with desire. 99

Mal. Mendoza is the man makes thee a horn'd beast; duke, 't is Mendoza cornutes thee.

Pietro. What conformance? <sup>4</sup> Relate; short, short.

Mal. As a lawyer's beard. 105

There is an old crone in the court, her name is Maquerelle,

She is my mistress, sooth to say, and she doth ever tell me.

Blirt<sup>5</sup> o' rhyme, blirt o' rhyme! Maquerelle is a cunning bawd; I am an honest villain; thy wife is a close drab; <sup>6</sup> and thou art a notorious cuckold. Farewell, duke. 111

Pietro. Stay, stay.

Mal. Dull, dull duke, can lazy patience make lame revenge? O God, for a woman to make a man that which God never created, never made? 115

Pietro. What did God never make?

Mal. A cuckold: to be made a thing that's hoodwink't with kindness, whilst every rascal fillips his brows; to have a coxcomb with <sup>120</sup> egregious horns pinn'd to a lord's back, every page sporting himself with delightful laughter, whilst he must be the last must know it. Pistols and poniards! pistols and poniards!

Pietro. Death and damnation! 125

Mal. Lightning and thunder!

Pietro. Vengeance and torture!

Mal. Catso!<sup>7</sup>

Pietro. O, revenge!

Mal. <sup>8</sup> Nay, to select among ten thousand fairs 130

A lady far inferior to the most,
In fair proportion both of limb and soul;
To take her from austerer check of parents,
To make her his by most devoutful rites,
Make her commandress of a better essence 135
Than is the gorgeous world, even of a man;
To hug her with as rais'd an appetite
As usurers do their delv'd-up treasury
(Thinking none tells<sup>9</sup> it but his private self);
To meet her spirit in a nimble kiss, 140
Distilling panting ardour to her heart;

True to her sheets, nay, diets strong his blood,
To give her height of hymeneal sweets, —

Pietro. O God!

Mal. Whilst she lisps, and gives him some court-quelquechose, 145

Made only to provoke, not satiate:
And yet, even then, the thaw of her delight
Flows from lewd heat of apprehension,
Only from strange imagination's rankness,
That forms the adulterer's presence in her soul, 150

And makes her think she clips the foul knave's loins.

Pietro. Affliction to my blood's root!

Mal. Nay, think, but think what may proceed of this; adultery is often the mother of incest. 155

Pietro. Incest!

Mal. Yes, incest: mark: — Mendoza of his wife begets perchance a daughter: Mendoza dies, his son marries this daughter: say you? nay, 't is frequent, not only probable, but no <sup>160</sup> question often acted, whilst ignorance, fearless ignorance, clasps his own seed.

Pietro. Hideous imagination!

Mal. Adultery! Why, next to the sin of simony, 't is the most horrid transgression under the cope of salvation. <sup>165</sup>

Pietro. Next to simony!

Mal. Ay, next to simony, in which our men in next age shall not sin.

Pietro. Not sin! why? 170

Mal. Because (thanks to some churchmen) our age will leave them nothing to sin with. But adultery, O dulness! should show <sup>175</sup> exemplary punishment, that intemperate bloods may freeze but to think it.] I would damn him and all his generation: my own hands should do it; ha, I would not trust heaven with my vengeance anything.

Pietro. Anything, anything, Malevole: thou shalt see instantly what temper my spirit <sup>180</sup> holds. Farewell; remember I forget thee not; farewell. Exit PIETRO.

[<sup>12</sup> Mal. Farewell.

Lean thoughtfulness, a sallow meditation,
Suck thy veins dry! Distemperance rob thy sleep! 185

The heart's disquiet is revenge most deep:
He that gets blood, the life of flesh but spills,
But he that breaks heart's peace, the dear soul kills.

Well, this disguise doth yet afford me that
Which kings do seldom hear, or great men use, — 190

Free speech: and though my state's usurpt,
Yet this affected strain gives me a tongue
As fetterless as is an emperor's.
I may speak foolishly, ay, knavishly, 194
Always carelessly, yet no one thinks it fashion
To poise <sup>13</sup> my breath; for he that laughs and strikes

<sup>10</sup> Under heaven (?) In spite of which a man can purchase salvation (?)

Is lightly felt, or seldom struck again.
 Duke, I'll torment thee now : my just revenge
 From thee than crown a richer gem shall part :
 Beneath God, naught's so dear as a calm
 heart.] 200

SCENE IV.<sup>1</sup>

Enter CELSO.

Celso. My honour'd lord, —

Mal. Peace, speak low, peace ! O Celso, constant lord, (Thou to whose faith I only rest discovered,

 Thou, one of full ten millions of men,
 That lovest virtue only for itself ;
 Thou in whose hands old Ops<sup>2</sup> may put her soul) 5

Behold forever-banish't Altofront,
 This Genoa's last year's duke. O truly noble !
 I wanted those old instruments of state,
 Dissemblance and suspect : I could not time it,
 Celso ; 10

My throne stood like a point in midst of a circle,

To all of equal nearness ; bore with none ;
 Rein'd all alike ; so slept in fearless virtue,
 Suspectless, too suspectless ; till the crowd,
 (Still likerous of<sup>3</sup> untried novelties) 15
 Impatience with severer government,
 Made strong with Florence, banish't Alto-
 front.

Celso. Strong with Florence ! ay, thence your mischief rose ;

For when the daughter of the Florentine
 Was match'd once with this Pietro, now duke,
 No stratagem of state untri'd was left, 21
 Till you of all —

Mal. Of all was quite bereft :
 Alas, Maria too, close prisoned,
 My true faith'd duchess, i' the citadel ! 24

Celso. I'll still adhere : let's mutiny and die.
Mal. O, no, climb not a falling tower, Celso ;
 'Tis well held desperation, no zeal,
 Hopeless to strive with fate. Peace ! Tem-porize !

Hope, hope, that never forsak'st the wretched'st
 man, 28

Yet bidd'st me live, and lurk in this disguise !
 What, play I well the free-breath'd discontent ?
 Why, man, we are all philosophical monarchs

Or natural fools. Celso, the court's a-fire ;
 The duchess' sheets will smoke for't ere't be
 long :

Impure Mendoza, that sharp-nos'd lord, that mad<sup>e</sup> 35

The cursed match that linkt Genoa with Florence,
 Now broad-horns the duke, which he now knows.

Discord to malcontents is very manna :
 When the ranks are burst, then scuffle, Alto-
 front.

Celso. Ay, but durst, — 40

<sup>3</sup> Having an appetite for.

<sup>4</sup> Qq print the rest of this speech as prose, perhaps rightly.

Mal. 'Tis gone ; 't is swallowed like a mineral :

Some say 't will work ; pheut, I'll not shrink :
 He's resolute who can no lower sink :

[<sup>5</sup> BILIOSO entering, MALEVOLE shifteth his speech.

O the father of May-poles ! did you never see a fellow whose strength consisted in his breath, [<sup>48</sup> respect in his office, religion in his lord, and love in himself, why, then, behold !

Bil. Signior, —

Mal. My right worshipful lord, your court night-cap makes you have a passing high forehead. 51

Bil. I can tell you strange news, but I am sure you know them already : the duke speaks much good of you.

Mal. Go to, then : and shall you and I now enter into a strict friendship ? 56

Bil. Second one another ?

Mal. Yes.

Bil. Do one another good offices ? 59

Mal. Just : what though I call'd thee old ox, egregious wittol, broken-bellied coward, rotten mummy ? yet, since I am in favour —

Bil. Words of course, terms of disport. His grace presents you by me a chain, as his grateful remembrance for — I am ignorant for [<sup>60</sup> what ; marry, ye may impart : yet howsoever —
 come — dear friend ; dost know my son ?

Mal. Your son !

Bil. He shall eat wood-cocks, dance jigs, make possets, and play at shuttle-cock with [<sup>70</sup> any young lord about the court : he has as sweet a lady, too ; dost know her little bitch ?

Mal. 'Tis a dog, man.

Bil. Believe me, a she-bitch. O, 't is a good creature ! thou shalt be her servant. I'll [<sup>75</sup> make thee acquainted with my young wife too :
 what ! I keep her not at court for nothing. 'Tis grown to supper-time ; come to my table : that, anything I have, stands open to thee.

Mal. (Aside to CELSO.) How smooth to him that is in state of grace, 80

How servile is the rugged'st courtier's face !
 What profit, nay, what nature would keep down,
 Are heav'd to them are minions to a crown.

Envious ambition never sates his thirst,
 Till, sucking all, he swells and swells, and bursts. 85

Bil. I shall now leave you with my always-best wishes ; only let's hold betwixt us a firm correspondence, a mutual friendly-reciprocal kind of a steady-unanimous-heartilyleagued — 90

Mal. Did your signorship ne'er see a pigeon-house that was smooth, round, and white without, and full of holes and stink within ? Ha' ye not, old courtier ? 94

Bil. O, yes, 't is the form, the fashion of them all.

Mal. Adieu, my true court-friend ; farewell,
 my dear Castilio. 6

Exit BILIOSO.]

Celso. Yonder 's Mendoza.

Descries MENDOZA.

Mal. True, the privy-key. <sup>59</sup>

Celso. I take my leave, sweet lord.

Mal. 'Tis fit; away! Exit CELSO.

SCENE V.<sup>1</sup>

Enter MENDOZA with three or four Suitors.

Men. Leave your suits with me; I can and will. Attend my secretary; leave me.

[Exeunt Suitors.]

Mal. Mendoza, hark ye, hark ye. You are a treacherous villain: God b' wi' ye!

Men. Out, you base-born rascal! <sup>5</sup>

Mal. We are all the sons of heaven, though a tripe-wife were our mother: ah, you whore-son, hot-rein'd he-marmoset! Aegisthus! didst ever hear of one Aegisthus?

Men. Gisthus? <sup>10</sup>

Mal. Ay, Aegisthus: he was a filthy incontinent flesh-monger, such a one as thou art.

Men. Out, grumbling rogue!

Mal. Orestes, beware Orestes!

Men. Out, beggar! <sup>15</sup>

Mal. I once shall rise!

Men. Thou rise!

Mal. At the resurrection.

No vulgar seed but once may rise and shall;
No king so huge but 'fore he die may fall. <sup>20</sup>

Exit.

Men. Now, good Elysium! what a delicious heaven is it for a man to be in a prince's favour! O sweet God! O pleasure! O fortune! O all thou best of life! What should I think, what say, what do to be a favourite, a minion? <sup>25</sup> to have a general timorous respect observe<sup>2</sup> a man, a stateful silence in his presence, solitariness in his absence, a confused hum and busy murmur of obsequious suitors training<sup>3</sup> him; the cloth held up, and way proclaim'd be-<sup>30</sup> fore him; petitionary vassels licking the pavement with their slavish knees, whilst some odd palace-lampreels<sup>4</sup> that engender with snakes, and are full of eyes on both sides, with a kind of insinuating humbleness, fix all <sup>35</sup> their delights upon his brow. O blessed state! what a ravishing prospect doth the Olympus of favour yield! Death, I cornute the duke! Sweet women! most sweet ladies! nay, angels! by heaven, he is more accursed than a devil <sup>40</sup> that hates you, or is hated by you; and happier than a god that loves you, or is beloved by you. You preservers of mankind, life-blood of society, who would live, nay, who can live with-<sup>45</sup> out you? O paradise! how majestical is your austerer presence! how imperiously chaste is your more modest face! but, O, how full of ravishing attraction is your pretty, petulant, languishing, lasciviously-composed countenance! these amorous smiles, those soul-<sup>50</sup> warming sparkling glances, ardent as those flames that singed the world by heedless Phaeton! in body how delicate, in soul how witty, in

discourse how pregnant, in life, how wary, in favours how judicious, in day how sociable, and <sup>55</sup> in night how — O pleasure unutterable! indeed, it is most certain, one man cannot deserve only to enjoy a beauteous woman: but a duchess! In despite of Phoebus, I'll write a sonnet instantly in praise of her. Exit. <sup>60</sup>

SCENE VI.<sup>5</sup>

Enter FERNEZE ushering AURELLA, EMILIA and MAQUERELLE bearing up her train, BIANCA attending; then exeunt EMILIA and BIANCA.

Aurel. And is't possible? Mendoza slight me! Possible?

Fer. Possible!

What can be strange in him that's drunk with favour,

Grows insolent with grace? — Speak, Maquerelle, speak. <sup>5</sup>

Maq. To speak feelingly, more, more richly in solid sense than worthless words, give me those jewels of your ears to receive my enforced duty. As for my part, 'tis well known I can put up anything (FERNEZE privately feeds MA-<sup>10</sup> QUERELLE's hands with jewels during this speech); can bear patiently with any man: but when I heard he wronged your precious sweetness, I was enforced to take deep offence. 'Tis most certain he loves Emilia with high appetite: <sup>15</sup> and, as she told me (as you know we women impart our secrets one to another), when she repulsed his suit, in that he was possessed with your endeared grace, Mendoza most ingrat-<sup>20</sup> fully renounced all faith to you.

Fer. Nay, call'd you — Speak, Maquerelle, speak.

Maq. By heaven, witch, dri'd biscuit; and contested blushlessly he lov'd you but for a spurt or so.

Fer. For maintenance. <sup>25</sup>

Maq. Advancement and regard.

Aurel. O villain! O impudent Mendoza!

Maq. Nay, he is the rustiest-jaw'd, the foul-<sup>30</sup> est mouth'd knave in railing against our sex: he will rail again' women —

Aurel. How? how?

Maq. I am asham'd to speak 't, I.

Aurel. I love to hate him: speak.

Maq. Why, when Emilia scorn'd his base un-<sup>35</sup> steadiness, the black-throated rascal scolded, and said —

Aurel. What?

Maq. Troth, 'tis too shameless.

Aurel. What said he?

Maq. Why, that, at four, women were <sup>40</sup> fools; at fourteen, drabs; at forty, bawds; at fourscore, witehes; and [at] a hundred, cats.

Aurel. O unlimited impudency!

Fer. But as for poor Ferneze's fixed heart, <sup>45</sup> Was never shadeless meadow drier parcht Under the scorching heat of heaven's dog; Than is my heart with your enforcing eyes.

Maq. A hot simile.

<sup>5</sup> The same.

Fer. Your smiles have been my heaven, your frowns my hell:

O, pity, then! grace should with beauty dwell. <sup>50</sup>

Maq. Reasonable perfect, by 'r lady.

Aurel. I will love thee, be it but in despite of that Mendoza: — witch! Ferneze, — witch! — Ferneze, thou art the duchess' favourite:

Be faithful, private: but 't is dangerous. <sup>55</sup>

Fer. His love is lifeless that for love fears breath:

The worst that's due to sin, O, would 't were death!

Aurel. Enjoy my favour. I will be sick instantly and take physic: therefore in depth of night visit — <sup>60</sup>

Maq. Visit her chamber, but conditionally you shall not offend her bed: by this diamond!

Fer. By this diamond. Gives it to MAQ.

Maq. Nor tarry longer than you please: by this ruby! <sup>65</sup>

Fer. By this ruby. Gives again.

Maq. And that the door shall not creak.

Fer. And that the door shall not creak.

Maq. Nay, but swear.

Fer. By this purse. Giving her his purse.

Maq. Go to, I'll keep your oaths for you: [71 remember, visit.

Enter MENDOZA, reading a sonnet.

Aurel. Dried biscuit! — Look where the base wretch comes. <sup>74</sup>

Men. "Beauty's life, heaven's model, love's queen," —

Maq. That's his Emilia.

Men. "Nature's triumph, best of earth," —

Maq. Meaning Emilia. <sup>79</sup>

Men. "Thou only wonder that the world hath seen," —

Maq. That's Emilia.

Aurel. Must I, then, hear her prais'd? — Mendoza!

Men. Madam, your excellency is graciously <sup>85</sup> encount'ed: I have been writing passionate flashes in honour of — Exit FERNEZE.

Aurel. Out, villain, villain!

O judgment, where have been my eyes? what Bewitch'd election made me dote on thee? <sup>90</sup>

What sorcery made me love thee? But, be gone; Bury thy head. O, that I could do more Than loath thee! hence, worst of ill!

No reason else,<sup>1</sup> our reason is our will. Exit with MAQUERELLE.

Men. Women! nay, Furies; nay, worse; <sup>105</sup> for they torment only the bad, but women good and bad. Damnation of mankind! Breath, hast thou prais'd them for this? and is't you, Ferneze, are wriggled into smock-grace? Sit sure.

O, that I could rail against these monsters <sup>100</sup> in nature, models of hell, curse of the earth, women! that dare attempt anything, and what they attempt they care not how they accomplish; without all premeditation or prevention;

rash in asking, desperate in working; impa- <sup>105</sup> tient in suffering, extreme in desiring, slaves unto appetite, mistresses in dissembling, only constant in unconstancy, only perfect in counterfeiting; their words are feigned, their eyes forg'd, their sighs dissembled, their looks <sup>110</sup> counterfeit, their hair false, their given hopes deceitful, their very breath artificial; their blood is their only god; bad clothes and old age are only the devils they tremble at. That I could rail now! <sup>115</sup>

SCENE VII.<sup>2</sup>

Enter PIETRO, his sword drawn.

Pietro. A mischief fill thy throat, thou foul-jaw'd slave!

Say thy prayers.

Men. I ha' forgot 'em.

Pietro. Thou shalt die.

Men. So shalt thou. I am heart-mad.

Pietro. I am horn-mad.

Men. Extreme mad.

Pietro. Monstrously mad.

Men. Why?

Pietro. Why! thou, thou hast dishonoured my bed. <sup>5</sup>

Men. I! Come, come, sit; here's my bare heart to thee,

As steady as is the<sup>3</sup> centre to this<sup>4</sup> glorious world:

And yet, hark, thou art a cornuto, — but by me?

Pietro. Yes, slave, by thee.

Men. Do not, do not with tart and spleenful breath <sup>10</sup>

Lose him can lose thee. I offend my duke!

Bear record, O ye dumb and raw-air'd nights,

How vigilant my sleepless eyes have been To watch the traitor! Record, thou spirit of truth,

With what debasement I ha' thrown myself <sup>15</sup> To under offices, only to learn

The truth, the party, time, the means, the place,

By whom, and when, and where thou wert disgrac'd!

And am I paid with "slave"? Hath my intrusion

To places private and prohibited, <sup>20</sup>

Only to observe the closer passages, Heaven knows with vows of revelation,

Made me suspected, made me deem'd a villain? What rogue hath wrong'd us?

Pietro. Mendoza, I may err.

Men. Err! 't is too mild a name: but err and err, <sup>25</sup>

Run giddy with suspect, 'fore through me thou know

That which most creatures, save thyself, do know:

Nay, since my service hath so loath'd reject, 'Fore I'll reveal, shalt find them clipt<sup>6</sup> together. <sup>29</sup>

Pietro. Mendoza, thou know'st I am a most plain-breasted man.

Men. The fitter to make a cuckold: would your brows were most plain too!

Pietro. Tell me : indeed, I heard thee rail —
Men. At women, true: why, what cold phlegm could choose, 35
 Knowing a lord so honest, virtuous,
 So boundless loving, bounteous, fair-shap'd,
 sweet,
 To be contemn'd, abus'd, defam'd, made cuck-
 old?

Heart! I hate all women for 't: sweet sheets, [30
 wax lights, antique bedposts, cambrie smocks, villanous curtains, arras pictures, oil'd hinges, and all ye tongue-tied lascivious witnesses of great creatures' wantonness, — what salvation can you expect?

Pietro. Wilt thou tell me? 46

Men. Why, you may find it yourself; observe,
 observe.

Pietro. I ha' not the patience. Wilt thou deserve me, tell, give it.

Men. Take 't: why, Ferneze is the man, [50 Ferneze: I'll prove 't; this night you shall take him in your sheets. Will 't serve?

Pietro. It will; my bosom's in some peace:
 till night —

Men. What?

Pietro. Farewell.

Men. God! how weak a lord are you!

Why, do you think there is no more but so? 65

Pietro. Why!

Men. Nay, then, will I presume to counsel
 you:

It should be thus. You with some guard upon the sudden

Break into the princess' chamber: I stay behind,

Without the door, through which he needs must pass: 60

Ferneze flies; let him: to me he comes; he's kill'd

By me, observe, by me: you follow: I rail,
 And seem to save the body. Duchess comes,
 On whom (respecting her advanced birth, 64

And your fair nature), I know, nay, I do know,
 No violence must be us'd; she comes: I storm,

I praise, excuse Ferneze, and still maintain
 The duchess' honour; she for this loves me.

I honour you; shall know her soul, you mine:
 Then naught shall she contrive in vengeance 70

(As women are most thoughtful in revenge)
 Of her Ferneze, but you shall sooner know 't

Than she can think 't. Thus shall his death come sure,

Your duchess brain-caught: so your life secure.

Pietro. It is too well: my bosom and my
 heart 76

When nothing helps, cut off the rotten part.

Exit.

Men. Who cannot feign friendship can ne'er produce the effects of hatred. Honest fool duke!
 subtle lascivious duchess! silly novice Ferneze!
 I do laugh at ye. My brain is in labour till it [80 produce mischief, and I feel sudden throes, proofs sensible, the issue is at hand.

As bears shape young, so I'll form my device,
 Which grown proves horrid: vengeance makes men wise. [Exit.]

[SCENE VIII.]<sup>1</sup>

[Enter MALEVOLE and PASSARELLO.

Mal. Fool, most happily encount' red: canst sing, fool?

Pass. Yes, I can sing, fool, if you'll bear the burden; and I can play upon instruments, scurvily, as gentlemen do. O, that I had been [5 gelded! I should then have been a fat fool for a chamber, a squeaking fool for a tavern, and a private fool for all the ladies.

Mal. You are in good case since you came to court, fool: what, guarded,<sup>2</sup> guarded! 10

Pass. Yes, faith, even as footmen and bawds wear velvet, not for an ornament of honour, but for a badge of drudgery; for, now the duke is discontented, I am fain to fool him asleep every night. 15

Mal. What are his griefs?

Pass. He hath sore eyes.

Mal. I never observed so much.

Pass. Horrible sore eyes; and so hath every cuckold, for the roots of the horns spring in [20 the eyeballs, and that's the reason the horn of a cuckold is as tender as his eye, or as that growing in the woman's forehead, twelve years since, that could not endure to be touch'd.<sup>3</sup> The duke hangs down his head like a columbine. 25

Mal. Passarello, why do great men beg fools? 4

Pass. As the Welshman stole rushes when there was nothing else to file; only to keep begging in fashion. 30

Mal. Pooh, thou givest no good reason; thou speakest like a fool.

Pass. Faith, I utter small fragments, as your knight courts your city widow with jingling of his gilt spurs,<sup>5</sup> advancing his bush-coloured [35 beard, and taking tobacco: this is all the mirror of their knightly complements.<sup>6</sup> Nay, I shall talk when my tongue is a-going once; 't is like a citizen on horseback, evermore in a false
 gallop. 40

Mal. And how doth Maquerelle fare nowa days?

Pass. Faith, I was wont to salute her as our English women are at their first landing in Flushing; <sup>7</sup> I would call her whore: but now [45 that antiquity leaves her as an old piece of plastic to work by, I only ask her how her rotten teeth fare every morning, and so leave her. She was the first that ever invented perfum'd smocks for the gentlewomen, and [50 woollen shoes, for fear of creaking for the visitant. She were an excellent lady, but that her face peebleth like Muscovy glass.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Seek to be made guardians to idiots, in order to enjoy their revenues.

<sup>5</sup> Some copies read something of his guilt: some advancing his high-colored.

<sup>7</sup> Flushing was in the hands of the English as security for a loan, and presumably the garrison was unpopular with the townspeople. <sup>8</sup> Talc.

Mal. And how doth thy old lord, that hath wit enough to be a flatterer, and conscience enough to be a knave? <sup>50</sup>

Pass. O, excellent: he keeps beside me fifteen jesters, to instruct him in the art of fooling, and utters their jests in private to the duke and duchess. He'll lie like to your Switzer or <sup>60</sup> lawyer; he'll be of any side for most money.

Mal. I am in haste, be brief.

Pass. As your fiddler when he is paid. — He'll thrive, I warrant you, while your young <sup>64</sup> courtier stands like Good Friday in Lent; men long to see it, because more fatting days come after it; else he's the leanest and pitifullest actor in the whole pageant. Adieu, Malevole.

Mal. O world most vile, when thy loose vanities, <sup>68</sup>

Taught by this fool, do make the fool seem wise!

Pass. You'll know me again, Malevole.

Mal. O, ay, by that velvet.

Pass. Ay, as a pettifogger by his buckram bag. I am as common in the court as an host-<sup>74</sup> ess's lips in the country; knights, and clowns, and knaves, and all share me; the court cannot possibly be without me. Adieu, Malevole.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter MENDOZA, with a scone,<sup>2</sup> to observe FERNEZE'S entrance, who, whilst the act is playing, enters unbraced, two Pages before him with lights; is met by MAQUERELLE and convey'd in; the Pages are sent away.

Men. He's caught, the woodcock's head is i' th' noose.

Now treads Ferneze in dangerous path of lust, Swearing his sense is merely<sup>3</sup> deified:

The fool grasps clouds, and shall beget Centaurs:

And now, in strength of panting faint delight, <sup>6</sup>

The goat bids heaven envy him. — Good goose, I can afford thee nothing

But the poor comfort of calamity, pity.

Lust's like the plummetts hanging on clock-lines,

Will ne'er ha' done till all is quite undone; <sup>10</sup>

Such is the course salt sallow lust doth run;

Which thou shalt try. I'll be reveng'd. Duke, thy suspect;

Duchess, thy disgrace; Ferneze, thy rivalship; Shall have swift vengeance. Nothing so holy, <sup>16</sup>

No band of nature so strong,

No law of friendship so sacred,

But I'll profane, burst, violate, 'fore I'll

Endure disgrace, contempt, and poverty.

Shall I, whose very "Hum" struck all heads bare,

Whose face made silence, creaking of whose shoe <sup>20</sup>

Fore'd the most private passages fly ope,

Scrape like a servile dog at some latch'd door? Learn how to make a leg, and cry "Beseech ye, Pray ye, is such a lord within?" be aw'd At some odd usher's scoff'd formality? <sup>26</sup> First sear my brains! Unde cadis non quo, refert; <sup>4</sup>

My heart cries, "Perish all!" How! how! what fate

Can once avoid revenge, that's desperate? <sup>28</sup>

I'll to the duke; if all should ope — If! tush.

Fortune still dotes on those who cannot blush.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.<sup>5</sup>

Enter MALEVOLE at one door; BIANCA, EMILIA, and MAQUERELLE at the other door.

Mal. Bless ye, cast<sup>6</sup> o' ladies! — Ha, Dipsas! how dost thou, old coal?

Mag. Old coal!

Mal. Ay, old coal; methinks thou liest like a brand under these billets of green wood. He <sup>16</sup> that will inflame a young wench's heart, let him lay close to her an old coal that hath first been fir'd, a panderess, my half-burnt lint, who though thou cannot name flame thyself, yet art able to set a thousand virgin's tapers afire. <sup>10</sup>

— And how does Janivere thy husband, my little periwinkle? Is he troubled with the cough o' the lungs still? Does he hawk o' nights still?

He will not bite.

Bian. No, by my troth, I took him with <sup>16</sup> his mouth empty of old teeth.

Mal. And he took thee with thy belly full of young bones: marry, he took his main by the stroke of his enemy. <sup>19</sup>

Bian. And I mine by the stroke of my friend.

Mal. The close stock! O mortal wench! Lady, ha' ye now no restoratives for your decayed Jasons? Look ye, crab's guts bak'd, distill'd ox-pith, the pulverized hairs of a lion's upper-lip, jelly of cock-sparrows, he-mon-<sup>26</sup> key's marrow, or powder of fox-stones? — And whither are all yon ambling now?

Bian. Why, to bed, to bed.

Mal. Do your husbands lie with ye?

Bian. That were country fashion, i' faith. <sup>30</sup>

Mal. Ha' ye no foregoers about you? Come, whither in good deed, la' now?

Mag. In good indeed, la now, to eat the most miraculously, admirably, astonishing compos'd posset with three curds, without any drink. <sup>36</sup> Will ye help me with a he-fox? — Here 's the duke.

Exeunt Ladies.
[Mal. Fri'd frogs are very good, and French-like too.] <sup>8</sup>

SCENE III.<sup>9</sup>

Enter DUKE PIETRO, COUNT CELSO, COUNT EQUATO, BILIOSO, FERRARDO, and MENDOZA.

Pietro. The night grows deep and foul: what hour is 't?

Celso. Upon the stroke of twelve.

<sup>9</sup> The same.

Mal. Save ye, Duke!

Pietro. From thee: begone, I do not love [5 thee! Let me see thee no more; we are dis-pleas'd.

Mal. Why, God b' wi' thee! Heaven hear my curse,—may thy wife and thee live long together!

Pietro. Begone, sirrah!

Mal. "When Arthur first in court began,"— Agamemnon—Menelaus—was ever any duke a cornuto?

Pietro. Begone, hence!

Mal. What religion wilt thou be of next?

Men. Out with him!

Mal. With most servile patience.—Time will
come

When wonder of thy error will strike dumb
Thy bezzel'd<sup>1</sup> senses.—

Slaves! ay, favour: ay, marry, shall he rise:
Good God! how subtle hell doth flatter vice!
Mounts him aloft, and makes him seem to fly,
As fowl the tortoise mock'd, who to the sky
The ambitious shell-fish rais'd! The end of all
Is only, that from height he might dead fall.

[<sup>2</sup>Bil. Why, when? Out, ye rogue! begone, ye rascal!

Mal. I shall now leave ye with all my best wishes.

Bil. Out, ye cur!

Mal. Only let's hold together a firm correspondence.

Bil. Out!

Mal. A mutual-friendly-reciprocal-perpetual kind of steady-unanimous-heartily-leagued—

Bil. Hence, ye gross-jaw'd, peasantly—out, go!

Mal. Adieu, pigeon-house; thou burr, that only stickest to nappy fortunes. The serpigio,<sup>3</sup> [40 the strangury, an eternal uneffectual priapism seize thee!

Bil. Out, rogue!

Mal. May'st thou be a notorious wittolly pander to thine own wife, and yet get no office, [46 but live to be the utmost misery of mankind, a beggarly cuckold!] Exit.

Pietro. It shall be so.

Men. It must be so, for where great states
revenge,

'T is requisite the parts be closely dogg'd, [50
(Which quietly and soft respect forbears).<sup>4</sup>

Lay one into his breast shall sleep with him,
Feed in the same dish, run in self-fashion,
Who may discover any shape of danger;
For once disgrac'd, displayed in offence, [55
It makes man bluishless, and man is (all confess)
More prone to vengeance than to gratefulness.
Favours are writ in dust; but stripes we feel
Depraved nature stamps in lasting steel.

Pietro. You shall be leagu'd with the duchess.

Equato. The plot is very good. [61

Men. You shall both kill, and seem the corse to save.

<sup>4</sup> Bullen's emend. Q<sub>q</sub> read

'T is requisite, the parts with piety

And soft respect forbears, be closely dog'd.

For soft, other copies read loft, lost.

Fer. A most fine brain-trick.

Celso. (Aside.) Of a most cunning knave. [64

Pietro. My lords, the heavy action we intend
Is death and shame, two of the ugliest shapes
That can confound a soul; think, think of it.
I strike, but yet, like him that 'gainst stone walls

Directs, his shafts rebound in his own face;
My lady's shame is mine, O God, 'tis mine! [70

Therefore I do conjure all secrecy:

Let it be as very little as may be,

Pray ye, as may be,

Make frightless entrance, salute her with soft
eyes,

Stain nought with blood; only Ferneze dies, [75

But not before her brows. O gentlemen,

God knows I love her! Nothing else, but this:—

I am not well: if grief, that sucks veins dry,

Rivels<sup>6</sup> the skin, casts ashes in men's faces,

Be-dulls the eye, unstrengthens all the blood, [80

Chance to remove me to another world,

As sure I once must die, let him succeed:

I have no child; all that my youth begot

Hath been your loves, which shall inherit me:

Which as it ever shall, I do conjure it, [85

Mendoza may succeed: he's nobly born;

With me of much desert.

Celso. (Aside.) Much!

Pietro. Your silence answers, "Ay."

I thank you. Come on now. O, that I might die [90

Before her shame's display'd! Would I were forc'd

To burn my father's tomb, unheal<sup>6</sup> his bones,

And dash them in the dirt, rather than this!

This both the living and the dead offends: [94

Sharp surgery where naught but death amends.

Exeunt.

SCENE IV.<sup>7</sup>

Enter MAQUERELLE, EMILIA, and BIANCA with a posset.

Mag. Even here it is, three curds in three regions individually distinct, most methodically according to art compos'd, without any drink.

Bian. Without any drink!

Mag. Upon my honour. Will ye sit and eat?

Emil. Good; the composure, the receipt,
how is 't?

Mag. 'T is a pretty pearl; by this pearl (how does 't with me? <sup>8</sup>) thus it is: Seven and thirty yolks of Barbary hens' eggs; eighteen spoon-<sup>[10</sup> fuls and a half of the juice of cock-sparrow bones; one ounce, three drams, four scruples, and one quarter of the syrup of Ethiopian dates; sweetened with three quarters of a pound of pure candied Indian eringoos; strewed [15 over with the powder of pearl of America, amber of Cataia, and lamb-stones of Muscovia.

Bian. Trust me, the ingredients are very cordial, and, no question, good, and most powerful in restoration. [20

Mag. I know not what you mean by restoration; but this it doth, — it purifieth the

<sup>8</sup> How does it become me?

blood, smootheth the skin, enliveneth the eye, strengtheneth the veins, mundifieth<sup>1</sup> the teeth, comforteth the stomach, fortifieth the back, [25] and quickeneth the wit; that's all.

Emil. By my troth, I have eaten but two spoonfuls, and methinks I could discourse most swiftly and wittily already.

Maq. Have you the art to seem honest? 30

Bian. Ay, thank advice and practice.

Maq. Why, then, eat me o' this posset, quicken your blood, and preserve your beauty. Do you know Doctor Plaster-face? by this curd, he is the most exquisite in forging of veins, [35] sprightening of eyes, dying of hair, sleeking of skins, blushing of cheeks, surphling<sup>2</sup> of breasts, blanching and bleaching of teeth, that ever made an old lady gracious by torchlight; by this curd, la. 40

Bian. Well, we are resolved, what God has given us we'll cherish.

Maq. Cherish anything saving your husband; keep him not too high, lest he leap the pale; but, for your beauty, let it be your saint; [45] bequeath two hours to it every morning in your closet. I ha' been young, and yet, in my conscience, I am not above five and twenty; but, believe me, preserve and use your beauty; for youth and beauty once gone, we are like bee- [50] hives without honey, out-o'-fashion apparel that no man will wear: therefore use me your beauty.

Emil. Ay, but men say —

Maq. Men say! let men say what they [55] will: life o' woman! they are ignorant of our wants. The more in years, the more in perfection they grow; if they lose youth and beauty, they gain wisdom and discretion: but when our beauty fades, good-night with us. There [60] cannot be an uglier thing than to see an old woman: from which, O pruning, pinching, and painting, deliver all sweet beauties!

[Music within.] 64

Bian. Hark! music!

Maq. Peace, 'tis i' the duchess' bed-chamber. Good rest, most prosperously-graced ladies.

Emil. Good night, sentinel.

Bian. Night, dear Maquerelle.

Exeunt all but MAQ.

Maq. May my posset's operation send you my wit and honesty; and me, your youth and [70] beauty; the pleasing'st rest! Exit.

SCENE V.<sup>3</sup>

A Song [within].

Whilst the song is singing, enter MENDOZA with his sword drawn, standing ready to murder FERNEZE as he flies from the duchess' chamber. — Tumult within. 40

All [within.] Strike, strike!

Aur. [within.] Save my Ferneze! O, save my Ferneze!

<sup>3</sup> The same.

Enter FERNEZE in his shirt, and is receiv'd upon MENDOZA's sword.

All [within.] Follow, pursue!

Aur. [within.] O, save Ferneze!

Men. Pierce, pierce! — Thou shallow fool, drop there!

He that attempts a princess' lawless love 6
Must have broad hands, close heart, with Argus' eyes,

And back of Hercules, or else he dies.

Thrusts his rapier in FER.

Enter AURELLA, PIETRO, FERRARDO, BILIOSO, CELSO, and EQUATO.

All. Follow, follow!

Men. Stand off, forbear, ye most uncivil lords!

Pietro. Strike!

Men. Do not; tempt not a man resolv'd: 10

MENDOZA bestrides the wounded body of FERNEZE, and seems to save him.

Would you, inhuman murderers, more than death?

Aur. O poor Ferneze!

Men. Alas, now all defence too late!

Aur. He's dead.

Pietro. I am sorry for our shame. — Go to your bed: 15

Weep not too much, but leave some tears to shed
When I am dead.

Aur. What, weep for thee! my soul no tears shall find.

Pietro. Alas, alas, that women's souls are blind!

Men. Betray such beauty! 20

Murder such youth! Contemn civility!

He loves him not that rails not at him.

Pietro. Thou canst not move us: we have blood enough. —

And please you, lady, we have quite forgot

All your defects: if not, why, then — 25

Aur. Not.

Pietro. Not: the best of rest: good-night.

Exit PIETRO, with other Courtiers.

Aur. Despite go with thee!

Men. Madam, you ha' done me foul disgrace; you have wrong'd him much loves you too much: go to, your soul knows you have. 31

Aur. I think I have.

Men. Do you but think so?

Aur. Nay, sure, I have: my eyes have witnessed thy love: thou hast stood too firm for me. 35

Men. Why, tell me, fair-cheek'd lady, who even in tears art powerfully beauteous, what unadvised passion struck ye into such a violent heat against me? Speak, what mis- [40] chief wrong'd us? What devil injur'd us? Speak.

Aur. The thing ne'er worthy of the name of man, Ferneze;

Ferneze swore thou lov'st Emilia;

Which to advance, with most reproachful breath 45

Thou both didst blemish and denounce my love.

Men. Ignoble villain! did I for this bestride

Thy wounded limbs? for this, rank opposite
 Even to my sovereign? for this, O God, for this, <sup>40</sup>
 Sunk all my hopes, and with my hopes my life?
 Ripp'd bare my throat unto the hangman's axe? —

Thou most dishonour'd trunk! — Emilia!

By life, I know her not — Emilia —!

Did you believe him?

Aur. Pardon me, I did.

Men. Did you? And thereupon you graced him? <sup>65</sup>

Aur. I did.

Men. Took him to favour, nay even clasp'd
 With him?

Aur. Alas, I did!

Men. This night?

Aur. This night.

Men. And in your lustful twines the duke took you?

Aur. A most sad truth.

Men. O God, O God! how we dull honest souls, <sup>60</sup>

Heavy brain'd men, are swallowed in the bogs
 Of a deceitful ground, whilst nimble bloods, Light-jointed spirits, speed; <sup>1</sup> cut good men's throats,

And scape! Alas, I am too honest for this age,
 Too full of phlegm and heavy steadiness; <sup>65</sup> Stood still whilst this slave cast a noose about
 me;

Nay, then to stand in honour of him and her,
 Who had even slic'd my heart!

Aur. Come, I did err,

And am most sorry I did err.

Men. Why, we are both but dead: the duke hates us; <sup>70</sup>

And those whom princes do once groundly <sup>2</sup> hate,

Let them provide to die, as sure as fate.

Prevention is the heart of policy.

Aur. Shall we murder him?

Men. Instantly? <sup>75</sup>

Aur. Instantly; before he casts a plot,

Or further blaze my honour's much-known blot,
 Let's murder him.

Men. I would do much for you: will ye marry
 me?

Aur. I'll make thee duke. We are of Med-icis; <sup>80</sup>

Florence our friend; in court my faction
 Not meanly strengthful; the duke then dead;
 We well prepar'd for change; the multitude
 Irresolutely reefing; we in force;
 Our party seconded; the kingdom maz'd; <sup>85</sup>
 No doubt of <sup>3</sup> swift success all shall be grac'd.

Men. You do confirm me, we are resolute:

To-morrow look for change: rest confident.

'T is now about the immodest waist of night: <sup>90</sup>

The mother of moist dew with pallid light Spreads gloomy shades about the numbed
 earth.

Sleep, sleep, whilst we contrive our mischief's birth.

This man I'll get inhum'd. Farewell: to bed;

Ay, kiss thy pillow, dream the duke is dead.

So, so, good night. Exit AURELIA.

How fortune dotes on impudence! <sup>95</sup>

I am in private the adopted son

Of yon good prince:

I must be duke: why, if I must, I must.

Most silly lord, name me! O heaven! I see

God made honest fools to maintain crafty knaves. <sup>100</sup>

The duchess is wholly mine too; must kill her husband

To quit her shame. Much! then marry her! Ay.

O, I grow proud in prosperous treachery!

As wrestlers clip, so I'll embrace you all,

Not to support, but to procure your fall. <sup>105</sup>

Enter MALEVOLE.

Mal. God arrest thee!

Men. At whose suit?

Mal. At the devil's. Ah, you treacherous, damnable monster, how dost? how dost, thou treacherous rogue? Ah, ye rascal! I am ban- <sup>110</sup> ished the court, sirrah.

Men. Prithee, let's be acquainted; I do love thee, faith.

Mal. At your service, by the Lord, la: shall's go to supper? Let's be once drunk together, <sup>115</sup> and so unite a most virtuously-strengthen'd friendship: shall's Huguenot? shall's?

Men. Wilt fall upon my chamber to-morrow morn?

Mal. As a raven to a dunghill. They say <sup>120</sup> there's one dead here: prickt for the pride of the flesh.

Men. Ferneze: there he is; prithee, bury him.

Mal. O, most willingly: I mean to turn pure
 Rochelle churchman, I. <sup>125</sup>

Men. Thou churchman! Why, why?

Mal. Because I'll live lazily, rail upon authority, deny kings' supremacy in things indifferent, and be a pope in mine own parish.

Men. Wherefore dost thou think churches were made? <sup>131</sup>

Mal. To scour plough-shares: I ha' seen oxen plough up altars; et nunc seges ubi Sion fuit. <sup>6</sup>

Men. Strange! <sup>134</sup>

Mal. Nay, monstrous! I ha' seen a sumptuous steeple turned to a stinking privy; more beastly, the sacredest place made a dogs' kennel; nay, most inhuman, the stoned coffins of long-dead Christians burst up, and made hogs' troughs: hic finis Priami. <sup>6</sup> Shall I ha' some <sup>140</sup> sack and cheese at thy chamber? Good night, good mischief in incarnate devil; good night,
 Mendoza; ah, ye inhuman villain, good night!

night, fub. <sup>7</sup> <sup>144</sup>

Men. Good night: to-morrow morn? Exit.

Mal. Ay, I will come, friendly damnation, I will come. I do desery cross-points; honesty and courtship straddle as far asunder as a true Frenchman's legs.

Fer. O! <sup>150</sup>

Mal. Proclamations! more proclamations!

Fer. O! a surgeon!

Mal. Hark! lust cries for a surgeon. What news from Limbo? How does the grand cuckold, Lucifer? 155

Fer. O, help, help! conceal and save me.
FERNEZE stirs, and MALEVOLE helps him up and conveys him away.

Mal. Thy shame more than thy wounds do grieve me far:

Thy wounds but leave upon thy flesh some scar;
 But fame ne'er heals, still rankles worse and worse;

Such is of uncontrolled lust the curse. 160
 Think what it is in lawless sheets to lie;
 But, O, Ferneze, what in lust to die!
 Then thou that shame respect'st, O, fly converse

With women's eyes and lisp'ing wantonness! 164
 Stick candles 'gainst a virgin wall's white back,
 If they not burn, yet at the least they'll black.
 Come, I'll convey thee to a private port,
 Where thou shalt live (O happy man!) from court.

The beauty of the day begins to rise,
 From whose bright form night's heavy shadow flies. 170

Now 'gin close plots to work; the scene grows full,
 And craves his eyes who hath a solid skull.

Exeunt.

ACT III

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter PIETRO, MENDOZA, EQUATO, and BILIOSO.

Pietro. 'Tis grown to youth of day: how shall we waste this light?

My heart's more heavy than a tyrant's crown.
 Shall we go hunt? Prepare for field.

Exit EQUATO.

Men. Would ye could be merry!

Pietro. Would God I could! Mendoza, bid 'em haste. Exit MENDOZA.

I would fain shift place; O vain relief!

Sad souls may well change place, but not change grief:

As deer, being struck, fly thorough many soils,<sup>2</sup>
 Yet still the shaft sticks fast, so —

Bil. A good old simile, my honest lord. 10

Pietro. I am not much unlike to some sick man

That long desired hurtful drink; at last
 Swills in and drinks his last, ending at once
 Both life and thirst. O, would I ne'er had known

My own dishonour! Good God, that men should desire 15

To search out that, which, being found, kills all
 Their joy of life! to taste the tree of knowledge,
 And then be driven from out paradise! —
 Canst give me some comfort?

Bil. My lord, I have some books which [20 have been dedicated to my honour, and I ne'er read 'em, and yet they had very fine names,

Physic for Fortune, Lozenges of Sanctified Sincerity; very pretty works of curates, scribes, and schoolmasters. Marry, I remember one [25
Seneca, Lucius Annaeus Seneca —

Pietro. Out upon him! he writ of temperance and fortitude, yet lived like a voluptuous epicure, and died like an effeminate coward. —
 Haste thee to Florence: 30

Here, take our letters; see 'em seal'd; away!
 Report in private to the honour'd duke
 His daughter's fore'd disgrace; tell him at length

We know too much: due compliments<sup>3</sup> advance:

There's naught that's safe and sweet but ignorance. Exit. 35

Bil. Madam, I am going ambassador for Florence; 't will be great charges to me.

Bian. No matter, my lord, you have the lease of two manors come out next Christmas; you may lay your tenants on the greater rack [40 for it; and when you come home again, I'll teach you how you shall get two hundred pounds a-year by your teeth.

Bil. How, madam?

Bian. Cut off so much from house-keep- [45
 ing: that which is saved by the teeth, you know, is got by the teeth.

Bil. 'Fore God, and so I may; I am in wondrous credit, lady.

Bian. See the use of flattery: I did ever [50 counsel you to flatter greatness, and you have profited well: any man that will do so shall be sure to be like your Scotch barnacle,<sup>5</sup> now a block, instantly a worm, and presently a great goose: this it is to rot and putrefy in the bosom of greatness. 55

Bil. Thou art ever my politician. O, how happy is that old lord that hath a politician to his young lady! I'll have fifty gentlemen shall attend upon me: marry, the most of them [60 shall be farmer's sons, because they shall bear their own charges; and they shall go apparelled thus, — in sea-water-green suits, ash-colour cloaks, watchet stockings, and popinjay-green feathers: will not the colours do excellent? 65

Bian. Out upon 't! they'll look like citizens riding to their friends at Whitsuntide; their apparel just so many several parishes.

Bil. I'll have it so; and Passarello, my fool, shall go along with me; marry, he shall be in velvet. 71

Bian. A fool in velvet!

Bil. Ay, 'tis common for your fool to wear satin; I'll have mine in velvet.

Bian. What will you wear, then, my lord? 75

Bil. Velvet too; marry, it shall be embroidered, because I'll differ from the fool somewhat. I am horribly troubled with the gout: nothing grieves me, but that my doctor hath forbidden me wine, and you know your ambassador [80

<sup>4</sup> Q<sub>3</sub> omits ll. 36-176.

must drink. Didst thou ask thy doctor what was good for the gout?

Bian. Yes; he said, ease, wine, and women, were good for it.

Bil. Nay, thou hast such a wit! What was good to cure it, said he? <sup>66</sup>

Bian. Why, the rack. All your empirics could never do the like cure upon the gout the rack did in England, or your Scotch boot.<sup>1</sup> The French harlequin will instruct you. <sup>69</sup>

Bil. Surely, I do wonder how thou, having for the most part of thy lifetime been a country body, shouldst have so good a wit.

Bian. Who, I? why, I have been a courtier thrice two months. <sup>95</sup>

Bil. So have I this twenty year, and yet there was a gentleman-usher called me coxcomb t' other day, and to my face too: was 't not a backbiting rascal? I would I were better travelled, that I might have been better acquainted with the fashions of several countrymen: [101 but my secretary, I think, he hath sufficiently instructed me.

Bian. How, my lord?

Bil. "Marry, my good lord," quoth he, [105 "your lordship shall ever find amongst a hundred Frenchmen forty hot-shots; amongst a hundred Spaniards, three-score braggarts; amongst a hundred Dutchmen, four-score drunkards; amongst an hundred Englishmen, four-score [110 and ten madmen; and amongst an hundred Welshmen"] —

Bian. What, my lord?

Bil. "Four-score and nineteen gentlemen." <sup>2</sup>
Bian. But since you go about a sad embassy, I would have you go in black, my lord. <sup>114</sup>

Bil. Why, dost think I cannot mourn, unless I wear my hat in cypress,<sup>3</sup> like an alderman's heir? That's vile, very old, in faith. <sup>119</sup>

Bian. I'll learn of you shortly: O, we should have a fine gallant of you, should not I instruct you! How will you bear yourself when you come into the Duke of Florence's court?

Bil. Proud enough, and 't will do well enough. As I walk up and down the chamber, I'll [125 spit frowns about me, have a strong perfume in my jerkin, let my beard grow to make me look terrible, salute no man beneath the fourth button; and 't will do excellent.

Bian. But there is a very beautiful lady [130 there; how will you entertain her?

Bil. I'll tell you that, when the lady hath entertained me: but to satisfy thee, here comes the fool.

Enter PASSARELLO.

Fool, thou shalt stand for the fair lady. <sup>135</sup>

Pass. Your fool will stand for your lady most willingly and most uprightly.

Bil. I'll salute her in Latin.

Pass. O, your fool can understand no Latin.

Bil. Ay, but your lady can. <sup>140</sup>

Pass. Why, then, if your lady take down your fool, your fool will stand no longer for your lady.

Bil. A pestilent fool! 'fore God, I think the world be turned upside down too. <sup>145</sup>

Pass. O, no, sir; for then your lady and all the ladies in the palace should go with their heels upward, and that were a strange sight, you know. <sup>149</sup>

Bil. There be many will repine at my preferment.

Pass. O, ay, like the envy of an elder sister, that hath her younger made a lady before her.

Bil. The duke is wondrous discontented.

Pass. Ay, and more melancholic than a [155 usurer having all his money out at the death of a prince.

Bil. Didst thou see Madam Floria to-day?

Pass. Yes, I found her repairing her face to-day; the red upon the white showed as if [160 her cheeks should have been served in for two dishes of barberries in stewed broth, and the flesh to them a woodcock.

Bil. A bitter fool! ' Come, madam, this night thou shalt enjoy me freely, and tomorrow [165 for Florence.

Pass. What a natural fool is he that would be a pair of bodies<sup>6</sup> to a woman's petticoat, to be trussed and pointed to them! Well, I'll dog my lord; and the word is proper: for when I [170 fawn upon him, he feeds me; when I snap him by the fingers, he spits in my mouth. If a dog's death were not strangling, I had rather be one than a serving-man; for the corruption of coin is either the generation of a usurer or a lousy [175 beggar. Exeunt BIANCA and PASSARELLO.]

SCENE II.<sup>6</sup>

Enter MALEVOLE in some frieze gown, whilst BILIOSO reads his patent.

Mal. I cannot sleep; my eyes' ill-neighbouring lids
Will hold no fellowship. O thou pale sober night,

Thou that in sluggish fumes all sense dost steep;

Thou that giv'st all the world full leave to play,

Unbend'st the feebled veins of sweaty labour!

The galley-slave, that all the toilsome day <sup>6</sup>
Tugs at his oar against the stubborn wave,

Straining his rugged veins, snores fast;
The stooping scythe-man, that doth barb<sup>7</sup> the field,

Thou mak'st wink sure: in night all creatures sleep; <sup>10</sup>

Only the discontent, that 'gainst his fate
Repines and quarrels, — alas he's Goodman tell-clock!

His sallow jaw-bones sink with wasting moan;
Whilst others' beds are down, his pillow's

stone.
Bil. Malevole! <sup>15</sup>
Mal. Elder of Israel, thou honest defect of

wicked nature and obstinate ignorance, when did thy wife let thee lie with her?

Bil. I am going ambassador to Florence.

Mal. Ambassador! Now, for thy country's [20 honour, prithee, do not put up mutton and porridge i' thy cloak-bag. Thy young lady wife goes to Florence with thee too, does she not?

Bil. No, I leave her at the palace. 24

Mal. At the palace! Now, discretion shield, man! For God's love, let's ha' no more cuckolds! Hymen begins to put off his saffron robe: 1 keep thy wife i' the state of grace. Heart o' truth, I would sooner leave my lady singled in a bordello than in the Genoa palace: 30

Sin there appearing in her sluttish shape, Would soon grow loathsome, even to blushes' sense;

Surfeit would choke 2 intemperate appetite, Make the soul scent the rotten breath of lust. When in an Italian lascivious palace, 35

A lady guardianless, Left to the push of all allurement, The strongest incitements to immodesty, To have her bound, incens'd with wanton sweets,

Her veins fill'd high with heating delicates, 40 Soft rest, sweet music, amorous masquerers, Lascivious banquets, sin itself gilt o'er, Strong fantasy tripping up strange delights,

Presenting it dress'd pleasingly to sense, Sense leading it unto the soul, confirm'd 45 With potent examples, impudent custom, Entic'd by that great bawd, Opportunity;

Thus being prepar'd, clap for her easy ear Youth in good clothes, well-shap'd, rich, Fair-spoken, promising, noble, ardent, blood- 50 full,

Witty, flattering, — Ulysses absent, O Ithaca, can chastest Penelope hold out?

Bil. Mass, I'll think on't. Farewell.

Mal. Farewell. Take thy wife with thee. Farewell. Exit BILIOSO. To Florence; um! it may prove good, it may! And we may once unmask our brows. 56

SCENE III.<sup>3</sup>

Enter COUNT CELSO.

Celso. My honour'd lord—

Mal. Celso, peace! how is't? Speak low: pale fears Suspect that hedges, walls, and trees, have ears:

Speak, how runs all? Celso. I' faith, my lord, that beast with many heads, 5

The staggering multitude, recoils apace: Though thorough great men's envy, most men's malice,

Their much-intemperate heat hath banish'd you,

Yet now they find envy and malice ne'er Produce faint reformation. 10

The duke, the too soft duke, lies as a block,

For which two tugging factions seem to saw; But still the iron through the ribs they draw.

Mal. I tell thee, Celso, I have ever found Thy breast most far from shifting cowardice 15 And fearful baseness: therefore I'll tell thee, Celso,

I find the wind begins to come about; I'll shift my suit of fortune.

I know the Florentine, whose only force,<sup>4</sup> By marrying his proud daughter to this prince, 20

Both banish'd me and made this weak lord duke,

Will now forsake them all; be sure he will. I'll lie in ambush for conveniency, Upon their severance to confirm myself.

Celso. Is Ferneze interr'd? 25

Mal. Of that at leisure: he lives. Celso. But how stands Mendoza? How is't with him?

Mal. Faith, like a pair of snuffers, snibs filth in other men, and retains it in himself. 30

Celso. He does fly from public notice, methinks, as a hare does from hounds; the feet whereon he flies betray him.

Mal. I can track him, Celso. O, my disguise fools him most powerfully! 35

For that I seem a desperate malcontent, He fain would clasp with me: he's the true slave

That will put on the most affected grace For some vile second cause.

Enter MENDOZA.

Celso. He's here. 40

Mal. Give place. Exit CELSO. Illo, ho, ho, ho! art there. old truepenny? Where hast thou spent thyself this morning?

I see flattery in thine eyes, and damnation in thy soul. Ha, ye huge rascal! 45

Men. Thou art very merry. Mal. As a scholar, futuens gratis. How does the devil go with thee now?

Men. Malevole, thou art an arrant knave. Mal. Who, I? I have been a sergeant, [60 man.

Men. Thou art very poor. Mal. As Job, an alchymist, or a poet. Men. The duke hates thee.

Mal. As Irishmen do bum-cracks. 65 Men. Thou hast lost his amity. Mal. As pleasing as maids lose their virginity.

Men. Would thou wert of a lusty spirit! Would thou wert noble! 60

Mal. Why, sure my blood gives me I am noble, sure I am of noble kind; for I find myself possessed with all their qualities;—love dogs, dice, and drabs, scorn wit in stuff-clothes; have beat my shoemaker, knocked my seam- [65 stress, cuckold[ed] my 'pothecary, and undone my tailor. Noble! why not? since the stoic<sup>5</sup> said, Neminem servum non ex regibus, neminem regem non ex servis esse oriundum; only busy Fortune touses, and the provident Chances [70 blend them together. I'll give you a simile: did you e'er see a well with two buckets, whilst one comes up full to be emptied, another goes down empty to be filled? Such is the state of all humanity. Why, look you, I may <sup>76</sup> be the son of some duke; for, believe me, intemperate lascivious bastardy makes nobility doubtful: I have a lusty daring heart, Mendoza. <sup>70</sup>

Men. Let's grasp; I do like thee infinitely. Wilt enact one thing for me?

Mal. Shall I get by it? (MEN. gives him his purse.) Command me; I am thy slave, beyond death and hell.

Men. Murder the duke. <sup>86</sup>

Mal. My heart's wish, my soul's desire, my fantasy's dream, my blood's longing, the only height of my hopes! How, O God, how! O, how my united spirits throng together, to strengthen my resolve! <sup>90</sup>

Men. The duke is now a-hunting.

Mal. Excellent, admirable, as the devil would have it! Lend me, lend me, rapier, pistol, cross-bow: so, so, I'll do it.

Men. Then we agree. <sup>95</sup>

Mal. As Lent and fishmongers. Come, a-cap-a-pe, how? Inform.

Men. Know that this weak-brain'd duke, who only stands On Florence' stilts, hath out of witless zeal

Made me his heir, and secretly confirm'd <sup>100</sup> The wreath to me after his life's full point.

Mal. Upon what merit?

Men. Merit! by heaven, I horn him. Only Ferneze's death gave me state's life.

Tut, we are politic, he must not live now. <sup>104</sup> Mal. No reason, marry: but how must he die now?

Men. My utmost project is to murder the duke, that I might have his state, because he makes me his heir; to banish the duchess, that I might be rid of a cunning Lacedaemonian, because I know Florence will forsake her; and then to marry Maria, the banished Duke Altfront's wife, that her friends might strengthen me and my faction: that is all, la. <sup>115</sup>

Mal. Do you love Maria?

Men. Faith, no great affection, but as wise men do love great women, to ennoble their blood and augment revenue. To accomplish this now, thus now. The duke is in the forest, next the sea: <sup>120</sup> single him, kill him, hurl him i' the main, and proclaim thou sawest wolves eat him.

Mal. Um! Not so good. Methinks when he is slain, To get some hypocrite, some dangerous wretch

That's muffled o'er with feigned holiness, <sup>125</sup> To swear he heard the duke on some steep cliff Lament his wife's dishonour, and, in an agony Of his heart's torture, hurl'd his groaning sides Into the swollen sea, — this circumstance Well made sounds probable: and hereupon <sup>130</sup> The duchess —

Men. May well be banish'd:

O unpeerable invention! rare!

Thou god of policy! it honeys me.

Mal. Then fear not for the wife of Altfront;

I'll close to her. <sup>135</sup>

Men. Thou shalt, thou shalt. Our excellency is pleas'd:

Why wert not thou an emperor? When we Are duke, I'll make thee some great man, sure.

Mal. Nay. Make me some rich knave, and I'll make myself

Some great man.

Men. In thee be all my spirit: <sup>140</sup>

Retain ten souls, unite thy virtual powers; Resolve; ha, remember greatness! Heart, farewell;

The fate of all my hopes in thee doth dwell. <sup>[Exit.]</sup>

Re-enter CELSO.

Mal. Celso, didst hear? — O heaven, didst hear

Such devilish mischief? Suffer'st thou the world <sup>145</sup>

Carouse damnation even with greedy swallow, And still dost wink, still does thy vengeance slumber?

If now thy brows are clear, when will they thunder? <sup>Exit.</sup>

SCENE IV.<sup>1</sup>

Enter PIETRO, FERRARDO, PREPASSO, and Three Pages.

Fer. The dogs are at a fault.

Pietro. Would God nothing but the dogs were at it! Let the deer pursue safety,<sup>2</sup> the dogs follow the game, and do you follow the dogs: as for me, 'tis unfit one beast should hunt another; I ha' one chasest me: an't please you, I would be rid of ye a little.

Fer. Would your grief would, as soon as we, leave you to quietness!

Pietro. I thank you. <sup>10</sup>

1 Page. Of a dry summer, my lord; for here's a hot world towards: but, my lord, I had a strange dream last night.

Pietro. What strange dream? <sup>15</sup>

1 Page. Why, methought I pleased you with singing, and then I dreamt that you gave me that short sword.

Pietro. Prettily begged: hold thee, I'll prove thy dream true; take 't. <sup>[Giving sword.]</sup> <sup>20</sup>

1 Page. My duty: but still I dreamt on, my lord; and methought, an't shall please your excellency, you would needs out of your royal bounty give me that jewel in your hat.

Pietro. O, thou didst but dream, boy; do <sup>25</sup> not believe it: dreams prove not always true; they may hold in a short sword, but not in a jewel. But now, sir, you dreamt you had pleased me with singing; make that true, as I ha' made the other. <sup>30</sup>

1 Page. Faith, my lord, I did but dream, and dreams, you say, prove not always true; they may hold in a good sword, but not in a good song. The truth is, I ha' lost my voice.

Pietro. Lost thy voice! How? <sup>35</sup>

1 Page. With dreaming, faith: but here's a couple of sirenical rascals shall enchant ye. What shall they sing, my good lord?

Pietro. Sing of the nature of women: and then the song shall be surely full of variety, <sup>40</sup> old crotchets, and most sweet closes; it shall be humorous, grave, fantastic, amorous, melancholy, sprightly, one in all, and all in one.

1 Page. All in one!

Pietro. By'r lady, too many. Sing: my <sup>45</sup> speech grows culpable of unthrifty idleness: <sup>1</sup> sing.

Song [by 2 and 3 Pages].

SCENE V.<sup>2</sup>

[To Pietro] Enter MALEVOLE, with cross-bow and pistol.

Pietro. Ah, so, so, sing. I am heavy: walk off; I shall talk in my sleep: walk off.

Exeunt Pages.

Mal. Brief, brief: who? The Duke! Good heaven, that fools

Should stumble upon greatness! — Do not sleep, duke; <sup>6</sup>

Give ye good-morrow. I<sup>3</sup> must be brief, duke; I am fe<sup>d</sup> to murder thee: — start not: — Mendoza, Mendoza hir'd me; here's his gold, his pistol, Cross-bow, [and] sword: 't is all as firm as earth. O fool, fool, choked with the common maze Of easy idiots, credulity! <sup>10</sup>

Make him thine heir! What, thy sworn murderer!

Pietro. O, can it be?

Mal. Can!

Pietro. Discover'd he not Ferneze?

Mal. Yes, but why? but why? For love to thee? <sup>15</sup>

Much, much! To be reveng'd upon his rival, Who had thrust his jaws awry;

Who being slain, suppos'd by thine own hands, Defended by his sword, made thee most loath-

some, Him most gracious with thy loose princess: <sup>20</sup> Thou, closely <sup>4</sup> yielding egress and regress to her, Madest him heir; whose hot unquiet lust

Straight tous'd thy sheets, and now would seize thy state.

Politician! Wise man! Death! to be Led to the stake like a bull by the horns; <sup>25</sup>

To make even kindness cut a gentle throat! Life, why art thou numb'd? Thou foggy dul-

ness, speak: Lives not more faith in a home-thrusting tongue

Than in those fencing tip-tap courtiers?

Enter CELSO, with a hermit's gown and beard.

[Pietro.] <sup>5</sup> Lord Malevole, if this be true —

Mal. If! Come, shad thee with this disguise. If! Thou shalt handle it; he shall thank thee for killing thyself. Come, follow my directions, and thou shalt see strange sleights.

Pietro. World, whither wilt thou? <sup>30</sup>

Mal. Why, to the devil. Come, the morn grows late:

A steady quickness is the soul of state.

Exeunt.

ACT IV

SCENE I.<sup>6</sup>

Enter MAQUERELLE, knocking at the ladies' door.

Mag. Madam, medam, are you stirring, medam? If you be stirring, medam, — if I thought I should disturb ye —

[Enter Page.]

Page. My lady is up, forsooth.

Mag. A pretty boy, faith: how old art thou?

Page. I think fourteen. <sup>6</sup>

Mag. Nay, an ye be in the teens — are ye a gentleman born? Do you know me? My name is Madam Maquerelle; I lie in the old Cunny-court. <sup>10</sup>

Enter BIANCA and EMILIA.

Bian. A fair day to ye, Maquerelle.

Emil. Is the duchess up yet, sentinel?

Mag. O ladies, the most abominable mischance! O dear ladies the most piteous dis- <sup>15</sup> aster! Ferneze was taken last night in the duchess' chamber. Alas, the duke catcht him and kill'd him!

Bian. Was he found in bed?

Mag. O, no; but the villanous certainty is, <sup>20</sup> the door was not bolted, the tongue-tied hatch held his peace: so the naked troth is, he was found in his shirt, whilst I, like an arrant beast, lay in the outward chamber, heard nothing; and yet they came by me in the dark, and <sup>25</sup> yet I felt them not, like a senseless creature as I was. O beauties, look to your busk-points; <sup>7</sup> if not chastely, yet charily: be sure the door be bolted. — Is your lord gone to Florence?

Bian. Yes, Maquerelle. <sup>30</sup>

Mag. I hope you'll find the discretion to purchase a fresh gown fore his return. — Now, by my troth, beauties, I would ha' ye once wise. He loves ye; pish! He is witty; bubble! Fair-proportioned; mew! Nobly-born; wind! Let <sup>35</sup> this be still your fixed position: esteem me every man according to his good gifts, and so ye shall ever remain most worthy to be most dear ladies.

Emil. Is the duke returned from hunting yet? 40

Mag. They say not yet.

Bian. 'Tis now in midst of day.

Emil. How bears the duchess with this blemish now?

Mag. Faith, holdly; strongly defies defame, as one that has a duke to her father. And [45 there 's a note to you: be sure of a stout friend in a corner, that may always awe your husband. Mark the behaviour of the duchess now: she dares defame; cries, "Duke, do what thou canst, I'll quit mine honour:" nay, as one [50 confirmed in her own virtue against ten thousand mouths that mutter her disgrace, she's presently for dances.

Enter FERRARDO.

Bian. For dances!

Mag. Most true. 55

Emil. Most strange. See, here 's my servant,<sup>1</sup> young Ferrardo. How many servants thinkst thou I have, Maquerelle?<sup>2</sup>

Mag. The more, the merrier. 'Twas well [50 said, use your servants as you do your smocks; have many, use one, and change often; for that's most sweet and courtlike.

Fer. Save ye, fair ladies! Is the duke returned?

Bian. Sweet sir, no voice of him as yet in court.

Fer. 'Tis very strange. 65

Bian. And how like you my servant, Maquerelle?

Mag. I think he could hardly draw Ulysses' bow; but, by my fidelity, were his nose narrower, his eyes' broader, his hands thinner, [60 his lips thicker, his legs bigger, his feet lesser, his hair blacker, and his teeth whiter, he were a tolerable sweet youth, y' faith. And he will come to my chamber, I will read him the fortune of his beard. Cornets sound. 75

Fer. Not yet return'd! I fear—but the duchess approacheth.

SCENE II.<sup>3</sup>

Enter MENDOZA supporting the Duchess and GUERRINO: the ladies that are on the stage rise: FERRARDO ushers in the Duchess, and then takes a lady to tread a measure.<sup>4</sup>

Aur. We will dance: music!—we will dance.

Guer. Les quanto,<sup>5</sup> lady, Pensez bien, Passa regis, or Bianca's brawl?

Aur. We have forgot the brawl.

Fer. So soon? 'Tis wonder. 5

Guer. Why, 'tis but two singles on the left, two on the right, three doubles forward, a traverse of six round: do this twice, three singles side, galliard trick-of-twenty, coranto-pace; a

figure of eight, three singles broken down, [10 come up, meet, two doubles, fall back, and then honour.

Aur. O Daedalus, thy maze! I have quite forgot it.

Mag. Trust me, so have I, saving the falling-back, and then honour. 16

Enter PREPASSO.

Aur. Music, music!

Prep. Who saw the duke? the duke?

Enter EQUATO.

Aur. Music!

Equato. The duke? is the duke returned? 20

Aur. Music!

Enter CELSO.

Celso. The duke is either quite invisible, or else is not.

Aur. We are not pleased with your intrusion upon our private retirement; we are not [25 pleased: you have forgot yourselves.

Celso. Boy, thy master? Where 's the duke?

Page. Alas, I left him burying the earth with his spread joyless limbs: he told me he was heavy, would sleep; bade me walk off, [30 for that the strength of fantasy oft made him talk in his dreams. I straight obeyed, nor ever saw him since: but whereso'er he is, he 's sad.

Aur. Music, sound high, as is our heart! Sound high! 35

SCENE III.<sup>6</sup>

[To them] enter MALEVOLE, and PIETRO disguised like an hermit.

Mal. The duke,—peace!—the duke is dead.

Aur. Music!

Mal. Is 't music?

Men. Give proof.

Fer. How?

Celso. Where?

Prep. When?

Mal. Rest in peace, as the duke does: quietly sit: for my own part, I beheld him but dead; that 's all. Marry, here 's one can give you a [30 more particular account of him.

Men. Speak, holy father, nor let any brow Within this presence fright thee from the truth:

Speak confidently and freely.

Aur.

We attend.

Pietro. Now had the mounting sun's all-ripening wings [35 Swept the cold sweat of night from earth's dank breast,

When I, whom men call Hermit of the Rock, Forsook my cell, and clambered up a cliff, Against whose base the heady Neptune dash'd His high-curl'd brows; there 't was I eas'd my limbs: 40

When, lo! my entrails melted with the moan

<sup>6</sup> The same, continued.

Some one, who far 'bove me was climb'd, did make —
I shall offend.

Men. Not.

Aur. On.

Pietro. Methinks I hear him yet: — "O female faith!

Go sow the ingrateful sand, and love a woman!
And do I live to be the scoff of men?

To be their wittol-cuckold, even to hug

My poison? Thou knowest, O truth!

Sooner hard steel will melt with southern wind,

A seaman's whistle calm the ocean,

A town on fire be extinct with tears,

Than women, yow'd to blushless impudence,

With sweet behaviour and soft minioning

Will turn from that where appetite is fix'd.

O powerful blood! how thou dost slave their

soul!

I wash'd an Ethiop, who, for recompense,

Sullied my name: and must I, then, be fore'd

To walk, to live thus black? Must! must! fie!

He that can bear with 'must,' he cannot die."

With that he sigh'd so passionately deep,

That the dull air even groan'd: at last he cries,

"Sink shame in seas, sink deep enough!" so

dies;

For then I viewed his body fall, and souse

Into the foamy main. O, then I saw,

That which methinks I see, it was the duke;

Whom straight the nicer-stomach'd sea belch'd up:

But then —

Mal. Then came I in; but, 'las, all was too late!

For even straight he sunk.

Pietro. Such was the duke's sad fate.

Celso. A better fortune to our Duke Mendoza!

Omnes. Mendoza! Cornets flourish.

Men. A guard, a guard!

Enter a Guard.

We, full of hearty tears,

For our good father's loss,

(For so we well may call him

Who did beseech your loves for our succession),

Cannot so lightly over-jump his death

As leave his woes revengeless. — (To AURELIA.)

Woman of shame,

We banish thee for ever to the place

From whence this good man comes; nor permit,

On death, unto thy body any ornament;

But, base as was thy life, depart away.

Aur. Ungrateful!

Men. Away!

Aur. Villain, hear me!

PREPASSO and GUERRINO lead away AURELIA.

Men. Begone! My lords,

Address to<sup>1</sup> public council; 't is most fit:

The train of fortune is borne up by wit.

Away! our presence shall be sudden; haste.

All depart saving MENDOZA, MALEVOLE, and PIETRO.

Mal. Now, you egregious devil! Ha, ye mur-

<sup>1</sup> Prepare for.

dering politician! How dost, duke? How dost look now? Brave duke, i' faith.

Men. How did you kill him?

Mal. Slatted his brains out, then soused him in the briny sea.

Men. Brained him, and drowned him too?

Mal. O 't was best, sure work; for he that strikes a great man, let him strike home, or else 'ware, he 'll prove no man. Shoulder not a huge fellow, unless you may be sure to lay him in the kennel.

Men. A most sound brain-pan! I 'll make you both emperors.

Mal. Make us Christians, make us Christians.

Men. I 'll hoist ye, ye shall mount.

Mal. To the gallows, say ye? Come: prae- mium incertum petit, certum scelus.<sup>2</sup> How stands the progress?

Men. Here, take my ring unto the citadel;

[Giving ring.]

Have entrance to Maria, the grave duchess

Of banish'd Altfront. Tell her we love her;

Omit no circumstance to grace our person: do 't.

Mal. I 'll make an excellent pander: duke, farewell; 'dieu, adieu, duke.

Men. Take Maquerelle with thee; for 't is found

None cuts a diamond but a diamond.

Exit MALEVOLE.

Hermit,

Thou art a man for me, my confessor:

O thou selected spirit, born for my good,

Sure thou wouldst make

An excellent elder in a deform'd church.

Come, we must be inward,<sup>3</sup> thou and I all one.

Pietro. I am glad I was ordained for ye.

Men. Go to, then; thou must know that Mal-evole is a strange villain; dangerous, very dangerous: you see how broad 'a speaks; a gross-jawed rogue: I would have thee poison him: he 's like a corn upon my great toe, I cannot go for him; he must be cored out, he must.

Wilt do 't, ha?

Pietro. Anything, anything.

Men. Heart of my life! thus, then. To the citadel;

Thou shalt consort with this Malevole;

There being at supper, poison him. It shall be laid

Upon Maria, who yields love or dies.

Seud quick.

Pietro. Like lightning: good deeds crawl,

but mischief flies. Exit.

Re-enter MALEVOLE.

Mal. Your devilship's ring has no virtue:
the buff-captain, the sallow Westphalian gammon-faced zaza cries, "Stand out!" must have a stiffer warrant, or no pass into the castle of comfort.

Men. Command our sudden letter. — Not enter! sha't; what place is there in Genoa but thou shalt? Into my heart, into my very heart:

come, let 's love: we must love, we two, soul and body.

<sup>3</sup> Intimate.

Mal. How didst like the hermit? A strange hermit, sirrah.

Men. A dangerous fellow, very perilous. He must die. 131

Mal. Ay, he must die.

Men. Thou 'st kill him. We are wise; we must be wise.

Mal. And provident. 135

Men. Yea, provident; beware an hypocrite; A churchman once corrupted, O, avoid!

A fellow that makes religion his stalking-horse.<sup>1</sup> He breeds a plague. Thou shalt poison him.

Mal. O, 't is wondrous necessary: how? 140

Men. You both go jointly to the citadel; There sup, there poison him: and Maria, Because she is our opposite,<sup>2</sup> shall bear

The sad suspect; on which she dies or loves us. Mal. I run. Exit.

Men. We that are great, our sole self-good still moves us. 146

They shall die both, for their deserts crave more Than we can recompense: their presence still

Imbraids<sup>3</sup> our fortunes with beholdingness, Which we abhor; like deed, not doer: then conclude, 150

They live not to cry out "Ingratitude!" One stick burns t' other, steel cuts steel alone:

'T is good trust few; but, O, 't is best trust none! Exit.

SCENE IV.<sup>4</sup>

Enter MALEVOLE and PIETRO, still disguised, at several doors.

Mal. How do you? How dost duke?

Pietro. O, let

The last day fall! drop, drop on our curs'd heads!

Let heaven unclasp itself, vomit forth flames. Mal. O, do not rave, do not turn player; [5 there 's more of them than can well live one by another already. What, art an infidel still?

Pietro. I am amazed, struck in a swoon with wonder: I am commanded to poison thee —

Mal. I am commanded to poison thee at [10 supper —

Pietro. At supper —

Mal. In the citadel —

Pietro. In the citadel.

Mal. Cross capers! tricks! Truth o' [15 heaven! he would discharge us as boys do eldern guns, one pellet to strike out another. Of what faith art now?

Pietro. All is damnation; wickedness extreme:

There is no faith in man. 20

Mal. In none but usurers and brokers; they deceive no man: men take 'em for blood-suckers, and so they are. Now, God deliver me from my friends!

Pietro. Thy friends! 25

Mal. Yes, from my friends; for from mine enemies I'll deliver myself. O, cut-throat friendship is the rankest villainy! Mark this

Mendoza; mark him for a villain: but heaven will send a plague upon him for a rogue. 30

Pietro. O world!

Mal. World! 't is the only region of death, the greatest shop of the devil; the cruelest prison of men, out of the which none pass without paying their dearest breath for a fee; [35 there 's nothing perfect in it but extreme, extreme calamity, such as comes yonder.

SCENE V.<sup>5</sup>

Enter AURELIA, two halberts before and two after, supported by CELSO and FERRARDO; AURELIA in base mourning attire.

Aur. To banishment! led on to banishment!

Pietro. Lady, the blessedness of repentance to you!

Aur. Why, why, I can desire nothing but death, 5

Nor deserve anything but hell. If heaven should give sufficiency of grace

To clear my soul, it would make heaven graceless:

My sins would make the stock of mercy poor; O, they would tire heaven's goodness to reclaim them!

Judgment is just, yet from that vast villain, 10 But, sure, he shall not miss sad punishment 'Fore he shall rule. — On to my cell of shame!

Pietro. My cell 't is, lady; where, instead of masks,

Music, tilts, tourneys, and such court-like shows,

The hollow murmur of the checkless winds 15 Shall groan again; whilst the unquiet sea Shakes the whole rock with foamy battery.

There usherless the air comes in and out: The rheumy vault will force your eyes to weep,

Whilst you behold true desolation. 20 A rocky barrenness shall pain your eyes, Where all at once one reaches where he stands, With brows the roof, both walls with both his hands.

Aur. It is too good. — Bless'd spirit of my lord,

O, in what orb so'er thy soul is thron'd, 25 Behold me worthily most miserable! O, let the anguish of my contrite spirit Entreat some reconciliation!

If not, O, joy, triumph in my just grief! Death is the end of woes and tears' relief. 30

Pietro. Belike your lord not lov'd you, was unkind.

Aur. O heaven!

As the soul loves<sup>6</sup> the body, so lov'd he: 'T was death to him to part my presence, heaven

To see me pleas'd. 35 Yet I, like a wretch given o'er to hell, Brake all the sacred rites of marriage, To clip<sup>7</sup> a base ungentle faithless villain;

O God! a very pagan reprobate — What should I say? ungrateful, throws me out, 40

For whom I lost soul, body, fame, and honour.
But 'tis most fit; why should a better fate
Attend on any who forsake chaste sheets;
Fly the embrace of a devoted heart,
Join'd by a solemn vow 'fore God and man, 45
To taste the brackish<sup>1</sup> flood<sup>2</sup> of beastly lust
In an adulterous touch? O ravenous immodesty!
Insatiate impudence of appetite!
Look, here's your end; for mark, what sap in dust,

What good in sin,<sup>3</sup> even so much love in lust. 50
Joy to thy ghost, sweet lord! pardon to me!
Celso. 'Tis the duke's pleasure this night you rest in court.

Aur. Soul, lurk in shades; run, shame, from brightsome skies;
In night the blind man misses not his eyes. 55
Exit [with CELSO, FERRARDO, and halberts].

Mal. Do not weep, kind cuckold: take comfort, man; thy betters have been beccos:<sup>4</sup>
Agamemnon, emperor of all the merry Greeks, that tickled all the true Trojans, was a cornuto;
Prince Arthur, that cut off twelve kings' 60 beards, was a cornuto; Hercules, whose back bore up heaven, and got forty wenches with child in one night, —

Pietro. Nay, 't was fifty.

Mal. Faith, forty's enow, o' conscience, — 65 yet was a cornuto. Patience; mischief grows proud: be wise.

Pietro. Thou pinchest too deep; art too keen upon me.

Mal. Tut, a pitiful surgeon makes a dan- 70
gerous sore; I'll tent<sup>5</sup> thee to the ground.
Thinkest I'll sustain myself by flattering thee, because thou art a prince? I had rather follow a drunkard, and live by licking up his vomit, than by servile flattery. 75

Pietro. Yet great men ha' done 't.

Mal. Great slaves fear better than love, born naturally for a coal-basket;<sup>6</sup> though the common usher of princes' presence, Fortune, ha' blindly given them better place. I am 80 vowed to be thy affliction.

Pietro. Prithee, be:

I love much misery, and be thou son to me.

Mal. Because you are an usurping duke. —

Enter BILIOSO.

Your lordship's well returned from Florence.

Bil. Well return'd, I praise my horse. 85

Mal. What news from the Florentines?

Bil. I will conceal the great duke's pleasure;
only this was his charge: his pleasure is, that his daughter die; Duke Pietro be banished 90 for publishing<sup>7</sup> his blood's dishonour; and that Duke Altofront be re-accepted. This is all: but I hear Duke Pietro is dead.

Mal. Ay, and Mendoza is duke: what will you do? 95

Bil. Is Mendoza strongest?

Mal. Yet he is.

Bil. Then yet I'll hold with him.

Mal. But if that Altofront should turn straight again? 100

Bil. Why, then, I would turn straight again.
'Tis good run still with him that has most might:

I had rather stand with wrong, than fall with right.

Mal. What religion will you be of now?

Bil. Of the Duke's religion, when I know what it is. 105

Mal. O Hercules!

Bil. Hercules! Hercules was the son of Jupiter and Almena.

Mal. Your lordship is a very wit-all. 110

Bil. Wittal!

Mal. Aye, all-wit.

Bil. Amphitryo was a cuckold.

Mal. Your lordship swears; your young lady will get you a cloth for your old worship's 115 brows. (Exit BILIOSO.) Here's a fellow to be damn'd: this is his inviolable maxim, — flatter the greatest and oppress the least: a whoreson flesh-fly, that still knaws upon the lean galled backs. 120

Pietro. Why dost, then, salute him?

Mal. Faith, as bawds go to church, for fashion sake. Come, be not confounded; thou'rt but in danger to lose a dukedom. Think this:
— this earth is the only grave and Golgotha 125 wherein all things that live must rot; 'tis but the draught wherein the heavenly bodies discharge their corruption; the very muck-hill on which the sublunary orbs cast their excrements: man is the slime of this dung pit, 130 and princes are the governors of these men; for,
for our souls, they are as free as emperors, all of one piece; there goes but a pair of shears betwixt an emperor and the son of a bagpiper;
only the dying, dressing, pressing, glossing, 135
makes the difference.

Now, what art thou like to lose?

A gaoler's office to keep men in bonds,
Whilst toil and treason all life's good con-
founds.

Pietro. I here renounce for ever regency: 140
O Altofront, I wrong thee to supplant thy right,
To trip thy heels up with a devilish sleight!
For which I now from throne am thrown:
world-tricks abjure;

For vengeance, though 't comes slow, yet it comes sure.

O, I am chang'd! for here, 'fore the dread
power, 145

In true contrition, I do dedicate
My breath to solitary holiness,
My lips to prayer, and my breast's care shall
be,

Restoring Altofront to regency.

Mal. Thy vows are heard, and we accept thy faith. Undisguiseth himself.

Re-enter FERNEZE and CELSO.

Banish amazement: come, we four must
stand 151

<sup>7</sup> Are cut out of the same cloth.

Full shock of fortune: be not so wonder-stricken.

Pietro. Dost Ferneze live?

Fer. For your pardon.

Pietro. Pardon and love. Give leave to recollect <sup>155</sup>

My thoughts-dispers'd in wild astonishment.

My vows stand fix'd in heaven, and from hence I crave all love and pardon.

Mal. Who doubts of providence,

That sees this change? A hearty faith to all!

He needs must rise who can no lower fall: <sup>161</sup>

For still impetuous vicissitude

Touseth the world; then let no maze intrude

Upon your spirits: wonder not I rise;

For who can sink that close can temporize? <sup>165</sup>

The time grows ripe for action: I'll detect

My privat'st plot, lest ignorance fear suspect.

Let's close to counsel, leave the rest to fate:

Mature discretion is the life of state. Exeunt.

[SCENE Ia.<sup>1</sup>

Enter BILIOSO and PASSARELLO.

Bil. Fool, how dost thou like my calf in a long stocking?

Pass. An excellent calf, my lord.

Bil. This calf hath been a reveller this twenty year. When Monsieur Gundi lay here am- <sup>15</sup> bassador, I could have carried a lady up and down at arm's end in a platter; and I can tell you, there were those at that time who, to try the strength of a man's back and his arm, would be coistered.<sup>2</sup> I have measured calves with <sup>10</sup> most of the palace, and they come nothing near me; besides, I think there be not many armours in the arsenal will fit me, especially for the headpiece. I'll tell thee —

Pass. What, my lord? <sup>15</sup>

Bil. I can eat stewed broth as it comes seething off the fire; or a custard as it comes reeking out of the oven; and I think there are not many lords can do it. A good pomander,<sup>3</sup> a little decayed in the scent; but six grains of musk, <sup>20</sup> ground with rose-water, and tempered with a little civet, shall fetch her again presently.

Pass. O, ay, as a bawd with aqua-vitae.

Bil. And, what, dost thou rail upon the ladies as thou wert wont? <sup>25</sup>

Pass. I were better roast a live cat, and might do it with more safety. I am as secret to [the] thieves as their painting. There's Maquerelle, oldest bawd and a perpetual beggar — did you never hear of her trick to be known in the <sup>30</sup> city?

Bil. Never.

to draw her picture; when they have done, she most courtly finds fault with them one after [<sup>35</sup> another, and never fetcheth them. They, in revenge of this, execute her in pictures as they do in Germany, and hang her in their shops. By this means is she better known to the stinkards<sup>4</sup> than if she had been five times carted. <sup>40</sup>

Bil. 'Fore God, an excellent policy.

Pass. Are there any revels to-night, my lord?

Bil. Yes.

Pass. Good my lord, give me leave to break a fellow's pate that hath abused me. <sup>45</sup>

Bil. Whose pate?

Pass. Young Ferrardo, my lord.

Bil. Take heed, he's very valiant; I have known him fight eight quarrels in five days, believe it. <sup>50</sup>

Pass. O, is he so great a quarreller? Why, then, he's an arrant coward.

Bil. How prove you that?

Pass. Why, thus. He that quarrels seeks to fight; and he that seeks to fight seeks to <sup>55</sup> die; and he that seeks to die seeks never to fight more; and he that will quarrel, and seeks means never to answer a man more, I think he 's a coward.

Bil. Thou canst prove anything. <sup>60</sup>

Pass. Anything but a rich knave; for I can flatter no man.

Bil. Well, be not drunk, good fool: I shall see you anon in the presence. Exeunt.]

SCENE I.<sup>5</sup>

Enter, from opposite sides, MALEVOLE and MAQUERELLE, singing.

Mal. "The Dutchman for a drunkard," —

Mag. "The Dane for golden locks," —

Mal. "The Irishman for usquebaugh," —

Mag. "The Frenchman for the ( )"<sup>6</sup> —

Mal. O, thou art a blessed creature! Had <sup>5</sup> I a modest woman to conceal, I would put her to thy custody; for no reasonable creature would ever suspect her to be in thy company. Ah, thou art a melodious Maquerelle, — thou picture of a woman, and substance of a beast!

Mag. O fool, will ye be ready anon to go <sup>10</sup> with me to the revels? The hall will be so pestered<sup>7</sup> anon.

Pass. Ay, as the country is with attorneys.

Mal. What hast thou there, fool? <sup>15</sup>

Pass. Wine; I have learned to drink since I went with my lord ambassador: I'll drink to the health of Madam Maquerelle,

Mal. Why, thou wast wont to rail upon her.

Pass. Ay; but since I borrowed money of <sup>20</sup> her, I'll drink to her health now; as gentlemen visit brokers, or as knights send venison to the city, either to take up more money, or to procure longer forbearance.

Mal. Give me the bowl. I drink a health <sup>25</sup> to Altofront, our deposed duke. [Drinks.]

Pass. I'll take it [drinks]:—so. Now I'll begin a health to Madam Maquerelle. [Drinks.]

Mal. Pooh! I will not pledge her.

Pass. Why, I pledged your lord. 30
Mal. I care not.

Pass. Not pledge Madam Maquerelle! Why, then, will I spew up your lord again with this fool's finger.

Mal. Hold; I'll take it. [Drinks.]

Mag. Now thou hast drunk my health, [30] fool, I am friends with thee.

Pass. Art? art?

When Griffon<sup>1</sup> saw the reconciled quean
Offering about his neck her arms to cast, 40
He threw off sword and heart's malignant spleen,<sup>2</sup>
And lovely her below the loins embrac'd.—

Adieu, Madam Maquerelle. [Exit.]

Mal. And how dost thou think o' this transformation of state now? 45

Mag. Verily, very well; for we women always note, the falling of the one is the rising of the other; some must be fat, some must be lean; some must be fools, and some must be lords; some must be knaves, and some must be officers; some [50] must be beggars, some must be knights; some must be cuckolds, and some must be citizens. As for example, I have two court-dogs, the most fawning curs, the one called Watch, the other Catch: now I, like Lady Fortune, sometimes love this dog, sometimes raise that [55] dog, sometimes favour Watch, most commonly fancy Catch. Now, that dog which I favour I feed; and he's so ravenous, that what I give he never chaws it, gulps it down whole, without any relish of what he has, but with a greedy [61] expectation of what he shall have. The other dog now—

Mal. No more dog, sweet Maquerelle, no more dog. And what hope hast thou of the [65] Duchess Maria? Will she stoop to the duke's lure? Will she come, thinkest?

Mag. Let me see, where's the sign now? Ha? ye e'er a calendar? Where's the sign, trow you? 70

Mal. Sign! why is there any moment in that?

Mag. O, believe me, a most secret power; look ye, a Chaldean or an Assyrian, I am sure 't was a most sweet Jew, told me, court any woman in the right sign, you shall not miss. But you must take her in the right vein [75] then; as, when the sign is in Pisces, a fishmonger's wife is very sociable; in Cancer, a precision's wife is very flexible; in Capricorn, a merchant's wife hardly holds out; in Libra, a lawyer's wife is very tractable, especially if [81] her husband be at the term; only in Scorpio 't is very dangerous meddling. Has the duke sent any jewel, any rich stones?

Enter CAPTAIN.

Mal. Ay, I think those are the best signs to [85] take a lady in. By your favour, signior, I must discourse with the Lady Maria, Altofront's duchess; I must enter for the duke.

Capt. She here shall give you interview, I [90] received the guardship of this citadel from the good Altofront, and for his use I'll keep 't, till I am of no use.

Mal. Wilt thou? O heavens, that a Christian should be found in a buff-jerkin! Captain Conscience, I love thee, captain. [Exit Captain.] 95
We attend. And what hope hast thou of this duchess' easiness?

Mag. 'T will go hard, she was a cold creature ever; she hated monkeys, fools, jesters, [95] and gentlemen-ushers extremely; she had the vile trick on 't, not only to be truly modestly honourable in her own conscience, but she would avoid the least wanton carriage that might incur suspect; as, God bless me, she had almost brought bed-pressing out of fashion; I [105] could scarce get a fine for the lease of a lady's favour once in a fortnight.

Mal. Now, in the name of immodesty, how many maidenheads has thou brought to the block? 110

Mag. Let me see: heaven forgive us our misdeeds!—Here 's the duchess.

SCENE II.<sup>3</sup>

[To them] enter MARIA with Captain.

Mal. God bless thee, lady!

Maria. Out of thy company!

Mal. We have brought thee tender of a husband.

Maria. I hope I have one already. 5

Mag. Nay, by mine honour, madam, as good ha' ne'er a husband as a banished husband; he's in another world now. I'll tell ye, lady, I have heard of a sect that maintained, when the husband was asleep the wife might law- [10] fully entertain another man, for then her husband was as dead; much more when he is banished.

Maria. Unhonest creature!

Mag. Pish, honesty is but an art to seem so: Pray ye, what 's honesty, what 's constancy, But fables feign'd, odd old fools' chat, devis'd By jealous fools to wrong our liberty? 14

Mal. Molly, he that loves thee is a duke, Mendoza; he will maintain thee royally, love [20] thee ardently, defend thee powerfully, marry thee sumptuously, and keep thee in despite of Rosicler<sup>4</sup> or Donzel del Phebo. There 's jewels: if thou wilt, so; if not, so.

Maria. Captain, for God's love, save poor wretchedness 25

From tyranny of lustful insolence!

Enforce me in the deepest dungeon dwell,

Rather than here; here round about is hell.—

O my dear'st Altofront! where'er thou breathe,

Let my soul sink into the shades beneath, 30

Before I stain thine honour! 'T is<sup>5</sup> thou has 't,

And long as I can die, I will live chaste.

Mal. 'Gainst him that can enforce how vain is strife!

Maria. She that can be enforc'd has ne'er a knife:

She that through force her limbs with lust enrolls,

Wants Cleopatra's asps and Portia's coals.

God amend you! Exit with Captain.

Mal. Now, the fear of the devil for ever go with thee! — Maquerelle, I tell thee, I have found an honest woman: faith, I perceive, when all is done, there is of women, as of all other things, some good, most bad; some saints, some sinners: for as nowadays no courtier but has his mistress, no captain but has his cock: [44] atrice, no cuckold but has his horns, and no fool but has his feather; even so, no woman but has her weakness and feather too, no sex but has his — I can hunt the letter no farther. — (Aside.) O God, how loathsome this toying is to me! That [49] a duke should be forced to fool it! Well, stultorum plena sunt omnia:<sup>1</sup> better play the fool lord than be the fool lord. — Now, where's your sleights, Madam Maquerelle?

Maq. Why, are ye ignorant that 't is said a squeamish affected niceness is natural to [55] women, and that the excuse of their yielding is only, forsooth, the difficult obtaining? You must put her to 't: women are flax, and will fire in a moment.

Mal. Why, was the flax put into thy mouth, and yet thou —

Thou set fire, thou inflame her!

Maq. Marry, but I'll tell ye now, you were too hot.

Mal. The fitter to have inflamed the flax, woman.

Maq. You were too boisterous, spleeny, for, indeed —

Mal. Go, go, thou art a weak pandress; now I see,

Sooner earth's fire heaven itself shall waste, Than all with heat can melt a mind that's chaste. Go; thou the duke's lime-twig! I'll make the duke turn thee out of thine office: what, not get one touch of hope, and had her at such advantage!

Maq. Now, o' my conscience, now I think in my discretion, we did not take her in the right sign; the blood was not in the true vein, sure. Exit.

SCENE III.

[Enter<sup>2</sup> BILIOSO.

Bil. Make way there! The duke returns from the enthronement. — Malevole —

Mal. Out, rogue!

Bil. Malevole, —

Mal. "Hence, ye gross-jawed, peasantly [5] — out, go!"<sup>3</sup>

Bil. Nay, sweet Malevole, since my return I hear you are become the thing I always prophesied would be, — an advanced virtue, a worthily-employed faithfulness, a man o' grace, [10] dear friend. Come; what! Si quoties peccant homines<sup>4</sup> — if as often as courtiers play the knaves, honest men should be angry — why, look ye, we must collogue<sup>5</sup> sometimes, forswear sometimes.

Mal. Be damned sometimes.

Bil. Right: nemo omnibus horis sapit; "no man can be honest at all hours:" necessity often depraves virtue.

Mal. I will commend thee to the duke.

Bil. Do: let us be friends, man.

Mal. And knaves, man.

Bil. Right: let us prosper and purchase: our lordships shall live, and our knavery be forgotten.

Mal. He that by any ways gets riches, his means never shames him.

Bil. True.

Mal. For impudency and faithlessness are the main stays to greatness.

Bil. By the Lord, thou art a profound lad.

Mal. By the Lord, thou art a perfect knave: out, ye ancient damnation!

Bil. Peace, peace! and thou wilt not be a friend to me as I am a knave, be not a knave to me as I am thy friend, and disclose me. Peace! cornets!

Enter PREPASSO and FERRATO, two Pages with lights, CELSO and EQUATO, MENDOZA in duke's robes, and GUERRINO.

Men. On, on; leave us, leave us.

Exeunt all saving MALEVOLE [and MENDOZA].

Stay, where is the hermit?

Mal. With Duke Pietro, with Duke Pietro.

Men. Is he dead? Is he poisoned?

Mal. Dead, as the duke is.

Men. Good, excellent: he will not blab; se-cureness lives in secrecy. Come hither, come hither.

Mal. Thou hast a certain strong villainous scent about thee my nature cannot endure.

Men. Scent, man! What returns Maria, what answer to our suit?

Mal. Cold, frosty; she is obstinate.

Men. Then she's but dead; 't is resolute, she dies:

"Black deed only through black deed safely flies."

Mal. Pooh! per scelera semper sceleribus tutum est iter.

Men. What, art a scholar? Art a politician? Sure, thou art an arrant knave.

Mal. Who, I? I ha' been twice an under-sheriff, man!

[Well, I will go rail upon some great man, that I may purchase the bastinado, or else go marry some rich Genoan lady, and instantly go travel.

Men. Travel, when thou art married?

Mend. Has been with Maria?

Mal. As your scrivener to your usurer, I have dealt about taking of this commodity, but she's cold-frosty.

These lines seem to have been meant to take the place of ll. 48-58, which were left in by mistake. Q<sub>1</sub> omits ll. 59-72.

Mal. Ay, 't is your young lord's fashion to do so, though he was so lazy, being a bachelor, that he would never travel so far as the university: yet, when he married her, tales off, and, Catso, for England!

Men. And why for England?

Mal. Because there is no brothel-houses there.

Men. Nor courtesans?

Mal. Neither; your whore went down with the stewes, and your punk came up with your puritan.

Men. Canst thou empoison? Canst thou empoison?

Mal. Excellently; no Jew, 'pothecary, or politician better. Look ye, here's a box: whom wouldst thou empoison? Here's a box (giving it), which, opened and the fume ta'en up in conduits thorough which the brain purges it- self, doth instantly for twelve hours' space bind up all show of life in a deep senseless sleep: here's another (giving it), which, being opened under the sleeper's nose, chokes all the pores of life, kills him suddenly.

Men. I'll try experiments; 't is good not to be deceived.—So, so; catso!

Seems to poison MALEVOLE [who falls].

Who would fear that may destroy?

Death hath no teeth nor tongue;

And he that's great, to him are slaves,
Shame, murder, fame, and wrong.—

Celso!

Enter Celso.

Celso. My honour'd lord?

Men. The good Malevole, that plain-tongu'd man,

Alas, is dead on sudden, wondrous strangely! He held in our esteem good place. Celso, See him buried, see him buried.

Celso. I shall observe ye.

Men. And, Celso, prithee, let it be thy care to-night

To have some pretty show, to solemnize
Our high instalment; some music, masquery.

We'll give fair entertain unto Maria,
The duchess to the banish'd Alfront:
Thou shalt conduct her from the citadel
Unto the palace. Think on some masquery.

Celso. Of what shape, sweet lord?

Men. What! shape! Why, any quick-done fiction;

As some brave spirits of the Genoan dukes,
To come out of Elysium, forsooth,
Led in by Mercury, to gratulate
Our happy fortune; some such anything,
Some far-fet trick good for ladies, some stale toy

Or other, no matter, so 't be of our devising.
Do thou prepare 't; 't is but for fashion sake.
Fear not, it shall be grac'd, man, it shall take.

Celso. All service.

Men. All thanks; our hand shall not be close<sup>2</sup> to thee; farewell.

(Aside.) Now is my treachery secure, nor can we fall:

Mischief that prospers, men do virtue call.

I'll trust no man: he that by tricks gets wreaths

Keeps them with steel; no man securely breathes

Out of deserved ranks; the crowd will mutter,
"fool!"

Who cannot bear with spite, he cannot rule.

The chiefest secret for a man of state

Is, to live senseless of a strengthless hate. Exit.

Mal. (starts up and speaks.) Death of the damned thief! I'll make one i' the masque; thou shalt ha' some brave spirits of the antique dukes.

Celso. My lord, what strange delusion?

Mal. Most happy, dear Celso, poisoned with an empty box: I'll give thee all, anon. My lady comes to court; there is a whirl of fate comes tumbling on; the castle's captain stands for me, the people pray for me, and the great leader of the just stands for me: then courage, Celso;

For no disastrous chance can ever move him

That leaveth<sup>3</sup> nothing but a God above him.

Exeunt.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter BILIOSO and PREPASSO, two Pages before them; MAQUERELLE, BIANCA, and EMILLA.

Bil. Make room there, room for the ladies! Why, gentlemen, will not ye suffer the ladies to be entered in the great chamber? Why, gallants! and you, sir, to drop your torch where the beauties must sit too?

Pre. And there's a great fellow plays the knave; why dost not strike him?

Bil. Let him play the knave, o' God's name; thinkest thou I have no more wit than to strike a great fellow?—The music! more lights! [10] revelling-scaffolds! do you hear? Let there be oaths enow ready at the door, swear out the devil himself. Let's leave the ladies, and go see if the lords be ready for them.

Exeunt BILIOSO, PREPASSO, and Pages.

Mag. And, by my troth, beauties, why do you not put you into the fashion? This is a stale cut; you must come in fashion; look ye, you must be all felt, felt and feather, a felt upon your bare hair. Look ye, these tiring things<sup>5</sup> are justly out of request now; and, do ye hear? you must wear falling-bands,<sup>6</sup> you must come into the falling fashion: there is such a deal o' pinning these ruffs, when the fine clean fall is worth all: and again, if ye should chance to take a nap in the afternoon, your falling-band requires no potting-stick<sup>7</sup> to recover his form: believe me, no fashion to the falling, I say.

<sup>6</sup> A part of dress, now usually called a vandyke; it fell flat upon the dress from the neck, and succeeded the stiff ruffs. (Nares.)

Bian. And is not Signior St. Andrew a gallant fellow now. 30

Mag. By my maidenhead, la, honour and he agree as well together as a satin suit and woollen stockings.

Emilia. But is not Marshal Make-room, my servant in reversion, a proper gentleman? 35

Mag. Yes, in reversion, as he had his office; as, in truth, he hath all things in reversion: he has his mistress in reversion, his clothes in reversion, his wit in reversion; and, indeed, is a suitor to me for my dog in reversion: but, [40 in good verity, la, he is as proper a gentleman in reversion as — and, indeed, as fine a man as may be, having a red beard and a pair of warpt legs.

Bian. But, i' faith, I am most monstrously in love with Count Quiddlibet-in-quodlibet: [45 is he not a pretty, dapper, unidle<sup>1</sup> gallant?

Mag. He is even one of the most busy-fingered lords; he will put the beauties to the squeak most hideously.

Re-enter BILIOSO.

Bil. Room! make a lane there! the duke [50 is entering: stand handsomely for beauty's sake, take up the ladies there! So, cornets, cornets!

SCENE V.

Re-enter PREPASSO, joins to BILIOSO; then enter two Pages with lights, FERRARDO, MENDOZA; at the other door, two Pages with lights, and the Captain leading in MARIA; MENDOZA meets MARIA and closeth with her; the rest fall back.

Men. Madam, with gentle ear receive my suit; A kingdom's safety should o'er-prise<sup>2</sup> slight rites; Marriage is merely nature's policy: Then, since unless our royal beds be join'd, Danger and civil tumults fright the state, [5 Be wise as you are fair, give way to fate.

Maria. What wouldst thou, thou affliction to our house?

Thou ever-devil, 't was thou that banished'st My truly noble lord!

Men. I! 10

Maria. Ay, by thy plots, by thy black stratagems:

Twelve moons have suffer'd change since I beheld

The loved presence of my dearest lord.

O thou far worse than Death! he parts but soul From a weak body; but thou soul from soul [15 Dissever'st, that which God's own hand did knit;

Thou scant of honour, full of devilish wit!

Men. We'll check your too-intemperate lavishness:

I can and will.

Maria. What canst? 20

Men. Go to; in banishment thy husband dies.

Maria. He ever is at home that's ever wise.

Men. You 'st ne'er meet more: reason should love control.

Maria. Not meet! 24

She that dear loves, her love's still in her soul.
Men. You are but a woman, lady, you must yield.

Maria. O, save me, thou innated bashfulness, Thou only ornament of woman's modesty!

Men. Modesty! death, I'll torment thee. 20

Maria. Do, urge all torments, all afflictions try; I'll die my lord's as long as I can die.

Men. Thou obstinate, thou shalt die.— Captain, that lady's life

Is forfeited to justice: we have examin'd her,
And we do find she hath empoisoned 24

The reverend hermit; therefore we command
Severest custody.— Nay, if you'll do's no good,
You 'st do's no harm: a tyrant's peace is blood.

Maria. O, thou art merciful; O gracious devil,
Rather by much let me condemned be 29

For seeming murder than be damn'd for thee!
I'll mourn no more; come, girt my brows with flowers:

Revel and dance, soul, now thy wish thou hast;
Die like a bride, poor heart, thou shalt die
chaste.

Enter AURELIA in mourning habit.

Aur. "Life is a frost of cold felicity,<sup>3</sup>
And death the thaw of all our vanity:" 4 45

Was 't not an honest priest that wrote so?

Men. Who let her in?

Bil. Forbear!

Pre. Forbear!

Aur. Alas, calamity is everywhere: 50
Sad misery, despite your double doors,
Will enter even in court.

Bil. Peace!

Aur. I ha' done.

Bil.<sup>5</sup> One word,—take heed! 55

Aur. I ha' done.

Enter MERCURY with loud music.

Mer. Cyllenian Mercury, the god of ghosts,
From gloomy shades that spread the lower coasts,<sup>6</sup>

Calls four high-famed Genoan dukes to come,
And make this presence their Elysium, 60

To pass away this high triumphal night
With song and dances, court's more soft delight.

Aur. Are you god of ghosts? I have a suit pending in hell betwixt me and my conscience;

I would fain have thee help me to an advocate.

Bil. Mercury shall be your lawyer, lady. 65

Aur. Nay, faith, Mercury has too good a face to be a right lawyer.

Pre. Peace, forbear! Mercury presents the masque.

Cornets: the song to the cornets, which playing, the masque enters; MALEVOLE, PIETRO, FERNEZE, and CELSO, in white robes, with duke's crowns upon laurel wreaths, pistols and short swords under their robes.

Men. Celso, Celso, court Maria for our love.—
Lady, be gracious, yet grace. 71

Maria. With me, sir?
MALEVOLE takes MARIA to dance.
Mal. Yes, more loved than my breath;
 With you I'll dance.
Maria. Why, then, you dance with death.
 But, come, sir, I was ne'er more apt for mirth.
 Death gives eternity a glorious breath: 75
 O, to die honour'd, who would fear to die?
Mal. They die in fear who live in villainy.
Men. Yes, believe him, lady, and be rul'd by him.
Pietro. Madam, with me.
PIETRO takes AURELLA to dance.
Aur. Wouldst, then, be miserable? 80
Pietro. I need not wish.
Aur. O, yet forbear my hand! away! fly!
 fly!
 O, seek not her that only seeks to die!
Pietro. Poor loved soul!
Aur. What, wouldst court misery? 85
Pietro. Yes.
Aur. She'll come too soon:—O my grieved heart!
Pietro. Lady, ha' done, ha' done:
 Come, let us dance: be once from sorrow free.
Aur. Art a sad man? 90
Pietro. Yes, sweet.
Aur. Then we'll agree.

FERNEZE takes MAQUERELLE and CELSO, BIANCA: then the cornets sound the measure, one change and rest.

Fer. (to BIANCA.) Believe it, lady; shall I swear? Let me enjoy you in private, and I'll marry you, by my soul. 95

Bian. I had rather you would swear by your body: I think that would prove the more regarded oath with you.

Fer. I'll swear by them both, to please you.

Bian. O, damn them not both to please [100 me, for God's sake!

Fer. Faith, sweet creature, let me enjoy you to-night, and I'll marry you to-morrow fort-night, by my troth, la.

Maq. On his troth, la! believe him not; [105 that kind of cony-catching<sup>1</sup> is as stale as Sir Oliver Anchovy's perfumed jerkin: promise of matrimony by a young gallant, to bring a virgin lady into a fool's paradise; make her a great woman, and then cast her off;—'t is as com- [110 mon [and]<sup>2</sup> natural to a courtier, as jealousy to a citizen, gluttony to a puritan, wisdom to an alderman, pride to a tailor, or an empty hand-basket to one of these six-penny damnations: of his troth, la! believe him not; traps to [115 catch pole-cats.

Mal. (to MARIA.) Keep your face constant, let no sudden passion

Speak in your eyes.

Maria. O my Altofront!

Pietro. (to AURELIA.) A tyrant's jealousies Are very nimble: you receive it all? 121

Aur. My heart, though not my knees, doth humbly fall
 Low as the earth, to thee.

[Mal.]<sup>3</sup> Peace! next change; no words.

Maria. Speech to such, ay, O, what will affords! 125

Cornets sound the measure over again; which danced, they unmask.

Men. Malevole!

They environ MENDOZA, bending their pistols on him.

Mal. No.

Men. Altofront! Duke Pietro! Ferneze! ha!

All. Duke Altofront! Duke Altofront!
Cornets, a flourish.—They seize upon MENDOZA.

Men. Are we surpris'd? What strange de-lusions mock 130

Our senses? Do I dream? or have I dreamt
 This two days' space? Where am I?

Mal. Where an arch-villain is.

Men. O, lend me breath till I am fit to die!
 For peace with heaven, for your own souls' sake,
 Vouchsafe me life! 135

Pietro. Ignoble villain! whom neither heaven
 nor hell,

Goodness of God or man, could once make
 good!

Mal. Base, treacherous wretch! what grace
 canst thou expect,

That hast grown impudent in gracelessness? 140

Men. O, life!

Mal. Slave, take thy life.

Wert thou defenced, th(ou)gh blood and
 wounds,

The sternest horror of a civil fight, 144

Would I achieve thee; but prostrate at my feet,
 I scorn to hurt thee: 't is the heart of slaves

That deigns to triumph over peasants' graves;
 For such thou art, since birth doth ne'er enroll
 A man 'mong monarchs, but a glorious soul.

[4 O, I have seen strange accidents of state! 150
 The flatterer, like the ivy, clip the oak,
 And waste it to the heart; just so confirm'd,
 That the black act of sin itself not sham'd
 To be term'd courtship.

O, they that are as great as be their sins, 155
 Let them remember that th' inconstant people
 Love many princes merely for their faces
 And outward shows; and they do covet more
 To have a sight of these than of their virtues.
 Yet thus much let the great ones still conceive,<sup>5</sup>
 When they observe not heaven's impos'd conditions, 161

They are no kings, but forfeit their commissions.

Maq. O good my lord, I have lived in the court this twenty year: they that have been old courtiers, and come to live in the city, they [165 are spited at, and thrust to the walls like apri-cocks, good my lord.

Bil. My lord, I did know your lordship in this disguise; you heard me ever say, if Alto-front did return, I would stand for him: [170 besides, 't was your lordship's pleasure to call me wittol and cuckold: you must not think, but that I knew you, I would have put it up so patiently.]

Mal. You o'er-joy'd spirits, wipe your long-wet eyes. To PIETRO and AURELLA.
Hence with this man (kicks out MENDOZA): an eagle takes not flies. <sup>178</sup>
You to your vows (to PIETRO and AURELLA): and thou into the suburbs.<sup>1</sup>

To MAQUERELLE.
You to my worst friend I would hardly give; Thou art a perfect old knave (to BILIOSO): all-pleas'd live

You two unto my breast (to CELSO and the Captain): thou to my heart. (To MARIA.)
The rest of idle actors idly part: <sup>181</sup>
And as for me, I here assume my right,
To which I hope all's pleas'd: to all, good-night.

Cornets, a flourish. Exeunt omnes.

AN IMPERFECT ODE, BEING BUT ONE STAFF

SPOKEN BY THE PROLOGUE.

To wrest each hurtless thought to private sense
Is the foul use of ill-bred impudence:
Immodest censure now grows wild,
All over-running.
Let innocence be ne'er so chaste, <sup>5</sup>
Yet to the last
She is defil'd
With too nice-brained cunning.

<sup>1</sup> The disreputable district.

O you of fairer soul,
Control <sup>10</sup>
With an Herculean arm
This harm;
And once teach all old freedom of a pen,
Which still must write of fools, whiles 't writes of men!

EPILOGUS

YOUR modest silence, full of heedful stillness,
Makes me thus speak: a voluntary illness
Is merely <sup>2</sup> senseless; but unwilling error,
Such as proceeds from too rash youthful fer-
your,

May well be call'd a fault, but not a sin: <sup>5</sup> Rivers take names from founts where they begin.

Then let not too severe an eye peruse
The slighter brakes <sup>3</sup> of our reformed Muse,
Who could herself herself of faults detect,
But that she knows 't is easy to correct, <sup>10</sup>
Though some men's labour: troth, to err is fit,
As long as wisdom's not profess'd, but wit.
Then till another's <sup>4</sup> happier Muse appears,
Till his Thalia feast your learned ears,
To whose desertful lamps pleased Fates impart
Art above nature, judgment above art, <sup>15</sup> Receive this piece, which hope nor fear yet
daunteth:

He that knows most knows most how much he wanteth.

<sup>3</sup> Flaws.

PROLOGUE

I COME but like a harbinger, being sent
To tell you what these preparations mean.
Look for no glorious state ; our Muse is bent
Upon a barren subject, a bare scene.
We could afford this twig a timber-tree,
Whose strength might boldly on your favours build ;
Our russet, tissue ; drone, a honey-bee ;
Our barren plot, a large and spacious field ;
Our coarse fare, banquets ; our thin water, wine ;
Our brook, a sea ; our bat's eyes, eagle's sight ;
Our poet's dull and earthy Muse, divine ;
Our ravens, doves ; our crow's black feathers, white.
But gentle thoughts, when they may give the foil,<sup>1</sup>
Save them that yield, and spare where they may spoil.

[ACT I]

[SCENE I.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter MASTER JOHN FRANKFORD, MISTRESS
[FRANKFORD],<sup>3</sup> SIR FRANCIS ACTON, SIR
CHARLES MOUNTFORD, MASTER MALBY, MASTER WENDOLL, AND MASTER CRAN-
WELL.

Sir F. Some music, there ! None lead the bride a dance ?

Sir C. Yes, would she dance The Shaking of the Sheets ;

But that's the dance her husband means to lead
her.

Wen. That's not the dance that every man must dance,
According to the ballad.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>4</sup> The Shaking of the Sheets, or The Dance of Death, was a well-known ballad and dance tune.

Sir F. Music, ho !
By your leave, sister, — by your husband's
leave,

I should have said, — the hand that but this day

Was given you in the church I'll borrow. —
Sound !

This marriage music hoists me from the ground.
Frank. Ay, you may caper ; you are light and free !

Marriage hath yok'd my heels ; pray, then, pardon me.

Sir F. I'll have you dance too, brother !

Sir C. Master Frankford,

You are a happy man, sir, and much joy
Succeed your marriage mirth : you have a wife
So qualified, and with such ornaments
Both of the mind and body. First, her birth
Is noble, and her education such

As might become the daughter of a prince ;
Her own tongue speaks all tongues, and her own hand

Can teach all strings to speak in their best
grace,
To the shrill'st treble to the hoarsest base.
To end her many praises in one word,
She's Beauty and Perfection's eldest daughter,
Only found by yours, though many a heart hath sought her.

Frank. But that I know your virtues and chaste thoughts,

I should be jealous of your praise, Sir Charles.

Cran. He speaks no more than you approve.

Mal. Nor flatters he that gives to her her due.

Mrs. F. I would your praise could find a fitter theme

Than my imperfect beauties to speak on!

Such as they be, if they my husband please,

They suffice me now I am married.

His sweet content is like a flattering glass,

To make my face seem fairer to mine eye;

But the least wrinkle from his stormy brow

Will blast the roses in my cheeks that grow.

Sir F. A perfect wife already, meek and patient!

How strangely the word husband fits your mouth,

Not married three hours since! Sister, 't is
good;

You that begin betimes thus must needs prove Pliant and duteous in your husband's love. —

Gramercies, brother! Wrought her to 't already, —

'Sweet husband,' and a curtesy, the first day?

Mark this, mark this, you that are bachelors,

And never took the grace<sup>1</sup> of honest man;

Mark this, against you marry,<sup>2</sup> this one phrase:

In a good time that man both wins and woos

That takes his wife down<sup>3</sup> in her wedding shoes.

Frank. Your sister takes not after you, Sir
Francis,

All his wild blood your father spent on you;

He got her in his age, when he grew civil.

All his mad tricks were to his land entail'd,

And you are heir to all; your sister, she

Hath to her dower her mother's modesty.

Sir C. Lord, sir, in what a happy state live
you!

This morning, which to many seems a burden,

Too heavy to bear, is unto you a pleasure.

This lady is no clog, as many are;

She doth become you like a well-made suit,

In which the tailor hath us'd all his art;

Not like a thick coat of unseason'd frieze,

For'd on your back in summer. She's no chain

To tie your neck, and curb you to the yoke;

But she's a chain of gold to adorn your neck.

You both adorn each other, and your hands,

Metinks, are matches. There's equality

In this fair combination; you are both

Scholars, both young, both being descended nobly.

There's music in this sympathy; it carries

Consort and expectation of much joy,

Which God bestow on you from this first day

Until your dissolution, — that's for aye!

<sup>3</sup> Reduces her to submission.

Sir F. We keep you here too long, good brother Frankford.

Into the hall; away! Go cheer your guests.

What! Bride and bridegroom both withdrawn at once?

If you be mist, the guests will doubt their welcome,

And charge you with unkindness.

Frank. To prevent it,

I'll leave you here, to see the dance within.

Mrs. F. And so will I.

Exeunt [MASTER AND MISTRESS
FRANKFORD].

Sir F. To part you it were sin. —

Now, gallants, while the town musicians

Finger their frets<sup>4</sup> within, and the mad lads

And country lasses, every mother's child,

With nosegays and bride-laces<sup>5</sup> in their hats,

Dance all their country measures, rounds, and jigs,

What shall we do? Hark! They're all on the hoigh;<sup>6</sup>

They toil like mill-horses, and turn as round, —

Marry, not on the toe! Ay, and they caper,

[Not]<sup>7</sup> without cutting; you shall see, tomorrow,

The hall-floor peckt and dinted like a mill-
stone,

Made with their high shoes. Though their skill be small,

Yet they tread heavy where their hobnails fall.

Sir C. Well, leave them to their sports! —

Sir Francis Acton,

I'll make a match with you! Meet me tomorrow

At Chevy Chase; I'll fly my hawk with yours.

Sir F. For what? For what?

Sir C. Why, for a hundred pound.

Sir F. Pawn me some gold of that!

Sir C. Here are ten angels;<sup>8</sup>

I'll make them good a hundred pound to-morrow

Upon my hawk's wing.

Sir F. 'T is a match; 't is done.

Another hundred pound upon your dogs; —

Dare ye, Sir Charles?

Sir C. I dare; were I sure to lose,

I durst do more than that; here is my hand,

The first course for a hundred pound!

Sir F. A match.

Wen. Ten angels on Sir Francis Acton's hawk;

As much upon his dogs!

Cran. I'm for Sir Charles Mountford: I have seen

His hawk and dog both tried. What! Clap ye hands,<sup>9</sup>

Or is't no bargain?

Wen. Yes, and stake them down.

Were they five hundred, they were all my own.

Sir F. Be stirring early with the lark tomorrow;

<sup>4</sup> The points where the strings of a musical instrument are stopped.

<sup>9</sup> Shake hands on it.

I'll rise into my saddle ere the sun
Rise from his bed. 110

Sir C. If there you miss me, say
I am no gentleman! I'll hold my day.

Sir F. It holds on all sides. — Come, to-night
let's dance;

Early to-morrow let's prepare to ride: 114
We'd need be three hours up before the bride.

Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter NICHOLAS and JENKIN, JACK SLIME, ROGER BRICKBAT, with Country Wenches, and two or three Musicians.

Jen. Come, Nick, take you Joan Miniver, to trace withal; Jack Slime, traverse you with Cicely Milkpail; I will take Jane Trubkin, and Roger Brickbat shall have Isabel Motley. And now that they are busy in the parlour, come, [<sup>5</sup> strike up; we'll have a crash<sup>2</sup> here in the yard.

Nich. My humour is not compendious: dancing I possess not, though I can foot it; yet, since I am fallen into the hands of Cicely [<sup>10</sup>
Milkpail, I consent.

Slime. Truly, Nick, though we were never brought up like serving courtiers, yet we have been brought up with serving creatures, — ay, and God's creatures, too; for we have been [<sup>15</sup> brought up to serve sheep, oxen, horses, hogs, and such like; and, though we be but country fellows, it may be in the way of dancing we can do the horse-trick as well as the serving-men.

Brick. Ay, and the cross-point too. <sup>20</sup>

Jen. O Slime! O Brickbat! Do not you know that comparisons are odious? Now we are odious ourselves, too; therefore there are no comparisons to be made betwixt us.

Nich. I am sudden, and not superfluous; <sup>25</sup>
I am quarrelsome, and not seditious;
I am peaceable, and not contentious;
I am brief, and not compendious.

Slime. Foot it quickly! If the music overcome not my melancholy, I shall quarrel; and if [<sup>30</sup> they suddenly do not strike up, I shall presently strike thee down.

Jen. No quarrelling, for God's sake! Truly, if you do, I shall set a knave between ye.

Slime. I come to dance, not to quarrel. [<sup>35</sup>
Come, what shall it be? Rogero?<sup>3</sup>

Jen. Rogero? No; we will dance The Beginning of the World.

Cicely. I love no dance so well as John come kiss me now. <sup>40</sup>

Nich. I that have ere now deserv'd a cushion, call for the Cushion-dance.

Brick. For my part, I like nothing so well as Tom Tyler.

Jen. No; we'll have The Hunting of the [<sup>45</sup>
Fox.

Slime. The Hay, The Hay! There's nothing like The Hay.

Nich. I have said, I do say, and I will say again — <sup>50</sup>

iar.

Jen. Every man agree to have it as Nick says!
All. Content.

Nich. It hath been, it now is, and it shall
be —

Cicely. What, Master Nicholas? What? <sup>55</sup>
Nich. Put on your Smock a' Monday.

Jen. So the dance will come cleanly off! Come, for God's sake, agree of something: if you like not that, put it to the musicians; or let me speak for all, and we'll have Sellenger's [<sup>60</sup> Round.

All. That, that, that!

Nich. No, I am resoly'd thus it shall be;
First take hands, then take ye to your heels.

Jen. Why, would you have us run away? <sup>65</sup>

Nich. No; but I would have you shake your heels. — Music, strike up!

They dance; NICK dancing, speaks stately and scurvily, the rest after the country fashion.

Jen. Hey! Lively, my lasses! Here's a turn for thee! Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>4</sup>

Wind horns. Enter SIR CHARLES MOUNTFORD, SIR FRANCIS ACTON, MALEY, CRANWELL,
WENDOLL, Falconer, and Huntsmen.

Sir C. So; well cast off! Aloft, aloft! Well flown!

Oh, now she takes her at the souse,<sup>5</sup> and strikes
her

Down to the earth, like a swift thunder-clap.

Wen. She hath struck ten angels out of my way.

Sir F. A hundred pound from me. <sup>5</sup>

Sir C. What, falconer!

Falc. At hand, sir!

Sir C. Now she hath seiz'd the fowl and 'gins to plume<sup>6</sup> her,

Rebeck<sup>7</sup> her not; rather stand still and check
her!

So, seize her gets,<sup>8</sup> her jesses,<sup>9</sup> and her bells!<sup>10</sup>
Away!

Sir F. My hawk kill'd, too.

Sir C. Ay, but 't was at the querre,<sup>10</sup>
Not at the mount like mine.

Sir F. Judgment, my masters!

Cran. Yours mist her at the ferre,<sup>11</sup>

Wen. Ay, but our merlin first had plum'd
the fowl, <sup>15</sup>

And twice renew'd<sup>12</sup> her from the river too.
Her bells, Sir Francis, had not both one weight,
Nor was one semi-tune above the other.

Methinks, these Milan bells do sound too full,
And spoil the mounting of your hawk.

Sir C. <sup>17</sup>T is lost. <sup>20</sup>

Sir F. I grant it not. Mine likewise seiz'd a fowl

Within her talons, and you saw her paws

<sup>8</sup> Verity explains as "booty," but apparently it is the same as jesses.

Full of the feathers; both her petty singles<sup>1</sup>
And her long singles grip'd her more than other;
The terrials<sup>2</sup> of her<sup>3</sup> legs were stain'd with blood,<sup>25</sup>
Not of the fowl only; she did discomfit
Some of her feathers; but she brake away.
Come, come; your hawk is but a riffer.<sup>3</sup>

Sir C. How!
Sir F. Ay, and your dogs are trindle-tails<sup>6</sup> and curs.

Sir C. You stir my blood.<sup>30</sup>
You keep not one good hound in all your kennel,
Nor one good hawk upon your perch.

Sir F. How, knight!
Sir C. So, knight. You will not swagger,
sir?

Sir F. Why, say I did?

Sir C. Why, sir,
I say you would gain as much by swagg'ring<sup>35</sup>
As you have got by wagers on your dogs.
You will come short in all things.

Sir F. Not in this!
Now I'll strike home. [Strikes Sir Charles.]

Sir C. Thou shalt to thy long home,
Or I will want my will.

Sir F. All they that love Sir Francis, follow me!<sup>40</sup>

Sir C. All that affect Sir Charles, draw on my part!

Cran. On this side heaves my hand.

Wen. Here goes my heart.

They divide themselves. SIR CHARLES MOUNTFORD, CRANWELL, Falconer, and Huntsman, fight against SIR FRANCIS ACTON, WENDOLL, his Falconer and Huntsman; and SIR CHARLES hath the better, and beats them away, killing both of SIR FRAN-CIS's men. [*Exeunt all but SIR
CHARLES MOUNTFORD.*]

Sir C. My God, what have I done! What have I done!

My rage hath plung'd into a sea of blood,
In which my soul lies drown'd. Poor innocents,<sup>45</sup>

For whom we are to answer! Well, 't is done,
And I remain the victor. A great conquest,
When I would give this right hand, nay, this
head,

To breathe in them new life whom I have slain! —

Forgive me, God! 'T was in the heat of blood,<sup>50</sup>

And anger quite removes me from myself.
It was not I, but rage, did this vile murder;
Yet I, and not my rage, must answer it.
Sir Francis Acton, he is fled the field;
With him all those that did partake his quarrel;
And I am left alone with sorrow dumb,<sup>55</sup>
And in my height of conquest overcome.

Enter SUSAN.

Susan. O God! My brother wounded 'mong the dead!

Unhappy jest, that in such earnest ends!
The rumour of this fear stretcht to my ears,<sup>60</sup>
And I am come to know if you be wounded.

Sir C. Oh, sister, sister! Wounded at the heart.

Susan. My God forbid!

Sir C. In doing that thing which he for-bad,

I am wounded, sister.

Susan. I hope, not at the heart.<sup>65</sup>

Sir C. Yes, at the heart.

Susan. O God! A surgeon, there.

Sir C. Call me a surgeon, sister, for my
soul!

The sin of murder, it hath pierc'd my heart
And made a wide wound there; but for these scratches,

They are nothing, nothing.

Susan. Charles, what have you done?<sup>70</sup>

Sir Francis hath great friends, and will pursue
you

Unto the utmost danger<sup>6</sup> of the law.

Sir C. My conscience is become mine enemy,
And will pursue me more than Acton can.

Susan. Oh! Fly, sweet brother!

Sir C. Shall I fly from thee?<sup>75</sup>

Why, Sue, art weary of my company?

Susan. Fly from your foe!

Sir C. You, sister, are my friend,
And flying you, I shall pursue my end.

Susan. Your company is as my eyeball
dear;

Being far from you, no comfort can be near.<sup>80</sup>
Yet fly to save your life! What would I care

To spend my future age in black despair,
So you were safe? And yet to live one week Without my brother Charles, through every cheek

My streaming tears would downwards run so rank,<sup>7</sup><sup>85</sup>

Till they could set on either side a bank,

And in the midst a channel; so my face
For two salt-water brooks shall still find place.

Sir C. Thou shalt not weep so much; for I will stay,

In spite of danger's teeth. I'll live with thee,<sup>90</sup>
Or I'll not live at all. I will not sell

My country and my father's patrimony,
Nor thy sweet sight, for a vain hope of life.

Enter Sheriff, with Officers.

Sher. Sir Charles, I am made the unwilling instrument

Of your attach<sup>8</sup> and apprehension.<sup>95</sup>

I'm sorry that the blood of innocent men
Should be of you exacted. It was told me
That you were guarded with a troop of friends,
And therefore I come thus arm'd.

Sir C. Oh, Master Sheriff!
I came into the field with many friends,<sup>100</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Arrest.

But see, they all have left me ; only one
Clings to my sad misfortune, my dear sister.
I know you for an honest gentleman ;
I yield my weapons, and submit to you.
Convey me where you please !

Sher. To prison, then, 105
To answer for the lives of these dead men.

Susan. O God ! O God !
Sir C. Sweet sister, every strain
Of sorrow from your heart augments my pain ;
Your grief abounds,<sup>1</sup> and hits against my breast.

Sher. Sir, will you go ?

Sir C. Even where it likes you best. 110
[Exeunt.]

[ACT II]

[SCENE I.]

Enter MASTER FRANKFORD in a study.

Frank. How happy am I amongst other men,
That in my mean estate embrace content !
I am a gentleman, and by my birth
Companion with a king ; a king's no more.
I am possess'd of many fair revenues, 5
Sufficient to maintain a gentleman ;
Touching my mind, I am studied in all arts ;
The riches of my thoughts and of my time
Have been a good proficient ;<sup>2</sup> but, the chief
Of all the sweet felicities on earth, 10
I have a fair, a chaste, and loving wife, —
Perfection all, all truth, all ornament.
If man on earth may truly happy be,
Of these at once possess, sure, I am he.

Enter NICHOLAS.

Nich. Sir, there's a gentleman attends without 15
To speak with you.

Frank. On horseback ?

Nich. Yes, on horseback.

Frank. Entreat him to alight, I will attend
him.

Know'st thou him, Nick ?

Nich. Know him ? Yes ; his name's Wendoll.
It seems, he comes in haste : his horse is booted<sup>3</sup>
Up to the flank in mire, himself all spotted 20
And stain'd with plashing. Sure, he rid in
fear,

Or for a wager. Horse and man both sweat ;
I ne'er saw two in such a smoking heat.

Frank. Entreat him in : about it instantly !

[Exit NICHOLAS.]

This Wendoll I have noted, and his carriage 25
Hath pleas'd me much ; by observation
I have noted many good deserts in him.
He's affable, and seen<sup>4</sup> in many things ;
Discourses well ; a good companion ;
And though of small means, yet a gentleman 30
Of a good house, though somewhat prest by want.

I have preferr'd him to a second place
In my opinion and my best regard.

Enter WENDOLL, MISTRESS FRANKFORD, and NICHOLAS.

Mrs. F. Oh, Master Frankford ! Master Wendoll here

Brings you the strangest news that e'er you heard. 35

Frank. What news, sweet wife ? What news, good Master Wendoll ?

Wen. You knew the match made 'twixt Sir
Francis Acton

And Sir Charles Mountford ?

Frank. True ; with their hounds and hawks.

Wen. The matches were both play'd.

Frank. Ha ? And which won ?

Wen. Sir Francis, your wife's brother, had the worst, 40

And lost the wager.

Frank. Why, the worse his chance ;

Perhaps the fortune of some other day

Will change his luck.

Mrs. F. Oh, but you hear not all.
Sir Francis lost, and yet was loth to yield. 44

At length the two knights grew to difference,
From words to blows, and so to banding sides ;<sup>5</sup>

Where valorous Sir Charles slew, in his spleen,
Two of your brother's men, — his falconer,
And his good huntsman, whom he lov'd so
well.

More men were wounded, no more slain out-
right. 50

Frank. Now, trust me, I am sorry for the knight.

But is my brother safe ?

Wen. All whole and sound,
His body not being blemish'd with one wound.

But poor Sir Charles is to the prison led,
To answer at th' assize for them that's dead.

Frank. I thank your pains, sir. Had the news been better, 55

Your will was to have brought it, Master Wendoll.

Sir Charles will find hard friends ; his case is heinous

And will be most severely censur'd<sup>6</sup> on.

I'm sorry for him. Sir, a word with you ! 60

I know you, sir, to be a gentleman

In all things ; your possibilities<sup>7</sup> but mean :

Please you to use my table and my purse ;

They're yours.

Wen. O Lord, sir ! I shall ne'er deserve it.

Frank. O sir, disparage not your worth to much : 65

You are full of quality<sup>8</sup> and fair desert.

Choose of my men which shall attend on you,

And he is yours. I will allow you, sir,

Your man, your gelding, and your table, all

At my own charge ; be my companion ! 70

Wen. Master Frankford, I have oft been bound to you

By many favours ; this exceeds them all,

That I shall never merit your least favour ;

But when your last remembrance I forget,

Heaven at my soul exact that weighty debt ! 75

<sup>8</sup> Accomplishments.

Frank. There needs no protestation; for I know you virtuous, and therefore grateful. — Prithee, Nan,

Use him with all thy loving'st courtesy!

Mrs. F. As far as modesty may well extend, it is my duty to receive your friend.

Frank. To dinner! Come, sir, from this present day, Welcome to me for ever! Come, away!

Exeunt [FRANKFORD, MISTRESS FRANKFORD, and WENDOLL].

Nich. I do not like this fellow by no means: I never see him but my heart still yearns.<sup>1</sup> Zounds! I could fight with him, yet know not why;

The devil and he are all one in mine eye.

Enter JENKIN.

Jen. O Nick! What gentleman is that comes to lie at our house? My master allows him one to wait on him, and I believe it will fall to thy lot.

Nich. I love my master; by these hilts, I do; But rather than I'll ever come to serve him, I'll turn away my master.

Enter CICELY.

Cic. Nich'las! where are you, Nich'las? You must come in, Nich'las, and help the young gentleman off with his boots.

Nich. If I pluck off his boots, I'll eat the spurs,

And they shall stick fast in my throat like burrs.

Cic. Then, Jenkin, come you!

Jen. Nay, 't is no boot<sup>2</sup> for me to deny it. [100] My master hath given me a coat here, but he takes pains himself to brush it once or twice a day with a holly wand.

Cic. Come, come, make haste, that you may wash your hands again, and help to serve [105] in dinner!

Jen. You may see, my masters, though it be afternoon with you, 't is yet but early days with us, for we have not din'd yet. Stay but a little; I'll but go in and help to bear up the first [110] course, and come to you again presently.

Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter MALBY and CRANWELL.

Mal. This is the sessions-day; pray can you tell me

How young Sir Charles hath sped? Is he acquitted,

Or must he try the laws' strict penalty?

Cran. He's clear'd of all, spite of his enemies,

Whose earnest labour was to take his life.

But in this suit of pardon he hath spent

All the revenues that his father left him;

And he is now turn'd a plain countryman, Reform'd<sup>4</sup> in all things. See, sir, here he comes.

<sup>4</sup> Changed.

Enter SIR CHARLES and his Keeper.

Keep. Discharge your fees, and you are then at freedom.

Sir C. Here, Master Keeper, take the poor remainder

Of all the wealth I have! My heavy foes Have made my purse light; but, alas! to me 'T is wealth enough that you have set me free.

Mal. God give you joy of your delivery!

Sir C. The poorest knight in England, Master Malby.

My life has cost me all my patrimony My father left his son. Well, God forgive them That are the authors of my penury!

Enter SHAFTON.

Shaft. Sir Charles! A hand, a hand! At liberty?

Now, by the faith I owe, I am glad to see it. What want you? Wherein may I pleasure you?

Sir C. Oh me! Oh, most unhappy gentleman!

I am not worthy to have friends stir'd up, Whose hands may help me in this plunge of want.

I would I were in Heaven, to inherit there Th' immortal birthright which my Saviour keeps,

And by no unthrif can be bought and sold; For here on earth what pleasures should we trust!

Shaft. To rid you from these contemplations, Three hundred pounds you shall receive of me;

Nay, five for fail.<sup>5</sup> Come, sir, the sight of gold Is the most sweet receipt for melancholy, And will revive your spirits. You shall hold law

With your proud adversaries. Tush! let Frank Acton

Wage, with his knighthood, like expense with me,

And he will sink, he will. — Nay, good Sir Charles,

Applaud your fortune and your fair escape From all these perils.

Sir C. Oh, sir! they have undone me. Two thousand and five hundred pound a year My father at his death possesst me of;

All which the envious Acton made me spend; And, notwithstanding all this large expense,

I had much ado to gain my liberty;

And I have only now a house of pleasure, With some five hundred pounds reserv'd,

Both to maintain me and my loving sister.

Shaft. [Aside.] That must I have, it lies convenient for me.

If I can fasten but one finger on him, With my full hand I'll gripe him to the heart.

'T is not for love I proffer'd him this coin, But for my gain and pleasure. — Come, Sir Charles,

I know you have need of money; take my offer.

<sup>5</sup> To prevent failure.

Sir C. Sir, I accept it, and remain indebted Even to the best of my unable<sup>1</sup> power. 25
Come, gentlemen, and see it tend' red down!<sup>2</sup>

[Exeunt.]

[SCENE III.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter WENDOLL, melancholy.

Wen. I am a villain, if I apprehend<sup>4</sup>
But such a thought! Then, to attempt the deed,

Slave, thou art damn'd without redemption. —
I'll drive away this passion with a song. 4

A song! Ha, ha! A song! As if, fond<sup>5</sup> man, Thy eyes could swim in laughter, when thy
soul

Lies drench'd and drowned in red tears of
blood!

I'll pray, and see if God within my heart
Plant better thoughts. Why, prayers are meditations,

And when I meditate (oh, God forgive me!) 10
It is on her divine perfections.

I will forget her; I will arm myself
Not t' entertain a thought of love to her;
And, when I come by chance into her presence,
I'll hale these balls until my eye-strings crack. 15

From being pull'd and drawn to look that way.

Enter, over the Stage, FRANKFORD, his Wife, and NICHOLAS [and exit].

O God, O God! With what a violence
I'm hurried to mine own destruction!

There goest thou, the most perfectest man
That ever England bred a gentleman, 20
And shall I wrong his bed? — Thou God of thunder!

Stay, in Thy thoughts of vengeance and of wrath,

Thy great, almighty, and all-judging hand
From speedy execution on a villain, —
A villain and a traitor to his friend. 25

Enter JENKIN.

Jen. Did your worship call?

Wen. He doth maintain me; he allows me largely
Money to spend.

Jen. By my faith, so do not you me: I cannot get a cross of you. 30

Wen. My gelding, and my man.

Jen. That's Sorrel and I.

Wen. This kindness grows of no alliance<sup>6</sup>
'twixt us.

Jen. Nor is my service of any great acquaint-
tance.

Wen. I never bound him to me by desert. 35
Of a mere stranger, a poor gentleman,
A man by whom in no kind he could gain,
He hath plac'd me in the height of all his thoughts,

Made me companion with the best and chiefest
In Yorkshire. He cannot eat without me, 40
Nor laugh without me; I am to his body

<sup>6</sup> Relationship.

As necessary as his digestion,
And equally do make him whole or sick.
And shall I wrong this man? Base man! Ingrate!

Hast thou the power, straight with thy gory
hands, 45

To rip thy image from his bleeding heart,
To scratch thy name from out the holy book
Of his remembrance, and to wound his name
That holds thy name so dear? Or rend his
heart

To whom thy heart was knit and join'd together? — 50

And yet I must. Then Wendoll, be content!
Thus villains, when they would, cannot repent.

Jen. What a strange humour is my new master in! Pray God he be not mad; if he should be so, I should never have any mind to serve [55 him in Bedlam. It may be he's mad for missing of me.

Wen. What, Jenkin! Where's your mistress?

Jen. Is your worship married? 60

Wen. Why dost thou ask?

Jen. Because you are my master; and if I have a mistress, I would be glad, like a good servant, to do my duty to her.

Wen. I mean Mistress Frankford. 65

Jen. Marry, sir, her husband is riding out of town, and she went very lovingly to bring him on his way to horse. Do you see, sir? Here she comes, and here I go.

Wen. Vanish! [Exit JENKINS.] 70

Enter MISTRESS FRANKFORD.

Mrs. F. You are well met, sir; now, in troth, my husband

Before he took horse, had a great desire
To speak with you; we sought about the house,

Halloo'd into the fields, sent every way,
But could not meet you. Therefore, he enjoind<sup>7</sup>
me 75

To do unto you his most kind commends, —
Nay, more: he wills you, as you prize his love,
Or hold in estimation his kind friendship,
To make bold in his absence, and command
Even as himself were present in the house; 80

For you must keep his table, use his servants,
And be a present Frankford in his absence.

Wen. I thank him for his love. —

[Aside.] Give me a name, you, whose infectious tongues

Are tipt with gall and poison: as you would Think on a man that had your father slain, 85
Mur'd red your children, made your wives base
strumpets,

So call me, call me so; print in my face
The most stigmatic<sup>7</sup> title of a villain,
For hatching treason to so true a friend! 90

Mrs. F. Sir, you are much beholding to my husband;

You are a man most dear in his regard.
Wen. I am bound unto your husband, and you too.

<sup>7</sup> Opprobrious.

[Aside.] I will not speak to wrong a gentleman
Of that good estimation, my kind friend. 95
I will not; zounds! I will not. I may choose,
And I will choose. Shall I be so misled,
Or shall I purchase<sup>1</sup> to my father's crest
The motto of a villain? If I say
I will not do it, what thing can enforce me? 100
What can compel me? What sad destiny Hath such command upon my yielding thoughts?

I will not; — ha! Some fury pricks me on;
The swift fates drag me at their chariot
wheel,

And hurry me to mischief. Speak I must: 105
Injure myself, wrong her, deceive his trust!

Mrs. F. Are you not well, sir, that you seem thus troubled?
There is sedition in your countenance.

Wen. And in my heart, fair angel, chaste and wise. 109

I love you! Start not, speak not, answer not;
I love you, — nay, let me speak the rest;
Bid me to swear, and I will call to record
The host of Heaven.

Mrs. F. The host of Heaven forbid
Wendoll should hatch such a disloyal thought?

Wen. Such is my fate; to this suit was I
born, 115
To wear rich pleasure's crown, or fortune's scorn.

Mrs. F. My husband loves you.
Wen. I know it.

Mrs. F. He esteems you,
Even as his brain, his eye-ball, or his heart.

Wen. I have tried it.
Mrs. F. His purse is your exchequer, and his table 120

Doth freely serve you.
Wen. So I have found it.

Mrs. F. Oh! With what face of brass, what brow of steel,

Can you, unblushing, speak this to the face
Of the espous'd wife of so dear a friend? 124

It is my husband that maintains your state. —
Will you dishonour him that in your power
Hath left his whole affairs? I am his wife,
It is to me you speak.

Wen. O speak no more;
For more than this I know, and have recorded
Within the red-leav'd table of my heart. 130

Fair, and of all below'd, I was not fearful
Bluntly to give my life into your hand,

And at one hazard all my earthly means.
Go, tell your husband; he will turn me off,
And I am then undone. I care not, I; 135

'Twas for your sake. Perchance, in rage he'll kill me;

I care not, 't was for you, Say I incur
The general name of villain through the world,

Of traitor to my friend; I care not, I.
Beggary, shame, death, scandal, and reproach, — 140

For you I'll hazard all. Why, what care I?
For you I'll live, and in your love I'll die.

Mrs. F. You move me, sir, to passion and to pity.

The love I bear my husband is as precious
As my soul's health.

Wen. I love your husband too, 145
And for his love I will engage my life.
Mistake me not; the augmentation
Of my sincere affection borne to you
Doth no whit lessen my regard to him.

I will be secret, lady, close as night; 150
And not the light of one small glorious star
Shall shine here in my forehead, to bewray
That act of night.

Mrs. F. What shall I say?
My soul is wandering, hath lost her way.

Oh, Master Wendoll! Oh!

Wen. Sigh not, sweet saint; 155
For every sigh you breathe draws from my heart

A drop of blood.
Mrs. F. I ne'er offended yet:
My fault, I fear, will in my brow be writ.

Women that fall, not quite bereft of grace,
Have their offences noted in their face. 160

I blush, and am asham'd. Oh, Master Wen-
doll,

Pray God I be not born to curse your tongue,
That hath enchanted me! This maze I am
in

I fear will prove the labyrinth of sin.

Enter NICHOLAS [behind].

Wen. The path of pleasure and the gate to bliss, 165

Which on your lips I knock at with a kiss!
Nich. I'll kill the rogue.

Wen. Your husband is from home, your bed's no blab.

Nay, look not down and blush!

[*Exit WENDOLL and MISTRESS
FRANKFORD.*]

Nich. Zounds! I'll stab.
Ay, Nick, was it thy chance to come just in the nick? 170

I love my master, and I hate that slave;
I love my mistress, but these tricks I like
not.

My master shall not pocket up this wrong;
I'll eat my fingers first. What say'st thou, metal?

Does not that rascal Wendoll go on legs 175
That thou must cut off? Hath he not ham-strings

That thou must hough? Nay, metal, thou shalt
stand

To all I say. I'll henceforth turn a spy,
And watch them in their close conveyances.<sup>2</sup>

I never look'd for better of that rascal, 180
Since he came miching<sup>3</sup> first into our house.

It is that Satan hath corrupted her;
For she was fair and chaste. I'll have an eye

In all their gestures. Thus I think of them:
If they proceed as they have done before, 185
Wendoll's a knave, my mistress is a —

Exit.

<sup>3</sup> Sneaking.

[ACT III]

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter SIR CHARLES MOUNTFORD and SUSAN.

Sir C. Sister, you see we are driven to hard shift,
To keep this poor house we have left unsold.
I'm now enforc'd to follow husbandry,
And you to milk; and do we not live well?
Well, I thank God.

Susan. Oh, brother! here's a change,<sup>5</sup>
Since old Sir Charles died in our father's house.

Sir C. All things on earth thus change,
some up, some down;
Content's a kingdom, and I wear that crown.

Enter SHAFTON, with a Sergeant.

Shaft. Good morrow, morrow, Sir Charles!
What! With your sister,<sup>9</sup>
Plying your husbandry? — Sergeant, stand off! —
You have a pretty house here, and a garden,
And goodly ground about it. Since it lies
So near a lordship that I lately bought,
I would fain buy it of you. I will give you —

Sir C. Oh, pardon me; this house successively<sup>15</sup>

Hath long'd to me and my progenitors
Three hundred years. My great-great-grandfather,

He in whom first our gentle style began,
Dwelt here, and in this ground increas't this mole-hill

Unto that mountain which my father left me.
Where he the first of all our house began,<sup>21</sup>

I now the last will end, and keep this house, —
This virgin title, never yet deflower'd
By any unthrif of the Mountfords' line.

In brief, I will not sell it for more gold.<sup>25</sup>
Than you could hide or pave the ground withal.

Shaft. Ha, ha! a proud mind and a beggar's purse!

Where's my three hundred pounds, besides the use?<sup>2</sup>

I have brought it to an execution<sup>28</sup>
By course of law. What! Is my money ready?

Sir C. An execution, sir, and never tell me
You put my bond in suit? You deaf extremely.<sup>3</sup>

Shaft. Sell me the land, and I'll acquit you straight.

Sir C. Alas, alas! 'T is all trouble hath left
me

To cherish me and my poor sister's life,<sup>35</sup>
If this were sold, our names should then be quite

Raz'd from the bead-roll<sup>4</sup> of gentility.
You see what hard shift we have made to keep
it

Allied still to our name. This palm you see,
Labour hath glow'd within; her silver brow,<sup>40</sup>
That never tasted a rough winter's blast
Without a mask or fan, doth with a grace
Defy cold winter, and his storms outface.

Susan. Sir, we feed sparing, and we labour
hard,

We lie uneasy, to reserve to us<sup>45</sup>
And our succession this small spot of ground.

Sir C. I have so bent my thoughts to husbandry,

That I protest I scarcely can remember
What a new fashion is; how silk or satin
Feels in my hand. Why, pride is grown to us<sup>50</sup>
A mere, mere stranger. I have quite forgot
The names of all that ever waited on me.

I cannot name ye any of my hounds,
Once from whose echoing mouths I heard all music

That e'er my heart desir'd. What should I say?<sup>55</sup>

To keep this place, I have chang'd myself
away.

Shaft. Arrest him at my suit! — Actions and actions

Shall keep thee in perpetual bondage fast;
Nay, more, I'll sue thee by a late appeal,
And call thy former life in question.<sup>60</sup>

The keeper is my friend; thou shalt have irons,
And usage such as I'll deny to dogs. —
Away with him!

Sir C. You are too timorous.<sup>5</sup>

But trouble is my master,
And I will serve him truly. — My kind sister,
Thy tears are of no use to mollify<sup>65</sup>

The flinty man. Go to my father's brother,
My kinsmen, and allies; entreat them for me,
To ransom me from this injurious man
That seeks my ruin.

Shaft. Come, irons! Come away;<sup>70</sup>
I'll see thee lodg'd far from the sight of day.

Exeunt [except SUSAN].

Susan. My heart's so hard'ned with the frost of grief,

Death cannot pierce it through. — Tyrant too fell!

So lead the fiends condemned souls to hell.

Enter SIR FRANCIS ACTON and MALBY.

Sir F. Again to prison! Malby, hast thou seen<sup>75</sup>

A poor slave better tortur'd? Shall we hear
The music of his voice cry from the grate,<sup>8</sup>

Meat, for the Lord's sake? No, no; yet I am
not

Thoroughly reveng'd. They say, he hath a pretty wench

Unto his sister; shall I, in mercy-sake<sup>80</sup>
To him and to his kindred, bribe the fool

To shame herself by lewd, dishonest lust?
I'll proffer largely; but, the deed being done,
I'll smile to see her base confusion.

Mal. Methinks, Sir Francis, you are full re-veng'd<sup>85</sup>

For greater wrongs than he can proffer you.
See where the poor sad gentlewoman stands!

Sir F. Ha, ha! Now will I flout her poverty,
Deride her fortunes, scoff her base estate;

My very soul the name of Mountford hates.<sup>90</sup>
But stay, my heart! Oh, what a look did fly

<sup>5</sup> Ed. conj. tyrannous. <sup>6</sup> Of the debtor's prison.

To strike my soul through with thy piercing eye!

I am enchanted; all my spirits are fled.
And with one glance my envious spleen struck dead.

Susan. Acton! That seeks our blood!

Sir F. O chaste and fair! <sup>95</sup>
Runs away.

Mal. Sir Francis! Why, Sir Francis! Zounds, in a trance?

Sir Francis! What cheer, man? Come, come, how is 't?

Sir F. Was she not fair? Or else this judging eye

Cannot distinguish beauty.

Mal. She was fair. <sup>99</sup>

Sir F. She was an angel in a mortal's shape,
And ne'er descended from old Mountford's line.
But soft, soft, let me call my wits together!
A poor, poor wench, to my great adversary
Sister, whose very souls denounce stern war
One against other! How now, Frank, turn'd fool <sup>106</sup>

Or madman, whether? But no! Master of My perfect senses and directest wits.
Then why should I be in this violent humour
Of passion and of love? And with a person
So different every way, and so oppos'd <sup>110</sup>
In all contractions <sup>1</sup> and still-warring actions?
Fie, fie! How I dispute against my soul!
Come, come; I'll gain her, or in her fair quest
Purchase my soul free and immortal rest.

[Exeunt.]

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter three or four Serving-men, one with a vorder<sup>3</sup> and a wooden knife, to take away all; another the salt and bread; another with the table-cloth and napkins; another the carpet; <sup>4</sup> JENKIN with two lights after them.

Jen. So; march in order, and retire in battle array! My master and the guests have supp'd already; all's taken away. Here, now spread for the serving-men in the hall! — Butler, it belongs to your office. <sup>5</sup>

But. I know it, Jenkin. What d' ye call the gentleman that supp'd there to-night?

Jen. Who? My master?

But. No, no; Master Wendoll, he's a daily guest. I mean the gentleman that came <sup>10</sup> but this afternoon.

Jen. His name's Master Cranwell. God's light! Hark, within there; my master calls to lay more billets<sup>5</sup> upon the fire. Come, come! Lord, how we that are in office here in the <sup>15</sup> house are troubled! One spread the carpet in the parlour, and stand ready to snuff the lights; the rest be ready to prepare their stomachs! More lights in the hall, there! Come, Nicholas.

Exeunt [all but NICHOLAS].

Nich. I cannot eat; but had I Wendoll's heart, <sup>20</sup>

I would eat that. The rogue grows impudent, Oh! I have seen such vile, notorious tricks,

<sup>3</sup> Tray for removing dishes.

Ready to make my eyes dart from my head.

I'll tell my master; by this air, I will;

Fall what may fall, I'll tell him. Here he comes. <sup>25</sup>

Enter MASTER FRANKFORD, as it were brushing the crumbs from his clothes with a napkin, as newly risen from supper.

Frank. Nicholas, what make you here? Why are not you

At supper in the hall, among your fellows?

Nich. Master, I stay'd your rising from the board,

To speak with you.

Frank. Be brief then, gentle Nicholas; My wife and guests attend<sup>6</sup> me in the parlour. <sup>30</sup>

Why dost thou pause? Now, Nicholas, you want money,

And, unthrift-like, would eat into your wages

Ere you had earn'd it. Here, sir, 's half-a-crown; Play the good husband, <sup>7</sup> — and away to supper!

Nich. By this hand, an honourable gentleman! I will not see him wrong'd. <sup>35</sup>

Sir, I have serv'd you long; you entertain'd me Seven years before your beard; you knew me, sir,

Before you knew my mistress.

Frank. What of this, good Nicholas?

Nich. I never was a make-bate<sup>8</sup> or a knave; <sup>40</sup> I have no fault but one — I'm given to quarrel, But not with women. I will tell you, master,

That which will make your heart leap from your breast,

Your hair to startle from your head, your ears to tingle.

Frank. What preparation's this to dismal news? <sup>45</sup>

Nich. 'Sblood! sir, I love you better than your wife.

I'll make it good.

Frank. You are a knave, and I have much ado

With wonted patience to contain my rage, And not to break thy pate. Thou art a knave. <sup>50</sup>

I'll turn you, with your base comparisons, Out of my doors.

Nich. Do, do.

There is not room for Wendoll and me too,

Both in one house. O master, master,

That Wendoll is a villain!

Frank. Ay, saucy? <sup>55</sup>

Nich. Strike, strike, do strike; yet hear me! I am no fool;

I know a villain, when I see him act

Deeds of a villain. Master, master, the base slave

Enjoys my mistress, and dishonours you.

Frank. Thou hast kill'd me with a weapon, whose sharp point <sup>60</sup>

Hath prick'd quite through and through my shiv'ring heart.

Drops of cold sweat sit dangling on my hairs, Like morning's dew upon the golden flowers,

<sup>8</sup> Maker of quarrels.

And I am plung'd into strange agonies.
What did'st thou say? If any word that touch

His credit, or her reputation,
It is as hard to enter my belief,
As Dives into heaven.

Nich. I can gain nothing:
They are two that never wrong'd me. I knew before

'T was but a thankless office, and perhaps
As much as is my service, or my life Is worth. All this I know; but this, and more,
More by a thousand dangers, could not hire
me

To smother such a heinous wrong from you.
I saw, and I have said.

Frank. 'T is probable. Though blunt, yet he is honest.

Though I durst pawn my life, and on their faith

Hazard the dear salvation of my soul,
Yet in my trust I may be too secure.
May this be true? Oh, may it? Can it be?
Is it by any wonder possible?

Man, woman, what thing mortal can we trust,
When friends and bosom wives prove so unjust? —

What instance<sup>1</sup> hast thou of this strange report?

Nich. Eyes, [master,] eyes.

Frank. Thy eyes may be deceiv'd, I tell
thee;

For should an angel from the heavens drop
down,

And preach this to me that thyself hast told,
He should have much ado to win belief;
In both their loves I am so confident.

Nich. Shall I discourse the same by circumstance?

Frank. No more! To supper, and command your fellows

To attend us and the strangers! Not a word,
I charge thee, on thy life! Be secret then;
For I know nothing.

Nich. I am dumb; and, now that I have eas'd my stomach,<sup>2</sup>

I will go fill my stomach. [Exit.]

Frank. Away! Begone! —
She is well born, descended nobly;

Virtuous her education; her repute
Is in the general voice of all the country

Honest and fair; her carriage, her demeanour,
In all her actions that concern the love

To me her husband, modest, chaste, and godly.
Is all this seeming gold plain copper?

But he, that Judas that hath borne my purse,
Hath sold me for a sin. O God! O God!

Shall I put up these wrongs? No! Shall I trust

The bare report of this suspicious groom,
Before the double-gilt, the well-hatch'd<sup>3</sup> ore

Of their two hearts? No, I will lose these
thoughts;

Distraction I will banish from my brow,

And from my looks exile sad discontent.
Their wonted favours in my tongue shall flow;

Till I know all, I'll nothing seem to know. —
Lights and a table there! Wife, Master
Wendoll,

And gentle Master Cranwell!

Enter MISTRESS FRANKFORD, MASTER WEN-DOLL, MASTER CRANWELL, NICHOLAS, and JENKIN with cards, carpets, stools, and other necessaries.

Frank. O! Master Cranwell, you are a stranger here,
And often balk<sup>4</sup> my house; faith, y'are a churl! —

Now we have supp'd, a table, and to cards!

Jen. A pair<sup>5</sup> of cards, Nicholas, and a carpet to cover the table! Where's Cicely, with her [12] counters and her box? Candles and candlesticks, there! Pie! We have such a household of serving-creatures! Unless it be Nick and I, there's not one amongst them all that can say bo to a goose. — Well said,<sup>6</sup> Nick!

They spread a carpet: set down lights and cards.

Mrs. F. Come, Mr. Frankford, who shall take my part?<sup>7</sup>

Frank. Marry, that will I, sweet wife.

Wen. No, by my faith, when you are together, I sit out. It must be Mistress Frankford and I, or else it is no match.

Frank. I do not like that match.

Nich. [Aside.] You have no reason, marry, knowing all.

Frank. 'T is no great matter, neither. — Come, Master Cranwell, shall you and I take them up?<sup>8</sup>

Cran. At your pleasure, sir.

Frank. I must look to you, Master Wendoll, for you'll be playing false. Nay, so will my wife, too.

Nich. [Aside.] Ay, I will be sworn she will.

Mrs. F. Let them that are taken playing false, forfeit the set!

Frank. Content; it shall go hard but I'll take
you.

Cran. Gentlemen, what shall our game be?

Wen. Master Frankford, you play best at noddy.<sup>9</sup>

Frank. You shall not find it so; indeed, you shall not.

Mrs. F. I can play at nothing so well as double-ruff.<sup>10</sup>

Frank. If Master Wendoll and my wife be together, there's no playing against them at double-hand.

Nich. I can tell you, sir, the game that Master Wendoll is best at.

Wen. What game is that, Nick?

Nich. Marry, sir, knave out of doors.

Wen. She and I will take you at lodam.

Mrs. F. Husband, shall we play at saint?

Frank. [Aside.] My saint's turn'd devil. —
No, we'll none of saint: 160
You are best at new-cut, wife, you'll play at that.

Wen. If you play at new-cut, I'm soonest hither of any here, for a wager.

Frank. [Aside.] 'Tis me they play on. —
Well, you may draw out; 164
For all your cunning, 't will be to your shame; I'll teach you, at your new-cut, a new game. Come, come!

Cran. If you cannot agree upon the game, To post and pair!

Wen. We shall be soonest pairs; and my good host, 170
When he comes late home, he must kiss the post.<sup>1</sup>

Frank. Whoever wins, it shall be to thy cost.

Cran. Faith, let it be vide-ruff, and let's make honours!

Frank. If you make honours, one thing let me crave:
Honour the king and queen, except the knave. 176

Wen. Well, as you please for that. — Lift,<sup>2</sup> who shall deal?

Mrs. F. The least in sight. What are you, Master Wendoll?

Wen. I am a knave.

Nich. [Aside.] I'll swear it.
Mrs. F. I a queen.

Frank. [Aside.] A queen, thou should'st say. — Well, the cards are mine:

They are the grossest pair<sup>3</sup> that e'er I felt. 180
Mrs. F. Shuffle, I'll cut: would I had never dealt!

Frank. I have lost my dealing.
Wen. Sir, the fault's in me;
This queen I have more than mine own, you see. Give me the stock!<sup>4</sup>

Frank. My mind's not on my game. Many a deal I've lost; the more's your shame. You have serv'd me a bad trick, Master Wendoll. 186

Wen. Sir, you must take your lot. To end this strife,

I know I have dealt better with your wife.

Frank. Thou hast dealt falsely, then.

Mrs. F. What's trumps? 190

Wen. Hearts, Partner, I rub.

Frank. [Aside.] Thou robb'st me of my soul, of her chaste love;

In thy false dealing thou hast robb'd my heart. —

Booty you play; I like a loser stand, Having no heart, or here or in my hand. 196

I will give o'er the set, I am not well.

Come, who will hold my cards?

Mrs. F. Not well, sweet Master Frankford? Alas, what ails you? 'T is some sudden qualm.

Wen. How long have you been so, Master Frankford? 200

Frank. Sir, I was lusty, and I had my health,

But I grew ill when you began to deal. — Take hence this table! — Gentle Master Cranwell,

Y' are welcome; see your chamber at your pleasure!

I am sorry that this megrim takes me so, 206
I cannot sit and bear you company. —

Jenkin, some lights, and show him to his chamber!<sup>4</sup>

Mrs. F. A nightgown for my husband; quickly, there!

It is some rheum or cold.

Wen. Now, in good faith, This illness you have got by sitting late 210
Without your gown.

Frank. I know it, Master Wendoll. Go, go to bed, lest you complain like me! —

Wife, prithee, wife, into my bed-chamber! The night is raw and cold, and rheumatic.

Leave me my gown and light; I'll walk away my fit. 216

Wen. Sweet sir, good night!

Frank. Myself, good night! [Exit Wendoll.]

Mrs. F. Shall I attend you, husband?
Frank. No, gentle wife, thou'lt catch cold in thy head.

Prithee, begone, sweet; I'll make haste to bed.

Mrs. F. No sleep will fasten on mine eyes, you know, 220

Until you come. [Exit.]

Frank. Sweet Nan, I prithee, go! — I have bethought me; get me by degrees

The keys of all my doors, which I will mould in wax, and take their fair impression,

To have by them new keys. This being com-past, 226

At a set hour a letter shall be brought me, And when they think they may securely

play,
They nearest are to danger. — Nick, I must rely

Upon thy trust and faithful secrecy.

Nich. Build on my faith!

Frank. To bed, then, not to rest!
Care lodges in my brain, grief in my breast. 231

[Exit.]

[SCENE III.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter SIR CHARLES'S Sister, OLD MOUNTFORD, SANDY, RODER, and TIDY.

Old Mount. You say my nephew is in great distress;

Who brought it to him but his own lewd life? I cannot spare a cross. I must confess,

He was my brother's son; why, niece, what then?

This is no world in which to pity men. 5
Susan. I was not born a beggar, though his extremes

Enforce this language from me. I protest No fortune of mine own could lead my tongue

To this base key. I do beseech you, uncle,

<sup>3</sup> Pack.

For the name's sake, for Christianity, — 10
Nay, for God's sake, to pity his distress.
He is deny'd the freedom of the prison,
And in the hole is laid with men condemn'd ;
Plenty he hath of nothing but of irons,
And it remains in you to free him thence. 15

Old Mount. Money I cannot spare ; men should take heed.

He lost my kindred when he fell to need. Exit.

Susan. Gold is but earth ; thou earth enough shalt have,

When thou hast once took measure of thy grave.
You know me, Master Sandy, and my suit. 20

Sandy. I knew you, lady, when the old man
liv'd ;

I knew you ere your brother sold his land.

Then you were Mistress Sue, trick'd up in jewels ;

Then you sung well, play'd sweetly on the lute ;
But now I neither know you nor your suit. 25

[Exit.]

Susan. You, Master Roder, was my brother's tenant ;

Rent-free he plac'd you in that wealthy farm,
Of which you are possesst.

Roder. True, he did ;

And have I not there dwelt still for his sake ?
I have some business now ; but, without doubt,

They that have hurl'd him in, will help him
out. Exit. 31

Susan. Cold comfort still. What say you, cousin Tidy ?

Tidy. I say this comes of roysting, <sup>1</sup> swagg'ring.

Call me not cousin ; each man for himself !
Some men are born to mirth, and some to sorrow : 35

I am no cousin unto them that borrow. Exit.

Susan. O Charity, why art thou fled to
heaven,

And left all things [up]on this earth uneven ?
Their scoffing answers I will ne'er return,

But to myself his grief in silence mourn. 40

Enter SIR FRANCIS and MALBY.

Sir F. She is poor, I'll therefore tempt her with this gold.

Go, Malby, in my name deliver it,
And I will stay thy answer.

Mal. Fair mistress, as I understand your grief
Doth grow from want, so I have here in store

A means to furnish you, a bag of gold, 45
Which to your hands I freely tender you.

Susan. I thank you, Heavens ! I thank you, gentle sir :

God make me able to requite this favour !

Mal. This gold Sir Francis Acton sends by
me, 50

And prays you —

Susan. Acton ? O God ! That name I'm born to curse.

Hence, bawd ; hence, broker ! See, I spurn his gold.

My honour never shall for gain be sold.

Sir F. Stay, lady, stay !

<sup>1</sup> Rioting.

Susan. From you I'll posting hie, 65
Even as the doves from feather'd eagles fly.

Exit.

Sir F. She hates my name, my face ; how should I woo ?

I am disgrac'd in every thing I do.
The more she hates me, and disdains my love,

The more I am rapt in admiration 60
Of her divine and chaste perfections.

Woo her with gifts I cannot, for all gifts Sent in my name she spurns ; with looks I can-

not,
For she abhors my sight ; nor yet with letters,

For none she will receive. How then ? how then ?
Well, I will fasten such a kindness on her, 65

As shall o'ercome her hate and conquer it.
Sir Charles, her brother, lies in execution

For a great sum of money ; and, besides,
The appeal is sued still for my huntsmen's

death, 70
Which only I have power to reverse.

In her I'll bury all my hate of him. —
Go seek the Keeper, Malby, bring him to me !

To save his body, I his debts will pay ; 75
To save his life, I his appeal will stay. [Exeunt.]

[ACT IV]

[SCENE I.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter SIR CHARLES [MOUNTFORD], in prison, with irons, his feet bare, his garments all ragged and torn.

Sir C. Of all on the earth's face most miserable,

Breathe in this hellish dungeon thy laments !
Thus like a slave ragg'd, like a felon gyv'd, —

That huris thee headlong to this base estate.
Oh, unkind uncle ! Oh, my friends ingrate ! 5

Unthankful kinsmen ! Mountford's all too base,
To let thy name be fetter'd in disgrace.

A thousand deaths here in this grave I die ;
Fear, hunger, sorrow, cold, all threat my death,

And join together to deprive my breath. 10
But that which most torments me, my dear

sister
Hath left<sup>3</sup> to visit me, and from my friends

Hath brought no hopeful answer ; therefore, I
Divine they will not help my misery.

If it be so, shame, scandal, and contempt 15 Attend their covetous thoughts ; need make their graves !

Usurers they live, and may they die like slaves !

Enter Keeper.

Keep. Knight, be of comfort, for I bring thee
freedom

From all thy troubles.

Sir C. Then, I am doom'd to die :
Death is the end of all calamity. 20

Keep. Live ! Your appeal is stay'd ; the execution

Of all your debts discharg'd ; your creditors
Even to the utmost penny satisfied.

<sup>3</sup> Ceased.

In sign whereof your shackles I knock off.
 You are not left so much indebted to us 25
 As for your fees; all is discharg'd; all paid.
 Go freely to your house, or where you please;
 After long miseries, embrace your ease.

Sir C. Thou grumblest out the sweetest music to me

That ever organ play'd. — Is this a dream? 30
 Or do my waking senses apprehend
 The pleasing taste of these applausiv<sup>1</sup> news?
 Slave that I was, to wrong such honest friends,
 My loving kinsman, and my near allies! 35
 Tongue, I will bite thee for the scandal breath'd Against such faithful kinsmen; they are all
 Compos'd of pity and compassion,
 Of melting charity and of moving ruth.
 That which I spoke before was in my rage;
 They are my friends, the mirrors of this age; 40
 Bounteous and free. The noble Mountford's race

Ne'er bred a covetous thought, or humour base.

Enter SUSAN.

Susan. I cannot longer stay from visiting My woful brother. While I could, I kept
 My hapless tidings from his hopeful ear. 46

Sir C. Sister, how much am I indebted to
 thee

And to thy travail!

Susan. What, at liberty?

Sir C. Thou seest I am, thanks to thy industry.

Oh! Unto which of all my courteous friends
 Am I thus bound? My uncle Mountford, he 50
 Even of an infant lov'd me; was it he?
 So did my cousin Tidy; was it he?
 So Master Roder, Master Sandy, too.

Which of all these did this high kindness do?

Susan. Charles, can you mock me in your poverty. 55

Knowing your friends deride your misery?

Now, I protest I stand so much amaz'd,
 To see your bonds free, and your irons knock'd
 off,

That I am rapt into a maze of wonder;
 The rather for I know not by what means 60
 This happiness hath chanc'd.

Sir C. Why, by my uncle,
 My cousins, and my friends; who else, I pray,
 Would take upon them all my debts to pay?

Susan. Oh, brother! they are men [made] all of flint,

Pictures of marble, and as void of pity 65
 As chased bears. I begg'd, I sued, I kneel'd,
 Laid open all your griefs and miseries,
 Which they derided; more than that, deni'd us
 A part in their alliance; but, in pride,
 Said that our kindred with our plenty died. 70

Sir C. Drudges too much,<sup>2</sup> — what did they?
 Oh, known evil!

Rich fly the poor, as good men shun the devil.
 Whence should my freedom come? Of whom alive,

Saving of those, have I deserv'd so well?

Guess, sister, call to mind, remember me! 75

These have I rais'd, they follow the world's guise,

Whom rich [they]<sup>3</sup> honour, they in woe despise.
Susan. My wits have lost themselves; let's ask the keeper!

Sir C. Gaoler!

Keep. At hand, sir. 80

Sir C. Of courtesy resolve me one demand!

What was he took the burden of my debts
 From off my back, staid my appeal to death,
 Discharg'd my fees, and brought me liberty?

Keep. A courteous knight, one call'd Sir
 Francis Acton. 85

Sir C. Ha! Acton! Oh me! More distress'd
 in this

Than all my troubles! Hale me back,
 Double my irons, and my sparing meals
 Put into halves, and lodge me in a dungeon
 More deep, more dark, more cold, more com-fortless! 90

By Acton freed! Not all thy manacles
 Could fetter so my heels, as this one word
 Hath thrall'd my heart; and it must now lie bound

In more strict prison than thy stony gaol.

I am not free, I go but under bail. 95

Keep. My charge is done, sir, now I have my fees.

As we get little, we will nothing leese.<sup>4</sup>

Sir C. By Acton freed, my dangerous opposite!

Why, to what end? On what occasion? Ha!
 Let me forget the name of enemy, 100
 And with indifference balance<sup>5</sup> this high favour!

Ha!

Susan. [Aside.] His love to me, upon my soul,
 't is so!

That is the root from whence these strange things grow.

Sir C. Had this proceeded from my father, he
 That by the law of Nature is most bound 105

In offices of love, it had deserv'd
 My best employment to requite that grace.

Had it proceeded from my friends, or him, 109

From them this action had deserv'd my life, —
 And from a stranger more, because from such

There is less execution<sup>6</sup> of good deeds.
 But he, nor father, nor ally, nor friend,

More than a stranger, both remote in blood,
 And in his heart oppos'd my enemy, 115

That this high bounty should proceed from
 him, —

Oh! there I lose myself. What should I say,
 What think, what do, his bounty to repay?

Susan. You wonder, I am sure, whence this strange kindness

Proceeds in Acton; I will tell you, brother. 120
 He dotes on me, and oft hath sent me gifts,
 Letters, and tokens; I refus'd them all.

Sir C. I have enough, though poor: my heart is set,

In one rich gift to pay back all my debt.

Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]

Enter FRANKFORD and NICHOLAS, with keys and a letter in his hand.

Frank. This is the night that I must play my part,

To try two seeming angels.—Where 's my keys?

Nich. They are made according to your mould in wax.

I bade the smith be secret, gave him money, And here they are. The letter, sir!

Frank. True, take it, there it is;

And when thou seest me in my pleasant'st vein, Ready to sit to supper, bring it me!

Nich. I'll do 't; make no more question, but I'll do it. Exit.

Enter MISTRESS FRANKFORD, CRANWELL, WENDOLL, and JENKIN.

Mrs. F. 'Sirrah, 'tis six o'clock already struck;

Go bid them spread the cloth, and serve in supper!

Jen. It shall be done, forsooth, mistress. Where 's Spigot, the butler, to give us out salt and trenchers?

Wen. We that have been a hunting all the day, Come with prepared stomachs.—Master Frankford,

We wish'd you at our sport.

Frank. My heart was with you, and my mind was on you.—

Fie, Master Cranwell! You are still thus sad.— A stool, a stool! Where 's Jenkin, and where 's Nick?

'T is supper time at least an hour ago.

What 's the best news abroad?

Wen. I know none good.

Frank. [Aside.] But I know too much bad.

Enter Butler and JENKIN, with a table-cloth, bread, trenchers, and salt; [then exeunt.]

Cran. Methinks, sir, you might have that interest<sup>2</sup>

In your wife's brother, to be more remiss<sup>3</sup> In his hard dealing against poor Sir Charles, Who, as I hear, lies in York Castle, needy And in great want.

Frank. Did not more weighty business of mine own

Hold me away, I would have labour'd peace Betwixt them with all care; indeed I would, sir.

Mrs. F. I'll write unto my brother earnestly In that behalf.

Wen. A charitable deed, And will beget the good opinion Of all your friends that love you, Mistress Frankford.

Frank. That 's you, for one; I know you love Sir Charles, [Aside.] And my wife too, well.

Wen. He deserves the love Of all true gentlemen; be yourselves judge!

Frank. But supper, ho!—Now, as thou lov'st me, Wendoll,

Which I am sure thou dost, be merry, pleasant, And frolic it to-night!—Sweet Mr. Cranwell, Do you the like!—Wife, I protest, my heart Was ne'er more bent on sweet alacrity.

Where be those lazy knaves to serve in supper?

Enter NICHOLAS.

Nich. Here 's a letter, sir.

Frank. Whence comes it, and who brought it?

Nich. A stripling that below attends your answer,

And, as he tells me, it is sent from York.

Frank. Have him into the cellar, let him taste

A cup of our March beer; go, make him drink!

Nich. I'll make him drunk, if he be a Trojan.

Frank. [after reading the letter.] My boots and spurs! Where 's Jenkin? God forgive me,

How I neglect my business!—Wife, look here! I have a matter to be tri'd to-morrow

By eight o'clock; and my attorney writes me, I must be there betimes with evidence,

Or it will go against me. Where 's my boots?

Enter JENKIN, with boots and spurs.

Mrs. F. I hope your business craves no such despatch,

That you must ride to-night?

Wen. [Aside.] I hope it doth.

Frank. God's me! No such despatch? Jenkin, my boots! Where 's Nick? Saddle my roan,

And the grey dapple for himself!—Content ye, It much concerns me.—Gentle Master Cranwell, And Master Wendoll, in my absence use

The very ripest pleasure of my house!

Wen. Lord! Master Frankford, will you ride to-night?

The ways are dangerous.

Frank. Therefore will I ride Appointed<sup>6</sup> well; and so shall Nick, my man.

Mrs. F. I'll call you up by five o'clock to-morrow.

Frank. No, by my faith, wife, I'll not trust to that:

'T is not such easy rising in a morning From one I love so dearly. No, by my faith,

I shall not leave so sweet a bedfellow, But with much pain. You have made me a sluggard Since I first knew you.

Mrs. F. Then, if you needs will go This dangerous evening, Master Wendoll,

Let me entreat you bear him company.

Wen. With all my heart, sweet mistress.— My boots, there!

Frank. Fie, fie, that for my private business I should disease<sup>6</sup> a friend, and be a trouble To the whole house!—Nick!

Nich. Anon, sir! 80

Frank. Bring forth my gelding! — As you love me, sir,
Use no more words: a hand, good Master Cranwell!

Cran. Sir, God be your good speed!

Frank. Good night, sweet Nan; nay, nay, a kiss, and part!

[Aside.] Dissembling lips, you suit not with my heart. 85

Exeunt [FRANKFORD and NICHOLAS].

Wen. [Aside.] How business, time, and hours, all gracious prove,

And are the furtherers to my new-born love!
I am husband now in Master Frankford's place,
And must command the house. — My pleasure is

We will not sup abroad so publicly, 90
But in your private chamber, Mistress Frankford.

Mrs. F. Oh, sir! you are too public in your love,

And Master Frankford's wife —

Cran. Might I crave favour,
I would entreat you I might see my chamber.

I am on the sudden grown exceeding ill, 95
And would be spar'd from supper.

Wen. Light there, ho! —
See you want nothing, sir, for if you do,

You injure that good man, and wrong me too.

Cran. I will make bold; good night! [Exit.]

Wen. How all conspire
To make our bosom<sup>1</sup> sweet, and full entire! 100
Come, Nan, I pry'thee, let us sup within!

Mrs. F. Oh! what a clog unto the soul is sin!
We pale offenders are still full of fear;

Every suspicious eye brings danger near;
When they, whose clear hearts from offence 105
are free,

Despise report, base scandals do outface,
And stand at mere defiance with disgrace.

Wen. Fie, fie! You talk too like a puritan.

Mrs. F. You have tempted me to mischief,
Master Wendoll:

I have done I know not what. Well, you plead custom; 110

That which for want of wit I granted erst,
I now must yield through fear. Come, come,

let's in;
Once over shoes, we are straight o'er head in sin.

Wen. My jocund soul is joyful beyond measure; 114
I'll be profuse in Frankford's richest treasure.

Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter CICELY, JENKIN, Butler, and other Serving-men.

Jen. My mistress and Master Wendoll, my master, sup in her chamber to-night. Cicely, you are prefer'd, from being the cook, to be chambermaid. Of all the loves betwixt thee and me, tell me what thou think'st of this? 5

Cic. Mum; there's an old proverb, — when the cat's away, the mouse may play.

Jen. Now you talk of a cat, Cicely, I smell a rat.

Cic. Good words, Jenkin, lest you be call'd [10 to answer them!

Jen. Why, God make my mistress an honest woman! Are not these good words? Pray God my new master play not the knave with my old master! Is there any hurt in this? God send [15 no villainy intended; and if they do sup together, pray God they do not lie together! God make my mistress chaste, and make us all His servants! What harm is there in all this? Nay, more; here in my hand, thou shalt never have [20 my heart, unless thou say, Amen.

Cic. Amen; I pray God, I say.

Enter Serving-man.

Serving-man. My mistress sends that you should make less noise. So, lock up the doors, and see the household all got to bed! You, [25
Jenkin, for this night are made the porter, to see the gates shut in.

Jen. Thus by little and little I creep into office. Come, to kennel, my masters, to kennel; 'tis eleven o'clock already. 30

Serving-man. When you have lock'd the gates in, you must send up the keys to my mistress.

Cic. Quickly, for God's sake, Jenkin; for I must carry them. I am neither pillow nor bolster, but I know more than both. 35

Jen. To bed, good Spigot; to bed, good honest serving-creatures; and let us sleep as snug as pigs in pease-straw! Exeunt.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter FRANKFORD and NICHOLAS.

Frank. Soft, soft! We've tied our geldings to a tree,
Two flight-shot<sup>4</sup> off, lest by their thundering hoofs

They blab our coming back. Hear'st thou no noise?

Nich. Hear? I hear nothing but the owl and you.

Frank. So; now my watch's hand points upon twelve, 5

And it is dead midnight. Where are my keys?

Nich. Here, sir.

Frank. This is the key that opes my outward gate;

This, the hall-door; this, the withdrawing-chamber; 9

But this, that door that's bawd unto my shame, Fountain and spring of all my bleeding thoughts, Where the most hallowed order and true knot Of nuptial sanctity hath been profan'd.

It leads to my polluted bed-chamber,
Once my terrestrial heaven, now my earth's hell, 15

The place where sins in all their ripeness dwell. —

But I forget myself; now to my gate!

Nich. It must ope with far less noise than Cripplegate, or your plot's dash'd.

Frank. So ; reach me my dark lantern to the rest ! 20

Tread softly, softly !

Nich. I will walk on eggs this pace.

Frank. A general silence hath surpris'd the house,

And this is the last door. Astonishment, Fear, and amazement, beat upon my heart, Even as a madman beats upon a drum. 25

Oh, keep my eyes, you Heavens, before I enter, From any sight that may transfix my soul ; Or, if there be so black a spectacle, Oh, strike mine eyes stark blind ; or if not so, Lend me such patience to digest my grief, 30 That I may keep this white and virgin hand From any violent outrage, or red murder ! — And with that prayer I enter.

[Exeunt into the house.]

[SCENE V.]<sup>1</sup>

[Enter NICHOLAS.]

Nich. Here 's a circumstance !<sup>2</sup>
A man may be made cuckold in the time That he 's about it. An the case were mine, As 't is my master's, 'sblood ! (that he makes me swear !), 4
I would have plac'd his action,<sup>3</sup> enter'd there ; I would, I would !

[Enter FRANKFORD.]

Frank. Oh ! oh !

Nich. Master ! 'Sblood ! Master, master !

Frank. Oh me unhappy ! I have found them lying

Close in each other's arms, and fast asleep. 9
But that I would not damn two precious souls, Bought with my Saviour's blood, and send them, laden

With all their scarlet sins upon their backs, Unto a fearful judgment, their two lives Had met upon my rapier.

Nich. Master, what, have you left them sleeping still ? 15

Let me go wake 'em !

Frank. Stay, let me pause awhile ! — Oh, God ! Oh, God ! That it were possible To undo things done ; to call back yesterday ; That Time could turn up his swift sandy glass, To untell<sup>4</sup> the days, and to redeem these hours ! Or that the sun 21
Could, rising from the west, draw his coach backward ;

Take from th' account of time so many minutes, Till he had all these seasons call'd again, Those minutes, and those actions done in them, Even from her first offence ; that I might take her 26

As spotless as an angel in my arms !

But, oh ! I talk of things impossible, And cast beyond the moon. God give me patience ;

For I will in, and wake them. Exit.

Nich. Here 's patience perforce !<sup>30</sup>
He needs must trot afoot that tires his horse.

[Exit.]

Enter WENDOLL, running over the stage in a night-gown,<sup>5</sup> FRANKFORD after him with his sword drawn ; a maid in her smock stays his hand, and clasps hold on him. He pauses for a while.

Frank. I thank thee, maid ; thou, like the angel's hand, Hast stay'd me from a bloody sacrifice. — Go, villain ; and my wrongs sit on thy soul As heavy as this grief doth upon mine ! 35
When thou record'st my many courtesies, And shalt compare them with thy treacherous heart,

Lay them together, weigh them equally, — 'T will be revenge enough. Go, to thy friend A Judas ; pray, pray, lest I live to see 40
Thee, Judas-like, hang'd on an elder-tree !

Enter MISTRESS FRANKFORD in her smock, night-gown, and night-attire.

Mrs. F. Oh, by what word, what title, or what name,

Shall I entreat your pardon ? Pardon ! Oh ! I am as far from hoping such sweet grace, As Lucifer from Heaven. To call you husband, — 45 (Oh me, most wretched ! I have lost that name ; I am no more your wife.

Nich. 'Sblood, sir, she swoons.

Frank. Spare thou thy tears, for I will weep for thee ;

And keep thy count'nance, for I'll blush for thee.

Now, I protest, I think 't is I am tainted, 50
For I am most ashamed ; and 't is more hard For me to look upon thy guilty face Than on the sun's clear brow. What ! Would'st thou speak ?

Mrs. F. I would I had no tongue, no ears, no eyes,

No apprehension, no capacity. 55

When do you spurn me like a dog ? When tread me

Under feet ? When drag me by the hair ? Though I deserve a thousand, thousand fold, More than you can inflict — yet, once my husband,

For womanhood, to which I am a shame, 60
Though once an ornament — even for His sake, That hath redeem'd our souls, mark not my face,

Nor hack me with your sword ; but let me go Perfect and undeformed to my tomb ! I am not worthy that I should prevail 65
In the least suit ; no, not to speak to you, Nor look on you, nor to be in your presence ; Yet, as an object,<sup>6</sup> this one suit I crave ; — This granted, I am ready for my grave.

Frank. My God, with patience arm me ! — Rise, nay, rise, 70

And I'll debate with thee. Was it for want

Thou play'dst the strumpet? Wast thou not suppli'd

With every pleasure, fashion, and new toy, —
Nay, even beyond my calling?<sup>1</sup>

Mrs. F. I was.

Frank. Was it, then, disability in me; <sup>75</sup>
Or in thine eye seem'd he a properer man?

Mrs. F. Oh, no!

Frank. Did I not lodge thee in my bosom?
Wear thee here in my heart?

Mrs. F. You did.

Frank. I did, indeed; witness my tears; I did —

Go, bring my infants hither! —

[Two Children are brought in.]

Oh, Nan! Oh, Nan!

If neither fear of shame, regard of honour, <sup>81</sup>
The blemish of my house, nor my dear love,
Could have withheld thee from so lewd a fact;
Yet for these infants, these young, harmless
souls, <sup>84</sup>

On whose white brows thy shame is character'd,
And grows in greatness as they wax in years, —
Look but on them, and melt away in tears! —
Away with them; lest, as her spotted body
Hath stain'd their names with stripe of bastardy,

So her adulterous breath may blast their spirits
With her infectious thoughts! Away with them! [Exeunt Children.] <sup>91</sup>

Mrs. F. In this one life, I die ten thousand deaths.

Frank. Stand up, stand up! I will do nothing rashly.

I will retire awhile into my study,
And thou shalt hear thy sentence presently.

Exit.

Mrs. F. 'Tis welcome, be it death. Oh me, base strumpet, <sup>96</sup>

That, having such a husband, such sweet children,

Must enjoy neither! Oh, to redeem mine honour,

I'd have this hand cut off, these my breasts
sear'd;

Be rack'd, strappado'd, put to any torment: <sup>100</sup>
Nay, to whip but this scandal out, I'd hazard
The rich and dear redemption of my soul!

He cannot be so base as to forgive me,
Nor I so shameless to accept his pardon.

Oh, women, women, you that yet have kept <sup>105</sup>
Your holy matrimonial vow unstain'd,

Make me your instance; when you tread awry,
Your sins, like mine, will on your conscience
lie.

Enter CICELY, SPIGOT, all the Serving-men, and JENKIN, as newly come out of bed.

All. Oh, mistress, mistress! What have you done, mistress?

Nich. 'Sblood, what a caterwauling keep you here! <sup>110</sup>

Jen. O Lord, mistress, how comes this to pass? My master is run away in his shirt, and never so much as call'd me to bring his clothes after him.

Mrs. F. See what guilt is! Here stand I in this place, <sup>115</sup>
Asham'd to look my servants in the face.

Enter FRANKFORD and CRANWELL; whom seeing, she falls on her knees.

Frank. My words are regist'ed in Heaven already.

With patience hear me! I'll not martyr thee,
Nor mark thee for a strumpet; but with usage
Of more humility torment thy soul, <sup>120</sup>
And kill thee even with kindness.

Cran. Master Frankford —

Frank. Good Master Cranwell! — Woman, hear thy judgment!

Go make thee ready in thy best attire; <sup>124</sup>
Take with thee all thy gowns, all thy apparel;
Leave nothing that did ever call thee mistress,
Or by whose sight, being left here in the house,
I may remember such a woman by.

Choose thee a bed and hangings for thy chamber;

Take with thee every thing which hath thy mark, <sup>130</sup>

And get thee to my manor seven mile off,
Where live; — 'tis thine; I freely give it thee.

My tenants by<sup>2</sup> shall furnish thee with wains
To carry all thy stuff within two hours;

No longer will I limit<sup>3</sup> thee my sight. <sup>135</sup>
Choose which of all my servants thou lik'st
best,

And they are thine to attend thee.

Mrs. F. A mild sentence.

Frank. But, as thou hop'st for Heaven, as thou believ'st

Thy name's recorded in the book of life,
I charge thee never after this sad day <sup>140</sup>

To see me, or to meet me; or to send,
By word or writing, gift or otherwise,

To move me, by thyself, or by thy friends;
Nor challenge any part in my two children.

So farewell, Nan; for we will henceforth be <sup>145</sup>
As we had never seen, ne'er more shall see.

Mrs. F. How full my heart is, in mine eyes appears;

What wants in words, I will supply in tears.

Frank. Come, take your coach, your stuff;
all must along.

Servants and all make ready; all begone! <sup>150</sup>
It was thy hand cut two hearts out of one.

[Exeunt.]

[ACT V]

[SCENE I.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter SIR CHARLES MOUNTFORD, gentleman-like, and his Sister, gentlewoman-like.

Susan. Brother, why have you trick'd<sup>5</sup> me like a bride,

Bought me this gay attire, these ornaments?
Forget you our estate, our poverty?

<sup>1</sup> Rank.

Sir C. Call me not brother, but imagine me
Some barbarous outlaw, or uncivil kern;<sup>1</sup> 5
For if thou shutt'st thine eye, and only hear'st
The words that I shall utter, thou shalt judge me
Some staring ruffian, not thy brother Charles.
Oh, sister! —

Susan. Oh, brother! what doth this strange language mean? 10

Sir C. Dost love me, sister? Wouldst thou see me live

A bankrupt beggar in the world's disgrace,
And die indebted to mine enemies?
Wouldst thou behold me stand like a huge beam
In the world's eye, a bye-word and a scorn? 15
It lies in thee of these to acquit me free,
And all my debt I may outstrip by thee.

Susan. By me? Why, I have nothing, nothing left;

I owe even for the clothes upon my back;
I am not worth —

Sir C. — O sister, say not so! 20
It lies in you my downcast state to raise;

To make me stand on even points with the world.

Come, sister, you are rich; indeed you are,
And in your power you have, without delay
Acton's five hundred pounds back to repay. 25

Susan. Till now I had thought you lov'd me.
By my honour

(Which I have kept as spotless as the moon),
I ne'er was mistress of that single doit<sup>2</sup>

Which I reserv'd not to supply your wants;
And do you think that I would hoard from
you? 30

Now, by my hopes in Heaven, knew I the means

To buy you from the slavery of your debts (Especially from Acton, whom I hate),
I would redeem it with my life or blood! 34

Sir C. I challenge it, and, kindred set apart,
Thus, ruffian-like, I lay siege to thy heart.
What do I owe to Acton?

Susan. Why, some five hundred pounds; towards which, I swear,

In all the world I have not one denier.<sup>3</sup>

Sir C. It will not prove so. Sister, now resolve<sup>4</sup> me: 40

What do you think (and speak your conscience)
Would Acton give, might he enjoy your bed?

Susan. He would not shrink to spend a thousand pound

To give the Mountfords' name so deep a wound.
Sir C. A thousand pound! I but five hundred owe: 45

Grant him your bed; he's paid with interest so.
Susan. Oh, brother!

Sir C. Oh, sister! only this one way,
With that rich jewel you my debts may pay.

In speaking this my cold heart shakes with
shame;

Nor do I woo you in a brother's name, 50
But in a stranger's. Shall I die in debt

To Acton, my grand foe, and you still wear
The precious jewel that he holds so dear?

Susan. My honour I esteem as dear and precious

As my redemption. 66

Sir C. I esteem you, sister,
As dear, for so dear prizing it. 66

Susan. Will Charles
Have me cut off my hands, and send them
Acton?

Rip up my breast, and with my bleeding heart
Present him as a token?

Sir C. Neither, sister;
But hear me in my strange assertion! 69

Thy honour and my soul are equal in my regard;

Nor will thy brother Charles survive thy shame.
His kindness, like a burden, hath surcharg'd
me,

And under his good deeds I stooping go,
Not with an upright soul. Had I remain'd 65

In prison still, there doubtless I had died.
Then, unto him that freed me from that prison,

Still do I owe this life. What mov'd my foe
To enfranchise me? 'T was, sister, for your love;

With full five hundred pounds he bought your
love; — 70

And shall he not enjoy it? Shall the weight
Of all this heavy burden lean on me,

And will not you bear part? You did partake
The joy of my release; will you not stand
In joint-bond bound to satisfy the debt? 75

Shall I be only charg'd?

Susan. But that I know
These arguments come from an honour'd mind,
As in your most extremity of need

Scorning to stand in debt to one you hate, —
Nay, rather would engage your unsustain'd
honour, 80

Than to be held ingrate, — I should condemn
you.

I see your resolution, and assent;
So Charles will have me, and I am content.

Sir C. For this I trick'd<sup>5</sup> you up.
Susan. But here 's a knife,

To save mine honour, shall slice out my life. 85
Sir C. I know thou pleasest me a thousand times

More in that resolution than thy grant. —
Observe her love; to soothe it to my suit,
Her honour she will hazard, though not lose;

To bring me out of debt, her rigorous hand 90
Will pierce her heart, — O wonder! — that will choose,

Rather than stain her blood, her life to lose.
Come, you sad sister to a woful brother,
This is the gate. I'll bear him such a present,
Such an acquittance for the knight to seal, 95

As will amaze his senses, and surprise
With admiration all his fantasies.

Enter SIR FRANCIS ACTON and MALBY.

Susan. Before his unchaste thoughts shall seize on me,

'T is here shall my imprison'd soul set free.

Sir F. How! Mountford with his sister, hand in hand! 100

What miracle's afoot?

Mal. It is a sight
Begets in me much admiration.<sup>1</sup>

Sir C. Stand not amaz'd to see me thus attended!

Acton, I owe thee money, and, being unable
To bring thee the full sum in ready coin, 105
Lo! for thy more assurance, here's a pawn, —
My sister, my dear sister, whose chaste honour
I prize above a million. Here! Nay, take her;
She's worth your money, man; do not forsake
her.

Sir F. I would he were in earnest! 110

Susan. Impute it not to my immodesty.
My brother, being rich in nothing else
But in his interest that he hath in me,
According to his poverty hath brought you 114
Me, all his store; whom, howso'er you prize,
As forfeit to your hand, he values highly,
And would not sell, but to acquit your debt,
For any emperor's ransom.

Sir F. Stern heart, relent,
Thy former cruelty at length repent!
Was ever known, in any former age, 120
Such honourable, wrested courtesy?
Lands, honours, life, and all the world forego,
Rather than stand engag'd to such a foe!

Sir C. Acton, she is too poor to be thy bride,
And I too much oppos'd to be thy brother. 125
There, take her to thee; if thou hast the heart
To seize her as a rape, or lustful prey;
To blur our house, that never yet was stain'd;
To murder her that never meant thee harm;
To kill me now, whom once thou sav'dst from
death: — 130

Do them at once; on her all these rely,
And perish with her spotless chastity.

Sir F. You overcome me in your love, Sir
Charles.

I cannot be so cruel to a lady
I love so dearly. Since you have not spar'd 135
To engage your reputation to the world,
Your sister's honour, which you prize so dear,
Nay, all the comforts which you hold on earth,
To grow out of my debt, being your foe, —
Your honour'd thoughts, lo! thus I recompense.
Your metamorphos'd foe receives your gift 141
In satisfaction of all former wrongs.
This jewel I will wear here in my heart;
And where before I thought her, for her wants,
Too base to be my bride, to end all strife, 145
I seal you my dear brother, her my wife.

Susan. You still exceed us. I will yield to fate,

And learn to love, where I till now did hate.

Sir C. With that enchantment you have charm'd my soul

And made me rich even in those very words! 150
I pay no debt, but am indebted more;
Rich in your love, I never can be poor.

Sir F. All's mine is yours; we are alike in state;

Let's knit in love what was oppos'd in hate!

<sup>1</sup> Wonder.

Come, for our nuptials we will straight provide,
Blest only in our brother and fair bride. 156
[Exeunt.]

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter CRANWELL, FRANKFORD, and NICHOLAS.

Cran. Why do you search each room about your house,

Now that you have despatch'd your wife away?
Frank. Oh, sir! To see that nothing may be left

That ever was my wife's. I lov'd her dearly;
And when I do but think of her unkindness, 5
My thoughts are all in hell; to avoid which tor-
ment,

I would not have a bodkin or a cuff,
A bracelet, necklace, or rabato wire,<sup>3</sup>
Nor anything that ever was call'd hers,
Left me, by which I might remember her. — 10
Seek round about.

Nich. 'Sblood! master, here's her lute flung in a corner.

Frank. Her lute! Oh, God! Upon this instrument

Her fingers have rung quick division,<sup>4</sup> Sweeter than that which now divides our hearts. 15

These frets have made me pleasant,<sup>5</sup> that have
now

Frets of my heart-strings made. Oh, Master
Cranwell,

Of't hath she made this melancholy wood
(Now mute and dumb for her disastrous chance) Speak sweetly many a note, sound many a strain 20

To her own ravishing voice; which being well strung,

What pleasant strange airs have they jointly sung! —

Post with it after her! — Now nothing's left;
Of her and hers I am at once bereft.

Nich. I'll ride and overtake her; do my message, 25

And come back again. [Exit.]

Cran. Meantime, sir, if you please,
I'll to Sir Francis Acton, and inform him
Of what hath past betwixt you and his sister.

Frank. Do as you please. — How ill am I bested,

To be a widower ere my wife be dead! 30
[Exeunt.]

[SCENE III.]<sup>6</sup>

Enter MISTRESS FRANKFORD; with JENKIN, her maid CICELY, her Coachmen, and three Carters.

Mrs. F. Bid my coach stay! Why should I ride in state,

Being hurl'd so low down by the hand of fate?
A seat like to my fortunes let me have, —
Earth for my chair, and for my bed a grave!

Jen. Comfort, good mistress; you have [<sup>6</sup> watered your coach with tears already. You have but two miles now to go to your manor.

A man cannot say by my old master Frankford as he may say by me, that he wants manors; for he hath three or four, of which this is one that we are going to now. <sup>11</sup>

Cic. Good mistress, be of good cheer! Sorrow, you see, hurts you, but helps you not; we all mourn to see you so sad.

Carter. Mistress, I spy one of my landlord's men <sup>15</sup>

Come riding post: 't is like he brings some news.

Mrs. F. Comes he from Master Frankford, he is welcome;

So is his news, because they come from him.

Enter NICHOLAS.

Nich. There!

Mrs. F. I know the lute. Oft have I sung to thee; <sup>20</sup>

We both are out of tune, both out of time.

Nich. Would that had been the worst instrument that e'er you played on! My master commends him to ye; there's all he can find was ever yours; he hath nothing left that ever you could lay claim to but his own heart,—and <sup>25</sup> he could afford you that! All that I have to deliver you is this: he prays you to forget him; and so he bids you farewell. <sup>29</sup>

Mrs. F. I thank him; he is kind, and ever was.

All you that have true feeling of my grief, That know my loss, and have relenting hearts,

Gird me about, and help me with your tears To wash my spotted sins! My lute shall groan;

It cannot weep, but shall lament my moan. <sup>35</sup>

[She plays.]

Enter WENDOLL [behind].

Wen. Pursu'd with horror of a guilty soul, And with the sharp scourge of repentance lash'd,

I fly from mine own shadow. O my stars!

What have my parents in their lives deserv'd, <sup>39</sup>

That you should lay this penance on their son?

When I but think of Master Frankford's love,

And lay it to my treason, or compare

My murdering him for his relieving me,

It strikes a terror like a lightning's flash,

To scorch my blood up. Thus I, like the owl, <sup>45</sup>

Asham'd of day, live in these shadowy woods,

Afraid of every leaf or murmuring blast,

Yet longing to receive some perfect knowledge

How he hath dealt with her. [Seeing MISTRESS

FRANKFORD.] O my sad fate!

Here, and so far from home, and thus attended!

Oh, God! I have divorc'd the truest turtles <sup>51</sup>

That ever liv'd together, and, being divided,

In several places make their several moan;

She in the fields laments, and he at home;

So poets write that Orpheus made the trees <sup>55</sup>

And stones to dance to his melodious harp,

Meaning the rustic and the barbarous hinds,

That had no understanding part in them:

So she from these rude carters tears extracts,

Making their flinty hearts with grief to rise, <sup>60</sup>

And draw down rivers from their rocky eyes.

Mrs. F. [to NICHOLAS.] If you return unto my master, say

(Though not from me, for I am all unworthy

To blast his name so with a strumpet's tongue)
That you have seen me weep, wish myself
dead! <sup>65</sup>

Nay, you may say, too (for my vow is past), <sup>1</sup>

Last night you saw me eat and drink my last.

This to your master you may say and swear;

For it is writ in heaven, and decreed here.

Nich. I'll say you wept; I'll swear you made me sad. <sup>70</sup>

Why, how now, eyes? What now? What's here to do?

I'm gone, or I shall straight turn baby too.

Wen. [Aside.] I cannot weep, my heart is all on fire.

Curs'd be the fruits of my unchaste desire!

Mrs. F. Go, break this lute upon my coach's wheel, <sup>75</sup>

As the last music that I e'er shall make,—

Not as my husband's gift, but my farewell

To all earth's joy; and so your master tell!

Nich. If I can for crying.

Wen. [Aside.] Grief, have done,

Or, like a madman, I shall frantic run. <sup>80</sup>

Mrs. F. You have beheld the wofull'st wretch on earth,—

A woman made of tears; would you had words

To express but what you see! My inward grief

No tongue can utter; yet unto your power

You may describe my sorrow, and disclose <sup>85</sup>

To thy sad master my abundant woes.

Nich. I'll do your commendations. <sup>2</sup>

Mrs. F. Oh, no!

I dare not so presume; nor to my children!

I am disclaim'd in both; alas! I am.

Oh, never teach them, when they come to speak, <sup>90</sup>

To name the name of mother: chide their

tongue,

If they by chance light on that hated word;

Tell them 't is naught; for when that word

they name,

Poor, pretty souls! they harp on their own

shame.

Wen. [Aside.] To recompense their wrongs,

what canst thou do? <sup>95</sup>

Thou hast made her husbandless, and childless

too.

Mrs. F. I have no more to say.—Speak not for me;

Yet you may tell your master what you see.

Nich. I'll do 't. Exit.

Wen. [Aside.] I'll speak to her, and comfort her in grief. <sup>100</sup>

Oh, but her wound cannot be cur'd with words!

No matter, though; I'll do my best good will

To work a cure on her whom I did kill.

Mrs. F. So, now unto my coach, then to my home,

So to my death-bed; for from this sad hour, <sup>105</sup>

I never will nor eat, nor drink, nor taste

Of any cates <sup>3</sup> that may preserve my life.

I never will nor smile, nor sleep, nor rest;

But when my tears have wash'd my black soul

white,

Sweet Saviour, to thy hands I yield my sprite.

<sup>3</sup> Food.

Wen. [coming forward.] Oh, Mistress Frankford!

Mrs F. Oh, for God's sake, fly! 111
The devil doth come to tempt me, ere I die.
My coach!—This sin, that with an angel's face

Conjur'd<sup>1</sup> mine honour, till he sought my wrack,

In my repentant eye seems ugly, black. 115

Exeunt all [except WENDOLL and JENKIN]; the Carters whistling.

Jen. What, my young master, that fled in his shirt! How come you by your clothes again? You have made our house in a sweet pickle, ha' ye not, think you? What, shall I serve you still, or cleave to the old house? 120

Wen. Hence, slave! Away, with thy unseason'd mirth!

Unless thou canst shed tears, and sigh, and howl,

Curse thy sad fortunes, and exclaim on fate, Thou art not for my turn.

Jen. Marry, an you will not, another will; farewell, and be hang'd! Would you had [125 never come to have kept this coil<sup>2</sup> within our doors! We shall ha' you run away like a sprite again. [Exit.]

Wen. She's gone to death; I live to want and woe, 130

Her life, her sins, and all upon my head. And I must now go wander, like a Cain,

In foreign countries and remoted climes, Where the report of my ingratitude

Cannot be heard. I'll over first to France, 135 And so to Germany and Italy;

Where, when I have recovered, and by travel Gotten those perfect tongues,<sup>3</sup> and that these rumours

May in their height abate, I will return: And I divine (however now dejected), 140

My worth and parts being by some great man prais'd,

At my return I may in court be rais'd. Exit.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter SIR FRANCIS ACTON, SIR CHARLES MOUNTFORD, CRANWELL, [MALBY.] and SUSAN.

Sir F. Brother, and now my wife, I think these troubles,

Fall on my head by justice of the heavens, For being so strict to you in your extremities;

But we are now aton'd. I would my sister Could with like happiness o'ercome her griefs: As we have ours.

Susan. You tell us, Master Cranwell, wondrous things

Touching the patience of that gentleman, With what strange virtue he demeans<sup>5</sup> his grief.

Cran. I told you what I was a witness of; 10
It was my fortune to lodge there that night.

Sir F. Oh, that same villain, Wendoll!

That did corrupt her; she was of herself Chaste and devoted well.<sup>6</sup> Is this the house?

Cran. Yes, sir; I take it, here your sister lies.<sup>7</sup> 15

Sir F. My brother Frankford show'd too mild a spirit

In the revenge of such a leathed crime. Less than he did, no man of spirit could do.

I am so far from blaming his revenge, That I commend it. Had it been my case, 20

Their souls at once had from their breasts been freed;

Death to such deeds of shame is the due meed.

Enter JENKIN and CICELY.

Jen. Oh, my mistress, mistress! my poor mistress!

Cicely. Alas! that ever I was born; what [25 shall I do for my poor mistress?

Sir C. Why, what of her?

Jen. Oh, Lord, sir! she no sooner heard that her brother and her friends had come to see how she did, but she, for very shame of her [30 guilty conscience, fell into such a swoon, that we had much ado to get life in her.

Susan. Alas, that she should bear so hard a fate!

Pity it is repentance comes too late.

Sir F. Is she so weak in body? 35

Jen. Oh, sir! I can assure you there's no hope of life in her; for she will take no sust'nance; she hath plainly starv'd herself, and now she's as lean as a lath. She ever looks for the good hour. Many gentlemen and gentlewomen of the [40 country are come to comfort her.

[SCENE V.]<sup>8</sup>

[SIR CHARLES MOUNTFORD, SIR FRANCIS ACTON, MALBY, CRANWELL, and SUSAN.]

Enter MISTRESS FRANKFORD in her bed.

Mal. How fare you, Mistress Frankford?

Mrs. F. Sick, sick, oh, sick! Give me some air, I pray you!

Tell me, oh, tell me, where is Master Frankford?

Will not he deign to see me ere I die?

Mal. Yes, Mistress Frankford; divers gentlemen, 5

Your loving neighbours, with that just request Have mov'd, and told him of your weak estate:<sup>9</sup>

Who, though with much ado to get belief, Examining of the general circumstance,

Seeing your sorrow and your penitence, 10 And hearing therewithal the great desire

You have to see him, ere you left the world, He gave to us his faith to follow us,

And sure he will be here immediately.

<sup>9</sup> Condition.

Mrs. F. You have half reviv'd me with the pleasing news, <sup>15</sup>

Raise me a little higher in my bed.—
Blush I not, brother Acton? Blush I not, Sir
Charles?

Can you not read my fault writ in my cheek?
Is not my crime there? Tell me, gentlemen.

Sir C. Alas, good mistress, sickness hath not left you <sup>20</sup>

Blood in your face enough to make you blush.

Mrs. F. Then, sickness, like a friend, my fault would hide.—

Is my husband come? My soul but carries
His arrive; then I am fit for heaven.

Sir F. I came to chide you, but my words of hate <sup>25</sup>

Are turn'd to pity and compassionate grief.
I came to rate you, but my brawls, you see,
Melt into tears, and I must weep by thee.—
Here's Master Frankford now.

Enter FRANKFORD.

Frank. Good morrow, brother; morrow, gentlemen! <sup>30</sup>

God, that hath laid this cross upon our heads, Might (had He pleas'd) have made our cause of meeting

On a more fair and more contented ground;
But He that made us made us to this woe.

Mrs. F. And is he come? Methinks, that voice I know. <sup>35</sup>

Frank. How do you, woman?

Mrs. F. Well, Master Frankford, well; but shall be better,

I hope within this hour. Will you vouchsafe,
Out of your grace and your humanity,

To take a spotted strumpet by the hand? <sup>40</sup>

Frank. This hand once held my heart in faster bonds,

Than now 'tis gripp'd by me. God pardon
them

That made us first break hold!

Mrs. F. Amen, amen!

Out of my zeal to Heaven, whither I'm now
bound,

I was so impudent to wish you here; <sup>45</sup>
And once more beg your pardon. O, good
man,

And father to my children, pardon me.

Pardon, oh, pardon me: my fault so heinous
is,

That if you in this world forgive it not,
Heaven will not clear it in the world to come. <sup>50</sup>

Faintness hath so usurp'd upon my knees,
That kneel I cannot; but on my heart's knees

My prostrate soul lies thrown down at your feet,

To beg your gracious pardon. Pardon, oh, pardon me!

Frank. As freely, from the low depth of my soul, <sup>55</sup>

As my Redeemer hath forgiven His death,
I pardon thee. I will shed tears for thee;

And, in mere pity of thy weak estate,
I'll will to die with thee.

All. So do we all.

Nich. So will not I;
I'll sigh and sob, but, by my faith, not die. <sup>60</sup>

Sir F. Oh, Master Frankford, all the near alliance

I lose by her, shall be suppli'd in thee.

You are my brother by the nearest way;

Her kindred hath fall'n off, but yours doth
stay.

Frank. Even as I hope for pardon, at that day <sup>65</sup>

When the Great Judge of heaven in scarlet sits,

So be thou pardon'd! Though thy rash offence

Divore'd our bodies, thy repentant tears

Unite our souls.

Sir C. Then comfort, Mistress Frankford!
You see your husband hath forgiven your fall; <sup>70</sup>

Then rouse your spirits, and cheer your fainting
soul!

Susan. How is it with you?

Sir F. How d'ye feel yourself?
Mrs. F. Not of this world.

Frank. I see you are not, and I weep to see
it.

My wife, the mother to my pretty babes! <sup>75</sup>
Both those lost names I do restore thee back,
And with this kiss I wed thee once again.

Though thou art wounded in thy honour'd
name,

And with that grief upon thy death-bed liest,
Honest in heart, upon my soul, thou diest. <sup>80</sup>

Mrs. F. Pardon'd on earth, soul, thou in heaven art free;

Once more thy wife, dies thus embracing thee. <sup>[Dies.]</sup>

Frank. New-married, and new-widow'd.—
Oh! she's dead,

And a cold grave must be her nuptial bed.

Sir C. Sir, be of good comfort, and your heavy sorrow <sup>85</sup>

Part equally amongst us; storms divided Abate their force, and with less rage are guided.

Cran. Do, Master Frankford; he that hath least part,

Will find enough to drown one troubled heart.

Sir F. Peace with thee, Nan!—Brothers and gentlemen, <sup>90</sup>

All we that can plead interest in her grief,
Bestow upon her body funeral tears!

Brother, had you with threats and usage bad
Punish'd her sin, the grief of her offence

Had not with such true sorrow touch'd her heart. <sup>95</sup>

Frank. I see it had not; therefore, on her grave

Will I bestow this funeral epitaph,
Which on her marble tomb shall be engrav'd.

In golden letters shall these words be fill'd: <sup>2</sup>
Here lies she whom her husband's kindness kill'd.

more); thy wife dies, etc.*

THE EPILOGUE

AN honest crew, disposed to be merry,
 Came to a tavern by, and call'd for wine.
 The drawer brought it, smiling like a cherry,
 And told them it was pleasant, neat<sup>1</sup> and fine.
 'Taste it,' quoth one. He did so. 'Fie!'
 (quoth he)
 'This wine was good; now 't runs too near the lee.'

Another sipp'd, to give the wine his due,
 And said unto the rest, it drunk too flat;

<sup>1</sup> Pure.

The third said, it was old; the fourth, too new;
 Nay, quoth the fifth, the sharpness likes me
 not. <sup>10</sup>

Thus, gentlemen, you see how, in one hour,
 The wine was new, old, flat, sharp, sweet, and sour.

Unto this wine we do allude<sup>2</sup> our play,
 Which some will judge too trivial, some too
 grave:

You as our guests we entertain this day, <sup>15</sup>
 And bid you welcome to the best we have.
 Excuse us, then; good wine may be disgrac'd,
 When every several mouth hath sundry taste.

TO THE READERS OF THIS COMEDY<sup>2</sup>

GENTLEMEN;

The world is so nice<sup>3</sup> in these our times, that for apparel there is no fashion; for music (which is a rare art, though now slighted) no instrument; for diet, none but the French kickshaws that are delicate; and for plays, no invention but that which now runneth an invective way, touching some particular persons, or else it is contemned before it is thoroughly understood. This is all that I have to say: that the author had no intent to wrong any one in this comedy; but, as a merry passage, here and there interlaced it with delight, which he hopes will please all, and be hurtful to none.

PROLOGUE<sup>4</sup>

WHERE the bee can suck no honey, she leaves her sting behind; and where the bear cannot find origanum<sup>5</sup> to heal his grief, he blasteth all other leaves with his breath. We fear it is like to fare so with us; that, seeing you cannot draw from our labours sweet content, you leave behind you a sour mislike,<sup>6</sup> and with open reproach blame our good meaning, because you cannot reap the wonted mirth. Our intent was at this time to move inward delight, not outward lightness; and [8 to breed (if it might be) soft smiling, not loud laughing; knowing it, to the wise, to be a great pleasure to hear counsel mixed with wit, as to the foolish, to have sport mingled with rudeness. They were banished the theatre of Athens, and from Rome hissed, that brought parasites on the stage with apish actions, or fools with uncivil habits, or courtesans with immodest words. We have endeavoured to be as far from unseemly speeches, to make your ears glow, as we hope you [10 will be free from unkind reports, or mistaking the authors'<sup>7</sup> intention, (who never aimed at any one particular in this play,) to make our cheeks blush. And thus I leave it, and thee to thine own censure, to like or dislike. — VALE.

[Prolog.] "From all that's near the court, from all that's great,

Within the compass of the city-walls,
We now have brought our scene —"

Citizen [leaps on the stage].

Cit. Hold your peace, goodman boy!

Prolog. What do you mean, sir?

Cit. That you have no good meaning: this<sup>5</sup>

seven years there hath been plays at this house,<sup>1</sup> I have observed it, you have still girds<sup>2</sup> at citizens; and now you call your play "The London Merchant." Down with your title,<sup>3</sup> boy! down with your title!

Prol. Are you a member of the noble city?

Cit. I am.

Prol. And a freeman?

Cit. Yea, and a grocer.<sup>4</sup> 15

Prol. So, grocer, then, by your sweet favour, we intend no abuse to the city.

Cit. No, sir! yes, sir. If you were not resolv'd to play the Jacks,<sup>5</sup> what need you study for new subjects, purposely to abuse your bet-<sup>20</sup> ters? Why could not you be contented, as well as others, with "The legend of Whittington,"<sup>6</sup> or "The Life and Death of Sir Thomas Gresham, with the building of the Royal Exchange,"<sup>7</sup> or "The story of Queen Eleanor, [25 with the rearing of London Bridge upon wool-sacks?"]<sup>8</sup>

Prol. You seem to be an understanding man: what would you have us do, sir? 20

Cit. Why present something notably in honour of the commons of the city.

Prol. Why, what do you say to "The Life and Death of fat Drake, or the Repairing of Fleet-privies?" 24

Cit. I do not like that; but I will have a citizen, and he shall be of my own trade.

Prol. Oh, you should have told us your mind a month since; our play is ready to begin now.

Cit. 'Tis all one for that; I will have a grocer, and he shall do admirable<sup>9</sup> things. 40

Prol. What will you have him do?

Cit. Marry, I will have him —

Wife. (below.) Husband, husband!

Ralph. (below.) Peace, mistress. 44

Wife. [below.] Hold thy peace, Ralph; I know what I do, I warrant 'ee. — Husband, husband!

Cit. What sayst thou, cony? 10

Wife. [below.] Let him kill a lion with a [49 pestle, husband! Let him kill a lion with a pestle!

Cit. So he shall. — I'll have him kill a lion with a pestle.

Wife. [below.] Husband! shall I come up, husband? 65

Cit. Ay, cony. — Ralph, help your mistress this way. — Pray, gentlemen, make her a little room. — I pray you, sir, lend me your hand to help up my wife: I thank you, sir. — So.

[Wife comes on the stage.]

Wife. By your leave, gentlemen all; I'm [60 something troublesome. I'm a stranger here; I was ne'er at one of these plays, as they say, before; but I should have seen<sup>11</sup> "Jane Shore"<sup>12</sup> once; and my husband hath promised me, any time this twelvemonth, to carry me [65 to "The Bold Beauchamps,"<sup>13</sup> but in truth he did not. I pray you, hear with me.

Cit. Boy, let my wife and I have a couple of stools and then begin; and let the grocer do rare things. [Stools are brought.] 70

Prol. But, sir, we have never a boy<sup>14</sup> to play him: every one hath a part already.

Wife. Husband, husband, for God's sake, let Ralph play him! Beshrew me, if I do not think he will go beyond them all. 75

Cit. Well rememb'ed, wife. — Come up, Ralph. — I'll tell you, gentlemen; let them but lend him a suit of repanel<sup>15</sup> and necessaries, and, by gad, if any of them all blow wind in the tail on him,<sup>16</sup> I'll be hang'd. 80

[RALPH comes on the stage.]

Wife. I pray you, youth, let him have a suit of repanel! — I'll be sworn, gentlemen, my husband tells you true. He will act you sometimes at our house, that all the neighbours [84 cry out on him; he will fetch you up a couraging part so in the garret, that we are all as fear'd, I warrant you, that we quake again: we'll fear our children with him; if they be never so unruly, do but cry, "Ralph comes, Ralph comes!" to them, and they'll be as [90 quiet as lambs. — Hold up thy head, Ralph; show the gentlemen what thou canst do; speak a huffing<sup>17</sup> part; I warrant you, the gentlemen will accept of it.

Cit. Do, Ralph, do. 95

Ralph. "By Heaven, methinks, it were an easy leap

To pluck bright honour from the pale-fac'd moon;

Or dive into the bottom of the sea,

Where never fathom-line toucht any ground,

And pluck up drowned honour from the lake of hell."<sup>18</sup> 100

Cit. How say you, gentlemen, is it not as I told you?

Wife. Nay, gentlemen, he hath play'd before, my husband says, "Mucedorus,"<sup>19</sup> before the wardens of our company. 105

Cit. Ay, and he should have play'd Jeronimo<sup>20</sup> with a shoemaker for a wager.

Prol. He shall have a suit of apparel, if he will go in.

Cit. In, Ralph, in, Ralph; and set out the grocery in their kind, if thou lov'st me. 111

[Exit RALPH.]

Wife. I warrant, our Ralph will look finely when he's drest.

Prol. But what will you have it call'd?

1 Probably Whitefriars, a private theatre.
 2 Jeers.
 3 The placard announcing the name of the play.
 4 I. e. a member of the Grocers' Guild, one of the great livery companies.
 5 Behave trickily.
 6 A lost play, author unknown.
 7 Heywood's If you know not me, you know nobody, pt. II.
 8 Peele's Edward I. 9 Wonderful. 10 Dear.

11 Was to have seen.
 12 Perhaps Edward IV., ascribed to Heywood.
 13 A lost play.
 14 This play was first acted by the children of Her Majesty's Revels.
 15 Apparel. 16 Disparage. 17 Swaggering.
 18 With slight changes from I Henry IV., I. iii. 201.
 19 An early play of unknown authorship.
 20 See The Spanish Tragedy, ante.

Cit. "The Grocer's Honour." 116

Pro. Methinks "The Knight of the Burning Pestle" were better.

Wife. I'll be sworn, husband, that's as good a name as can be.

Cit. Let it be so. — Begin, begin; my wife and I will sit down. 121

Pro. I pray you, do.

Cit. What stately music have you? You have shawms?<sup>1</sup>

Pro. Shawms? No.

Cit. No! I'm a thief if my mind did not [125 give me so. Ralph plays a stately part, and he must needs have shawms. I'll be at the charge of them myself, rather than we'll be without them. 130

Pro. So you are like to be.

Cit. Why, and so I will be: there's two shillings; — [Gives money.] — let's have the waits of Southwark; they are as rare fellows as any are in England; and that will fetch them all o'er the water with a vengeance, as if they [135 were mad.

Pro. You shall have them. Will you sit down then?

Cit. Ay. — Come, wife. 140

Wife. Sit you merry all, gentlemen; I'm bold to sit amongst you for my ease.

[Citizen and Wife sit down.]

Pro. "From all that's near the court, from all that's great,

Within the compass of the city-walls,
We now have brought our scene. Fly far from hence 145

All private taxes, 's inmodest phrases,
Whatever may but show like vicious!
For wicked mirth never true pleasure brings,
But honest minds are pleas'd with honest things." —

Thus much for that we do; but for Ralph's part you must answer for yourself. 151

Cit. Take you no care for Ralph; he'll discharge himself, I warrant you.

[Exit PROLOGUE.]

Wife. P' faith, gentlemen, I'll give my word for Ralph. 155

ACT I

SCENE I.<sup>2</sup>

Enter Merchant [VENTUREWELL] and JASPER, his Prentice.

Vent. Sirrah, I'll make you know you are my prentice,

And whom my charitable love redeem'd
Even from the fall of fortune; gave thee heat
And growth, to be what now thou art, new-cast thee;

Adding the trust of all I have, at home,
In foreign staples,<sup>3</sup> or upon the sea,
To thy direction; tied the good opinions

Both of myself and friends to thy endeavours;
So fair were thy beginnings. But with these,
As I remember, you had never charge 10
To love your master's daughter, and even then
When I had found a wealthy husband for her;
I take it, sir, you had not: but, however,
I'll break the neck of that commission,
And make you know you are but a merchant's factor. 15

Jasp. Sir, I do liberally confess I am yours,
Bound both by love and duty to your service,
In which my labour hath been all my profit:
I have not lost in bargain, nor delighted
To wear your honest gains upon my back; 20
Nor have I given a pension to my blood,<sup>5</sup>
Or lavishly in play consum'd your stock;
These, and the miseries that do attend them,
I dare with innocence proclaim are strangers 24
To all my temperate actions. For your daughter,
If there be any love to my deservings
Borne by her virtuous self, I cannot stop it;
Nor am I able to refrain her wishes.
She's private to herself, and best of knowledge 28
Whom she will make so happy as to sigh for: 30
Besides, I cannot think you mean to match her
Unto a fellow of so lame a presence,<sup>7</sup>
One that hath little left of nature in him.

Vent. 'Tis very well, sir: I can tell your wisdom

How all this shall be cur'd.

Jasp. Your care becomes you. 35

Vent. And thus it must be, sir: I here discharge you

My house and service; take your liberty;
And when I want a son, I'll send for you. Exit.

Jasp. These be the fair rewards of them that love!

Oh, you that live in freedom, never prove 40
The travail of a mind led by desire!

Enter LUCE.

Luce. Why, how now, friend? Struck with my father's thunder!

Jasp. Struck, and struck dead, unless the remedy

Be full of speed and virtue; I am now,
What I expected long, no more your father's. 45

Luce. But mine.

Jasp. But yours, and only yours, I am;
That's all I have to keep me from the statute.<sup>8</sup>
You dare be constant still?

Luce. Oh, fear me not!
In this I dare be better than a woman:
Nor shall his anger nor his offers move me, 50
Were they both equal to a prince's power.

Jasp. You know my rival!

Luce. Yes, and love him dearly,
Even as I love an ague or foul weather.
I prithee, Jasper, fear him not.

Jasp. Oh, no!
I do not mean to do him so much kindness. 55
But to our own desires; you know the plot
We both agreed on?

Luce. Yes, and will perform
My part exactly.

Jasp. I desire no more.

Farewell, and keep my heart; 't is yours.

Luce. I take it;
He must do miracles makes me forsake it.<sup>60</sup>
Exeunt [severally].

Cit. Fie upon 'em, little infidels! what a matter 's here now! Well, I'll be hang'd for a halfpenny, if there be not some abomination knavery in this play. Well; let 'em look to 't; Ralph must come, and if there be any tricks [<sup>65</sup> a-brewing —

Wife. Let 'em brew and bake too, husband, a' God's name; Ralph will find all out, I warrant you, an they were older than they are.—
[Enter Boy.]—I pray, my pretty youth, is [<sup>70</sup> Ralph ready?

Boy. He will be presently.

Wife. Now, I pray you, make my commendations unto him, and withal carry him this stick of liquorice. Tell him his mistress sent it to [<sup>75</sup> him; and bid him bite a piece; 't will open his pipes the better, say. [Exit Boy.]

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter Merchant [VENTUREWELL] and Master HUMPEREY.

Vent. Come, sir, she 's yours; upon my faith, she 's yours;
You have my hand: for other idle lets<sup>2</sup>
Between your hopes and her, thus with a wind
They are scattered and no more. My wanton prentice,

That like a bladder blew himself with love,<sup>5</sup>
I have let out, and sent him to discover
New masters yet unknown.

Hum. I thank you, sir,
Indeed, I thank you, sir; and, ere I stir,
It shall be known, however you do deem,
I am of gentle blood and gentle seem.<sup>10</sup>

Vent. Oh, sir, I know it certain.

Hum. Sir, my friend,
Although, as writers say, all things have end,
And that we call a pudding hath his two,
Oh, let it not seem strange, I pray, to you,
If in this bloody simile I put<sup>15</sup>
My love, more endless than frail things or gut!

Wife. Husband, I prithee, sweet lamb, tell me one thing; but tell me truly. — Stay, youths, I beseech you, till I question my husband.

Cit. What is it, mouse?<sup>20</sup>

Wife. Sirrah, didst thou ever see a prettier child? how it behaves itself, I warrant ye, and speaks and looks, and perts up the head! — I pray you, brother, with your favour, were you never none of Master Moncaster's<sup>3</sup> scholars?<sup>25</sup>

Cit. Chicken, I prithee heartily, contain<sup>4</sup> thyself: the childer are pretty childer; but when Ralph comes, lamb —

Wife. Ay, when Ralph comes, cony! — Well, my youth, you may proceed.<sup>30</sup>

Vent. Well, sir, you know my love, and rest, I hope, Assur'd of my consent; get but my daughter's,
And wed her when you please. You must be bold,

And clap in close unto her: come, I know
You have language good enough to win a wench.<sup>35</sup>

Wife. A whoreson tyrant! h'as been an old stringer<sup>6</sup> in 's days, I warrant him.

Hum. I take your gentle offer, and withal
Yield love again for love reciprocal.

Vent. What, Luce! within there!

Enter LUCE.

Luce. Call'd you, sir?<sup>40</sup>
Vent. I did:<sup>40</sup>

Give entertainment to this gentleman;
And see you be not froward. — To her, sir:
My presence will but be an eye-sore to you.

Exit.

Hum. Fair Mistress Luce, how do you do?
Are you well?

Give me your hand, and then I pray you tell<sup>45</sup>
How doth your little sister and your brother;
And whether you love me or any other.

Luce. Sir, these are quickly answered.

Hum. So they are,
Where women are not cruel. But how far
Is it now distant from the place we are in,<sup>50</sup>
Unto that blessed place, your father's warren?

Luce. What makes you think of that, sir?

Hum. Even that face;
For, stealing rabbits whilom in that place,
God Cupid, or the keeper, I know not whether,
Unto my cost and charges brought you thither,
And there began —

Luce. Your game, sir.

Hum. Let no game,<sup>55</sup>
Or any thing that tendeth to the same,
Be evermore rememb'rd, thou fair killer,
For whom I sat me down, and brake my tiller.<sup>6</sup>

Wife. There 's a kind gentleman, I war-<sup>60</sup> rant you; when will you do as much for me, George?

Luce. Beshrew me, sir, I am sorry for your losses,
But, as the proverb says, I cannot cry.
I would you had not seen me!

Hum. So would I,<sup>65</sup>
Unless you had more maw<sup>7</sup> to do me good.

Luce. Why, cannot this strange passion be withstood?

Send for a constable, and raise the town.

Hum. Oh, no! my valiant love will batter
down

Millions of constables, and put to flight<sup>70</sup>

Even that great watch of Midsummer-day at night.<sup>1</sup>

Luce. Beshrew me, sir, 't were good I yielded, then;

Weak women cannot hope, where valiant men
Have no resistance.

Hum. Yield, then; I am full
Of pity, though I say it, and can pull
Out of my pocket thus a pair of gloves.

Look, Lucy, look; the dog's tooth nor the dove's

Are not so white as these; and sweet they be,
And whipt<sup>2</sup> about with silk, as you may see.

If you desire the price, shoot from your eye
A beam to this place, and you shall espy

F S, which is to say, my sweetest honey,
They cost me three and twopence, or no money.

Luce. Well, sir, I take them kindly, and I thank you:

What would you more?

Hum. Nothing.

Luce. Why, then, farewell.

Hum. Nor so, nor so; for, lady, I must tell,
Before we part, for what we met together:

God grant me time and patience and fair weather!

Luce. Speak, and declare your mind in terms
so brief.

Hum. I shall: then, first and foremost, for relief

I call to you, if that you can afford it;
I care not at what price, for, on my word, it

Shall be repaid again, although it cost me
More than I'll speak of now; for love hath tost
me

In furious blanket like a tennis-ball,
And now I rise aloft, and now I fall.

Luce. Alas, good gentleman, alas the day!

Hum. I thank you heartily; and, as I say,
Thus do I still continue without rest,

I' th' morning like a man, at night a beast,
Roaring and bellowing mine own disquiet,

That much I fear, forsaking of my diet
Will bring me presently to that quandary,

I shall bid all adieu.

Luce. Now, by St. Mary,
That were great pity!

Hum. So it were, beshrew me;
Then, ease me, lusty Luce, and pity show me.

Luce. Why, sir, you know my will is nothing
worth

Without my father's grant; get his consent,
And then you may with assurance try me.

Hum. The worshipful your sire will not deny
me;

For I have askt him, and he hath repli'd,
"Sweet Master Humphrey, Luce shall be thy bride."

Luce. Sweet Master Humphrey, then I am content.

Hum. And so am I, in truth.

Luce. Yet take me with you;

There is another clause must be annext,
And this it is: I swore, and will perform it,

No man shall ever joy me as his wife
But he that stole me hence. If you dare venture,

I am yours (you need not fear; my father loves
you);

If not, farewell for ever!

Hum. Stay, nymph, stay:

I have a double gelding, colour'd bay,
Sprung by his father from Barbarian kind;

Another for myself, though somewhat blind,
Yet true as trusty tree.

Luce. I am satisfied;
And so I give my hand. Our course must
lie

Through Waltham-forest, where I have a friend

Will entertain us. So, farewell, Sir Humphrey,
And think upon your business.

Hum. Though I die,
I am resolv'd to venture life and limb

For one so young, so fair, so kind, so trim.

Exit.

Wife. By my faith and troth, George, and as I am virtuous, it is e'en the kindest young man that ever trod on shoe-leather. — Well, go thy ways; if thou hast her not, 't is not thy fault,

'faith.

Cit. I prithee, mouse, be patient; 'a shall have her, or I'll make some of 'em smoke
for 't.

Wife. That's my good lamb, George. — Fie, this stinking tobacco kills me!

— Now, I pray, gentlemen, what good does this stinking tobacco do you? Nothing, I warrant you: make chimneys o' your faces! Oh, husband, husband, now, now!

there 's Ralph, there 's Ralph.

[SCENE III.]

Enter RALPH, like a Grocer in 's shop with two Prentices [TIM and GEORGE], reading "Palmerin of England."

Cit. Peace, fool! let Ralph alone. — Hark you, Ralph; do not strain yourself too much at the first. — Peace! — Begin, Ralph.

Ralph. [reads.] Then Palmerin and Trineus, snatching their lances from their dwarfs, [s and clasping their helmets, gallopt amain after the giant; and Palmerin, having gotten a sight of him, came posting amain, saying, "Stay, traitorous thief! for thou mayst not so carry away her, that is worth the greatest lord in the world;" and, with these words, gave him a blow on the shoulder, that he struck him besides his elephant. And Trineus, coming to the knight that had Agricola behind him, set him soon besides his horse, with his neck [s broken in the fall; so that the princess, getting out of the throng, between joy and grief, said,
"All happy knight, the mirror of all such as

follow arms, now may I be well assured of the love thou bearest me."<sup>1</sup> I wonder why the [20] kings do not raise an army of fourteen or fifteen hundred thousand men, as big as the army that the Prince of Portigo brought against Rosicleer, and destroy these giants; they do much hurt to wand'ring damsels, that go in [25] quest of their knights.

Wife. Faith, husband, and Ralph says true; for they say the King of Portugal cannot sit at his meat, but the giants and the ettins<sup>2</sup> will come and snatch it from him. 30

Cit. Hold thy tongue.—On, Ralph!

Ralph. And certainly those knights are much to be commended, who, neglecting their possessions, wander with a squire and a dwarf through the deserts to relieve poor ladies. 35

Wife. Ay, by my faith, are they, Ralph; let 'em say what they will, they are indeed. Our knights neglect their possessions well enough, but they do not the rest.

Ralph. There are no such courteous and [40] fair well-spoken knights in this age: they will call one "the son of a whore," that Palmerin of England would have called "fair sir;" and one that Rosicleer would have call'd "right beauteous damsel," they will call "damn'd [45] bitch."

Wife. I'll be sworn will they, Ralph; they have call'd me so an hundred times about a scurvy pipe of tobacco.

Ralph. But what brave spirit could be [50] content to sit in his shop, with a flappet of wood,<sup>3</sup> and a blue apron before him, selling mithridatum<sup>4</sup> and dragon's-water<sup>5</sup> to visited houses,<sup>6</sup> that might pursue feats of arms, and, through his noble achievements, procure such a famous history to be written of his heroic prowess?<sup>7</sup> 55

Cit. Well said, Ralph; some more of those words, Ralph!

Wife. They go finely, by my troth.

Ralph. Why should not I, then, pursue [60] this course, both for the credit of myself and our company? for amongst all the worthy books of achievements, I do not call to mind that I yet read of a grocer-errant. I will be the said knight.—Have you heard of any that hath wand'ring [65] unfurnished of his squire and dwarf? My elder apprentice Tim shall be my trusty squire, and little George my dwarf. Hence, my blue apron! Yet, in remembrance of my former trade, upon my shield shall be portray'd a Burning Pestle, [70] and I will be call'd the Knight of the Burning Pestle.

Wife. Nay, I dare swear thou wilt not forget thy old trade; thou wert ever meek.

Ralph. Tim!

Tim. Anon.

Ralph. My beloved squire, and George my dwarf, I charge you that from henceforth you never call me by any other name but "the right courteous and valiant Knight of the Burning Pestle;" and that you never call any female by the name of a woman or wench, but "fair lady," if she have her desires, if not, "distressed damsel;" that you call all forests and heaths "deserts," and all horses "palfreys." 75

Wife. This is very fine, faith.—Do the gentlemen like Ralph, think you, husband?

Cit. Ay, I warrant thee; the players would give all the shoes in their shop for him.

Ralph. My beloved squire Tim, stand out. [80] Admit this were a desert, and over it a knight-errant pricking,<sup>8</sup> and I should bid you inquire of his intents, what would you say?

Tim. Sir, my master sent me to know whither you are riding? 85

Ralph. No, thus: "Fair sir, the right courteous and valiant Knight of the Burning Pestle commanded me to inquire upon what adventure you are bound, whether to relieve some distressed damsels, or otherwise." 90

Cit. Whoreson blockhead, cannot remember!

Wife. I' faith, and Ralph told him on't before: all the gentlemen heard him.—Did he not, gentlemen? Did not Ralph tell him on't?

George. Right courteous and valiant [95] Knight of the Burning Pestle, here is a distressed damsel to have a halfpenny-worth of pepper.

Wife. That's a good boy! See, the little boy can hit it; by my troth, it's a fine child. 100

Ralph. Relieve her, with all courteous language. Now shut up shop; no more my apprentices, but my trusty squire and dwarf. I must bespeak my shield and arming<sup>7</sup> pestle.

[Exeunt TIM and GEORGE.]

Cit. Go thy ways, Ralph! As I'm a true<sup>8</sup> [105] man, thou art the best on 'em all.

Wife. Ralph, Ralph!

Ralph. What say you, mistress?

Wife. I prithee, come again, quickly, sweet Ralph. 110

Ralph. By and by. Exit.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>9</sup>

Enter JASPER and his mother, MISTRESS MERRY-THOUGHT.

Mist. Mer. Give thee my blessing? No, I'll ne'er give thee my blessing; I'll see thee

hang'd first; it shall ne'er be said I gave thee my blessing. Th' art thy father's own son, of the right blood of the Merrythoughts. I may [5 curse the time that e'er I knew thy father; he hath spent all his own and mine too; and when I tell him of it, he laughs, and dances, and sings, and cries, "A merry heart lives long-a." And thou art a wastethrift, and art run [10 away from thy master that lov'd thee well, and art come to me; and I have laid up a little for my younger son Michael, and thou think'st to bezzle<sup>1</sup> that, but thou shalt never be able to do it. — Come hither, Michael! 15

Enter MICHAEL.

Come, Michael, down on thy knees; thou shalt have my blessing.

Mich. [kneels.] I pray you, mother, pray to God to bless me.

Mist. Mer. God bless thee! but Jasper shall [20 never have my blessing; he shall be hang'd first; shall he not, Michael? How sayst thou?

Mich. Yes, forsooth, mother, and grace of God.

Mist. Mer. That's a good boy! 25

Wife. I' faith, it's a fine spoken child.

Jasp. Mother, though you forget a parent's love I must preserve the duty of a child. I ran not from my master, nor return To have your stock maintain my idleness. 30

Wife. Ungracious child, I warrant him; hark, how he chops logic with his mother! — Thou hadst best tell her she lies; do, tell her she lies.

Cit. If he were my son, I would hang him [35 up by the heels, and flay him, and salt him, whoreson haltersack.<sup>2</sup>

Jasp. My coming only is to beg your love, Which I must ever, though I never gain it; And, howsoever you esteem of me, 40 There is no drop of blood hid in these veins But, I remember well, belongs to you That brought me forth, and would be glad for you To rip them all again, and let it out.

Mist. Mer. I' faith, I had sorrow enough [45 for thee, God knows; but I'll hamper thee well enough. Get thee in, thou vagabond, get thee in, and learn of thy brother Michael,

[Exeunt JASPER and MICHAEL.]

Mer. (within.)

Nose, nose, jolly red nose,
And who gave thee this jolly red nose? 50

Mist. Mer. Hark, my husband! he's singing and hoiting; and I'm fain to cark<sup>3</sup> and care, and all little enough. — Husband! Charles! Charles Merrythought!

Enter old MERRYTHOUGHT.

Mer. [sings.]

Nutmegs and ginger, cinnamon and cloves; 55
And they gave me this jolly red nose.

1 Squander. 2 Gallows-bird. 3 To be careful.

Mist. Mer. If you would consider your state, you would have little list to sing, i-wis.<sup>4</sup>

Mer. It should never be considered, while it were an estate, if I thought it would spoil [60 my singing.

Mist. Mer. But how wilt thou do, Charles? Thou art an old man, and thou canst not work, and thou hast not forty shillings left, and thou eatest good meat, and drinkest good drink, [65 and laughest.

Mer. And will do.

Mist. Mer. But how wilt thou come by it, Charles?

Mer. How! why, how have I done hitherto [70 this forty years? I never came into my dining room, but, at eleven and six o'clock,<sup>5</sup> I found excellent meat and drink a' th' table; my clothes were never worn out, but next morning a tailor brought me a new suit: and with- [75 out question it will be so ever; use makes perfectness. If all should fail, it is but a little straining myself extraordinary, and laugh myself to death.

Wife. It's a foolish old man this; is not [80 he, George?

Cit. Yes, cony.

Wife. Give me a penny i' th' purse while I live, George.

Cit. Ay, by lady, cony, hold thee there. 85

Mist. Mer. Well, Charles; you promis'd to provide for Jasper, and I have laid up for Michael. I pray you, pay Jasper his portion: he's come home, and he shall not consume Michael's stock; he says his master turn'd him away, [90 but, I promise you truly, I think he ran away.

Wife. No, indeed, Mistress Merrythought; though he be a notable gallows,<sup>7</sup> yet I'll assure you his master did turn him away, even in this place; 'twas, i' faith, within this half- [95 hour, about his daughter; my husband was by.

Cit. Hang him, rogue! he serv'd him well enough: love his master's daughter! By my troth, cony, if there were a thousand boys, [100 thou wouldst spoil them all with taking their parts; let his mother alone with him.

Wife. Ay, George; but yet truth is truth.

Mer. Where is Jasper? He's welcome, however. Call him in; he shall have his portion. [105 Is he merry?

Mist. Mer. Ah, foul chive<sup>8</sup> him, he is too merry! — Jasper! Michael!

Re-enter JASPER and MICHAEL.

Mer. Welcome, Jasper! though thou run'st away, welcome! God bless thee! 'T is thy [110 mother's mind thou shouldst receive thy portion; thou hast been abroad, and I hope hast learn'd experience enough to govern it; thou art of sufficient years. Hold thy hand — one,

<sup>5</sup> Dinner and supper hours.

two, three, four five, six, seven, eight, nine, [115
there 's ten shillings for thee. [Gives money.] Thrust thyself into the world with that, and take some settled course. If fortune cross thee, thou hast a retiring place; come home to me; I have twenty shillings left. Be a good hus- [120 band; <sup>1</sup> that is, wear ordinary clothes, eat the best meat, and drink the best drink; be merry, and give to the poor, and, believe me, thou hast
no end of thy goods.

Jasp. Long may you live free from all thought of ill, <sup>125</sup>

And long have cause to be thus merry still!

But, father—

Mer. No more words, Jasper; get thee gone.
Thou hast my blessing; thy father's spirit upon
thee!

Farewell, Jasper! [Sings.] <sup>130</sup>

But yet, or ere you part (oh, cruel?)

Kiss me, kiss me, sweeting, mine own dear
jewel!

So, now begone; no words. Exit JASPER.

Mist. Mer. So, Michael, now get thee gone too. <sup>135</sup>

Mich. Yes, forsooth, mother; but I'll have my father's blessing first.

Mist. Mer. No, Michael; 't is no matter for his blessing; thou hast my blessing; begone.
I'll fetch my money and jewels, and follow [140 thee; I'll stay no longer with him, I warrant thee. [Exit MICHAEL.]—Truly, Charles, I'll be gone too.

Mer. What! you will not?

Mist. Mer. Yes, indeed will I. <sup>145</sup>

Mer. [sings.]

Heigh-ho, farewell, Nan!

I'll never trust wench more again, if I can.

Mist. Mer. You shall not think, when all your own is gone, to spend that I have been scraping up for Michael. <sup>150</sup>

Mer. Farewell, good wife; I expect it not:
all I have to do in this world, is to be merry;
which I shall, if the ground be not taken from me; and if it be, [Sings.]

When earth and seas from me are reft, <sup>155</sup>
The skies aloft for me are left.

Exeunt [severally].

Wife. I'll be sworn he's a merry old gentleman for all that. (Music.) Hark, hark, husband, hark! fiddles, fiddles! now surely they go finely. They say 'tis present death for these [160 fiddlers, to tune their rebecks <sup>2</sup> before the great Turk's grace; it's not, George? (Boy danc-eth.) But, look, look! here's a youth dances!
—Now, good youth, do a turn a' th' toe.—
Sweetheart, i' faith, I'll have Ralph [165 come and do some of his gambols.—He'll ride the wild mare <sup>3</sup> gentlemen, 't would do your hearts good to see him.—I thank you, kind youth; pray, bid Ralph come. <sup>170</sup>

Cit. Peace, cony!—Sirrah, you scurvy boy, bid the players send Ralph; or, by God's—an they do not, I'll tear some of their periwigs beside their heads: this is all riff-raff.

[Exit Boy.]

ACT II

SCENE I.<sup>5</sup>

Enter Merchant [VENTUREWELL] and HUM-PHREY.

Vent. And how, faith, how goes it now, son Humphrey?

Hum. Right worshipful, and my beloved friend

And father dear, this matter 's at an end.

Vent. 'T is well; it should be so. I'm glad the girl

Is found so tractable.

Hum. Nay, she must whirl <sup>5</sup>
From hence (and you must wink; for so, I say,
The story tells,) to-morrow before day.

Wife. George, dost thou think in thy conscience now 't will be a match? Tell me but what thou think'st, sweet rogue. Thou seest [10 the poor gentleman, dear heart, how it labours and throbs, I warrant you, to be at rest! I'll go move the father for 't.

Cit. No, no; I prithee, sit still, honeysuckle;
thou 't spoil all. If he deny him, I'll bring [15 half-a-dozen good fellows myself, and in the shutting <sup>6</sup> of an evening, knock 't up, and there 's an end.

Wife. I'll buss thee for that, i' faith, boy.
Well, George, well, you have been a wag in [20
your days, I warrant you; but God forgive you, and I do with all my heart.

Vent. How was it, son? You told me that to-morrow

Before day-break, you must convey her hence.

Hum. I must, I must; and thus it is agreed:
Your daughter rides upon a brown-bay steed, <sup>25</sup>
I on a sorrel, which I bought of Brian,
The honest host of the Red roaring Lion,
In Waltham situate. Then, if you may,
Consent in seemly sort; lest, by delay, <sup>30</sup>
The Fatal Sisters come, and do the office,
And then you 'll sing another song.

Vent. Alas,
Why should you be thus full of grief to me,
That do as willing as yourself agree
To any thing, so it be good and fair? <sup>35</sup>
Then, steal her when you will, if such a pleasure

Content you both; I'll sleep and never see it,
To make your joys more full. But tell me why
You may not here perform your marriage?

Wife. God's blessing a' thy soul, old man! <sup>40</sup>
I' faith, thou art loth to part true hearts. I see
'a has her, George; and I'm as glad on 't!—
Well, go thy ways, Humphrey, for a fair-spoken

man; I believe thou hast not thy fellow within the walls of London; an I should say the [48 suburbs too, I should not lie.—Why dost not rejoice with me, George?

Cit. If I could but see Ralph again, I were as merry as mine host, i' faith.

Hum. The cause you seem to ask, I thus declare —

Help me, O Muses nine! Your daughter sware
A foolish oath, and more it was the pity;
Yet no one but myself within this city
Shall dare to say so, but a bold defiance 54
Shall meet him, were he of the noble science;<sup>1</sup>
And yet she sware, and yet why did she swear?
Truly, I cannot tell, unless it were
For her own ease; for, sure, sometimes an oath,
Being sworn thereafter, is like cordial broth;
And this it was she swore, never to marry 60
But such a one whose mighty arm could carry
(As meaning me, for I am such a one)
Her bodily away, through stick and stone,
Till both of us arrive, at her request, 64
Some ten miles off, in the wild Waltham-forest.

Vent. If this be all, you shall not need to fear
Any denial in your love: proceed;
I'll neither follow, nor repent the deed.

Hum. Good night, twenty good nights, and twenty more,
And twenty more good nights,—that makes three-score! Exeunt [severally]. 70

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter MISTRESS MERRYTHOUGHT and her son MICHAEL.

Mist. Mer. Come, Michael; art thou not weary, boy?

Mich. No, forsooth, mother, not I.
Mist. Mer. Where be we now, child?

Mich. Indeed, forsooth, mother, I cannot [5 tell, unless we be at Mile-End. Is not all the world Mile-End, mother?

Mist. Mer. No, Michael, not all the world, boy; but I can assure thee, Michael, Mile-End is a goodly matter: there has been a pitch- [10 field,<sup>3</sup> my child, between the naughty Spaniards<sup>4</sup> and the Englishmen; and the Spaniards ran away, Michael, and the Englishmen followed:
my neighbor Coxstone was there, boy, and kill'd them all with a birding-piece.<sup>5</sup> 15

Mich. Mother, forsooth —
Mist. Mer. What says my white boy? <sup>6</sup>

Mich. Shall not my father go with us too?

Mist. Mer. No, Michael, let thy father go snick-up; <sup>7</sup> he shall never come between a [20 pair of sheets with me again while he lives; let him stay at home, and sing for his supper, boy.
Come, child, sit down, and I'll show my boy fine knacks, indeed. [They sit down: and she takes out a casket.] Look here, Michael; here's

<sup>3</sup> This seems to be an allusion to a sham-battle at Mile-End, the green at which was used as a training ground.

<sup>6</sup> Fowling-piece.      <sup>7</sup> Go hang.

a ring, and here's a brooch, and here's a [25 bracelet, and here's two rings more, and here's money and gold by th' eye,<sup>8</sup> my boy.

Mich. Shall I have all this, mother?
Mist. Mer. Ay, Michael, thou shalt have [30 all, Michael.

Cit. How likedst thou this, wench?

Wife. I cannot tell; I would have Ralph,
George; I'll see no more else, indeed, la; and I pray you, let the youths understand so [35 much by word of mouth; for, I tell you truly,
I'm afraid a' my boy. Come, come, George,
let's be merry and wise: the child's a fatherless child; and say they should put him into a strait pair of gaskins,<sup>9</sup> 't were worse than [40 knot-grass;<sup>10</sup> he would never grow after it.

Enter RALPH, Squire [Tim], and Dwarf
[GEORGE].

Cit. Here's Ralph, here's Ralph!

Wife. How do you do, Ralph? you are welcome, Ralph, as I may say. It's a good boy, hold up thy head, and be not afraid; we are thy friends, Ralph; the gentlemen will praise thee, Ralph, if thou play'st thy part with auda- [47 city. Begin, Ralph, a' God's name!

Ralph. My trusty squire, unlace my helm;
give me my hat.

Where are we, or what desert may this be? 50

George. Mirror of knighthood, this is, as I take it, the perilous Waltham-down; in whose bottom stands the enchanted valley.

Mist. Mer. Oh, Michael, we are betray'd, we are betray'd! Here be giants! Fly, boy! fly, boy, fly! 55

Exit with MICHAEL [leaving the casket.]

Ralph. Lace on my helm again. What noise is this?

A gentle lady, flying the embrace
Of some uncourteous knight! I will relieve her.
Go, squire, and say, the Knight that wears this Pestle 60

In honour of all ladies, swears revenge
Upon that recreant coward that pursues her;
Go, comfort her, and that same gentle squire
That bears her company.

Tim. I go, brave knight. [Exit.]

Ralph. My trusty dwarf and friend, reach me my shield; 65

And hold it while I swear. First, by my knight-
hood;

Then by the soul of Amadis de Gaul,
My famous ancestor; then by my sword
The beauteous Brionella<sup>11</sup> girt about me;
By this bright burning Pestle, of mine honour
The living trophy; and by all respect 71
Due to distressed damsels; here I vow
Never to end the quest of this fair lady
And that forsaken squire till by my valour
I gain their liberty!

<sup>8</sup> In abundance.      <sup>9</sup> Breeches.
<sup>10</sup> An infusion of knot-grass was supposed to retard growth.
<sup>11</sup> The mistress of Ptolme, the friend of Palmerin.

George. Heaven bless the knight <sup>75</sup>
That thus relieves poor errant gentlewomen!
Exeunt.

Wife. Ay, marry, Ralph, this has some savour in 't; I would see the proudest of them all offer to carry his books after him. But, George, I will not have him go away so soon; I shall be sick if he go away, that I shall. Call Ralph <sup>81</sup> again, George, call Ralph again; I prithee, sweetheart, let him come fight before me, and let 's ha' some drums and some trumpets, and let him kill all that comes near him, an thou lov 'st me, George! <sup>80</sup>

Cit. Peace a little, bird: he shall kill them all, an they were twenty more on 'em than there are.

Enter JASPER.

Jasp. Now, Fortune, if thou be'st not only ill, <sup>90</sup>
Show me thy better face, and bring about
Thy desperate wheel, that I may climb at length,

And stand. This is our place of meeting,
If love have any constancy. Oh, age
Where only wealthy men are counted happy! <sup>95</sup>
How shall I please thee, how deserve thy smiles,
When I am only rich in misery?
My father's blessing and this little coin
Is my inheritance; a strong revenue!

From earth thou art, and to the earth I give thee: [Throws away the money.]
There grow and multiply, whilst fresher air <sup>101</sup>
Breeds me a fresher fortune. — How! illusion?

Spies the casket.
What, hath the devil coin'd himself before me?
'T is metal good, it rings well; I am waking,
And taking too, I hope. Now, God's dear blessing <sup>105</sup>
Upon his heart that left it here! 'T is mine;
These pearls, I take it, were not left for swine.

Exit [with the casket].

Wife. I do not like that this unthrifty youth should embezzle away the money; the poor gentlewoman his mother will have a heavy heart for it, God knows. <sup>111</sup>

Cit. And reason good, sweetheart.

Wife. But let him go; I'll tell Ralph a tale in 's ear shall fetch him again with a wanion.<sup>1</sup> I warrant him, if he be above ground; and besides, George, here are a number of sufficient gentlemen can witness, and myself, and yourself, and the musicians, if we be call'd in question. But here comes Ralph, George; thou shalt hear him speak as he were an emperal.<sup>2</sup>

[SCENE III.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter RALPH and Dwarf [GEORGE].

Ralph. Comes not sir squire again?

George. Right courteous knight,

<sup>3</sup> Another part of the forest.

Your squire doth come, and with him comes the lady,

Enter MISTRESS MERRYTHOUGHT, MICHAEL, and Squire [TIM].

For and <sup>4</sup> the Squire of Damsels, as I take it.
Ralph. Madam, if any service or devoir
Of a poor errant knight may right your wrongs,
Command it; I am prest <sup>5</sup> to give you succour;
For to that holy end I bear my armour.

Mist. Mer. Alas, sir, I am a poor gentlewoman, and I have lost my money in this forest!

Ralph. Desert, you would say, lady; and not lost <sup>10</sup>
Whilst I have sword and lance. Dry up your tears,

Which ill befits the beauty of that face,
And tell the story, if I may request it,
Of your disastrous fortune.

Mist. Mer. Out, alas! I left a thousand [us pound, a thousand pound, e'en all the money I had laid up for this youth, upon the sight of your mastership, you lookt so grim, and, as I may say it, saving your presence, more like a giant than a mortal man. <sup>20</sup>

Ralph. I am as you are, lady; so are they; All mortal. But why weeps this gentle squire?

Mist. Mer. Has he not cause to weep, do you think, when he hath lost his inheritance?

Ralph. Young hope of valour, weep not; I am here <sup>25</sup>

That will confound thy foe, and pay it dear
Upon his coward head, that dares deny
Dressed squires and ladies equity.

I have but one horse, on which shall ride
This fair lady behind me, and before, <sup>30</sup>
This courteous squire: fortune will give us more
Upon our next adventure. Fairly speed
Beside us, squire and dwarf, to do us need!

Exeunt.

Cit. Did not I tell you, Nell, what your man would do? By the faith of my body, wench, [us for clean action and good delivery, they may all cast their caps at him.]<sup>6</sup>

Wife. And so they may, i' faith; for I dare speak it boldly, the twelve companies <sup>7</sup> of London cannot match him, timber for timber.<sup>8</sup> Well, George, an he be not inveigled by some [us of these paltry players, I ha' much marvel: but, George, we ha' done our parts, if the boy have any grace to be thankful.]

Cit. Yes, I warrant thee, duckling. <sup>45</sup>

[SCENE IV.]<sup>9</sup>

Enter HUMPHREY and LUCE.

Hum. Good Mistress Luce, however I in fault am
For your lame horse, you 're welcome unto Waltham;

But which way now to go, or what to say,
I know not truly, till it be broad day.

<sup>4</sup> And also.

<sup>9</sup> Another part of the forest.

Luce. Oh, fear not, Master Humphrey; I am guide 5
For this place good enough.

Hum. Then, up and ride;
Or, if it please you, walk, for your repose;
Or sit, or, if you will, go pluck a rose;<sup>1</sup>
Either of which shall be indifferent

To your good friend and Humphrey, whose consent 10
Is so entangled ever to your will,
As the poor harmless horse is to the mill.

Luce. Faith, an you say the word, we 'll e'en sit down,
And take a nap.

Hum. 'Tis better in the town,
Where we may nap together; for, believe me,
To sleep without a snatch would mickle grieve
me. 15

Luce. You're merry, Master Humphrey.
Hum. So I am,
And have been ever merry from my dam.

Luce. Your nurse had the less labour.
Hum. Faith, it may be,
Unless it were by chance I did beray<sup>2</sup> me. 20

Enter JASPER.

Jasp. Luce! dear friend Luce!
Luce. Here, Jasper.
Jasp. You are mine.

Hum. If it be so, my friend, you use me fine.
What do you think I am?

Jasp. An arrant noddy.
Hum. A word of obloquy! Now, by God's body,
I'll tell thy master; for I know thee well. 25

Jasp. Nay, an you be so forward for to tell,
Take that, and that; and tell him, sir, I gave it:
And say, I paid you well. [Beats him.]

Hum. Oh, sir, I have it,
And do confess the payment! Pray, be quiet.
Jasp. Go, get [you] to your night-cap and the diet. 30

To cure your beaten bones.
Luce. Alas, poor Humphrey;
Get thee some wholesome broth, with sage and comfrey;<sup>3</sup>

A little oil of roses and a feather
To 'noint thy back withal.

Hum. When I came hither,
Would I had gone to Paris with John Dory!<sup>4</sup>

Luce. Farewell, my pretty nump; I am very sorry 35
I cannot bear thee company.

Hum. Farewell:
The devil's dam was ne'er so bang'd in hell.
Exit LUCE and JASPER.

Wife. This young Jasper will prove me another thing, a' my conscience, an he may be suffered. George, dost not see, George, how 'a swaggers, and flies at the very heads a' folks, [42 as he were a dragon? Well, if I do not do his lesson<sup>5</sup> for wronging the poor gentleman, I am no true woman. His friends that brought him up might have been better occupied, i-wis, than ha' taught him these fegaries:<sup>6</sup> he's e'en in [47

the high way to the gallows, God bless him!

Cit. You're too bitter, cony; the young man may do well enough for all this. 50

Wife. Come hither, Master Humphrey; has he hurt you? Now, beshrew his fingers for 't! Here, sweetheart, here 's some green ginger for thee. Now, beshrew my heart, but 'a has peppernel<sup>7</sup> in 's head, as big as a pullet's egg! Alas, sweet lamb, how thy temples [56 beat! Take the peace on him,<sup>8</sup> sweetheart, take the peace on him.

Cit. No, no; you talk like a foolish woman:
I'll ha' Ralph fight with him, and swinge him up well-favour'dly. — Sirrah boy, come hither.
(Enter Boy.) Let Ralph come in and fight [62 with Jasper.

Wife. Ay, and beat him well; he's an unhappy<sup>9</sup> boy. 65

Boy. Sir, you must pardon; the plot of our play lies contrary; and 't will hazard the spoiling of our play.

Cit. Plot me no plots! I'll ha' Ralph come out; I'll make your house too hot for you else.

Boy. Why, sir, he shall; but if any thing fall out of order, the gentlemen must pardon us. 72

Cit. Go your ways, goodman boy! [Exit Boy.]
I'll hold<sup>10</sup> him a penny, he shall have his belly-ful of fighting now. Ho, here comes Ralph! No
more!<sup>11</sup> 75

[SCENE V.]<sup>12</sup>

[HUMPHREY manet.] Enter RALPH, MISTRESS MERRYTHOUGHT, MICHAEL, Squire [TIM],
and Dwarf [GEORGE].

Ralph. What knight is that, squire? Ask him if he keep
The passage, bound by love of lady fair,
Or else but prickant.<sup>13</sup>

Hum. Sir, I am no knight,
But a poor gentleman, that this same night
Had stolen from me, on yonder green, 5
My lovely wife, and suffered (to be seen
Yet extant on my shoulders) such a greeting,
That whilst I live I shall think of that meeting.

Wife. Ay, Ralph, he beat him unmercifully, Ralph; an thou sparest him, Ralph, I would [10
thou wert hang'd.

Cit. No more, wife, no more.

Ralph. Where is the caitiff-wretch hath done this deed?

Lady, your pardon, that I may proceed
Upon the quest of this injurious knight. — 15
And thou, fair squire, repute me not the worse,
In leaving the great venture of the purse
And the rich casket, till some better leisure.

<sup>4</sup> John Dory, according to the legend, engaged with the King of France to bring the crew of an English ship prisoners to Paris, but was himself captured whilst making the attempt. The song and tune were for a long time popular in England. (Strachey.)

Enter JASPER and LUCE.

Hum. Here comes the broker hath purloin'd my treasure.

Ralph. Go, squire, and tell him I am here, <sup>20</sup>
An errant knight-at-arms, to crave delivery
Of that fair lady to her own knight's arms.
If he deny, bid him take choice of ground,
And so defy him.

Tim. From the Knight that bears
The Golden Pestle, I defy thee, knight, <sup>25</sup>
Unless thou make fair restitution
Of that bright lady.

Jasp. Tell the knight that sent thee,
He is an ass; and I will keep the wench,
And knock his head-piece.

Ralph. Knight, thou art but dead
If thou recall not thy uncourteous terms. <sup>30</sup>

Wife. Break 's pate, Ralph; break 's pate, Ralph, soundly!

Jasp. Come, knight; I am ready for you.
Now your Pestle (Snatches away his pestle.)
Shall try what temper, sir, your mortar 's of.

"With that he stood upright in his stirrups, <sup>35</sup> and gave the Knight of the calf-skin such a knock [Knocks RALPH down.] that he forsook his horse, and down he fell: and then he leaped upon him, and plucking off his helmet —"

Hum. Nay, an my noble knight be down so soon, <sup>40</sup>
Though I can scarcely go, I needs must run.

Exeunt HUMPHREY and RALPH.

Wife. Run, Ralph, run, Ralph; run for thy life, boy;
Jasper comes, Jasper comes!

Jasp. Come Luce, we must have other arms
for you:
Humphrey, and Golden Pestle, both adieu! <sup>45</sup>
Exeunt.

Wife. Sure the devil (God bless us!) is in this springald! <sup>1</sup> Why, George, didst ever see such a fire-drake <sup>2</sup> I am afraid my boy's miscarried:
if he be, though he were Master Merrythought's son a thousand times, if there be any law in <sup>50</sup>
England, I'll make some of them smart for 't.

Cit. No, no; I have found out the matter, sweetheart; Jasper is enchanted; as sure as we are here, he is enchanted: he could no more have stood in Ralph's hands than I can in <sup>55</sup> my lord mayor's. I'll have a ring to discover all enchantments, and Ralph shall beat him yet.
Be no more vext, for it shall be so.

[SCENE VI.] <sup>3</sup>

Enter RALPH, MISTRESS MERRYTHOUGHT, MICHAEL, Squire [TIM], and Dwarf [GEORGE].

Wife. Oh, husband, here 's Ralph again! — Stay, Ralph, let me speak with thee. How dost thou, Ralph? Art thou not shrewdly <sup>4</sup>

hurt? — The foul great lungies <sup>5</sup> laid unmercifully on thee; there 's some sugar-candy for [s thee. Proceed; thou shalt have another bout with him.

Cit. If Ralph had him at the fencing-school, if he did not make a puppy of him, and drive him up and down the school, he should ne'er <sup>10</sup> come in my shop more.

Mist. Mer. Truly Master Knight of the Burning Pestle, I am weary.

Mich. Indeed, la, mother, and I am very hungry. <sup>15</sup>

Ralph. Take comfort, gentle dame, and you fair squire;

For in this desert there must needs be plac'd
Many strong castles held by courteous knights;
And till I bring you safe to one of those,
I swear by this my order ne'er to leave you. <sup>20</sup>

Wife. Well said, Ralph! — George, Ralph was ever comfortable, <sup>6</sup> was he not?

Cit. Yes, duck.

Wife. I shall ne'er forget him. When he had lost our child, (you know it was stray'd al- <sup>25</sup> most, alone, to Puddle-Wharf, and the criers were abroad for it, and there it had drown'd itself but for a sculler.) Ralph was the most comfortablest to me: "Peace, mistress," says he, "let it go; I'll get you another as good." <sup>30</sup> Did he not, George, did he not say so?

Cit. Yes, indeed did he, mouse.

George. I would we had a mess of pottage and a pot of drink, squire, and were going to bed!

Tim. Why, we are at Waltham town's <sup>35</sup> end, and that 's the Bell Inn.

George. Take courage, valiant knight, damsel, and squire!

I have discovered, not a stone cast off,
An ancient castle, held by the old knight
Of the most holy order of the Bell, <sup>40</sup>
Who gives to all knights-errant entertain.
There plenty is of food, and all prepar'd
By the white hands of his own lady dear.
He hath three squires that welcome all his guests;

The first, hight Chamberlino, who will see <sup>45</sup>
Our beds prepar'd, and bring us snowy sheets,
Where never footman stretch'd his butter'd hams; <sup>7</sup>

The second, hight Tapstero, who will see
Our pots full filled, and no froth therein;
The third, a gentle squire, Ostlero hight, <sup>50</sup>
Who will our palfreys slick with wisps of straw,
And in the manger put them oats enough,
And never grease their teeth with candle-snuff. <sup>8</sup>

Wife. That same dwarf 's a pretty boy, but the squire 's a groutnol. <sup>55</sup>

<sup>8</sup> A common trick of the ostlers of the time to prevent the horses from eating the hay. (Weber.)

Ralph. Knock at the gates, my squire, with stately lance. [TIM knocks at the door.]

Enter TAPSTER.

Tap. Who's there? — You're welcome, gentlemen: will you see a room?

George. Right courteous and valiant Knight of the Burning Pestle, this is the Squire [<sup>50</sup> Tapstero.

Ralph. Fair Squire Tapstero, I a wandering knight,

Hight of the Burning Pestle, in the quest Of this fair lady's casket and wrought purse, Losing myself in this vast wilderness, [<sup>55</sup>

Am to this castle well by fortune brought; Where, hearing of the goodly entertain

Your knight of holy order of the Bell Gives to all damsels and all errant knights,

I thought to knock, and now am bold to enter. [<sup>70</sup>

Tap. An't please you see a chamber, you are very welcome. Exeunt.

Wife. George, I would have something done, and I cannot tell what it is.

Cit. What is it, Nell? [<sup>75</sup>

Wife. Why, George, shall Ralph beat nobody again? Prithee, sweetheart, let him.

Cit. So he shall, Nell; and if I join with him, we'll knock them all.

[SCENE VII.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter HUMPHREY and Merchant [VENTUREWELL.]

Wife. Oh, George, here's Master Humphrey again now, that lost Mistress Luce, and Mistress Luce's father. Master Humphrey will do somebody's errand, I'll warrant him.

Hum. Father, it's true in arms I ne'er shall clasp her; [<sup>5</sup>

For she is stoln away by your man Jasper.

Wife. I thought he would tell him.

Vent. Unhappy that I am, to lose my child! Now I begin to think on Jasper's words, Who oft bath urg'd [to] me thy foolishness. [<sup>10</sup> Why didst thou let her go? Thou lov'st her not, That wouldst bring home thy life, and not bring her.

Hum. Father, forgive me. Shall I tell you true?

Look on my shoulders, they are black and blue. Whilst to and fro fair Luce and I were wind- ing, [<sup>15</sup>

He came and basted me with a hedge-binding.<sup>2</sup>

Vent. Get men and horses straight: we will be there

Within this hour. You know the place again?

Hum. I know the place where he my loins did swaddle;

I'll get six horses, and to each a saddle. [<sup>20</sup>

Vent. Mean time I will go talk with Jasper's father. Exeunt [severally].

Wife. George, what wilt thou lay with me now, that Master Humphrey has not Mistress Luce yet? Speak, George, what wilt thou lay with me? [<sup>25</sup>

Cit. No, Nell; I warrant thee Jasper is at Puckeridge<sup>3</sup> with her by this.

Wife. Nay, George, you must consider Mistress Luce's feet are tender; and besides 't is dark; and, I promise you truly, I do not see [<sup>30</sup> how he should get out of Waltham-forest with her yet.

Cit. Nay, cony, what wilt thou lay with me, that Ralph has her not yet?

Wife. I will not lay against Ralph, honey, [<sup>35</sup> because I have not spoken with him. But look, George, peace! here comes the merry old gentleman again.

[SCENE VIII.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter old MERRRTHOUGHT.

Mer. [sings.]

When it was grown to dark midnight,

And all were fast asleep,

In came Margaret's grimly ghost,

And stood at William's feet.

I have money, and meat, and drink before- [<sup>5</sup> hand, till to-morrow at noon; why should I be sad? Methinks I have half-a-dozen jovial spirits within me! [Sings.]

I am three merry men, and three merry men!

To what end should any man be sad in this [<sup>10</sup> world? Give me a man who when he goes to hanging cries,

Troul<sup>5</sup> the black bowl to me!

and a woman that will sing a catch in her travail! I have seen a man come by my door [<sup>15</sup> with a serious face, in a black cloak, without a hatband, carrying his head as if he lookt for pins in the street; I have lookt out of my window half a year after, and have spied that man's head upon London-bridge.<sup>6</sup> 'T is vile: never [<sup>20</sup> trust a tailor that does not sing at his work; his mind is of nothing but flehing.

Wife. Mark this, George; 't is worth noting: Godfrey my tailor, you know, never sings, and he had fourteen yards to make this gown: [<sup>25</sup> and I'll be sworn, Mistress Penistone the draper's wife had one made with twelve.

Mer. [sings.]

'T is mirth that fills the veins with blood,

More than wine, or sleep, or food;

Let each man keep his heart at ease,

No man dies of that disease. [<sup>30</sup>

He that would his body keep
From diseases, must not weep ;
But whoever laughs and sings,
Never he his body brings
Into fevers, gout, or rheums,
Or ling'ringly his lungs consumes,
Or meets with achés in the bowe,
Or catarrhs or griping stone ;
But contented lives for aye ;
The more he laughs, the more he may.

Wife. Look, George ; how sayest thou by this, George ? Is't not a fine old man ? — Now, God's blessing a' thy sweet lips ! — When wilt thou be so merry, George ? Faith, thou art <sup>45</sup> the frowning'st little thing, when thou art angry, in a country.

Enter Merchant [VENTUREWELL].

Cit. Peace, cony ; thou shalt see him taken down too, I warrant thee. Here's Luce's father come now.

Mer. [sings.]

As you came from Walsingham,
From that holy laud,
There met you not with my true love
By the way as you came ?

Vent. Oh, Master Merrythought, my daughter's gone !
This mirth becomes you not ; my daughter's gone !

Mer. [sings.]

Why, an if she be, what care I ?
Or let her come, or go, or tarry.

Vent. Mock not my misery ; it is your son (Whom I have made my own, when all forsook him)

Has stoln my only joy, my child, away.

Mer. [sings.]

He set her on a milk-white steed,
And himself upon a grey ;
He never turn'd his face again,
But he bore her quite away.

Vent. Unworthy of the kindness I have shown

To thee and thine ! too late I well perceive
Thou art consenting to my daughter's loss.

Mer. Your daughter ! what a stir's here wi' your daughter ? Let her go, think no more <sup>70</sup> on her, but sing loud. If both my sons were on the gallows, I would sing,

Down, down, down they fall ;
Down, and arise they never shall.

Vent. Oh, might I behold her once again, <sup>75</sup> And she once more embrace her aged sire !

Mer. Fie, how scurvily this goes ! " And she once more embrace her aged sire ? " You'll make a dog on her, will ye ? She cares much for her aged sire, I warrant you. [Sings.]

She cares not for her daddy, nor
She cares not for her mammy,
For she is, she is, she is, she is
My lord of Lowgave's lassy.

Vent. For this thy scorn I will pursue that son
Of thine to death.

Mer. Do ; and when you ha' kill'd him, [Sings.]

Give him flowers enow, palmer, give him flowers enow ;
Give him red, and white, and blue, green, and yellow.

Vent. I'll fetch my daughter —

Mer. I'll hear no more a' your daughter ; it spoils my mirth.

Vent. I say, I'll fetch my daughter.

Mer. [sings.]

Was never man for lady's sake,
Down, down,
Tormented as I, poor Sir Guy,
De derry down,
For Lucy's sake, that lady bright,
Down, down,
As ever men beheld with eye,
De derry down.

Vent. I'll be reveng'd, by Heaven !

Exeunt [severally].

Music.

Wife. How dost thou like this, George ?

Cit. Why, this is well, cony ; but if Ralph were hot once, thou shouldst see more.

Wife. The fiddlers go again, husband.

Cit. Ay, Nell ; but this is scurvey music. I gave the whoreson gallows money, and I think he has not got me the waits of Southwark. If I hear 'em not anon, I'll twinge him by the ears. — You musicians, play Baloo !

Wife. No, good George, let's ha' Lachrymae !

Cit. Why, this is it, cony.

Wife. It's all the better, George. Now, sweet lamb, what story is that painted upon the cloth ? The Confutation of St. Paul ?

Cit. No, lamb ; that's Ralph and Lucrece.

Wife. Ralph and Lucrece ! Which Ralph ? Our Ralph ?

Cit. No, mouse ; that was a Tartarian.<sup>1</sup>

Wife. A Tartarian ! Well, I would the fiddlers had done, that we might see our Ralph again !

ACT III

SCENE I.<sup>2</sup>

Enter JASPER and LUCE.

Jasp. Come, my dear dear ; though we have lost our way,

We have not lost ourselves. Are you not weary With this night's wand'ring, broken from your rest,

And frighted with the terror that attends The darkness of this wild unpeopled place ?

Luce. No, my best friend ; I cannot either fear,

Or entertain a weary thought, whilst you (The end of all my full desires) stand by me. Let them that lose their hopes, and live to languish

Amongst the number of forsaken lovers, 10
Tell the long weary steps, and number time,
Start at a shadow, and shrink up their blood,
Whilst I (possess with all content and quiet)
Thus take my pretty love, and thus embrace
him.

Jasp. You have caught me, Luce, so fast, that, whilst I live, 16

I shall become your faithful prisoner,
And wear these chains for ever. Come, sit
down,

And rest your body, too, too delicate
For these disturbances. — [They sit down.] So:
will you sleep?

Come, do not be more able<sup>1</sup> than you are; 20
I know you are not skilful in these watches,
For women are no soldiers. Be not nice,<sup>2</sup>
But take it; <sup>3</sup> sleep, I say.

Luce. I cannot sleep;
Indeed, I cannot, friend.

Jasp. Why, then we'll sing,
And try how that will work upon our senses. 25

Luce. I'll sing, or say, or any thing but sleep.

Jasp. Come, little mermaid, rob me of my
heart

With that enchanting voice.

Luce. You mock me, Jasper. [They sing.]

Song.

Jasp. Tell me, dearest, what is love?

Luce. 'Tis a lightning from above; 30

'Tis an arrow, 'tis a fire,

'Tis a boy they call Desire;

'Tis a smile

Doth beguile

Jasp. The poor hearts of men that prove. 35

Tell me more, are women true?

Luce. Some love change, and so do you.

Jasp. Are they fair and never kind?

Luce. Yes, when men turn with the wind.

Jasp. Are they froward? 40

Luce. Ever toward

Those that love, to love anew.

Jasp. Dissemble it no more; I see the god
Of heavy sleep lay on his heavy mace 44
Upon your eyelids.

Luce. I am very heavy. [Sleeps.]

Jasp. Sleep, sleep; and quiet rest crown thy sweet thoughts!

Keep from her fair blood distempers, startings, Horrors, and fearful shapes! Let all her dreams

Be joys, and chaste delights, embraces,
wishes,

And such new pleasures as the ravisht soul 50
Gives to the senses! — So; my charms have took. —

Keep her, you powers divine, whilst I contemplate

Upon the wealth and beauty of her mind!
She is only fair and constant, only kind,

And only to thee, Jasper. Oh, my joys! 55
Whither will you transport me? Let not ful-
ness

Of my poor buried hopes come up together
And overcharge my spirits! I am weak.
Some say (however ill) the sea and women
Are govern'd by the moon; both ebb and
flow, 60

Both full of changes; yet to them that know,
And truly judge, these but opinions are,
And heresies, to bring on pleasing war
Between our tempers, that without these were

Both void of after-love and present fear; 65
Which are the best of Cupid. Oh, thou child
Bred from despair, I dare not entertain thee,
Having a love without the faults of women,
And greater in her perfect goods than men!

Which to make good, and please myself the stronger, 70

Though certainly I am certain of her love,
I'll try her, that the world and memory
May sing to after-times her constancy. —

[Draws his sword.]

Luce! Luce! awake!

Luce. Why do you fright me, friend,
With those distemp'ered looks? What makes<sup>4</sup> your sword 75

Drawn in your hand? Who hath offended you?
I prithee, Jasper, sleep; thou art wild with watching.

Jasp. Come, make your way to Heaven, and bid the world,

With all the villainies that stick upon it,
Farewell; you're for another life.

Luce. Oh, Jasper, 80
How have my tender years committed evil,
Especially against the man I love,
Thus to be cropt untimely?

Jasp. Foolish girl,
Canst thou imagine I could love his daughter 84

That flung me from my fortune into nothing?
Discharged me his service, shut the doors
Upon my poverty, and scorn'd my prayers,
Sending me, like a boat without a mast,
To sink or swim? Come; by this hand you
die;

I must have life and blood, to satisfy 90
Your father's wrongs.

Wife. Away, George, away! raise the watch at Ludgate, and bring a mittimus<sup>5</sup> from the justice for this desperate villain! — Now, I charge you, gentlemen, see the king's peace 95 kept! — Oh, my heart, what a varlet's this to offer manslaughter upon the harmless gentle-woman!

Cit. I warrant thee, sweetheart, we'll have him hampered.

Luce. Oh, Jasper, be not cruel! 100
If thou wilt kill me, smile, and do it quickly,
And let not many deaths appear before me.
I am a woman, made of fear and love,
A weak, weak woman; kill not with thy eyes,
They shoot me through and through. Strike, I am ready; 105

And, dying, still I love thee.

<sup>5</sup> Warrant for arrest.

Enter Merchant [VENTUREWELL], HUMPHREY, and his men.

Vent. Whereabouts?
Jasp. No more of this; now to myself again.

[Aside.]
Hum. There, there he stands, with sword, like martial knight,
Drawn in his hand; therefore beware the fight,
You that be wise; for, were I good Sir Bevis,
I would not stay his coming, by your leaves. 111
Vent. Sirrah, restore my daughter!

Jasp. Sirrah, no.

Vent. Upon him, then!
[They attack JASPER, and force
LUCE from him.]

Wife. So; down with him, down with him, down with him!
Cut him i' th' leg, boys, cut him i' th' leg! 116

Vent. Come your ways, minion: I'll provide a cage

For you, you're grown so tame. — Horse her
away.

Hum. Truly, I'm glad your forces have the day. Exeunt all except JASPER.

Jasp. They are gone, and I am hurt; my love is lost, 120

Never to get again. Oh, me unhappy!
Bleed, bleed and die! I cannot. Oh, my folly, Thou hast betray'd me! Hope, where art thou fled?

Tell me, if thou be'st any where remaining,
Shall I but see my love again? Oh, no! 125
She will not deign to look upon her butcher,
Nor is it fit she should; yet I must venture.
Oh, Chance, or Fortune, or what'er thou art,
That men adore for powerful, hear my cry,
And let me loving live, or losing die! Exit.

Wife. Is 'a gone, George? 131

Cit. Ay, cony.

Wife. Marry, and let him go, sweetheart. By the faith a' my body, 'a has put me into such a fright, that I tremble (as they say) as [135
't were an aspen-leaf. Look a' my little finger, George, how it shakes. Now, i' truth, every member of my body is the worse for 't.

Cit. Come, hug in mine arms, sweet mouse; he shall not fright thee any more. Alas, mine own dear heart, how it quivers! 141

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter MISTRESS MERRYTHOUGHT, RALPH, MI-CHAEL, Squire [TIM], Dwarf [GEORGE], Host, and Tapster.

Wife. Oh, Ralph! how dost thou, Ralph?
How hast thou slept to-night? Has the knight us'd thee well?

Cit. Peace, Nell; let Ralph alone.

Tap. Master, the reckoning is not paid. 14

Ralph. Right courteous knight, who, for the order's sake

Which thou hast ta'en, hang'st out the holy Bell,

As I this flaming Pestle bear about,
We render thanks to your puissant self,
Your beauteous lady, and your gentle squires, 10
For thus refreshing of our wearied limbs,
Stiff'ned with hard achievements in wild desert.

Tap. Sir, there is twelve shillings to pay.

Ralph. Thou merry Squire Tapstero, thanks to thee

For comforting our souls with double jug: 15
And, if advent'rous fortune prick thee forth,
Thou jovial squire, to follow feats of arms,
Take heed thou tender every lady's cause,
Every true knight, and every damsel fair;
But spill the blood of treacherous Saracens, 20
And false enchanters that with magic spells
Have done to death full many a noble knight.

Host. Thou valiant Knight of the Burning Pestle, give ear to me; there is twelve shillings to pay, and, as I am a true knight, I will not 25
bate a penny.

Wife. George, I prithee, tell me, must Ralph pay twelve shillings now?

Cit. No, Nell, no; nothing but the old knight is merry with Ralph. 30

Wife. Oh, is 't nothing else? Ralph will be as merry as he.

Ralph. Sir Knight, this mirth of yours becomes you well;

But, to requite this liberal courtesy,
If any of your squires will follow arms, 35
He shall receive from my heroic hand
A knighthood, by the virtue of this Pestle.

Host. Fair knight, I thank you for your noble offer:

Therefore, gentle knight,
Twelve shillings you must pay, or I must cap 2
you. 40

Wife. Look, George! did not I tell thee as much? The knight of the Bell is in earnest.
Ralph shall not be beholding to him; give him his money, George, and let him go snick up.<sup>3</sup>

Cit. Cap Ralph? No. — Hold your hand, [45
Sir Knight of the Bell; there's your money [Gives money.]: have you any thing to say to Ralph now? Cap Ralph!

Wife. I would you should know it, Ralph has friends that will not suffer him to be capt [50 for ten times so much, and ten times to the end of that. — Now take thy course, Ralph.

Mist. Mer. Come, Michael; thou and I will go home to thy father; he hath enough left to keep us a day or two, and we'll set fellows [55 abroad to cry our purse and our casket: shall we, Michael?

Mich. Ay, I pray, mother; in truth my feet are full of chilblains with travelling.

Wife. Faith, and those chilblains are a [60 foul trouble. Mistress Merrythought, when

your youth comes home, let him rub all the soles of his feet, and his heels, and his ancles, with a mouse-skin; or, if none of your people can catch a mouse, when he goes to bed, let him roll his feet in the warm embers, and, I warrant you, he shall be well; and you may make him put his fingers between his toes, and smell to them; it's very sovereign for his head, if he be costive. 70

Mist. Mer. Master Knight of the Burning Pestle, my son Michael and I bid you farewell: I thank your worship heartily for your kindness.

Ralph. Farewell, fair lady, and your tender squire. 75

If pricking through these deserts, I do hear Of any traitorous knight, who through his guile

Hath tri'd upon your casket and your purse, I will dispoil him of them, and restore them.

Mist. Mer. I thank your worship. 80

Ralph. Dwarf, bear my shield; squire, elevate my lance: —

And now farewell, you Knight of holy Bell.

Cit. Ay, ay, Ralph, all is paid.

Ralph. But yet, before I go, speak, worthy knight,

If aught you do of sad<sup>1</sup> adventures know, 85 Where errant knight may through his prowess win

Eternal fame, and free some gentle souls From endless bonds of steel and ling'ring pain.

Host. Sirrah, go to Nick the barber, and bid him prepare himself, as I told you before, 90 quickly.

Tap. I am gone, sir. Exit.

Host. Sir Knight, this wilderness affordeth none

But the great venture, where full many a knight

Hath tri'd his prowess, and come off with shame; 95

And where I would not have you lose your life Against no man, but furious fiend of hell.

Ralph. Speak on, Sir Knight; tell what he is and where:

For here I vow, upon my blazing badge, Never to blaze a day in quietness, 100

But bread and water will I only eat, And the green herb and rock shall be my couch,

Till I have quell'd<sup>2</sup> that man, or beast, or fiend,

That works such damage to all errant knights.

Host. Not far from hence, near to a craggy cliff, 105

At the north end of this distressed town, There doth stand a lowly house,

Ruggedly builded, and in it a cave In which an ugly giant now doth won,<sup>3</sup>

Ycleped Barbaroso: in his hand 110

He shakes a naked lance of purest steel, With sleeves turn'd up; and him before he wears

A motley garment, to preserve his clothes From blood of those knights which he massacres,

And ladies gent:<sup>4</sup> without his door doth hang A copper basin on a prickant<sup>5</sup> spear; 115

At which no sooner gentle knights can knock, But the shrill sound fierce Barbaroso hears,

And rushing forth, brings in the errant knight And sets him down in an enchanted chair; 120

Then with an engine, which he hath prepar'd, With forty teeth, he claws his courtly crown;

Next makes him wink, and underneath his chin

He plants a brazen piece of mighty bord,<sup>6</sup> And knocks his bullets<sup>7</sup> round about his cheeks; 125

Whilst with his fingers, and an instrument With which he snaps his hair off, he doth fill

The wretch's ears with a most hideous noise. Thus every knight-adventurer he doth trim,

And now no creature dares encounter him. 130

Ralph. In God's name, I will fight him. Kind sir,

Go but before me to this dismal cave, Where this huge giant Barbaroso dwells,

And, by that virtue that brave Rosicleer That damned brood of ugly giants slew, 135

And Palmerin Frannarco overthrew, I doubt not but to curb this traitor foul,

And to the devil send his guilty soul.

Host. Brave-sprighted knight, thus far I will perform

This your request: I'll bring you within sight Of this most loathsome place, inhabited 140

By a more loathsome man; but dare not stay, For his main force swoops all he sees away.

Ralph. Saint George, set on before! March squire and page! Exeunt.

Wife. George, dost think Ralph will con- [145 found the giant?

Cit. I hold my cap to a farthing he does. Why, Nell, I saw him wrestle with the great Dutchman, and hurl him.

Wife. Faith, and that Dutchman was a goodly man, if all things were answerable to his [150 bigness. And yet they say there was a Scotchman higher than he, and that they two and a knight met, and saw one another for nothing.

But of all the sights that ever were in Lon- [155 don, since I was married, methinks the little child that was so fair grown about the members was the prettiest; that and the hermaphrodite.

Cit. Nay, by your leave, Nell, Ninivie<sup>8</sup> was better. 160

Wife. Ninivie! Oh, that was the story of Jone and the wall,<sup>9</sup> was it not, George?

Cit. Yes, lamb.

Wife. Look, George, here comes Mistress Merrythought again! and I would have Ralph come and fight with the giant; I tell you true, I long to see 't.

Cit. Good Mistress Merrythought, begone, [I pray you, for my sake; I pray you, forbear a little; you shall have audience presently; I have a little business.]

Wife. Mistress Merrythought, if it please you to refrain your passion a little, till Ralph [10] have despatcht the giant out of the way, we shall think ourselves much bound to you. I thank you, good Mistress Merrythought.

Exit MISTRESS MERRYTHOUGHT.Enter a Boy.

Cit. Boy, come hither. Send away Ralph and this whoreson giant quickly. <sup>15</sup>

Boy. In good faith, sir, we cannot; you'll utterly spoil our play, and make it to be hist; and it cost money; you will not suffer us to go on with our plot. — I pray, gentlemen, rule him.

Cit. Let him come now and despatch this, [20] and I'll trouble you no more.

Boy. Will you give me your hand of that?

Wife. Give him thy hand, George, do; and I'll kiss him. I warrant thee, the youth means plainly. <sup>25</sup>

Boy. I'll send him to you presently.<sup>2</sup>

Wife. [kissing him.] I thank you, little youth. (Exit Boy.) Faith, the child hath a sweet breath, George; but I think it be troubled with the worms; carduus benedictus and mare's milk [30] were the only thing in the world for 't.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>3</sup>Enter RALPH, Host, TIM, and GEORGE.

Wife. Oh, Ralph's here, George! — God send thee good luck, Ralph!

Host. Puissant knight, yonder his mansion is. Lo, where the spear and copper basin are!

Behold that string, on which hangs many a tooth, <sup>5</sup>
Drawn from the gentle jaw of wand'ring knights!

I dare not say to sound; he will appear.<sup>4</sup>

Exit.

Ralph. Oh, faint not, heart! Susan, my lady dear,
The cobbler's maid in Milk-street, for whose sake <sup>9</sup>

I take these arms, oh, let the thought of thee Carry thy knight through all adventurous deeds;

And, in the honour of thy beauteous self, May I destroy this monster Barbaroso! — Knock, squire, upon the basin, till it break <sup>14</sup>
With the shrill strokes, or till the giant speak.

[TIM knocks upon the basin.]

Wife. Oh, George, the giant, the giant! — Now, Ralph for thy life!

Bar. What fond<sup>5</sup> unknowing wight is this, that dares
So rudely knock at Barbaroso's cell,
Where no man comes but leaves his fleece behind? <sup>20</sup>

Ralph. I, traitorous caitiff, who am sent by fate

To punish all the sad enormities
Thou hast committed against ladies gent
And errant knights. Traitor to God and men,
Prepare thyself! This is the dismal hour <sup>25</sup>
Appointed for thee to give strict account
Of all thy beastly treacherous villanies.

Bar. Fool-hardy knight, full soon thou shalt aby<sup>6</sup>

This fond reproach: thy body will I bang; <sup>29</sup>
Takes down his pole.

And, lo, upon that string thy teeth shall hang!
Prepare thyself, for dead soon shalt thou be.

Ralph. Saint George for me! They fight.

Bar. Gargantua for me!

Wife. To him, Ralph, to him! hold up the giant; set out thy leg before, Ralph! <sup>35</sup>

Cit. Falsify<sup>7</sup> a blow, Ralph, falsify a blow!
The giant lies open on the left side.

Wife. Bear 't off, bear 't off still! there, boy! —

Oh, Ralph's almost down, Ralph's almost down!

Ralph. Susan, inspire me! Now have up again. <sup>40</sup>

Wife. Up, up, up, up, up! so, Ralph! down with him, down with him, Ralph!

Cit. Fetch him o'er the hip, boy!
[RALPH knocks down the Barber.]

Wife. There, boy! kill, kill, kill, kill, kill, Ralph!

Cit. No, Ralph; get all out of him first. <sup>45</sup>

Ralph. Presumptuous man, see to what desperate end

Thy treachery hath brought thee! The just gods,

Who never prosper those that do despise them,
For all the villanies which thou hast done

To knights and ladies, now have paid thee home <sup>50</sup>

By my stiff arm, a knight adventurous.

But say, vile wretch, before I send thy soul

To sad Avernus, whither it must go,

What captives holdst thou in thy sable cave?

Bar. Go in, and free them all; thou hast the day. <sup>55</sup>

Ralph. Go, squire and dwarf, search in this dreadful cave,

And free the wretched prisoners from their bonds. Ezeunt TIM and GEORGE.

<sup>5</sup> Foolish.<sup>6</sup> Pay for.<sup>7</sup> Feign.

Bar. I crave for mercy, as thou art a knight,
And scorn'st to spill the blood of those that beg.

Ralph. Thou show'd'st no mercy, nor shalt thou have any; 60
Prepare thyself, for thou shalt surely die.

Re-enter Squire [TIM], leading one winking, with a Basin under his Chin.

Tim. Behold, brave knight, here is one prisoner,
Whom this wild man hath used as you see.

Wife. This is the first wise word I heard the squire speak. 65

Ralph. Speak what thou art, and how thou hast been us'd,
That I may give him condign punishment.

1 Kn. I am a knight that took my journey
post
Northward from London; and in courteous wise

This giant train'd me to his loathsome den, 70
Under pretence of killing of the itch;
And all my body with a powder strew'd,
That smarts and stings; and cut away my beard,

And my curl'd locks wherein were ribands ti'd;
And with a water washt my tender eyes, 75
(Whilst up and down about me still he skipt,
Whose virtue is, that, till my eyes be wipt
With a dry cloth, for this my foul disgrace,
I shall not dare to look a dog i' th' face.

Wife. Alas, poor knight! — Relieve him, [80
Ralph; relieve poor knights, whilst you live.

Ralph. My trusty squire, convey him to the town,
Where he may find relief. — Adieu, fair knight.
Exit 1 Knight.

Re-enter Dwarf [GEORGE], leading one, with a patch o'er his nose.

George. Puissant Knight, of the Burning Pes-tle light, 84

See here another wretch, whom this foul beast
Hath scorcht<sup>1</sup> and scor'd in this inhuman wise.

Ralph. Speak me thy name, and eke thy place of birth,

And what hath been thy usage in this cave.
2 Kn. I am a knight, Sir Pockhole is my
name,

And by my birth I am a Londoner, 90
Free by my copy,<sup>2</sup> but my ancestors
Were Frenchmen<sup>3</sup> all; and riding hard this
way

Upon a trotting horse, my bones did ache;
And I, faint knight, to ease my weary limbs,
Light at this cave; when straight this furious
fiend, 95

With sharpest instruments of purest steel,

<sup>2</sup> Certificate of citizenship.

<sup>3</sup> The pox or syphilis was also known as the French disease.

Did cut the gristle of my nose away,
And in the place this velvet plaster stands.
Relieve me, gentle knight, out of his hands! 99

Wife. Good Ralph, relieve Sir Pockhole, and send him away; for in truth his breath stinks.

Ralph. Convey him straight after the other knight. —
Sir Pockhole, fare you well.

2 Kn. Kind sir, good night. Exit.
Man. [within.] Deliver us! Cries within.
Woman. [within.] Deliver us! 105

Wife. Hark, George, what a woeful cry there is! I think some woman lies-in there.

Man. [within.] Deliver us!
Women. [within.] Deliver us!
Ralph. What ghastly noise is this? Speak,
Barbaroso, 110

Or, by this blazing steel, thy head goes off!

Bar. Prisoners of mine, whom I in diet keep.
Send lower down into the cave,
And in a tub that's heated smoking hot,
There may they find them, and deliver them. 115

Ralph. Run, squire and dwarf; deliver them with speed. Exeunt TIM and GEORGE.

Wife. But will not Ralph kill this giant?
Surely I am afeard, if he let him go, he will do as much hurt as ever he did.

Cit. Not so, mouse, neither, if he could convert him. 121

Wife. Ay, George, if he could convert him;
but a giant is not so soon converted as one of us ordinary people. There's a pretty tale of a witch, that had the devil's mark about her, (God bless us!) that had a giant to her son, [125 that was call'd Lob-lie-by-the-fire; didst never hear it, George?

*Re-enter Squire [TIM], leading a Man, with a glass of lotion in his hand, and Dwarf [GEORGE], leading a Woman, with diet-bread and drink
[in her hand].*

Cit. Peace, Nell, here comes the prisoners.

George. Here be these pined wretches, manful knight, 130
That for this six weeks have not seen a wight.

Ralph. Deliver what you are, and how you came

To this sad cave, and what your usage was?
Man. I am an errant knight that followed arms

With spear and shield; and in my tender years
I stricken was with Cupid's fiery shaft, 135
And fell in love with this my lady dear,
And stole her from her friends in Turnbull-street,<sup>4</sup>

And bore her up and down from town to town,
Where we did eat and drink, and music hear;
Till at the length at this unhappy town 141
We did arrive, and coming to this cave,

<sup>4</sup> The resort of prostitutes.

This beast us caught, and put us in a tub,
Where we this two mouths sweat,<sup>1</sup> and should have done

Another month, if you had not reliev'd us. 145
Woman. This bread and water hath our diet
been,

Together with a rib cut from a neck
Of burned mutton; hard hath been our fare.
Release us from this ugly giant's snare!

Man. This hath been all the food we have receiv'd; 150

But only twice a-day, for novelty,
He gave a spoonful of this hearty broth
To each of us, through this same slender quill.

Ralph. From this infernal monster you shall go,

That useth knights and gentle ladies so! — 156
Convey them hence.

Exeunt Man and Woman.

Cit. Cony, I can tell thee, the gentlemen like
Ralph.

Wife. Ay, George, I see it well enough. — Gentlemen, I thank you all heartily for [160
gracing my man Ralph; and I promise you,
you shall see him oft'ner.

Bar. Mercy, great knight! I do recant my ill,
And henceforth never gentle blood will spill.

Ralph. I give thee mercy; but yet shalt thou swear 165

Upon my Burning Pestle, to perform
Thy promise uttered.

Bar. I swear and kiss. [Kisses the Pestle.]

Ralph. Depart, then, and amend. — [Exit Barber.]

Come, squire and dwarf; the sun grows towards his set,

And we have many more adventures yet. 170
Exeunt.

Cit. Now Ralph is in this humour, I know he would ha' beaten all the boys in the house, if they had been set on him.

Wife. Ay, George, but it is well as it is. I warrant you, the gentlemen do consider what it is to overthrow a giant. But, look, [175
George; here comes Mistress Merrythought, and her son Michael. — Now you are welcome,
Mistress Merrythought; now Ralph has done,
you may go on.

[SCENE V.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter MISTRESS MERRYTHOUGHT and MI-CHAEL.

Mist. Mer. Mick, my boy —

Mich. Ay, forsooth, mother.

Mist. Mer. Be merry, Mick; we are at home now; where, I warrant you, you shall find the house flung out of the windows. [Music within.] 5
Hark! hey, dogs, hey! this is the old world,<sup>3</sup>
i' faith, with my husband. If I get in among

<sup>3</sup> His old habits.

'em, I'll play 'em such a lesson, that they shall have little list to come scraping hither again. —
Why, Master Merrythought! husband! Charles
Merrythought! 11

Mer. [appearing above, and singing.]

If you will sing, and dance, and laugh,
And hollow, and laugh again,
And then cry, "There, boys, there!" why, then, 16
One, two, three, and four,
We shall be merry within this hour.

Mist. Mer. Why, Charles, do you not know your own natural wife? I say, open the door, and turn me out those mangy companions; 't is more than time that they were fellow and [20 fellow-like with you. You are a gentleman,
Charles, and an old man, and father of two children; and I myself, (though I say it) by my mother's side niece to a worshipful gentleman and a conductor; ' he has been three times [25 in his majesty's service at Chester, and is now the fourth time, God bless him and his charge, upon his journey.

Mer. [sings.]

Go from my window, love, go;
Go from my window, my dear! 30
The wind and the rain
Will drive you back again;
You cannot be lodged here.

Hark you, Mistress Merrythought, you that walk upon adventures, and forsake your hus- [35 band, because he sings with never a penny in his purse; what, shall I think myself the worse? Faith, no, I'll be merry. You come not here; here's none but lads of mettle, lives of a hundred years and upwards; care never [40 drunk their bloods, nor want made 'em warble
"Heigh-ho, my heart is heavy."

Mist. Mer. Why, Master Merrythought, what am I, that you should laugh me to scorn thus abruptly? Am I not your fellow-feeler, as [45 we may say, in all our miseries? your comforter in health and sickness? Have I not brought you children? Are they not like you, Charles?
look upon thine own image, hard-hearted man!
and yet for all this — 50

Mer. [sings.]

Begone, begone, my juggy, my puggy,
Begone, my love, my dear!
The weather is warm,
'T will do thee no harm:
Thou canst not be lodged here. — 55

Be merry, boys! some light music, and more wine! [Exit above.]

Wife. He's not in earnest, I hope, George, is he?

Cit. What if he be, sweetheart? 60

Wife. Marry, if he be, George, I'll make bold to tell him he's an ingrant<sup>5</sup> old man to use his bed-fellow so scurvily.

Cit. What! how does he use her, honey?

Wife. Marry, come up, sir saucebox! I think you'll take his part, will you not? Lord, how [65 hot you are grown! You are a fine man, an you had a fine dog; it becomes you sweetly!

Cit. Nay, prithee, Nell, chide not; for, as I am an honest man and a true Christian grocer, [70] I do not like his doings.

Wife. I cry you mercy, then, George! you know we are all frail and full of infirmities. — D'ye hear, Master Merrythought? May I crave a word with you? [75]

Mer. [appearing above.] Strike up lively, lads!

Wife. I had not thought, in truth, Master Merrythought, that a man of your age and discretion, as I may say, being a gentleman, [80] and therefore known by your gentle conditions, I could have used so little respect to the weakness of his wife; for your wife is your own flesh, the staff of your age, your yoke-fellow, with whose help you draw through the mire to this [85] transitory world; nay, she's your own rib: and again —

Mer. [sings.]

I come not hither for thee to teach,
I have no pulpit for thee to preach,
I would thou hadst kist me under the breech, [90]
As thou art a lady gay.

Wife. Marry, with a vengeance! I am heartily sorry for the poor gentlewoman: but if I were thy wife, i' faith, greybeard, i' faith —

Cit. I prithee, sweet honeysuckle, be content. [95]

Wife. Give me such words, that am a gentlewoman born! Hang him, hoary rascal! Get me some drink, George; I am almost molten with fretting: now, beshrew his knave's heart [100] for it! [Exit Citizen.]

Mer. Play me a light lavolta.<sup>2</sup> Come, be frolic. Fill the good fellows wine.

Mist. Mer. Why, Master Merrythought, are you disposed to make me wait here? You'll [105] open, I hope; I'll fetch them that shall open else.

Mer. Good woman, if you will sing, I'll give you something; if not — [Sings.]

You are no love for me, Margaret, [110]
I am no love for you. —

Come aloft,<sup>3</sup> boys, aloft! [Exit above.]

Mist. Mer. Now a churl's fart in your teeth, sir! — Come, Mick, we'll not trouble him; 'a shall not ding us i' th' teeth with his bread [115] and his broth, that he shall not. Come, boy; I'll provide for thee, I warrant thee. We'll go to Master Venturewell's, the merchant: I'll get his letter to mine host of the Bell in Waltham; there I'll place thee with the tapster: [120] will not that do well for thee, Mick? And let me alone for that old cuckoldly knave your father; I'll use him in his kind,<sup>4</sup> I warrant ye. [Exeunt.]

[Re-enter Citizen with Beer.]

Wife. Come, George, where's the beer?

Cit. Here, love. [125]

Wife. This old fornicating fellow will not out of my mind yet. — Gentlemen, I'll begin to you all; and I desire more of your acquaintance with all my heart. [Drinks.] Fill the gentlemen some beer, George. Music. Boy danceth. [130] Look,<sup>5</sup> George; the little boy's come again: methinks he looks something like the Prince of Orange in his long stocking, if he had a little harness<sup>6</sup> about his neck. George, I will have him dance Fading. — Fading is a fine jig, [135] I'll assure you, gentlemen. — Begin, brother. — Now 'a capers, sweetheart! — Now a turn i' th' toe, and then tumble! cannot you tumble, youth?

Boy. No, indeed, forsooth. [140]

Wife. Nor eat fire?

Boy. Neither.

Wife. Why, then, I thank you heartily; there's twopence to buy you points<sup>7</sup> withal.

ACT IV

SCENE I.<sup>8</sup>

Enter JASPER and Boy.

Jasp. There, boy, deliver this; but do it well.

Hast thou provided me four lusty fellows, [Gives a letter.]
Able to carry me? and art thou perfect
In all thy business?

Boy. Sir, you need not fear;
I have my lesson here, and cannot miss it: [15]
The men are ready for you, and what else
Pertains to this employment.

Jasp. There, my boy;
Take it, but buy no land. [Gives money.]

Boy. Faith, sir, 't were rare
To see so young a purchaser. I fly,
And on my wings carry your destiny. [10]

Jasp. Go and be happy! [Exit Boy.] Now, my latest hope,
Forsake me not, but fling thy anchor out,
And let it hold! Stand fixt, thou rolling stone,
Till I enjoy my dearest! Hear me, all
You powers, that rule in men, celestial! [Exit.] [15]

Wife. Go thy ways; thou art as crooked a sprig as ever grew in London. I warrant him, he'll come to some naughty end or other; for his looks say no less: besides, his father (you know, George) is none of the best; you heard [20] him take me up like a flirt-gill,<sup>9</sup> and sing bawdy songs upon me; but i' faith, if I live, George —

Cit. Let me alone, sweetheart: I have a trick in my head shall lodge him in the Arches<sup>10</sup> for one year, and make him sing peccavi ere [25] I leave him; and yet he shall never know who hurt him neither.

Wife. Do, my good George, do!

<sup>7</sup> Tagged laces used to attach the hose or breeches to the doublet.

<sup>10</sup> Apparently a prison attached to the Court of Arches.

Cit. What shall we have Ralph do now, [30
boy?

Boy. You shall have what you will, sir.

Cit. Why, so, sir; go and fetch me him then,
and let the Sophy of Persia come and christen him a child.<sup>1</sup>

Boy. Believe me, sir, that will not do so well;
'tis stale; it has been had before at the Red
Bull.<sup>2</sup>

Wife. George, let Ralph travel over great hills, and let him be very weary, and come [40 to the King of Cracovia's house, covered with velvet; and there let the king's daughter stand in her window, all in beaten gold, combing her golden locks with a comb of ivory; and let her spy Ralph, and fall in love with him, and [45 come down to him, and carry him into her father's house; and then let Ralph talk with her.

Cit. Well said, Nell; it shall be so. — Boy,
let's ha't done quickly.

Boy. Sir, if you will imagine all this to be [50 done already, you shall hear them talk together; but we cannot present a house covered with black velvet, and a lady in beaten gold.

Cit. Sir boy, let's ha't as you can, then.

Boy. Besides, it will show ill-favour'dly [55 to have a grocer's apprentice to court a king's daughter.

Cit. Will it so, sir? You are well read in histories!<sup>3</sup>
I pray you, what was Sir Dagonet? Was not he prentice to a grocer in London? [60
Read the play of "The Four Prentices of London,"<sup>4</sup> where they toss their pikes so. I pray you, fetch him in, sir, fetch him in.

Boy. It shall be done. — It is not our fault,
gentlemen.

Wife. Now we shall see fine doings, I warrant
'ee, George. Exit. 65

[SCENE II.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter the Lady [POMPIONA], RALPH, Squire, and Dwarf.

Wife. Oh, here they come, how prettily the King of Cracovia's daughter is drest!

Cit. Ay, Nell, it is the fashion of that country,
I warrant 'ee.

Pomp. Welcome, Sir Knight, unto my father's court, 5

King of Moldavia: unto me Pompiona,
His daughter dear! But, sure, you do not like
Your entertainment, that will stay with us
No longer but a night.

Ralph. Damsel right fair,
I am on many sad<sup>6</sup> adventures bound, 10
That call me forth into the wilderness;
Besides, my horse's back is something gall'd,
Which will enforce me ride a sober pace.
But many thanks, fair lady, be to you
For using errant knight with courtesy! 15

<sup>1</sup> An allusion to an incident in a play called The Tra-vails of the Three English Brothers, by Day, Rowley, and Wilkins.

<sup>5</sup> A Hall in the King of Moldavia's Court. <sup>6</sup> Serious.

Pomp. But say, brave knight, what is your name and birth?

Ralph. My name is Ralph; I am an English-
man,

As true as steel, a hearty Englishman,
And prentice to a grocer in the Strand
By deed indent,<sup>7</sup> of which I have one part: 20
But fortune calling me to follow arms,
On me this holy order I did take
Of Burning Pestle, which in all men's eyes
I bear, confounding ladies' enemies.

Pomp. Oft have I heard of your brave countrymen, 25

And fertile soil, and store of wholesome food;
My father oft will tell me of a drink
In England found, and nipitato<sup>8</sup> call'd,
Which driveth all the sorrow from your hearts.

Ralph. Lady, 'tis true; you need not lay your lips 30

To better nipitato than there is.

Pomp. And of a wild fowl he will often speak,

Which powd' red<sup>9</sup> -beef-and-mustard called is:
For there have been great wars 'twixt us and
you;

But truly, Ralph, it was not 'long of me. 35

Tell me then, Ralph, could you contented be
To wear lady's favour in your shield?

Ralph. I am a knight of religious order,
And will not wear a favour of a lady 39
That trusts in Antichrist and false traditions.

Cit. Well said, Ralph! convert her, if thou canst.

Ralph. Besides, I have a lady of my own
In merry England, for whose virtuous sake
I took these arms; and Susan is her name, 45
A cobbler's maid in Milk Street; whom I vow

Ne'er to forsake whilst life and Pestle last.

Pomp. Happy that cobbling dame, whoe'er
she be,

That for her own, dear Ralph, hath gotten
thee!

Unhappy I, that ne'er shall see the day 50
To see thee more, that bear'st my heart
away!

Ralph. Lady, farewell; I needs must take my leave.

Pomp. Hard-hearted Ralph, that ladies dost deceive!

Cit. Hark thee, Ralph: there's money for thee [gives money]; give something in the King of Cracovia's house; be not beholding to him. 55

Ralph. Lady, before I go, I must remember
Your father's officers, who truth to tell,
Have been about me very diligent.

Hold up thy snowy hand, thou princely maid!
There's twelve-pence for your father's chamberlain; 61

And another shilling for his cook,
7 Indenture.

<sup>8</sup> A mock learned form of nipitate, or strong ale.

<sup>9</sup> Salted.

For, by my troth, the goose was roasted well ;
And twelve-pence for your father's horse-keeper,

For nointing my horse' back, and for his butter<sup>1</sup> 65

There is another shilling ; to the maid
That washt my boot-hose<sup>2</sup> there 's an English
groat,

And two-pence to the boy that wipt my boots ;
And last, fair lady, there is for yourself
Three-pence, to buy you pins at Bumbo Fair.

Pomp. Full many thanks ; and I will keep them safe 71

Till all the heads be off, for thy sake, Ralph.

Ralph. Advance, my squire and dwarf ! I cannot stay,

Pomp. Thou kill'st my heart in passing thus away. Exeunt.

Wife. I commend Ralph yet, that he will [75 not stoop to a Cracovian ; there 's properer<sup>3</sup> women in London than any are there, I-wis. But here comes Master Humphrey and his love again now, George.

Cit. Ay, cony ; peace. 80

SCENE III.4

Enter Merchant [VENTUREWELL], HUMPHREY,
LUCE, and Boy.

Vent. Go, get you up ;<sup>5</sup> I will not be entreated ;

And, gossip mine, I'll keep you sure hereafter
From gadding out again with boys and un-thrifits.

Come, they are women's tears ; I know your fashion, —

Go, sirrah, lock her in, and keep the key 5
Safe as you love your life.

Exeunt LUCE and Boy.

Now, my son Humphrey,
You may both rest assured of my love

In this, and reap your own desire.

Hum. I see this love you speak of, through your daughter,

Although the hole be little ; and hereafter 10
Will yield the like in all I may or can,
Fitting a Christian and a gentleman.

Vent. I do believe you, my good son, and
thank you ;

For 't were an impudence to think you flattered.

Hum. It were, indeed : but shall I tell you
why ? 15

I have been beaten twice about the lie.

Vent. Well, son, no more of compliment. My daughter

Is yours again : appoint the time and take
her.

We'll have no stealing for it ; I myself

And some few of our friends will see you married. 20

<sup>5</sup> Upstairs.

Hum. I would you would, i' faith ! for, be it known,

I ever was afraid to lie alone.

Vent. Some three days hence, then.

Hum. Three days ! let me see :

'T is somewhat of the most ;<sup>6</sup> yet I agree,
Because I mean against<sup>7</sup> the appointed day 25
To visit all my friends in new array.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, there 's a gentlewoman without would speak with your worship.

Vent. What is she ?

Serv. Sir, I askt her not. 30

Vent. Bid her come in. [Exit Servant.]

Enter MISTRESS MERRYTHOUGHT and MI-CHAEL.

Mist. Mer. Peace be to your worship ! I come as a poor suitor to you, sir, in the behalf of this child.

Vent. Are you not wife to Merrythought ?

Mist. Mer. Yes, truly. Would I had ne'er [35 seen his eyes ! Ha has undone me and himself and his children ; and there he lives at home, and sings and hoits and revels among his drunken companions ! but, I warrant you, [40 where to get a penny to put bread in his mouth he knows not : and therefore, if it like your worship, I would entreat your letter to the honest host of the Bell in Waltham, that I may place my child under the protection of his tapster, in some settled course of life. 45

Vent. I'm glad the heavens have heard my prayers. Thy husband,

When I was ripe in sorrows, laught at me ;
Thy son, like an unthankful wretch, I having Redeem'd him from his fall, and made him
mine, 50

To show his love again, first stole my daughter,

Then wronged this gentleman, and, last of all,
Gave me that grief had almost brought me
down

Unto my grave, had not a stronger hand
Reliev'd my sorrows. Go, and weep as I did,
And be unpitied : for I here profess 55
An everlasting hate to all thy name.

Mist. Mer. Will you so, sir ? how say you by that ? — Come, Mick ; let him keep his wind to cool his porridge. We'll go to thy nurse's, [60 Mick : she knits silk stockings, boy ; and we'll knit too, boy, and be beholding to none of them all. Exit with MICHAEL.

Enter a Boy with a letter.

Boy. Sir, I take it you are the master of this house. 65

Vent. How then, boy ?

Boy. Then to yourself, sir, comes this letter.

Vent. From whom, my pretty boy ?

Boy. From him that was your servant ; but no more

Shall that name ever be, for he is dead : 70

<sup>7</sup> In anticipation of.

Grief of your purchas'd<sup>1</sup> anger broke his heart.

I saw him die, and from his hand receiv'd
This paper, with a charge to bring it hither:
Read it, and satisfy yourself in all.

Vent. [reads.] Sir, that I have wronged your love I must confess; in which I have purchas'd chaste to myself, besides mine own undoing, the ill opinion of my friends. Let not your anger, good sir, outlive me, but suffer me to rest in peace with your forgiveness: let my body (if a dying man may so much prevail with you) be brought to your daughter, that she may truly know my hot flames are now buried, and withal receive a testimony of the zeal I bore her virtue. Farewell for ever, and be ever happy!

JASPER.
God's hand is great in this. I do forgive him; yet I am glad he's quiet, where I hope he will not bite again. — Boy, bring the body, and let him have his will, if that be all.

Boy. 'Tis here without, sir.
Vent. So, sir; if you please, you may conduct it in; I do not fear it.

Hum. I'll be your usher, boy; for, though I say it,
He ow'd me something once, and well did pay it.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter LUCE.

Luc. If there be any punishment inflicted upon the miserable, more than yet I feel, let it together seize me, and at once press down my soul! I cannot bear the pain of these delaying tortures. — Thou that art the end of all, and the sweet rest of all, come, come, oh, Death! bring me to thy peace, and blot out all the memory I nourish both of my father and my cruel friend! — Oh, wretched maid, still living to be wretched, to be a say to Fortune in her changes, and grow to number times and woes together! How happy had I been, if, being born, my grave had been my cradle!

Enter Servant.

Serv. By your leave, young mistress; here's a boy hath brought a coffin:
What 'a would say, I know not; but your father charg'd me to give you notice. Here they come.

Enter two bearing a Coffin, JASPER in it.

Luc. For me I hope 'tis come, and 'tis most welcome.

Boy. Fair mistress, let me not add greater grief to that great store you have already. Jasper (that whilst he liv'd was yours, now dead) And here enclosed commanded me to bring His body hither, and to crave a tear

From those fair eyes, (though he deserv'd not pity.)
To deck his funeral; for so he bid me
Tell her for whom he died.

Luc. He shall have many. — Good friends, depart a little, whilst I take My leave of this dead man, that once I lov'd.

Execut. Coffin-carrier and Boy.
Hold yet a little, life! and then I give thee To thy first heavenly being. Oh, my friend! Hast thou deceiv'd me thus, and got before me? I shall not long be after. But, believe me, Thou wert too cruel, Jasper, 'gainst thyself, In punishing the fault I could have pardon'd, With so untimely death: thou didst not wrong me,

But ever wert most kind, most true, most loving;

And I the most unkind, most false, most cruel! Didst thou but ask a tear? I'll give thee all, Even all my eyes can pour down, all my sighs, And all myself, before thou goest from me. These are but sparing rites; but if thy soul Be yet about this place, and can behold And see what I prepare to deck thee with, It shall go up, borne on the wings of peace, And satisfied. First will I sing thy dirge, Then kiss thy pale lips, and then die myself, And fill one coffin and one grave together.

SONG.

Come, you whose loves are dead,
And, while I sing,
Weep, and wring
Every hand, and every head
Bind with cypress and sad yew;
Ribands black and candles blue
For him that was of men most true!
Come with heavy moaning,<sup>3</sup>
And on his grave
Let him have
Sacrifice of sighs and groaning;
Let him have fair flowers enow,
White and purple, green and yellow,
For him that was of men most true!

Thou sable cloth, sad cover of my joys,
I lift thee up, and thus I meet with death.

[Removes the Cloth, and JASPER rises out of the Coffin.]

Jasp. And thus you meet the living.

Luc. Save me, Heaven!
Jasp. Nay, do not fly me, fair; I am no spirit:

Look better on me; do you know me yet?

Luc. Oh, thou dear shadow of my friend!

Jasp. Dear substance, I swear I am no shadow; feel my hand, It is the same it was; I am your Jasper, Your Jasper that's yet living, and yet loving. Pardon my rash attempt, my foolish proof; I put in practice of your constancy; For sooner should my sword have drunk my blood,

And set my soul at liberty, than drawn The least drop from that body: for which boldness

<sup>4</sup> Test.

Doom me to any thing ; if death, I take it,
And willingly.

Luce. This death I'll give you for it ;
[Kisses him.]

So, now I am satisfied you are no spirit,
But my own truest, truest, truest friend :
Why do you come thus to me ?

Jasp. First, to see you ;<sup>80</sup>
Then to convey you hence.

Luce. It cannot be ;
For I am lockt up here, and watcht at all hours,
That 't is impossible for me to scape.

Jasp. Nothing more possible. Within this coffin

Do you convey yourself. Let me alone,<sup>85</sup>
I have the wits of twenty men about me ;
Only I crave the shelter of your closet

A little, and then fear me not.<sup>1</sup> Creep in,
That they may presently convey you hence :<sup>90</sup>
Fear nothing, dearest love ; I'll be your second ;

[LUCE lies down in the Coffin, and JASPER covers her with the cloth.]

Lie close :<sup>2</sup> so ; all goes well yet. — Boy !

[Re-enter Boy and Men.]

Boy. At hand, sir.

Jasp. Convey away the coffin, and be wary.

Boy. 'Tis done already.

[Exeunt Men with the Coffin.]

Jasp. Now must I go conjure.
Exit [into a Closet].

Enter Merchant [VENTUREWELL].

Vent. Boy, boy !

Boy. Your servant, sir.<sup>95</sup>

Vent. Do me this kindness, boy ; (hold, here 's a crown ;)

Before thou bury the body of this fellow,
Carry it to his old merry father, and salute him
From me, and bid him sing ; he hath cause.<sup>3</sup>

Boy. I will, sir.<sup>100</sup>

Vent. And then bring me word what tune he is in,

And have another crown ; but do it truly.

I have fitted him a bargain now will vex him.

Boy. God bless your worship's health, sir !

Vent. Farewell, boy ! Exeunt [severally].

[SCENE V.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter MERRYTHOUGHT.

Wife. Ah, old Merrythought, art thou there again ? Let's hear some of thy songs.

Mer. [sings.]

Who can sing a merrier note
Than he that cannot change a groat ?

Not a denier<sup>5</sup> left, and yet my heart leaps. I [<sup>6</sup> do wonder yet, as old as I am, that any man will follow a trade, or serve, that may sing and laugh, and walk the streets. My wife and both

my sons are I know not where ; I have nothing left, nor know I how to come by meat to sup-<sup>[10</sup> per ; yet am I merry still, for I know I shall find it upon the table at six o'clock ; therefore, hang thought ! [Sings.]

I would not be a serving-man
To carry the cloak-bag<sup>6</sup> still,
Nor would I be a falconer
The greedy hawks to fill ;
But I would be in a good house,
And have a good master too ;
But I would eat and drink of the best,
And no work would I do.<sup>20</sup>

This is it that keeps life and soul together, — mirth ; this is the philosopher's stone that they write so much on, that keeps a man ever young.<sup>25</sup>

Enter a Boy.

Boy. Sir, they say they know all your money is gone, and they will trust you for no more drink.

Mer. Will they not ? let 'em choose ! The best is, I have mirth at home, and need not [<sup>30</sup> send abroad for that ; let them keep their drink to themselves. [Sings.]

For Jillian of Berry, she dwells on a hill,
And she hath good beer and ale to sell,
And of good fellows she thinks no ill ;<sup>35</sup>
And thither will we go now, now, now,
And thither will we go now.

And when you have made a little stay,
You need not ask what is to pay,
But kissa your hostess, and go your way ;<sup>40</sup>
And thither will we go now, now, now,
And thither will we go now.

Enter another Boy.

2 Boy. Sir, I can get no bread for supper.

Mer. Hang bread and supper ! Let's preserve our mirth, and we shall never feel hunger, [<sup>45</sup> I'll warrant you. Let's have a catch ; boy, follow me, come sing this catch.

Ho, ho, nobody at home !
Meat, nor drink, nor money ha' we none.
Fill the pot, Eedy,
Never more need I.<sup>50</sup>

Mer. So, boys ; enough. Follow me : let's change our place, and we shall laugh afresh.
Exeunt.

Wife. Let him go, George ; 'a shall not have any countenance from us, nor a good word from any i' th' company, if I may strike stroke<sup>7</sup> in 't.

Cit. No more 'a sha'not, love. But, Nell, I [<sup>55</sup> will have Ralph do a very notable matter now, to the eternal honour and glory of all grocers.
— Sirrah ! you there, boy ! Can none of you hear ?<sup>61</sup>

[Enter Boy.]

Boy. Sir, your pleasure ?

Cit. Let Ralph come out on May-day in the morning, and speak upon a conduit, with all his

scarfs about him, and his feathers, and his rings, and his knacks. <sup>66</sup>

Boy. Why, sir, you do not think of our plot; what will become of that, then?

Cit. Why, sir, I care not what become on 't; I'll have him come out, or I'll fetch him <sup>70</sup> out myself; I'll have something done in honour of the city. Besides, he hath been long enough upon adventures. Bring him out quickly; or, if I come in amongst you —

Boy. Well, sir, he shall come out, but if our play miscarry, sir, you are like to pay for 't. <sup>76</sup>

Cit. Bring him away then!

Exit Boy.

Wife. This will be brave, i' faith! George, shall not he dance the morris too, for the credit of the Strand? <sup>80</sup>

Cit. No, sweetheart, it will be too much for the boy. Oh, there he is, Nell! he's reasonable well in reparael: but he has not rings enough.

Enter RALPH [dressed as a May-lord].

Ralph. London, to thee, I do present the merry month of May; <sup>85</sup>

Let each true subject be content to hear me what I say:

For from the top of conduit-head, as plainly may appear,

I will both tell my name to you, and wherefore I came here.

My name is Ralph, by due descent though not ignoble I <sup>1</sup>

Yet far inferior to the flock <sup>2</sup> of gracious grocery; <sup>90</sup>

And by the common counsel of my fellows in the Strand,

With gilded staff and crossed scarf, the May-lord here I stand.

Rejoice, oh, English hearts, rejoice! rejoice, oh, lovers dear!

Rejoice, oh, city, town, and country! rejoice, eke every shire!

For now the fragrant flowers do spring and sprout in seemly sort, <sup>95</sup>

The little birds do sit and sing, the lambs do make fine sport;

And now the birchen-tree doth bud, that makes the schoolboy cry;

The morris rings, while hobby-horse doth foot it featously; <sup>3</sup>

The lords and ladies now abroad, for their disport and play,

Do kiss sometimes upon the grass, and sometimes in the hay; <sup>100</sup>

Now butter with a leaf of sage is good to purge the blood;

Fly Venus and phlebotomy, <sup>4</sup> for they are neither good;

Now little fish on tender stone begin to cast their bellies, <sup>5</sup>

And sluggish snails, that erst were mew'd, <sup>6</sup> do creep out of their shellies;

The rumbling rivers now do warm, for little boys to paddle; <sup>105</sup>

The sturdy steed now goes to grass, and up they hang his saddle;

The heavy hart, the bellowing buck, the rascal, <sup>7</sup> and the pricket, <sup>8</sup>

Are now among the yeoman's peas, and leave the fearful peasant:

And be like them, oh, you, I say, of this same noble town,

And lift aloft your velvet heads, and slipping off your gown, <sup>110</sup>

With bells on legs, and napkins clean unto your shoulders tied,

With scarfs and garters as you please, and "Hey for our town!" cried,

March out, and show your willing minds, by twenty and by twenty,

To Hogsdon <sup>9</sup> or to Newington, where ale and cakes are plenty;

And let it ne'er be said for shame, that we the youths of London <sup>115</sup>

Lay thrumming of our caps <sup>10</sup> at home, and left our custom undone.

Up, then, I say, both young and old, both man and maid a-maying,

With drums, and guns that bounce aloud, and merry tabor playing!

Which to prolong, God save our king, and send his country peace,

And root out treason from the land! and so, my friends, I cease. Exit. <sup>120</sup>

ACT V

SCENE I.<sup>11</sup>

Enter Merchant [VENTUREWELL].

Vent. I will have no great store of company at the wedding; a couple of neighbours and their wives; and we will have a capon in stewed broth, with marrow, and a good piece of beef stuck with rosemary. <sup>5</sup>

Enter JASPER, his face mealed.

Jasp. Forbear thy pains, fond <sup>12</sup> man! it is too late.

Vent. Heaven bless me! Jasper!

Jasp. Ay, I am his ghost, Whom thou hast injur'd for his constant love,

Fond worldly wretch! who dost not understand In death that true hearts cannot parted be. <sup>10</sup>

First know, thy daughter is quite borne away On wings of angels, through the liquid air,

To far out of thy reach, and never more Shalt thou behold her face: but she and I

Will in another world enjoy our loves; <sup>15</sup> Where neither father's anger, poverty,

Nor any cross that troubles earthly men, Shall make us sever our united hearts.

And never shalt thou sit or be alone

In any place, but I will visit thee
 With ghastly looks, and put into thy mind
 The great offences which thou didst to me.
 When thou art at thy table with thy friends,
 Merry in heart, and fill'd with swelling wine,
 I'll come in midst of all thy pride and mirth,<sup>25</sup>
 Invisible to all men but thyself,
 And whisper such a sad tale in thine ear
 Shall make thee let the cup fall from thy hand,
 And stand as mute and pale as death itself.

Vent. Forgive me, Jasper! Oh, what might
 I do,

Tell me, to satisfy thy troubled ghost?

Jasp. There is no means; too late thou think'st of this.

Vent. But tell me what were best for me to do?

Jasp. Repent thy deed, and satisfy my father,

And beat fond Humphrey out of thy doors.<sup>35</sup>
Exit.

-Wife. Look, George; his very ghost would have folks beaten.

Enter HUMPHREY.

Hum. Father, my bride is gone, fair Mistress
 Luce:

My soul's the fount of vengeance, mischief's sluice.

Vent. Hence, fool, out of my sight with thy fond passion!

Thou hast undone me. [Beats him.]

Hum. Hold, my father dear,
 For Luce thy daughter's sake, that had no peer!

Vent. Thy father, fool! There's some blows more; begone.— [Beats him.]

Jasper, I hope thy ghost be well appear'd
 To see thy will perform'd. Now will I go
 To satisfy thy father for thy wrongs.<sup>45</sup>
Exit.

Hum. What shall I do? I have been beaten
 twice,

And Mistress Luce is gone. Help me, device!
 Since my true love is gone, I never more,
 Whilst I do live, upon the sky will pore;<sup>50</sup>
 But in the dark will wear out my shoe-soles
 In passion<sup>1</sup> in Saint Faith's church under Paul's. Exit.

Wife. George, call Ralph hither; if you love me, call Ralph hither: I have the bravest thing for him to do, George; prithee, call him quickly.

Cit. Ralph! why, Ralph, boy!<sup>55</sup>

Enter RALPH.

Ralph. Here, sir.

Cit. Come hither, Ralph; come to thy mistress, boy.

Wife. Ralph, I would have thee call all<sup>60</sup>
 the youths together in battle-ray, with drums, and guns, and flags, and march to Mile-End in pompous<sup>2</sup> fashion, and there exhort your soldiers to be merry and wise, and to keep their beards from burning, Ralph; and then kiss—<sup>65</sup>

mish, and let your flags fly, and cry, "Kill, kill, kill!" My husband shall lend you his jer-kin, Ralph, and there's a scarf; for the rest,
 the house shall furnish you, and we'll pay for't.
 Do it bravely, Ralph; and think before<sup>70</sup> whom you perform, and what person you represent.

Ralph. I warrant you, mistress; if I do it not for the honour of the city and the credit of my master, let me never hope for freedom!<sup>3</sup>

Wife. 'Tis well spoken, i' faith. Go thy ways; thou art a spark indeed.

Cit. Ralph, Ralph, double your files bravely,
 Ralph!

Ralph. I warrant you, sir. Exit.

Cit. Let him look narrowly to his service; I shall take him else. I was there myself a pike-man once, in the hottest of the day, wench; had my feather shot sheer away, the fringe of my pike burnt off with powder, my pate<sup>40</sup> broken with a scouring-stick,<sup>4</sup> and yet, I thank God, I am here. Drum within.

Wife. Hark, George, the drums!

Cit. Ran, tan, tan, tan; ran, tan! Oh, wench, an thou hadst but seen little Ned of Aldgate,<sup>51</sup> Drum Ned, how he made it roar again, and laid on like a tyrant, and then struck softly till the ward<sup>5</sup> came up, and then thund'ed again, and together we go! "Sa, sa, sa, bounce!"<sup>62</sup> quoth the guns; "Courage, my hearts!"<sup>63</sup> quoth the captains; "Saint George!" quoth the pikemen; and withal, here they lay, and there they lay: and yet for all this I am here, wench.<sup>60</sup>

Wife. Be thankful for it, George; for indeed
 't is wonderful.

[SCENE II.]<sup>6</sup>

Enter RALPH and Company of Soldiers (among whom are WILLIAM HAMMERTON, and GEORGE GREENGOOSE), with drums and colours.

Ralph. March fair, my hearts! Lieutenant, beat the rear up.—Ancient,<sup>7</sup> let your colours fly; but have a great care of the butchers' hooks at Whitechapel; they have been the death of many a fair ancient.—Open your<sup>75</sup> files, that I may take a view both of your persons and munition.—Sergeant, call a muster.

Serg. A stand!—William Hammerton, pewterer!

Ham. Here, captain!

Ralph. A corselet and a Spanish pike; 't is well: can you shake it with a terror?

Ham. I hope so, captain.

Ralph. Charge upon me. [He charges on RALPH.]—'T is with the weakest: put more<sup>85</sup> strength, William Hammerton, more strength.
 As you were again!—Proceed, Sergeant.

Serg. George Greengoose, poulterer!

<sup>7</sup> Ensign (the flag or its bearer).

Green. Here!

Ralph. Let me see your piece,<sup>1</sup> neighbour <sup>20</sup> Greengoose: when was she shot in?

Green. An't like you, master captain, I made a shot even now, partly to scour her, and partly for audacity.

Ralph. It should seem so certainly, for her <sup>25</sup> breath is yet inflamed; besides, there is a main<sup>2</sup> fault in the touch-hole, it runs and stinketh;
and I tell you moreover, and believe it, ten such touch-holes would breed the pox in the army. Get you a feather, neighbour, get you <sup>30</sup> a feather, sweet oil, and paper, and your piece may do well enough yet. Where's your powder?

Green. Here.

Ralph. What, in a paper! As I am a soldier and a gentleman, it craves a martial court! <sup>35</sup>
You ought to die for 't. Where's your horn?
Answer me to that.

Green. An't like you, sir, I was oblivious.

Ralph. It likes me not you should be so; 'tis a shame for you, and a scandal to all our <sup>40</sup> neighbours, being a man of worth and estimation, to leave your horn behind you: I am afraid 't will breed example. But let me tell you no more on 't. — Stand, till I view you all.
What's become o' th' nose of your flask? <sup>45</sup>

1 Sold. Indeed, la, captain, 'twas blown away with powder.

Ralph. Put on a new one at the city's charge.
— Where's the stone<sup>3</sup> of this piece?

2 Sold. The drummer took it out to light <sup>50</sup> tobacco.

Ralph. 'Tis a fault, my friend; put it in again. — You want a nose, — and you a stone.
— Sergeant, take a note on 't, for I mean to stop it in the pay. — Remove, and march! [They <sup>55</sup>
march.] Soft and fair, gentlemen, soft and fair!
Double your files! As you were! Faces about!
Now, you with the sodden<sup>4</sup> face, keep in there!
Look to your match, sirrah, it will be in your fellow's flask anon. So; make a crescent now: <sup>60</sup> advance your pikes: stand and give ear! —
Gentlemen, countrymen, friends, and my fellow-soldiers, I have brought you this day, from the shops of security and the counters of content, to measure out in these furious fields honour by <sup>65</sup> the ell, and prowess by the pound. Let it not, oh, let it not, I say, be told hereafter, the noble issue of this city fainted; but bear yourselves in this fair action like men, valiant men, and free men! Fear not the face of the enemy, <sup>70</sup> nor the noise of the guns, for, believe me, brethren, the rude rumbling of a brewer's car is far more terrible, of which you have a daily experience; neither let the stink of powder offend you, since a more valiant stink is nightly with
you. <sup>75</sup>

To a resolved mind his home is every-where:

I speak not this to take away
The hope of your return: for you shall see
(I do not doubt it) and that very shortly <sup>80</sup>
Your loving wives again and your sweet children,

Whose care doth bear you company in baskets.

1 Musket. 2 Serious. 3 Flint. 4 Bloated.

Remember, then, whose cause you have in hand,
And, like a sort<sup>5</sup> of true-born scavengers,
Scour me this famous realm of enemies. <sup>85</sup>

I have no more to say but this: stand to your tacklings,<sup>6</sup> lads, and show to the world you can as well brandish a sword as shake an apron.
Saint George, and on, my hearts!

All. Saint George, Saint George! Exeunt. <sup>90</sup>

Wife. 'T was well done, Ralph! I'll send thee a cold capon a-field and a bottle of March beer;
and, it may be, come myself to see thee.

Cit. Nell, the boy has deceived me much; I did not think it had been in him. He has <sup>95</sup> performed such a matter, wench, that, if I live, next year I'll have him captain of the galleyfoist<sup>7</sup> or I'll want my will.

[SCENE III.]<sup>8</sup>

Enter MERRYTHOUGHT.

Mer. Yet, I thank God, I break not a wrinkle more than I had. Not a stoop,<sup>9</sup> boys? Care, live with cats; I defy thee! My heart is as sounded as an oak; and though I want drink to wet my whistle, I can sing; [Sings.] <sup>5</sup>

Come no more there, boys, come no more there;
For we shall never whilst we live come any more there.

Enter Boy, [and two Men] with a Coffin.

Boy. God save you, sir!

Mer. It's a brave boy. Canst thou sing?

Boy. Yes, sir, I can sing; but 't is not so <sup>10</sup> necessary at this time.

Mer. [sings.]

Sing we, and chant it;
Whilst love doth grant it.

Boy. Sir, sir, if you knew what I have brought you, you would have little list to <sup>15</sup>
sing.

Mer. [sings.]

Oh, the Mimon round,
Full long, long I have thee sought,
And now I have thee found,
And what hast thou here brought? <sup>20</sup>

Boy. A coffin, sir, and your dead son Jasper in it. [Exit with Men.]

Mer. Dead!

Why, farewell he!
Thou wast a bonny boy,
And I did love thee. <sup>25</sup>

Enter JASPER.

Jasp. Then, I pray you, sir, do so still.

Mer. Jasper's ghost! [Sings.]

Thou art welcome from Stygian lake so soon;
Declare to me what wondrous things in Pluto's court are done. <sup>30</sup>

Jasp. By my troth, sir, I ne'er came there;
't is too hot for me, sir.

Mer. A merry ghost, a very merry ghost!
[Sings.]

And where is your true love? Oh, where is yours?

Jasp. Marry, look you, sir! <sup>35</sup>

Mer. Ah, ha! art thou good at that, i' faith?
[Sings.]

With hey, trixy, tarlery-whiskin,
The world it runs on wheels:
When the young man's — ,<sup>1</sup>
Up goes the maiden's heels. <sup>40</sup>

Mrs. MERRYTHOUGHT and MICHAEL within.

Mist. Mer. [within.] What, Master Merrythought! will you not let's in? What do you think shall become of us?

Mer. [sings.]
What voice is that, that calleth at our door.

Mist. Mer. [within.] You know me well <sup>45</sup> enough; I am sure I have not been such a stranger to you.

Mer. [sings.]
And some they whistled, and some they sung,
Hey, down, down!
And some did loudly say, <sup>50</sup>
Ever as the Lord Barnet's horn blew, Away, Musgrave, away!

Mist. Mer. [within.] You will not have us starve here, will you, Master Merrythought?
Jasp. Nay, good sir, be persuaded; she is my mother. <sup>55</sup>

If her offences have been great against you,
Let your own love remember she is yours,
And so forgive her.

Luce. Good Master Merrythought,
Let me entreat you; I will not be denied.

Mist. Mer. [within.] Why, Master Merry- <sup>60</sup> thought, will you be a vexed thing still?

Mer. Woman, I take you to my love again;
but you shall sing before you enter; therefore despatch your song and so come in.

Mist. Mer. [within.] Well, you must have <sup>65</sup> your will, when all's done. — Mick, what song canst thou sing, boy?

Mich. [within.] I can sing none, forsooth, but
A Lady's Daughter, of Paris properly.

Mist. Mer. [Song.]
It was a lady's daughter, &c. <sup>70</sup>

[MERRYTHOUGHT opens the Door; enter MIS-TRESS MERRYTHOUGHT and MICHAEL.]

Mer. Come, you're welcome home again.
[Sings.]

If such danger be in playing,
And jest must to earnest turn,
You shall go no more a-maying —

Vent. [within.] Are you within, sir? Master <sup>75</sup> Merrythought!

Jasp. It is my master's voice! Good sir, go hold him

In talk, whilst we convey ourselves into
Some inward room. [Exit with LUCE.]

Mer. What are you? Are you merry?
You must be very merry, if you enter. <sup>80</sup>

Vent. [within.] I am, sir.

Mer. Sing, then.

Vent. [within.] Nay, good sir, open to me.

Mer. Sing, I say, or, by the merry heart, you come not in! <sup>85</sup>

<sup>1</sup> So printed in Qq.

Vent. [within.] Well, sir, I'll sing. [Sings.]
Fortune, my foe, &c.

[MERRYTHOUGHT opens the Door: Enter VEN-TUREWELL.]

Mer. You are welcome, sir, you are welcome:
you see your entertainment; pray you, be merry. <sup>90</sup>

Vent. Oh, Master Merrythought, I'm come to ask you

Forgiveness for the wrongs I offered you
And your most virtuous son! They're infinite;
Yet my contrition shall be more than that:

I do confess my hardness broke his heart, <sup>95</sup>
For which just Heaven hath given me punishment

More than my age can carry. His wand'ring spirit,

Not yet at rest, pursues me every where,
Crying, "I'll haunt thee for thy cruelty."

My daughter, she is gone, I know not how, <sup>100</sup>
Taken invisible, and whether living
Or in [the] grave, 't is yet uncertain to me.

Oh, Master Merrythought, these are the weights

Will sink me to my grave! Forgive me, sir.

Mer. Why, sir, I do forgive you; and be merry. <sup>105</sup>

And if the wag in 's lifetime play'd the knave.
Can you forgive him too?

Vent. With all my heart, sir.

Mer. Speak it again, and heartily.

Vent. I do, sir;
Now, by my soul, I do.

Re-enter LUCE and JASPER.

Mer. [sings.]

With that came out his paramour; <sup>110</sup>
She was as white as the lily flower:

Hey, troul, trolly, jolly!
With that came out her own dear knight;

He was as true as ever did fight, &c.

Sir, if you will forgive him, clap their hands <sup>115</sup> together; there's no more to be said i' th'
matter.

Vent. I do, I do.

Cit. I do not like this. Peace, boys! Hear me, one of you! Every body's part is come to an end but Ralph's, and he's left out. <sup>121</sup>

Boy. 'T is 'long of yourself, sir; we have nothing to do with his part.

Cit. Ralph, come away! — Make [an end]<sup>2</sup> on him, as you have done of the rest, boys; <sup>125</sup>
come.

Wife. Now, good husband, let him come out and die.

Cit. He shall, Nell. — Ralph, come away quickly, and die, boy! <sup>130</sup>

Boy. 'T will be very unfit he should die, sir, upon no occasion — and in a comedy too.

Cit. Take you no care of that, sir boy; is not his part at an end, think you, when he's dead? — Come away, Ralph! <sup>135</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Qq. omit. Added in Ed. of 1778.

Enter RALPH, with a forked Arrow through his Head.

Ralph. When I was mortal, this my costive corps

Did lap up figs and raisins in the Strand ;
Where sitting, I esp'd a lovely dame,
Whose master wrought with lingel<sup>1</sup> and with awl,

And underground he vamped many a boot. 140
Straight did her love prick forth me, tender sprig,

To follow feats of arms in warlike wise
Through Waltham-desert ; where I did perform

Many achievements, and did lay on ground
Huge Barbaroso, that insulting giant, 145
And all his captives soon set at liberty.

Then honour prickt me from my native soil
Into Moldavia, where I gain'd the love
Of Pompiona, his beloved daughter ;
But yet prov'd constant to the black thumb'd maid 150

Susan, and scorned Pompiona's love ;
Yet liberal I was, and gave her pins,
And money for her father's officers.

I then returned home, and thrust myself
In action, and by all men chosen was 155
Lord of the May, where I did flourish it,
With scarfs and rings, and posy in my hand.

After this action I preferred was,
And chosen city-captain at Mile-End, 160
With hat and feather, and with leading-staff,<sup>2</sup>
And train'd my men, and brought them all off clear,

Save one man that beray'd him<sup>3</sup> with the noise.

But all these things I Ralph did undertake
Only for my beloved Susan's sake.

Then coming home, and sitting in my shop 165
With apron blue, Death came into my stall
To cheapen <sup>4</sup> aqua vitæ ; but ere I Could take the bottle down and fill a taste,
Death caught a pound of pepper in his hand,
And sprinkled all my face and body o'er, 170
And in an instant vanished away.

Cit. 'Tis a pretty fiction, i' faith.

Ralph. Then took I up my bow and shaft in hand,

And walkt into Moorfields to cool myself ;
But there grim cruel Death met me again, 175
And shot this forked arrow through my head ;

And now I faint ; therefore be warn'd by me,
My fellows every one, of forked heads !
Farewell, all you good boys in merry London !

Ne'er shall we more upon Shrove-Tuesday meet, 180

And pluck down houses of iniquity ;<sup>5</sup> —
My pain increaseth — I shall never more
Hold open, whilst another pumps both legs,
Nor daub a satin gown with rotten eggs ;
Set up a stake, oh, never more I shall ! 185
I die ! fly, fly, my soul, to Grocers' Hall !
Oh, oh, oh, &c.<sup>6</sup>

Wife. Well said, Ralph ! do your obeisance to the gentlemen, and go your ways : well said, Ralph ! 190

RALPH [rises, makes obeisance and]
exit.

Mer. Methinks all we, thus kindly and unexpectedly reconciled, should not depart<sup>7</sup> without a song.

Vent. A good motion.

Mer. Strike up, then ! 195

SONG.

Better music ne'er was known
Than a choir of hearts in one.
Let each other, that hath been Troubled with the gall or spleen,
Learn of us to keep his brow 200
Smooth and plain, as ours are now :
Sing, though before the hour of dying ;
He shall rise, and then be crying,
" Hey, ho, 'tis nought but mirth
That keeps the body from the earth ! " 205

Exeunt.

EPILOGUS.

Cit. Come, Nell, shall we go ? The play's done.

Wife. Nay, by my faith, George, I have more manners than so ; I'll speak to these gentlemen first. — I thank you all, gentlemen, for<sup>8</sup> your patience and countenance to Ralph, a poor fatherless child ; and if I might see you at my house, it should go hard but I would have a pottle of wine and a pipe of tobacco for you : for, truly, I hope you do like the youth, but<sup>9</sup> I would be glad to know the truth ; I refer it to your own discretions, whether you will applaud him or no ; for I will wink, and whilst<sup>6</sup> you shall do what you will. I thank you with all my heart. God give you good night ! — Come. [220
George. [Exeunt.]

<sup>6</sup> Cf. the speech of Andrea's Ghost in The Spanish Tragedy, I. i., many lines of which are here parodied.

ACT I

SCENE I.<sup>2</sup>

Enter DION, CLEREMONT, and THERASILINE.

Cler. Here 's nor lords nor ladies.

Dion. Credit me, gentlemen, I wonder at it. They receiv'd strict charge from the King to attend here; besides, it was boldly published that no officer should forbid any gentleman [4 that desired to attend and hear.

Cle. Can you guess the cause?

Dion. Sir, it is plain, about the Spanish Prince that 's come to marry our kingdom's heir and be our sovereign. 10

Thra. Many that will seem to know much say she looks not on him like a maid in love.

Dion. Faith, sir, the multitude, that seldom know any thing but their own opinions, speak that they would have; but the prince, be- [15 fore his own approach, receiv'd so many confident messages from the state, that I think she 's resolv'd to be rul'd.

Cle. Sir, it is thought, with her he shall enjoy both these kingdoms of Sicily and Calabria.

Dion. Sir, it is without controversy so [21 meant. But 't will be a troublesome labour for him to enjoy both these kingdoms with safety, the right heir to one of them living, and living so virtuously: especially, the people admir- [25 ing the bravery of his mind and lamenting his injuries.

Cle. Who? Philaster?

Dion. Yes: whose father, we all know, was by our late King of Calabria unrighteously [30 deposed from his fruitful Sicily. Myself drew some blood in those wars, which I would give my hand to be washed from.

Cle. Sir, my ignorance in state-policy will not let me know why, Philaster being heir to one [35 of these kingdoms, the King should suffer him to walk abroad with such free liberty.

Dion. Sir, it seems your nature is more constant than to inquire after state-news. But the King, of late, made a hazard of both the [40 kingdoms, of Sicily and his own, with offering but to imprison Philaster; at which the city was in arms, not to be charm'd down by any state-order or proclamation, till they saw Philaster ride through the streets pleas'd and [45 without a guard: at which they threw their hats and their arms from them; some to make bonfires, some to drink, all for his deliverance: which wise men say is the cause the King labours to bring in the power of a foreign nation to awe his own with. 51

Enter GALATEA, a Lady, and MEGRA.

Thra. See, the ladies! What 's the first?

Dion. A wise and modest gentlewoman that attends the princess.

Cle. The second? 55

Dion. She is one that may stand still discreetly enough and ill-favour'dly dance her measure; simpler when she is courted by her friend, and slight her husband.

Cle. The last? 60

Dion. Faith, I think she is one whom the state keeps for the agents of our confederate princes; she 'll cog<sup>3</sup> and lie with a whole army, before the league shall break. Her name is common through the kingdom, and the tro- [65

phies of her dishonour advanced beyond Hercules' Pillars. She loves to try the several constitutions of men's bodies; and, indeed, has destroyed the worth of her own body by making experiment upon it for the good of the commonwealth.

Cle. She's a profitable member.

Meg. Peace, if you love me! You shall see these gentlemen stand their ground and not court us.

Gal. What if they should? 76

La. What if they should!

Meg. Nay, let her alone. — What if they should! Why, if they should, I say they were never abroad. What foreigner would do so? [80
It writes them directly untravell'd.

Gal. Why, what if they be?

La. What if they be!

Meg. Good madam, let her go on. — What if they be! Why, if they be, I will justify, [84 they cannot maintain discourse with a judicious lady, nor make a leg<sup>1</sup> nor say "Excuse me."

Gal. Ha, ha, ha!

Meg. Do you laugh, madam?

Dion. Your desires upon you, ladies!

Meg. Then you must sit beside us. 90

Dion. I shall sit near you then, lady.

Meg. Near me, perhaps; but there's a lady endures no stranger; and to me you appear a very strange fellow. 94

La. Methinks he's not so strange; he would quickly be acquainted.

Thra. Peace, the King!

Enter KING, PHARAMOND, ARETHUSA, and Train.

King. To give a stronger testimony of love Than sickly promises (which commonly In princes find both birth and burial 100
In one breath) we have drawn you, worthy sir,

To make your fair endearments to our daughter,

And worthy services known to our subjects, Now lov'd and wondered at; next, our intent

To plant you deeply our immediate heir 105
Both to our blood and kingdoms. For this lady, (The best part of your life, as you confirm me, And I believe,) though her few years and sex

Yet teach her nothing but her fears and blushes,

Desires without desire, discourse and knowledge 110

Only of what herself is to herself,
Make her feel moderate health; and when she sleeps,

In making no ill day, knows no ill dreams. Think not, dear sir, these undivided parts,

That must mould up a virgin, are put on 115
To show her so, as borrowed ornaments
To speak her perfect love to you, or add

An artificial shadow to her nature, — No, sir; I boldly dare proclaim her yet

No woman. But woo her still, and think her modesty 120

A sweeter mistress than the offer'd language

Of any dame, were she a queen, whose eye Speaks common loves and comforts to her servants.<sup>2</sup>

Last, noble son (for so I now must call you), What I have done thus public, is not only 125

To add a comfort in particular
To you or me, but all; and to confirm

The nobles and the gentry of these kingdoms
By oath to your succession, which shall be

Within this month at most. 130

Thra. This will be hardly done.

Cle. It must be ill done, if it be done.

Dion. When 'tis at best, 't will be but half done, whilst

So brave a gentleman is wrong'd and flung off. Thra. I fear. 135

Cle. Who does not?

Dion. I fear not for myself, and yet I fear too.

Well, we shall see, we shall see. No more. Pha. Kissing your white hand, mistress, I take leave

To thank your royal father; and thus far 140
To be my own free trumpet. Understand,

Great King, and these your subjects, mine that must be,

(For so deserving you have spoke me, sir, And so deserving I dare speak myself,)

To what a person, of what eminence, 145
Ripe expectation, of what faculties,

Manners and virtues, you would wed your kingdoms;

You in me have your wishes. Oh, this country! By more than all the gods, I hold it happy; 149

Happy in their dear memories that have been Kings great and good; happy in yours that is;

And from you (as a chronicle to keep Your noble name from eating age) do I

Opine myself most happy. Gentlemen, Believe me in a word, a prince's word, 155

There shall be nothing to make up a kingdom
Mighty and flourishing, defenced, fear'd,

Equal to be commanded and obeyed,
But through the travails of my life I'll find it,

And tie it to this country. By all the gods, 160
My reign shall be so easy to the subject,

That every man shall be his prince himself,
And his own law — yet I his prince and law.

And dearest lady, to your dearest self
(Dear in the choice of him whose name and lustre 165

Must make you more and mightier) let me say,
You are the blessed'st living; for, sweet princess,

You shall enjoy a man of men to be
Your servant; you shall make him yours, for whom

Great queens must die. 170

Thra. Miraculous!

Cle. This speech calls him Spaniard, being nothing but a large inventory of his own commendations.

Dion. I wonder what's his price; for certainly 175

He'll sell himself, he has so prais'd his shape.

<sup>2</sup> Lovers.

Enter PHILASTER.

But here comes one more worthy those large speeches,

Than the large speaker of them.

Let me be swallowed quick, if I can find,
In all the anatomy of yon man's virtues, 180

One sinew sound enough to promise for him,

He shall be constable. By this sun,

He'll ne'er make king unless it be of trifles,

In my poor judgment.

Phi. [kneeling.] Right noble sir, as low as my obedience, 185

And with a heart as loyal as my knee,

I beg your favour.

King. Rise; you have it, sir.

Dion. Mark but the King, how pale he looks!

He fears!

Oh, this same whorson conscience, how it jades us!

King. Speak your intents, sir.

Phi. Shall I speak 'em freely? 100

Be still my royal sovereign.

King. As a subject,

We give you freedom.

Dion. Now it heats.

Phi. Then thus I turn

My language to you, prince; you, foreign man!

Ne'er stare nor put on wonder, for you must Endure me, and you shall. This earth you tread upon 105

(A dowry, as you hope, with this fair princess),

By my dead father (oh, I had a father,

Whose memory I bow to!) was not left

To your inheritance, and I up and living —

Having myself about me and my sword, 200

The souls of all my name and memories,

These arms and some few friends beside the gods —

To part so calmly with it, and sit still

And say, "I might have been." I tell thee,

Pharamond, 204

When thou art king, look I be dead and rotten,

And my name ashes: † for, hear me, Pharamond!

This very ground thou goest on, this fat earth,

My father's friends made fertile with their faiths,

Before that day of shame shall gape and swallow

Thee and thy nation, like a hungry grave, 210

Into her hidden bowels. Prince, it shall:

By the just gods, it shall!

Phi. He's mad; beyond cure, mad.

Dion. Here is a fellow has some fire in's

veins:

The outlandish prince looks like a tooth-drawer.

Phi. Sir Prince of popinjays, I'll make it

well 215

Appear to you I am not mad.

King. You displease us:

You are too bold.

Phi. No, sir, I am too tame,

Too much a turtle, a thing born without passion,

1 Q<sub>2</sub> and Q<sub>3</sub> insert as I.

A faint shadow, that every drunken cloud
Sails over, and makes nothing.

King. I do not fancy this. 220

Call our physicians; sure, he's somewhat tainted.<sup>2</sup>

Thra. I do not think 't will prove so.

Dion. He's given him a general purge already,

For all the right he has; and now he means

To let him blood. Be constant, gentlemen: 225

By heaven, I'll run his hazard,

Although I run my name out of the kingdom!

Cle. Peace, we are all one soul.

Phi. What you have seen in me to stir offence

I cannot find, unless it be this lady, 230

Offer'd into mine arms with the succession;

Which I must keep, (though it hath pleas'd

your fury

To mutiny within you,) without disputing

Your genealogies, or taking knowledge

Whose branch you are. The King will leave it

me, 235

And I dare make it mine. You have your answer.

Phi. If thou wert sole inheritor to him

That made the world his,<sup>3</sup> and couldst see no

sun

Shine upon any thing but thine; were Phara-

mond

As truly valiant as I feel him cold, 240

And ring'd amongst the choicest of his friends

(Such as would blush to talk such serious follies,

Or back such bellied<sup>4</sup> commendations),

And from this presence, spite of all these bugs,<sup>5</sup>

You should hear further from me. 245

King. Sir, you wrong the prince; I gave you not this freedom

To brave our best friends. You deserve our frown.

Go to; be better temper'd.

Phi. It must be, sir, when I am nobler us'd.

Gal. Ladies, 250

This would have been a pattern of succession,<sup>6</sup>

Had he ne'er met this mischief. By my life,

He is the worthiest the true name of man

This day within my knowledge.

Meg. I cannot tell what you may call your knowledge; 255

But the other is the man set in mine eye.

Oh, 't is a prince of wax!<sup>7</sup>

Gal. A dog it is,<sup>8</sup>

King. Philaster, tell me

The injuries you aim at<sup>9</sup> in your riddles. 260

Phi. If you had my eyes, sir, and sufferance,

My griefs upon you, and my broken fortunes,

My wants great, and now nought but hopes and fears,

My wrongs would make ill riddles to be laugh't at.

Dare you be still my king, and right me not?

King. Give me your wrongs in private.

<sup>3</sup> Swollen. Q<sub>1</sub> and Q<sub>2</sub> belied. <sup>6</sup> To succeeding kings.

<sup>8</sup> The phrase, a dog of wax, is used elsewhere in a contemptuous sense, but has not been explained.

<sup>9</sup> Refer to.

Phi. Take them, 265
And ease me of a load would bow strong Atlas.
They whisper.

Cle. He dares not stand the shock.

Dion. I cannot blame him; there's danger in 't. Every man in this age has not a soul of crystal, for all men to read their actions [270 through: men's hearts and faces are so far under, that they hold no intelligence. Do but view you stranger well, and you shall see a fever through all his bravery,<sup>1</sup> and feel him shake like a true tenant.<sup>2</sup> If he give not back his [276 crown again upon the report of an elder-gun, I have no argury.

King. Go to;

Be more yourself, as you respect our favour; 270
You 'll stir us else. Sir, I must have you know,
That y' are and shall be, at our pleasure, what Fashion we will put upon you. Smooth your brow,

Or by the gods —

Phi. I am dead, sir; y' are my fate. It was not I

Said, I was wrong'd: I carry all about me 285
My weak stars lead me to, all my weak fortunes.

Who dares in all this presence speak, (that is
But man of flesh, and may be mortal,) tell me
I do not most entirely love this prince,
And honour his full virtues!

King. Sure, he's possess'd. 290

Phi. Yes, with my father's spirit. It's here,
O King,

A dangerous spirit! Now he tells me, King,
I was a king's heir, bids me be a king,
And whispers to me, these are all my subjects.
'Tis strange he will not let me sleep, but dives into my fancy, and there gives me shapes 296
That kneel and do me service, cry me king,
But I'll suppress him; he's a factious spirit,
And will undo me. — [To PHAR.] Noble sir,
your hand;

I am your servant.

King. Away! I do not like this: 300
I'll make you tamer, or I'll dispossess you
Both of your life and spirit. For this time
I pardon your wild speech, without so much
As your imprisonment.

Exeunt KING, PHARAMOND, ARE-THUSA [and Train].

Dion. I thank you, sir; you dare not for the people. 305

Gal. Ladies, what think you now of this brave fellow?

Meg. A pretty talking fellow, hot at hand.
But eye you stranger: is he not a fine complete gentleman? Oh, these strangers, I do affect<sup>3</sup> them strangely! They do the rarest home- [310 things, and please the fullest! As I live, I could love all the nation over and over for his sake.

Gal. Gods comfort your poor head-piece, lady! 'Tis a weak one, and had need of a night-
cap. Exeunt Ladies. 315

<sup>2</sup> Probably corrupt. Q<sub>1</sub> truant. Mod. edd. conjecture tyrant; recreant; in a true tertian.

<sup>3</sup> Love.

Dion. See, how his fancy labours! Has he
not Spoke home and bravely? What a dangerous train

Did he give fire to! How he shook the King,
Made his soul melt within him, and his blood
Run into whey! It stood upon his brow 320
Like a cold winter dew.

Phi. Gentlemen,
You have no suit to me? I am no minion.
You stand, methinks, like men that would be courtiers,

If I<sup>4</sup> could well be flatter'd at a price
Not to undo your children. You're all honest:
Go, get you home again, and make your country 326

A virtuous court, to which your great ones
may,
In their diseased age, retire and live recluse.

Cle. How do you, worthy sir?

Phi. Well, very well;
And so well that, if the King please you, I find
I may live many years.

Dion. The King must please, 331
Whilst we know what you are and who you are,
Your wrongs and virtues.<sup>5</sup> Shrink not, worthy
sir,

But add your father to you; in whose name
We'll waken all the gods, and conjure up 336
The rods of vengeance, the abused people,
Who, like to raging torrents, shall swell high,
And so begirt the dens of these male-dragons,
That, through the strongest safety, they shall
beg

For mercy at your sword's point.

Phi. Friends, no more; 340
Our ears may be corrupted; 'tis an age
We dare not trust our wills to. Do you love
me?

Thra. Do we love Heaven and Honour?

Phi. My Lord Dion, you had
A virtuous gentlewoman call'd you father; 345
Is she yet alive?

Dion. Most honour'd sir, she is;
And, for the penance but of an idle dream
Has undertook a tedious pilgrimage.

Enter a Lady.

Phi. Is it to me, or any of these gentlemen,
you come?

Lady. To you, brave lord; the princess would entreat 350

Your present company.

Phi. The princess send for me! You are mistaken.

Lady. If you be called Philaster, 'tis to you.
Phi. Kiss her fair hand, and say I will attend
her. [Exit Lady.] 355

Dion. Do you know what you do?

Phi. Yes; go to see a woman.

Cle. But do you weigh the danger you are
in?

Phi. Danger in a sweet face!

By Jupiter, I must not fear a woman!

<sup>4</sup> Mason conj. Q<sub>q</sub>. F. you. If you could flatter me without ruining your families by antagonizing the king.

<sup>5</sup> Q<sub>1</sub>. Other edd. injuries.

Thra. But are you sure it was the princess sent? 300

It may be some foul train to catch your life.

Phi. I do not think it, gentlemen; she 's noble. Her eye may shoot me dead, or those true red And white friends in her cheeks may steal my soul out; 364

There 's all the danger in 't. But, be what may, Her single name hath arm'd me. Exit.

Dion. Go on, And be as truly happy as thou 'rt fearless!— Come, gentlemen, let 's make our friends acquainted,

Lest the King prove false. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter ARETHUSA and a Lady.

Are. Comes he not?

Lady. Madam?

Are. Will Philaster come?

Lady. Dear madam, you were wont to credit me

At first.

Are. But didst thou tell me so?

I am forgetful, and my woman's strength Is so o'ercharg'd with dangers like to grow About my marriage, that these under-things Dare not abide in such a troubled sea.

How lookt he when he told thee he would come?

Lady. Why, well. 10

Are. And not a little fearful?

Lady. Fear, madam! Sure, he knows not what it is.

Are. You all are of his faction; the whole court

Is bold in praise of him; whilst I May live neglected, and do noble things, As fools in strife throw gold into the sea, Drown'd in the doing. But, I know he fears.

Lady. Fear, madam! Methought, his looks hid more

Of love than fear.

Are. Of love! To whom? To you?

Did you deliver those plain words I sent, With such a winning gesture and quick look That you have caught him?

Lady. Madam, I mean to you.

Are. Of love to me! Alas, thy ignorance Lets thee not see the crosses of our births! Nature, that loves not to be questioned Why she did this or that, but has her ends, And knows she does well, never gave the world Two things so opposite, so contrary As he and I am: if a bowl of blood Drawn from this arm of mine would poison thee, 30

A draught of his would cure thee. Of love to me!

Lady. Madam, I think I hear him.

Are. Bring him in. [Exit Lady.]

You gods, that would not have your dooms withstood,

Whose holy wisdoms at this time it is To make the passion of a feeble maid The way unto your justice, I obey. 35

[Re-enter [Lady with] PHILASTER.

Lady. Here is my Lord Philaster.

Are. Oh, 'tis well.

Withdraw yourself. [Exit Lady.]

Phi. Madam, your messenger

Made me believe you wish'd to speak with me.

Are. 'Tis true, Philaster; but the words are such 40

I have to say, and do so ill beseeem The mouth of woman, that I wish them said, And yet am loth to speak them. Have you known

That I have aught detracted from your worth?

Have I in person wrong'd you, or have set 45

My baser instruments to throw disgrace

Upon your virtues?

Phi. Never, madam, you.

Are. Why, then, should you, in such a public place,

Injure a princess, and a scandal lay

Upon my fortunes, fam'd to be so great, 50

Calling a great part of my dowry in question?

Phi. Madam, this truth which I shall speak will be Foolish: but, for your fair and virtuous self, I could afford myself to have no right

To any thing you wish'd.

Are. Philaster, know, 55

I must enjoy these kingdoms.

Phi. Madam, both?

Are. Both, or I die: by heaven, I die, Philaster,

If I not calmly may enjoy them both.

Phi. I would do much to save that noble life;

Yet would be loth to have posterity 60

Find in our stories, that Philaster gave

His right unto a sceptre and a crown

To save a lady's longing.

Are. Nay, then, hear:

I must and will have them, and more—

Phi. What more?

Are. Or lose that little life the gods prepared

To trouble this poor piece of earth withal. 65

Phi. Madam, what more?

Are. Turn, then, away thy face.

Phi. No.

Are. Do.

Phi. I can endure it. Turn away my face! 70

I never yet saw enemy that lookt

So dreadfully, but that I thought myself

As great a basilisk<sup>3</sup> as he; or spake

So horrible, but that I thought my tongue

Bore thunder underneath, as much as his; 75

Nor beast that I could turn from. Shall I then

Begin to fear sweet sounds? A lady's voice,

Whom I do love? Say you would have my life;

Why, I will give it you; for 't is of me

A thing so loath'd, and unto you that ask 80

Of so poor use, that I shall make no price:

If you entreat, I will unmov'dly hear.

Are. Yet, for my sake, a little bend thy looks.

Phi. I do.

Are. Then know, I must have them and thee.

Phi. And me?

<sup>2</sup> Arethusa's apartment in the palace.

<sup>3</sup> A fabulous serpent that killed with a glance.

Are. Thy love; without which, all the land Discovered yet will serve me for no use <sup>86</sup>
But to be buried in.

Phi. Is 't possible?

Are. With it, it were too little to bestow
On thee. Now, though thy breath do strike me dead,
(Which, know, it may,) I have unript my breast. <sup>90</sup>

Phi. Madam, you are too full of noble
thoughts,

To lay a train for this contemned life,
Which you may have for asking. To suspect
Were base, where I deserve no ill. Love you!
By all my hopes, I do, above my life! <sup>95</sup>
But how this passion should proceed from you
So violently, would amaze a man
That would be jealous.<sup>1</sup>

Are. Another soul into my body shot Could not have fill'd me with more strength and spirit <sup>100</sup>
Than this thy breath. But spend not hasty
time

In seeking how I came thus: 't is the gods,
The gods, that make me so; and, sure, our love
Will be the nobler and the better blest,
In that the secret justice of the gods <sup>105</sup>
Is mingled with it. Let us leave, and kiss;
Lest some unwelcome guest should fall betwixt
us,

And we should part without it.

Phi. 'T will be ill
I should abide here long.

Are. 'T is true; and worse
You should come often. How shall we devise
To hold intelligence, that our true loves, <sup>111</sup>
On any new occasion, may agree
What path is best to tread?

Phi. I have a boy,
Sent by the gods, I hope, to this intent, <sup>114</sup>
Not yet seen in the court. Hunting the buck,
I found him sitting by a fountain's side,
Of which he borrow'd some to quench his thirst,
And paid the nymph again as much in tears.
A garland lay him by, made by himself
Of many several flowers bred in the vale, <sup>120</sup>
Stuck in that mystic order that the rareness
Delighted me: but ever when he turn'd
His tender eyes upon 'em, he would weep,
As if he meant to make 'em grow again.
Seeing such pretty helpless innocence <sup>125</sup>
Dwell in his face, I ask'd him all his story.
He told me that his parents gentle died,
Leaving him to the mercy of the fields,
Which gave him roots; and of the crystal springs, <sup>129</sup>

Which did not stop their courses; and the sun,
Which still, he thank'd him, yielded him his
light.

Then took he up his garland, and did show
What every flower, as country-people hold,
Did signify, and how all, ordered thus,
Express his grief; and, to my thoughts, did read <sup>135</sup>

The prettiest lecture of his country-art

<sup>1</sup> Suspicious.

That could be wish'd: so that methought I could

Have studied it. I gladly entertain'd
Him, who was glad to follow; and have got
The trustiest, loving'st, and the gentlest boy <sup>140</sup>
That ever master kept. Him will I send
To wait on you, and bear our hidden love.

Are. 'T is well; no more.

Re-enter Lady.

Lady. Madam, the prince is come to do his service.

Are. What will you do, Philaster, with yourself? <sup>145</sup>

Phi. Why, that which all the gods have pointed out for me.

Are. Dear, hide thyself. —

Bring in the prince. [Exit Lady.]

Phi. Hide me from Pharamond!
When thunder speaks, which is the voice of God,

Though I do reverence, yet I hide me not; <sup>150</sup>
And shall a stranger-prince have leave to brag Unto a foreign nation, that he made
Philaster hide himself?

Are. He cannot know it.

Phi. Though it should sleep for ever to the
world,
It is a simple sin to hide myself, <sup>155</sup>
Which will for ever on my conscience lie.

Are. Then, good Philaster, give him scope and way

In what he says; for he is apt to speak
What you are loth to hear. For my sake, do. <sup>160</sup>

Phi. I will.

[Re-enter [Lady with] PHARAMOND.]

Phi. My princely mistress, as true lovers ought, [Exit Lady.]

I come to kiss these fair hands, and to show,
In outward ceremonies, the dear love
Writ in my heart. <sup>164</sup>

Phi. If I shall have an answer no directlier,
I am gone.

Phi. To what would he have answer?

Are. To his claim unto the kingdom.

Phi. Sirrah, I forbare you before the King —

Phi. Good sir, do so still; I would not talk with you. <sup>170</sup>

Phi. But now the time is fitter. Do but offer
To make mention of right to any kingdom,
Though it be scarce habitable —

Phi. Good sir, let me go.

Phi. And by the gods —

Phi. Peace, Pharamond! if thou —

Are. Leave us, Philaster.

Phi. I have done. [Going.] <sup>175</sup>

Phi. You are gone! by Heaven I'll fetch you back.

Phi. You shall not need. [Returning.]

Phi. What now?

Phi. Know, Pharamond,

I loathe to brawl with such a blast as thou,
Who art nought but a valiant voice; but if Thou shalt provoke me further, men shall say,

Thou wert, and not lament it.

Pha. Do you slight
My greatness so, and in the chamber of
The princess?

Phi. It is a place to which I must confess
I owe a reverence; but were 't the church,
Ay, at the altar, there's no place so safe,
Where thou dar'st injure me, but I dare kill
thee.

And for your greatness, know, sir, I can grasp
You and your greatness thus, thus into nothing.
Give not a word, not a word back! Farewell.

Exit.

Pha. 'T is an odd fellow, madam; we must stop
His mouth with some office when we are married.

Are. You were best make him your controller.

Pha. I think he would discharge it well. But,
madam,

I hope our hearts are knit; but yet so slow
The ceremonies of state are, that 't will be long

Before our hands be so. If then you please,
Being agreed in heart, let us not wait
For dreaming form, but take a little stolen
Delights, and so prevent<sup>1</sup> our joys to come.

Are. If you dare speak such thoughts,
I must withdraw in honour.

Exit.

Pha. The constitution of my body will never hold out till the wedding; I must seek elsewhere.

Exit. [205

ACT II

SCENE I.<sup>2</sup>

Enter PHILASTER and BELLARIO.

Phi. And thou shalt find her honourable,
boy;

Full of regard unto thy tender youth,
For thine own modesty; and, for my sake,
Apter to give than thou wilt be to ask,
Ay, or deserve.

Bel. Sir, you did take me up
When I was nothing; and only yet am something

By being yours. You trusted me unknown;
And that which you were apt to conster<sup>3</sup>

A simple innocence in me, perhaps
Might have been craft, the cunning of a boy
Hard'ned in lies and theft: yet ventur'd you
To part my miseries and me: for which,
I never can expect to serve a lady

That bears more honour in her breast than you.
Phi. But, boy, it will prefer<sup>4</sup> thee. Thou art young,

And bear'st a childish overflowing love
To them that clap thy cheeks and speak thee fair yet;

But when thy judgment comes to rule those passions,

Thou wilt remember best those careful friends
That plac'd thee in the noblest way of life.
She is a princess I prefer thee to.

Bel. In that small time that I have seen the
world,

I never knew a man hasty to part
With a servant he thought trusty. I remember,
My father would prefer the boys he kept
To greater men than he; but did it not Till they were grown too saucy for himself.

Phi. Why, gentle boy, I find no fault at all
In thy behaviour.

Bel. Sir, if I have made
A fault in ignorance, instruct my youth:

I shall be willing, if not apt, to learn;

Age and experience will adorn my mind
With larger knowledge; and if I have done
A wilful fault, think me not past all hope

For once. What master holds so strict a hand
Over his boy, that he will part with him
Without one warning? Let me be corrected

To break my stubbornness, if it be so,
Rather than turn me off; and I shall mend.

Phi. Thy love doth plead so prettily to stay,
That, trust me, I could weep to part with thee.

Alas, I do not turn thee off! Thou knowest
It is my business that doth call thee hence;

And when thou art with her, thou dwell'st
with me,

Think so, and 't is so; and when time is full,
That thou hast well discharg'd this heavy trust,
Laid on so weak a one, I will again

With joy receive thee; as I live, I will!

Nay, weep not, gentle boy. 'T is more than
time

Thou didst attend the princess.

Bel. I am gone.

But since I am to part with you, my lord,
And none knows whether I shall live to do
More service for you, take this little prayer:

Heaven bless your loves, your fights, all your designs!

May sick men, if they have your wish, be well;
And Heaven hate those you curse, though I be
one!

Phi. The love of boys unto their lords is strange;

I have read wonders of it: yet this boy
For my sake (if a man may judge by looks And speech) would out-do story. I may see
A day to pay him for his loyalty.

Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter PHARAMOND.

Pha. Why should these ladies stay so long?
They must come this way. I know the queen employs 'em not; for the reverend mother<sup>6</sup> sent me word, they would all be for the garden.

If they should all prove honest<sup>7</sup> now, I were in a fair taking; I was never so long without sport in my life, and, in my conscience, 't is not my fault. Oh, for our country ladies!

Enter GALATEA.

Here 's one bolted; I'll hound at her.—Madam!
Gal. Your grace!

Pha. Shall I not be a trouble?

Gal. Not to me, sir. 11

Pha. Nay, nay, you are too quick. By this sweet hand—

Gal. You'll be forsworn, sir; 'tis but an old glove.

If you will talk at distance, I am for you:
But, good prince, be not bawdy, nor do not brag; 15

These two I bar;
And then, I think, I shall have sense enough
To answer all the weighty apophthegms
Your royal blood shall manage.

Pha. Dear lady, can you love? 20

Gal. Dear prince! how dear? I ne'er cost you a coach yet, nor put you to the dear repentance of a banquet. Here's no scarlet, sir, to blush the sin out it was given for. This wire mine own hair covers; and this face has [25] been so far from being dear to any, that it ne'er cost penny painting; and, for the rest of my poor wardrobe, such as you see, it leaves no hand<sup>1</sup> behind it, to make the jealous mercer's wife curse our good doings. 30

Pha. You mistake me, lady.

Gal. Lord, I do so; would you or I could help it!

[Pha. You're very dangerous bitter, like a potion.

Gal. No, sir, I do not mean to purge you, though

I mean to purge a little time on you.]<sup>2</sup> 35

Pha. Do ladies of this country use to give
No more respect to men of my full being?

Gal. Full being! I understand you not, unless your grace means growing to fatness; and then your only remedy (upon my knowledge, [40] prince) is, in a morning, a cup of neat white wine brewed with carduus,<sup>3</sup> then fast till supper; about eight you may eat; use exercise, and keep a sparrow-hawk; you can shoot in a tiller:<sup>4</sup> but, of all, your grace must fly phle- [45] botomy,<sup>5</sup> fresh pork, conger,<sup>6</sup> and clarified whey; they are all duller of the vital spirits.

Pha. Lady, you talk of nothing all this while.

Gal. 'Tis very true, sir; I talk of you. 45

Pha. [Aside.] This is a crafty wench; I like her wit well; 'twill be rare to stir up a leaden appetite. She's a Danaë, and must be courted in a shower of gold.—Madam, look here; all these, and more than— 54

Gal. What have you there, my lord? Gold! now, as I live, 'tis fair gold! You would have silver for it, to play with the pages. You could not have taken me in a worse time; but, if you have present use, my lord, I'll send my man with silver and keep your gold for you. 60

Pha. Lady, lady!

Gal. She's coming, sir, behind, will take white money.—

[Aside.] Yet for all this I'll match ye.

Exit behind the hangings.

Pha. If there be but two such more in this kingdom, and near the court, we may even [65]

<sup>1</sup> Note of indebtedness.

<sup>3</sup> A kind of thistle used as a medicine.

hang up our harps. Ten such camphire<sup>7</sup> constitutions as this would call the golden age again in question, and teach the old way for every ill-fac'd husband to get his own children; and what a mischief that would breed, let all consider! 71

Enter MEGRA.

Here's another: if she be of the same last, the devil shall pluck her on.—Many fair mornings, lady!

Meg. As many mornings bring as many days,
Fair, sweet and hopeful to your grace! 76

Pha. [Aside.] She gives good words yet; sure this wench is free.—<sup>8</sup>

If your more serious business does not call you,
Let me hold quarter with you; we will talk
An hour out quickly.

Meg. What would your grace talk of? 80

Pha. Of some such pretty subject as yourself:
I'll go no further than your eye, or lip;
There's theme enough for one man for an age.

Meg. Sir, they stand right, and my lips are yet even,

Smooth, young enough, ripe enough, and red enough, 85

Or my glass wrongs me.

Pha. Oh, they are two twinn'd cherries dy'd in blushes

Which those fair suns above with their bright beams

Reflect upon and ripen. Sweetest beauty,
Bow down those branches, that the longing taste 90

Of the faint looker-on may meet those blessings,
And taste and live. They kiss.

Meg. [Aside.] Oh, delicate sweet prince!
She that hath snow enough about her heart

To take the wanton spring of ten such lines off,
May be a nun without probation.—Sir, 95

You have in such neat poetry gathered a kiss,
That if I had but five lines of that number,

Such pretty begging blanks,<sup>9</sup> I should commend

Your forehead or your cheeks, and kiss you too.

Pha. Do it in prose; you cannot miss it, madam. 100

Meg. I shall, I shall.

Pha. By my life, but you shall not;
I'll prompt you first. [Kisses her.] Can you do it now?

Meg. Methinks 'tis easy, now you ha' done 't before me;

But yet I should stick at it. [Kisses him.]

Pha. Stick till to-morrow;
I'll ne'er part you, sweetest. But we lose time:
Can you love me? 105

Meg. Love you, my lord! How would you have me love you?

Pha. I'll teach you in a short sentence,
'cause I will not load your memory; this is all:
love me, and lie with me. 110

Meg. Was it "lie with you" that you said?
'Tis impossible.

Pha. Not to a willing mind, that will endeavour. If I do not teach you to do it as easily in one night as you'll go to bed, I'll lose my royal blood for 't. 116

Meg. Why, prince, you have a lady of your own

That yet wants teaching.

Pha. I'll sooner teach a mare the old measures<sup>1</sup> than teach her anything belonging to the function. She's afraid to lie with herself if she have but any masculine imaginations about her. I know, when we are married, I, must ravish her.

Meg. By mine honour, that's a foul fault, indeed; 125
But time and your good help will wear it out, sir.

Pha. And for any other I see, excepting your dear self, dearest lady, I had rather be Sir Tim the schoolmaster, and leap a dairy-maid, madam. 130

Meg. Has your grace seen the court-star, Galatea?

Pha. Out upon her! She's as cold of her favour as an apoplex; she sail'd by but now.

Meg. And how do you hold her wit, sir? 135

Pha. I hold her wit? The strength of all the guard cannot hold it, if they were tied to it; she would blow 'em out of the kingdom. They talk of Jupiter; he's but a squib-cracker to her: look well about you, and you may find a tongue-<sup>[140]</sup> bolt. But speak, sweet lady, shall I be freely welcome.

Meg. Whither?

Pha. To your bed. If you mistrust my faith, you do me the unobtest wrong. 145

Meg. I dare not, prince, I dare not.

Pha. Make your own conditions, my purse shall seal 'em, and what you dare imagine you can want, I'll furnish you withal. Give two hours to your thoughts every morning about it. Come I know you are bashful; 151
Speak in my ear, will you be mine? Keep this,

And with it, me: soon I will visit you.

Meg. My lord, my chamber's most unsafe; but when 't is night, 154
I'll find some means to slip into your lodging; Till when — [156]

Pha. Till when, this and my heart go with [158]
Ereunt several ways.

Re-enter GALATEA from behind the hangings.

Gal. Oh, thou pernicious petticoat prince! are these your virtues? Well, if I do not lay a train to blow your sport up, I am no woman: and, Lady Towsabel, I'll fit you for 't. Exit. 160

[SCENE III.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter ARETHUSA and a Lady.

Are. Where's the boy?

Lady. Within, madam.

Are. Gave you him gold to buy him clothes?

Lady. I did.

Are. And has he done 't? 5

Lady. Yes, madam.

Are. 'T is a pretty sad-talking boy, is it not? Asked you his name? 9

Lady. No, madam.

Enter GALATEA.

Are. Oh, you are welcome. What good news?

Gal. As good as any one can tell your grace, That says she has done that you would have wish'd.

Are. Hast thou discovered?

Gal. I have strain'd a point of modesty for you.

Are. I prithee, how? 15

Gal. In list'ning after bawdry. I see, let a lady live never so modestly, she shall be sure to find a lawful time to hearken after bawdry. Your prince, brave Pharamond, was so hot on 't! 20

Are. With whom?

Gal. Why, with the lady I suspected. I can tell the time and place.

Are. Oh, when, and where?

Gal. To-night, his lodging. 25

Are. Run thyself into the presence; mingle there again

With other ladies; leave the rest to me.

[Exit GALATEA.]

If destiny (to whom we dare not say, "Why didst thou this?") have not decreed it so, In lasting leaves (whose smallest characters 30 Were never alter'd yet), this match shall break. —

Where's the boy?

Lady. Here, madam.

Enter BELLARIO.

Are. Sir, you are sad to change your service; is 't not so?

Bel. Madam, I have not chang'd; I wait on you, 35

To do him service.

Are. Thou disclaim'st in me.

Tell me thy name.

Bel. Bellario.

Are. Thou canst sing and play?

Bel. If grief will give me leave, madam, I can. 40

Are. Alas, what kind of grief can thy years know?

Hadst thou a curst master when thou went'st to school?

Thou art not capable of other grief:

Thy brows and cheeks are smooth as waters be
When no breath troubles them. Believe me, boy, 45

Care seeks out wrinkled brows and hollow eyes,
And builds himself caves, to abide in them

Come, sir, tell me truly, doth your lord love me?

Bel. Love, madam! I know not what it is

Are. Canst thou know grief, and never yet knew'st love? 50

Thou art deceiv'd, boy. Does he speak of me
As if he wish'd me well?

Bel. If it be love
To forget all respect of his own friends
With thinking of your face; if it be love
To sit cross-arm'd and sigh away the day,<sup>55</sup>
Mingled with starts, crying your name as loud
And hastily as men i' the streets do fire;
If it be love to weep himself away
When he but hears of any lady dead
Or kill'd, because it might have been your chance;

If, when he goes to rest (which will not be),
'Twill every prayer he says, to name you once,
As others drop a bead, be to be in love,
Then, madam, I dare swear he loves you.

Are. Oh you're a cunning boy, and taught to lie<sup>65</sup>

For your lord's credit! But thou know'st a lie
That bears this sound is welcomer to me
Than any truth that says he loves me not.
Lead the way, boy. — [To Lady.] Do you attend me too. —

'Tis thy lord's business hastes me thus. Away!
Exeunt.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter DION, CLEREMONT, THRASILINE, MEGRA, and GALATEA.

Dion. Come, ladies, shall we talk a round?
As men

Do walk a mile, women should talk an hour
After supper: 'tis their exercise.

Gal. 'Tis late.

Meg. 'Tis all<sup>5</sup>
My eyes will do to lead me to my bed.

Gal. I fear, they are so heavy, you'll scarce find

The way to your own lodging with 'em to-night.

Enter PHARAMOND.

Thra. The prince!

Pha. Not a-bed, ladies? You're good sitters-up.<sup>10</sup>

What think you of a pleasant dream, to last
Till morning?

Meg. I should choose, my lord, a pleasing wake before it.

Enter ARETHUSA and BELLARIO.

Are. 'Tis well, my lord; you're courting of these ladies. —

Is't not late, gentlemen?<sup>15</sup>

Cle. Yes, madam.

Are. Wait you there. Exit.

Meg. [Aside.] She's jealous, as I live. — Look you, my lord,

The princess has a Hylas, an Adonis.

Pha. His form is angel-like.<sup>20</sup>

Meg. Why, this is he that must, when you are wed,

Sit by your pillow, like young Apollo, with His hand and voice binding your thoughts in
sleep,

The princess does provide him for you and for herself.

<sup>1</sup> Before Pharamond's lodging in the court of the palace.

Pha. I find no music in these boys.

Meg. Nor I: <sup>25</sup>
They can do little, and that small they do,
They have not wit to hide.

Dion. Serves he the princess?

Thra. Yes. [keeps him!

Dion. 'Tis a sweet boy: how brave<sup>2</sup> she

Pha. Ladies all, good rest; I mean to kill a buck

To-morrow morning ere you've done your dreams.<sup>30</sup>

Meg. All happiness attend your grace! [Exit
PHARAMOND.] Gentlemen, good rest. —

Come, shall we go to bed?

Gal. Yes. — All good night.

Dion. May your dreams be true to you! —

Exeunt GALATEA and MEGRA.

What shall we do, gallants? 'tis late. The
King

Is up still: see, he comes; a guard along<sup>35</sup>
With him.

Enter KING, ARETHUSA, and Guard.

King. Look your intelligence be true.

Are. Upon my life, it is; and I do hope
Your highness will not tie me to a man
That in the heat of wooing throws me off,
And takes another.

Dion. What should this mean?<sup>40</sup>

King. If it be true,
That lady had been better have embrac'd
Cureless diseases. Get you to your rest:
You shall be righted.

Exeunt ARETHUSA and BELLARIO.

— Gentlemen, draw near;
We shall employ you. Is young Pharamond<sup>45</sup>
Come to his lodging?

Dion. I saw him enter there.

King. Haste, some of you, and cunningly discover

If Megra be in her lodging. [Exit DION.]

Cle. Sir,
She parted hence but now, with other ladies.<sup>50</sup>

King. If she be there, we shall not need to make

A vain discovery of our suspicion.

[Aside.] You gods, I see that who unrighteously
Holds wealth or state from others shall be curst
In that which meaner men are blest withal:<sup>55</sup>
Ages to come shall know no male of him
Left to inherit, and his name shall be Blotted from earth; if he have any child,
It shall be crossly match'd; the gods themselves

Shall sow wild strife betwixt her lord and her.

Yet, if it be your wills, forgive the sin<sup>61</sup>

I have committed; let it not fall

Upon this understanding child of mine!

She has not broke your laws. But how can I

Look to be heard of gods that must be just,<sup>65</sup>

Praying upon the ground I hold by wrong?

Re-enter DION.

Dion. Sir, I have asked, and her women swear
she is within; but they, I think, are bawds.

I told 'em, I must speak with her; they laugh, and said, their lady lay speechless. I said, [70] my business was important; they said, their lady was about it. I grew hot, and cried, my business was a matter that concern'd life and death; they answered, so was sleeping, at which their lady was. I urg'd again, she had scarce [75] time to be so since last I saw her: they smil'd again, and seem'd to instruct me that sleeping was nothing but lying down and winking.<sup>1</sup> Answers more direct I could not get: in short, sir, I think she is not there.

King. 'Tis then no time to dally. — You o' the guard,
Wait at the back door of the prince's lodging,
And see that none pass thence, upon your lives.

[Exit Guards.]
Knock, gentlemen; knock loud; louder yet.
[DION, CLER., &c. knock at the door of PHARAMOND'S Lodging.]

What, has their pleasure taken off their hearing? —

I'll break your meditations. — Knock again. — Not yet? I do not think he sleeps, having this Larum by him. — Once more. — Pharamond! prince! PHARAMOND [appears] above.

Pha. What saucy groom knocks at this dead of night?

Where be our waiters? By my vexed soul, [90] He meets his death that meets me, for his boldness.

King. Prince, prince, you wrong your thoughts; we are your friends:
Come down.

Pha. The King!
King. The same, sir. Come down, sir: We have cause of present counsel with you.

Pha. If your grace please [95] To use me, I'll attend you to your chamber.

Enter PHARAMOND below.

King. No, 'tis too late, prince; I'll make bold with yours.

Pha. I have some private reasons to myself Makes me unmannerly, and say you cannot. —

[They press to come in.]
Nay, press not forward, gentlemen; he must [100] Come through my life that comes here.

King. Sir, be resolv'd<sup>2</sup> I must and will come. — Enter.

Pha. I will not be dishonour'd. He that enters, enters upon his death.

Sir, 'tis a sign you make no stranger of me, [105] To bring these renegadoes to my chamber At these unseasoned hours.

King. Why do you Chafe yourself so? You are not wrong'd nor shall be;

Only I'll search your lodging, for some cause To ourself known. — Enter, I say.

Pha. I say, no. [110]

Enter MEGRA above.

Meg. Let 'em enter, prince, let 'em enter; I am up and ready: [3] I know their business;

'Tis the poor breaking of a lady's honour They hunt so hotly after; let 'em enjoy it. — [114] You have your business, gentlemen; I lay here. Oh, my lord the King, this is not noble in you To make public the weakness of a woman!

King. Come down.

Meg. I dare, my lord. Your hootings and your clamours, [119] Your private whispers and your broad floorings, Can no more vex my soul than this base carriage.<sup>4</sup>

But I have vengeance yet in store for some Shall, in the most contempt you can have of me, Be joy and nourishment.

King. Will you come down?

Meg. Yes, to laugh at your worst; but I shall wring you, [125]

If my skill fail me not. [Exit above.]

King. Sir, I must dearly chide you for this looseness;

You have wrong'd a worthy lady; but, no more. —

Conduct him to my lodging and to bed. [Exit PHARAMOND and Attendants.]

Cle. Get him another wench, and you bring him to bed indeed. [151]

Dion. 'Tis strange a man cannot ride a stage Or two, to breathe himself, without a warrant. If his gear hold, that lodgings be search'd thus, Pray God we may lie with our own wives in safety, [135]

That they be not by some trick of state mistaken!

Enter [Attendants] with MEGRA [below].

King. Now, lady of honour, where's your honour now?

No man can fit your palate but the prince. Thou most ill-shrouded rottenness, thou piece

Made by a painter and a 'pothecary, [140] Thou troubled sea of lust, thou wilderness

Inhabited by wild thoughts, thou swollen cloud Of infection, thou ripe mine of all diseases,

Thou all-sin, all-hell, and last, all-devils, tell me, Had you none to pull on with your courtesies [145] But he that must be mine, and wrong my daughter?

By all the gods, all these, and all the pages, And all the court, shall hoot thee through the court,

Fling rotten oranges, make ribald rhymes, And sear thy name with candles upon walls! [150] Do you laugh, Lady Venus?

Meg. Faith, sir, you must pardon me; I cannot choose but laugh to see you merry.

If you do this, O King! nay, if you dare do it, By all those gods you swore by, and as many [155] More of my own, I will have fellows, and such Fellows in it, as shall make noble mirth! The princess, your dear daughter, shall stand by me

On walls, and sung in ballads, any thing. [159] Urge me no more; I know her and her haunts,

Her lays, leaps, and outlays, and will discover all;

Nay, will dishonour her. I know the boy

She keeps; a handsome boy, about eighteen;
Know what she does with him, where, and
when. 104

Come, sir, you put me to a woman's madness,
The glory of a fury; and if I do not Do't to the height —

King. What boy is this she raves at?

Meg. Alas! good-minded prince, you know not these things!

I am loth to reveal 'em. Keep this fault,
As you would keep your health from the hot air 170

Of the corrupted people, or, by Heaven,
I will not fall alone. What I have known
Shall be as public as a print; all tongues Shall speak it as they do the language they
Are born in, as free and commonly; I'll set it,
Like a prodigious star, for all to gaze at, 176
And so high and glowing, that other kingdoms far and foreign

Shall read it there, nay, travel with it, till they find

No tongue to make it more, nor no more people;

And then behold the fall of your fair princess!
King. Has she a boy? 181

Cle. So please your grace, I have seen a boy wait

On her, a fair boy.

King. Go, get you to your quarter;
For this time I will study to forget you.

Meg. Do you study to forget me, and I'll study 186

To forget you.

Exeunt KING, MEGRA, and Guard.

Cle. Why, here's a male spirit fit for Hercules. If ever there be Nine Worthies of women, this wench shall ride astride and be their captain. 190

Dion. Sure, she has a garrison of devils in her tongue, she uttered such balls of wild-fire. She has so nettled the King, that all the doctors in the country will scarce cure him. That boy was a strange-found-out antidote to cure her [195 infection; that boy, that princess' boy; that brave, chaste, virtuous lady's boy; and a fair boy, a well-spoken boy! All these considered, can make nothing else — but there I leave you,
gentlemen. 200

Thra. Nay, we'll go wander with you.
Exeunt.

ACT III

SCENE I.<sup>2</sup>

Enter DION, CLEREMONT, and THRASILINE.

Cle. Nay, doubtless, 't is true.

Dion. Ay; and 't is the gods
That rais'd this punishment, to scourge the
King

With his own issue. Is it not a shame
For us that should write noble in the land, 5
For us that should be freemen, to behold
A man that is the bravery of his age,

Philaster, prest down from his royal right
By this regardless King? and only look
And see the sceptre ready to be cast 10
Into the hands of that lascivious lady
That lives in lust with a smooth boy, now to be married

To you strange prince, who, but that people
please

To let him be a prince, is born a slave
In that which should be his most noble part, 15
His mind?

Thra. That man that would not stir with you
To aid Philaster, let the gods forget
That such a creature walks upon the earth!

Cle. Philaster is too backward in 't himself.
The gentry do await it, and the people, 20
Against their nature, are all bent for him,
And like a field of standing corn, that's moved
With a stiff gale, their heads bow all one way.

Dion. The only cause that draws Philaster back

From this attempt is the fair princess' love, 25
Which he admires, and we can now confute.

Thra. Perhaps he'll not believe it.

Dion. Why, gentlemen, 't is without question
so.

Cle. Ay, 't is past speech she lives dishonestly.

But how shall we, if he be curious,<sup>3</sup> work 30
Upon his faith?

Thra. We all are satisfied within ourselves.

Dion. Since it is true, and tends to his own
good,

I'll make this new report to be my knowledge;

I'll say I know it; nay, I'll swear I saw it. 35
Cle. It will be best.

Thra. 'T will move him.

Enter PHILASTER.

Dion. Here he comes.
Good morrow to your honour: we have spent
Some time in seeking you.

Phi. My worthy friends,
You that can keep your memories to know
Your friend in miseries, and cannot frown 40
On men disgrac'd for virtue, a good day
Attend you all! What service may I do Worthy your acceptation?

Dion. My good lord,
We come to urge that virtue, which we know Lives in your breast, forth. Rise, and make a head;<sup>4</sup> 45

The nobles and the people are all dull'd
With this usurping king; and not a man,
That ever heard the word, or knew such a
thing

As virtue, but will second your attempts.

Phi. How honourable is this love in you 50
To me that have deserv'd none! Know, my friends,

(You, that were born to shame your poor Philaster

With too much courtesy,) I could afford
To melt myself in thanks: but my designs

Are not yet ripe. Suffice it, that ere long 55
I shall employ your loves; but yet the time
Is short of what I would.

Dion. The time is fuller, sir, than you expect;
That which hereafter will not, perhaps, be reach'd
By violence, may now be caught. As for the King, 60

You know the people have long hated him;
But now the princess, whom they lov'd —
Phi. Why, what of her?

Dion. Is loath'd as much as he.
Phi. By what strange means?

Dion. She's known a whore.
Phi. Thou liest. 65

Dion. My lord —
Phi. Thou liest,

Offers to draw and is held.
And thou shalt feel<sup>a</sup> it! I had thought thy mind

Had been of honour. Thus to rob a lady
Of her good name is an infectious sin
Not to be pardon'd. Be it false as hell, 70
'T will never be redeem'd, if it be sown
Amongst the people, fruitful to increase
All evil they shall hear. Let me alone
That I may cut off falsehood whilst it springs!
Set hills on hills betwixt me and the man 75
That utters this, and I will scale them all,
And from the utmost top fall on his neck,
Like thunder from a cloud.

Dion. This is most strange:
Sure, he does love her.

Phi. I do love fair truth.
She is my mistress, and who injures her 80
Draws vengeance from me. Sirs, let go my arms.

Thra. Nay, good my lord, be patient.
Cle. Sir, remember this is your honour'd friend,

That comes to do his service, and will show you
Why he utter'd this.

Phi. I ask your pardon, sir; 85
My zeal to truth made me unmannerly:
Should I have heard dishonour spoke of you,
Behind your back, untruly, I had been
As much distemper'd and enrag'd as now.

Dion. But this, my lord, is truth.
Phi. Oh, say not so! 90

Good sir, forbear to say so: 'tis then truth,
That womankind is false; urge it no more;
It is impossible. Why should you think
The princess light?

Dion. Why, she was taken at it. 94
Phi. 'Tis false! by Heaven, 'tis false! It cannot be!

Can it? Speak, gentlemen; for God's love, speak!

Is 't possible? Can women all be damn'd?
Dion. Why, no, my lord.

Phi. Why, then, it cannot be.
Dion. And she was taken with her boy.

Phi. What boy? 99
Dion. A page, a boy that serves her.

Phi. Oh, good gods!
A little boy?

Dion. Ay; know you him my lord?
Phi. [Aside.] Hell and sin know him! — Sir,
you are deceiv'd;

I'll reason it a little coldly with you.
If she were lustful, would she take a boy,
That knows not yet desire? She would have one 105
Should meet her thoughts and know the sin he acts,

Which is the great delight of wickedness.
You are abus'd,<sup>1</sup> and so is she, and I.

Dion. How you, my lord?
Phi. Why, all the world's abus'd 109
In an unjust report.

Dion. Oh, noble sir, your virtues
Cannot look into the subtle thoughts of woman!

In short, my lord, I took them; I myself.
Phi. Now, all the devils, thou didst! Fly from my rage!

Would thou hadst ta'en devils engend'ring
plagues,
When thou did'st take them! Hide thee from mine eyes! 115

Would thou hadst taken thunder on thy breast,
When thou didst take them; or been stricken dumb
For ever; that this foul deed might have slept

In silence!
Thra. Have you known him so ill-temper'd?
Cle. Never before.

Phi. The winds that are let loose 120
From the four several corners of the earth,
And spread themselves all over sea and land,
Kiss not a chaste one. What friend bears a sword

To run me thorough?
Dion. Why, my lord, are you
So mov'd at this?

Phi. When any fall from virtue, 125
I am distract; I have an interest in 't.

Dion. But, good my lord, recall yourself, and think
What's best to be done.

Phi. I thank you; I will do it.
Please you to leave me; I'll consider of it.
To-morrow I will find your lodging forth, 130
And give you answer.

Dion. All the gods direct you
The readiest way!

Thra. He was extreme impatient.
Cle. It was his virtue and his noble mind.

Exit DION, CLEREMONT, and THRASILINE.

Phi. I had forgot to ask him where he took
them;

I'll follow him. Oh that I had a sea 135
Within my breast, to quench the fire I feel!
More circumstances will but fan this fire:

It more afflicts me now, to know by whom
This deed is done, than simply that 'tis done;
And he that tells me this is honourable, 140
As far from lies as she is far from truth.

Oh, that, like beasts, we could not grieve ourselves

<sup>1</sup> Deceived.

With that we see not! Bulls and rams will fight
To keep their females standing in their sight;
But take 'em from them, and you take at
once 145
Their spleens away; and they will fall again
Unto their pastures, growing fresh and fat,
And taste the waters of the springs as sweet
As 't was before, finding no start in sleep; 149
But miserable man —

Enter BELLARIO.

See, see, you gods,
He walks still; and the face you let him wear
When he was innocent is still the same,
Not blasted! Is this justice? Do you mean
To intrap mortality, that you allow Treason so smooth a brow? I cannot now 155
Think he is guilty.

Bel. Health to you, my lord!
The princess doth commend her love, her life,
And this, unto you. Gives a letter.

Phi. Oh, Bellario,
Now I perceive she loves me: she does show it
In loving thee, my boy, she has made thee brave. 160

Bel. My lord, she has attir'd me past my wish,
Past my desert; more fit for her attendant,
Though far unfit for me who do attend.

Phi. Thou art grown courtly, boy. — Oh, let all women, 164

That love black deeds, learn to dissemble here,
Here, by this paper! She does write to me
As if her heart were mines of adamant
To all the world besides; but, unto me,
A maiden-snow that melted with my looks. —
Tell me, my boy, how doth the princess use
thee? 170

For I shall guess her love to me by that.

Bel. Scarce like her servant, but as if I were,

Something allied to her, or had preserv'd
Her life three times by my fidelity;
As mothers fond do use their only sons, 175
As I'd use one that's left unto my trust,
For whom my life should pay if he met harm,
So she does use me.

Phi. Why, this is wondrous well:
But what kind language does she feed thee
with?

Bel. Why, she does tell me she will trust my youth 180

With all her loving secrets, and does call me
Her pretty servant; bids me weep no more
For leaving you; she'll see my services
Regarded: and such words of that soft strain
That I am nearer weeping when she ends 185
Than ere she spake.

Phi. This is much better still.

Bel. Are you not ill, my lord?

Phi. Ill? No, Bellario.

Bel. Methinks your words

Fall not from off your tongue so evenly,
Nor is there in your looks that quietness 190
That I was wont to see.

Phi. Thou art deceiv'd, boy:
And she strokes thy head?

Bel. Yes.
Phi. And she does clap thy cheeks?
Bel. She does, my lord.
Phi. And she does kiss thee, boy? ha!
Bel. How, my lord? 194
Phi. She kisses thee?
Bel. Never, my lord, by heaven.
Phi. That's strange, I know she does.
Bel. No, by my life.
Phi. Why then she does not love me. Come,
she does.

I bade her do it; I charg'd her, by all charms
Of love between us, by the hope of peace
We should enjoy, to yield thee all delights 200
Naked as to her bed; I took her oath
Thou shouldst enjoy her. Tell me, gentle boy,
Is she not parallelless? Is not her breath
Sweet as Arabian winds when fruits are ripe?
Are not her breasts two liquid ivory balls? 205
Is she not all a lasting mine of joy?

Bel. Ay, now I see why my disturbed
thoughts

Were so perplex'd. When first I went to her,
My heart held augury. You are abus'd;
Some villain has abus'd you; I do see 210
Whereto you tend. Fall rocks upon his head
That put this to you! 'Tis some subtle train
To bring that noble frame of yours to nought.

Phi. Thou think'st I will be angry with thee. Come, 214

Thou shalt know all my drift. I hate her more
Than I love happiness, and plac'd thee there
To pry with narrow eyes into her deeds.
Hast thou discovered? Is she fallen to lust,
As I would wish her? Speak some comfort to
me.

Bel. My lord, you did mistake the boy you
sent. 220

Had she the lust of sparrows or of goats,
Had she a sin that way, hid from the world,
Beyond the name of lust, I would not aid
Her base desires; but what I came to know
As servant to her, I would not reveal, 225
To make my life last ages.

Phi. Oh, my heart!
This is a salve worse than the main disease. —
Tell me thy thoughts; for I will know the least

That dwells within thee, or will rip thy heart
To know it. I will see thy thoughts as plain 230
As I do now thy face.

Bel. Why, so you do.
She is (for aught I know) by all the gods,
As chaste as ice! But were she foul as hell,
And I did know it thus, the breath of kings,
The points of swords, tortures, nor bulls of brass, 235

Should draw it from me.

Phi. Then it is no time
To dally with thee; I will take thy life,
For I do hate thee. I could curse thee now,

Bel. If you do hate, you could not curse me
worse;

The gods have not a punishment in store 240
Greater for me than is your hate.

Phi. Fie, fie,
So young and so dissembling! Tell me when

And where thou didst enjoy her, or let plagues
Fall on me, if I destroy thee not!

Bel. By heaven, I never did; and when I lie <sup>245</sup>

To save my life, may I live long and loath'd!
Hew me asunder, and, whilst I can think,
I'll love those pieces you have cut away Better than those that grow, and kiss those limbs <sup>249</sup>

Because you made 'em so.
Phi. Fear'st thou not death?
Can boys contemn that?

Bel. Oh, what boy is he
Can be content to live to be a man,
That sees the best of men thus passionate,
Thus without reason?

Phi. Oh, but thou dost not know
What 't is to die.

Bel. Yes, I do know, my lord: <sup>255</sup>
'T is less than to be born; a lasting sleep;
A quiet resting from all jealousy,
A thing we all pursue. I know, besides,
It is but giving over a game <sup>259</sup>
That must be lost.

Phi. But there are pains, false boy,
For perjurd souls. Think but on those, and
then

Thy heart will melt, and thou wilt utter all.
Bel. May they fall all upon me whilst I live,
If I be perjurd, or have ever thought
Of that you charge me with! If I be false, <sup>265</sup>
Send me to suffer in those punishments
You speak of; kill me!

Phi. Oh, what should I do?
Why, who can but believe him? He does
swear
So earnestly, that if it were not true,
The gods would not endure him. Rise, Bel-lario: <sup>270</sup>

Thy protestations are so deep, and thou
Dost look so truly when thou utter'st them,
That, though I know 'em false as were my hopes,

I cannot urge thee further. But thou wert
To blame to injure me, for I must love <sup>275</sup>
Thy honest looks, and take no revenge upon
Thy tender youth. A love from me to thee
Is firm, whate'er thou dost; it troubles me
That I have call'd the blood out of thy cheeks,
That did so well become thee. But, good boy, Let me not see thee more: something is done <sup>281</sup>

That will distract me, that will make me mad,
If I behold thee. If thou tender'st me,
Let me not see thee.

Bel. I will fly as far
As there is morning, ere I give distaste <sup>285</sup>
To that most honour'd mind. But through these tears,

Shed at my hopeless parting, I can see
A world of treason practis'd upon you,
And her, and me. Farewell for evermore! <sup>289</sup>
If you shall hear that sorrow struck me dead,
And after find me loyal, let there be
A tear shed from you in my memory,
And I shall rest in peace.

Exit.

Phi. Blessing be with thee,
Whatever thou deserv'st! Oh, where shall I Go bathe this body? Nature too unkind; <sup>295</sup>
That made no medicine for a troubled mind!
Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter ARETHUSA.

Are. I marvel my boy comes not back again:
But that I know my love will question him
Over and over, — how I slept, wak'd, talk'd,
How I rememb' red him when his dear name
Was last spoke, and how when I sigh'd, wept, sung, <sup>5</sup>
And ten thousand such, — I should be angry at his stay.

Enter KING.

King. What, at your meditations! Who attends you?

Are. None but my single self. I need no guard;

I do no wrong, nor fear none.

King. Tell me, have you not a boy?
Are. Yes, sir. <sup>10</sup>

King. What kind of boy?

Are. A page, a waiting-boy.

King. A handsome boy?

Are. I think he be not ugly:

Well qualified and dutiful I know him;

I took him not for beauty.

King. He speaks and sings and plays?

Are. Yes, sir. <sup>15</sup>

King. About eighteen?

Are. I never ask'd his age.

King. Is he full of service?

Are. By your pardon, why do you ask?

King. Put him away.

Are. Sir!

King. Put him away, I say.

H'as done you that good service shames me to speak of. <sup>20</sup>

Are. Good sir, let me understand you.

King. If you fear me,

Show it in duty; put away that boy.

Are. Let me have reason for it, sir, and then

Your will is my command.

King. Do not you blush to ask it? Cast him off, <sup>25</sup>

Or I shall do the same to you. You're one

Shame with me, and so near unto myself,

That, by my life, I dare not tell myself

What you, myself, have done.

Are. What have I done, my lord? <sup>30</sup>

King. 'T is a new language, that all love to learn:

The common people speak it well already;

They need no grammar. Understand me well;

There be foul whispers stirring. Cast him off,

And suddenly. Do it! Farewell. Exit. <sup>35</sup>

Are. Where may a maiden live securely free,

Keeping her honour fair? Not with the living.

They feed upon opinions, errors, dreams,

And make 'em truths; they draw a nourish-
ment

<sup>1</sup> Arethus's apartment in the palace.

Out of defamings, grow upon disgraces, 40
 And, when they see a virtue fortified
 Strongly above the batt'ry of their tongues,
 Oh, how they cast<sup>1</sup> to sink it! and, defeated,
 (Soul-sick with poison) strike the monuments 45
 Where noble names lie sleeping, till they sweat,
 And the cold marble melt.

Enter PHILASTER.

Phi. Peace to your fairest thoughts, dearest
 mistress!

Are. Oh, my dearest servant,<sup>2</sup> I have a war within me!

Phi. He must be more than man that makes these crystals

Run into rivers. Sweetest fair, the cause? 50
 And, as I am your slave, tied to your goodness,
 Your creature, made again from what I was
 And newly-spirited, I'll right your honour.

Are. Oh, my best love, that boy?

Phi. What boy?

Are. The pretty boy you gave me—

Phi. What of him? 55

Are. Must be no more mine.

Phi. Why?

Are. They are jealous of him.

Phi. Jealous! Who?

Are. The King.

Phi. [Aside.] Oh, my misfortune!

Then 't is no idle jealousy. — Let him go.

Are. Oh, cruel!

Are you hard-hearted too? Who shall now tell
 you 60

How much I lov'd you? Who shall swear it to
 you,

And weep the tears I send? Who shall now bring you

Letters, rigns, bracelets? Lose his health in service?

Wake tedious nights in stories of your praise?

Who shall now sing your crying elegies, 65

And strike a sad soul into senseless pictures,

And make them mourn? Who shall take up his lute,

And touch it till he crown a silent sleep

Upon my eye-lids, making me dream, and cry,

"Oh, my dear, dear Philaster!"

Phi. [Aside.] Oh, my heart! 70

Would he had broken thee, that made me know

This lady was not loyal! — Mistress,

Forget the boy; I'll get thee a far better.

Are. Oh, never, never such a boy again

As my Bellario!

Phi. 'T is but your fond affection. 75

Are. With thee, my boy, farewell for ever

All secrecy in servants! Farewell, faith,

And all desire to do well for itself!

Let all that shall succeed thee for thy wrongs
 Sell and betray chaste love! 80

Phi. And all this passion for a boy?

Are. He was your boy, and you put him to me,
 And the loss of such must have a mourning
 for.

Phi. Oh, thou forgetful woman!

Are. How, my lord?

<sup>1</sup> Plan.

<sup>2</sup> Lover.

Phi. False Arethusa! 85

Hast thou a medicine to restore my wits,
 When I have lost 'em? If not, leave to talk,
 And do thus.

Are.

Do what, sir? Would you sleep?

Phi. For ever, Arethusa. Oh, you gods

Give me a worthy patience! Have I stood, 90

Naked, alone, the shock of many fortunes?

Have I seen mischiefs numberless and mighty

Grow like a sea upon me? Have I taken

Danger as stern as death into my bosom,

And laught upon it, made it but a mirth, 95

And flung it by? Do I live now like him,

Under this tyrant King, that languishing

Hears his sad bell and sees his mourners? Do I

Bear all this bravely, and must sink at length

Under a woman's falsehood? Oh, that boy, 100

That cursed boy! None but a villain boy

To ease your lust?

Are.

Nay, then, I am betrayed:

I feel the plot cast for my overthrow.

Oh, I am wretched!

Phi. Now you may take that little right I

have 105

To this poor kingdom. Give it to your joy;

For I have no joy in it. Some far place,

Where never womankind durst set her foot

For<sup>3</sup> bursting with her poisons, must I seek,

And live to curse you; 110

There dig a cave, and preach to birds and beasts

What woman is, and help to save them from

you;

How heaven is in your eyes, but in your hearts

More hell than hell has; how your tongues, like scorpions,

Both heal and poison;<sup>4</sup> how your thoughts are woven 115

With thousand changes in one subtle web,

And worn so by you; how that foolish man,

That reads the story of a woman's face

And dies believing it, is lost for ever;

How all the good you have is but a shadow, 120

I' the morning with you, and at night behind

you.

Past and forgotten; how your vows are frosts,

Fast for a night, and with the next sun gone;

How you are, being taken all together,

A mere confusion, and so dead a chaos, 125

That love cannot distinguish. These sad texts,

Till my last hour, I am bound to utter of you.

So, farewell all my woe, all my delight! Exit.

Are. Be merciful, ye gods, and strike me

dead!

What way have I deserv'd this? Make my

breast 130

Transparent as pure crystal, that the world,

Jealous of me, may see the foulest thought

My heart holds. Where shall a woman turn her

eyes,

To find out constancy?

Enter BELLARIO.

Save me, how black

And guiltily, methinks, that boy looks now! 135

<sup>4</sup> It was believed that scorpions, applied to the wound they made, cured it.

Oh, thou dissembler, that, before thou spak'st,
Wert in thy cradle false, sent to make lies
And betray innocents! Thy lord and thou
May glory in the ashes of a maid
Fool'd by her passion; but the conquest is 140
Nothing so great as wicked. Fly away!
Let my command force thee to that which
shame

Would do without it. If thou understood'st
The loathed office thou hast undergone,
Why, thou wouldst hide thee under heaps of hills, 145
Lest men should dig and find thee.

Bel. Oh, what god,
Angry with men, hath sent this strange disease

Into the noblest minds! Madam, this grief
You add unto me is no more than drops 149
To seas, for which they are not seen to swell.
My lord hath struck his anger through my
heart,

And let out all the hope of future joys.
You need not bid me fly; I came to part,
To take my latest leave. Farewell for ever!
I durst not run away in honesty 155
From such a lady, like a boy that stole Or made some grievous fault. The power of gods

Assist you in your sufferings! Hasty time
Reveal the truth to your abused lord
And mine, that he may know your worth;
whilst I 160

Go seek out some forgotten place to die! Exit.
Are. Peace guide thee! Thou hast overthrown me once;

Yet, if I had another Troy to lose,
Thou, or another villain with thy looks, 164
Might talk me out of it, and send me naked,
My hair dishevell'd, through the fiery streets.

Enter a Lady.

Lady. Madam, the King would hunt, and calls for you
With earnestness.

Are. I am in tune to hunt!
Diana, if thou canst rage with a maid
As with a man,<sup>1</sup> let me discover thee 170
Bathing, and turn me to a fearful hind,
That I may die pursued by cruel hounds,
And have my story written in my wounds!

Exeunt.

ACT IV

SCENE I.<sup>2</sup>

Enter KING, PHARAMOND, ARETHUSA, GALATEA, MEGRA, DION, CLEREMONT, THRASILINE, and Attendants.

King. What, are the hounds before and all the woodmen?

Our horses ready and our bows bent?

Dion. All, sir.

King. [to PHARAMOND.] You are cloudy, sir.
Come, we have forgotten

<sup>2</sup> Before the palace.

Your venial trespass; let not that sit heavy
Upon your spirit; here's none dare utter it. 5
Dion. He looks like an old surfeited stallion, dull as a dormouse. See how he sinks! The wench has shot him between wind and water, and, I hope, sprung a leak.

Thra. He needs no teaching, he strikes [10 sure enough. His greatest fault is, he hunts too much in the purlieus; would he would leave off poaching!

Dion. And for his horn, h'as left it at the lodge where he lay late. Oh, he's a precious [15 limehound!<sup>3</sup> Turn him loose upon the pursuit of a lady, and if he lose her, hang him up i' the slip. When my fox-bitch Beauty grows proud,
I'll borrow him.

King. Is your boy turn'd away? 20
Are. You did command, sir, and I obey'd
you.

King. 'Tis well done. Hark ye further.
[They talk apart.]

Cle. Is't possible this fellow should repent?
Methinks, that were not noble in him; and [25 yet he looks like a mortified member, as if he had a sick man's salve<sup>4</sup> in's mouth. If a worse man had done this fault now, some physical<sup>5</sup> justice or other would presently (without the help of an almanack<sup>6</sup>) have opened the ob- [30 structions of his liver, and let him blood with a dog-whip.

Dion. See, see how modestly yon lady looks, as if she came from churching with her neighbours! Why, what a devil can a man see in [35 her face but that she's honest!<sup>7</sup>

Thra. Faith, no great matter to speak of; a foolish twinkling with the eye, that spoils her coat;<sup>8</sup> but he must be a cunning herald that finds it. 40

Dion. See how they muster one another! Oh, there's a rank regiment where the devil carries the colours and his dam drum-major! Now the world and the flesh come behind with the carriage. 45

Cle. Sure this lady has a good turn done her against her will; before she was common talk, now none dare say cantharides<sup>10</sup> can stir her.
Her face looks like a warrant, willing and commanding all tongues, as they will answer it, [50 to be tied up and bolted when this lady means to let herself loose. As I live, she has got her a goodly protection and a gracious; and may use her body discreetly for her health's sake, once a week, excepting Lent and dog-days. Oh, [55 if they were to be got for money, what a great sum would come out of the city for these licences!

King. To horse, to horse! we lose the morning,
gentlemen. Exeunt. 60

<sup>4</sup> An allusion to a religious work, Thomas Bacon's
The Sicke Man's Salve, 1561.

<sup>8</sup> Coat of arms. Mason explains that the reference is to the introduction of stars into a coat of arms, denot-ing a younger branch.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>*Enter two Woodmen.*1 Wood. What, have you lodged the deer?2 Wood. Yes, they are ready for the bow.1 Wood. Who shoots?2 Wood. The princess.1 Wood. No, she 'll hunt.2 Wood. She 'll take a stand, I say.1 Wood. Who else?2 Wood. Why, the young stranger-prince.

1 Wood. He shall shoot in a stone-bow<sup>2</sup> for me. I never lov'd his beyond-sea-ship since [10] he forsook the say,<sup>3</sup> for paying ten shillings. He was there at the fall of a deer, and would needs (out of his mightiness) give ten groats for the dovesets; marry, his steward would have the velvet-head<sup>4</sup> into the bargain, to [15] turf<sup>5</sup> his hat withal. I think he should love ventry; he is an old Sir Tristrem; for, if you be rememb'red, he forsook the stag once to strike a rascal<sup>6</sup> miching<sup>7</sup> in a meadow, and her he kill'd in the eye. Who shoots else? 20

2 Wood. The Lady Galatea.

1 Wood. That's a good wench, an she would not chide us for tumbling of her women in the brakes. She's liberal, and by the Gods, they say she's honest, and whether that be a [25] fault, I have nothing to do. There's all?

2 Wood. No, one more; Megra.

1 Wood. That's a firker,<sup>8</sup> i' faith, boy. There's a wench will ride her haunches as hard after a kennel of hounds as a hunting [30] saddle, and when she comes home, get 'em clapt, and all is well again. I have known her lose herself three times in one afternoon (if the woods have been answerable),<sup>9</sup> and it has been work enough for one man to find her, and [35] he has sweat for it. She rides well and she pays well. Hark! let's go. Exeunt.

Enter PHILASTER.Phi. Oh, that I had been nourish'd in these woods

With milk of goats and acorns, and not known
The right of crowns nor the dissembling trains
Of women's looks; but digg'd myself a cave 41
Where I, my fire, my cattle, and my bed,
Might have been shut together in one shed;

And then had taken me some mountain-girl,
Beaten with winds, chaste as the hard'ned rocks 45
Whereon she dwelt, that might have strewed

my bed
With leaves and reeds, and with the skins of beasts,
Our neighbours, and have borne at her big breasts

<sup>1</sup> A forest.<sup>2</sup> With a cross-bow for shooting stones.<sup>3</sup> The assay or slitting of the deer, in order to test the quality of the flesh, which involved a fee to the keeper.<sup>4</sup> The hart's horns, which are covered with velvet pile when new.<sup>5</sup> Re-cover.<sup>7</sup> Creeping stealthily.<sup>8</sup> Suitable.<sup>6</sup> A lean doe.<sup>9</sup> A fast one.

My large coarse issue! This had been a life
Free from vexation.

Enter BELLARIO.Bel. Oh, wicked men! 50

An innocent may walk safe among beasts;
Nothing assaults me here. See, my griev'd lord
Sits as his soul were searching out a way
To leave his body! — Pardon me, that must Break thy last commandment; for I must speak. 55

You that are griev'd can pity; hear, my lord!

Phi. Is there a creature yet so miserable,
That I can pity?

Bel. Oh, my noble lord,
View my strange fortune, and bestow on me,
According to your bounty (if my service 60
Can merit nothing), so much as may serve
To keep that little piece I hold of life
From cold and hunger!

Phi. Is it thou? Be gone!
Go, sell those misbeseeming clothes thou wear'st,
And feed thyself with them. 65

Bel. Alas, my lord, I can get nothing for them!The silly country-people think 't is treason
To touch such gay things.Phi. Now, by the gods, this is Unkindly done, to vex me with thy sight.

Thou 'rt fallen again to thy dissembling trade;
How shouldst thou think to cozen me again? 71
Remains there yet a plague untried for me?
Even so thou wept'st, and lookt'st, and spok'st when first

I took thee up.

Curse on the time! If thy commanding tears 75
Can work on any other, use thy art;

I 'll not betray it. Which way wilt thou take,
That I may shun thee, for thine eyes are poison
To mine, and I am loth to grow in rage? 80
This way, or that way?

Bel. Any will serve; but I will choose to haveThat path in chase that leads unto my grave.
Exeunt severally.Enter [on one side] DION, and [on the other] the two Woodmen.Dion. This is the strangest sudden chance!
— You, woodmen!1 Wood. My lord Dion?Dion. Saw you a lady come this way on a sable horse studded with stars of white? 852 Wood. Was she not young and tall?Dion. Yes. Rode she to the wood or to the plain?2 Wood. Faith, my lord, we saw none.Exeunt Woodmen.Dion. Pox of your questions then!Enter CLEREMONT.

What, is she found?

Cle. Nor will be, I think. 90

Dion. Let him seek his daughter himself.
She cannot stray about a little necessary natural business, but the whole court must be in arms.
When she has done, we shall have peace.

Cle. There's already a thousand father-<sup>95</sup> less tales amongst us. Some say, her horse ran away with her; some, a wolf pursued her;
others, 't was a plot to kill her, and that arm'd men were seen in the wood: but questionless she rode away willingly. <sup>100</sup>

Enter KING and THRASILINE.

King. Where is she?

Cle. Sir, I cannot tell.

King. How's that?

Answer me so again!

Cle. Sir, shall I lie?

King. Yes, lie and damn, rather than tell me
that.

I say again, where is she? Mutter not!—

Sir, speak you; where is she?

Dion. Sir, I do not know. <sup>105</sup>

King. Speak that again so boldly, and, by Heaven,

It is thy last!—You, fellows, answer me;

Where is she? Mark me, all; I am your
king:

I wish to see my daughter; show her me;

I do command you all, as you are subjects, <sup>110</sup>

To show her me! What! am I not your king?

If ay, then am I not to be obeyed?

Dion. Yes, if you command things possible and honest.

King. Things possible and honest! Hear me,
thou,—

Thou traitor, that dar'st confine thy King to things <sup>115</sup>

Possible and honest! Show her me,

Or, let me perish, if I cover not

All Sicily with blood!

Dion. Faith, I cannot,

Unless you tell me where she is.

King. You have betray'd me; you have let me lose <sup>120</sup>

The jewel of my life. Go, bring her to me,

And set her here before me. 'T is the king

Will have it so; whose breath can still the winds,

Uncloud the sun, charm down the swelling sea,
And stop the floods of heaven. Speak, can it
not? <sup>125</sup>

Dion. No. [this?]

King. No! I cannot the breath of kings do

Dion. No; nor smell sweet itself, if once the lungs

Be but corrupted.

King. Is it so? Take heed!

Dion. Sir, take you heed how you dare the powers

That must be just.

King. Alas! what are we kings! <sup>130</sup>

Why do you gods place us above the rest,

To be serv'd, flatter'd, and ador'd, till we Believe we hold within our hands your thunder?

And when we come to try the power we have,

There's not a leaf shakes at our threat'nings.

I have sinn'd, 't is true, and here stand to be punish'd; <sup>135</sup>

Yet would not thus be punish'd. Let me choose
My way, and lay it on!

Dion. [Aside.] He articles with the gods.

Would somebody would draw bonds for the performance of covenants betwixt them! <sup>141</sup>

Enter PHARAMOND, GALATEA, and MEGRA.

King. What, is she found?

Pha. No; we have ta'en her horse;
He gallop'd empty by. There is some treason.

You, Galatea, rode with her into the wood;

Why left you her?

Gal. She did command me. <sup>145</sup>

King. Command! you should not.

Gal. 'T would ill become my fortunes and my birth

To disobey the daughter of my king.

King. You're all cunning to obey us for our hurt;

But I will have her.

Pha. If I have her not, <sup>150</sup>

By this hand, there shall be no more Sicily.

Dion. [Aside.] What, will he carry it to Spain
in's pocket?

Pha. I will not leave one man alive, but the
king,

A cook, and a tailor. <sup>154</sup>

Dion. [Aside.] Yes; you may do well to spare your lady-bedfellow; and her you may keep for a spawner.

King. [Aside.] I see the injuries I have done must be reveng'd.

Dion. Sir, this is not the way to find her out.

King. Run all, disperse yourselves. The man that finds her, <sup>160</sup>

Or (if she be kill'd) the traitor, I'll make him great.

Dion. I know some would give five thousand pounds to find her.

Pha. Come, let us seek.

King. Each man a several way; here I myself.

Dion. Come, gentlemen, we here. <sup>165</sup>

Cle. Lady, you must go search too.

Meg. I had rather be search'd myself.

Exeunt [severally].

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter ARETHUSA.

Are. Where am I now? Feet, find me out a
way,

Without the counsel of my troubled head.

I'll follow you boldly about these woods,
O'er mountains, thorough brambles, pits, and floods.

Heaven, I hope, will ease me: I am sick.

Sits down.

Enter BELLARIO.

Bel. [Aside.] Yonder's my lady. God knows
I want nothing.

Because I do not wish to live; yet I

Will try her charity. — Oh hear, you have plenty!

From that flowing store drop some on dry ground. — See,

The lively red is gone to guard her heart! <sup>10</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Another part of the forest.

I fear she faints. — Madam, look up! — She breathes not.—

Open once more those rosy twins, and send Unto my lord your latest farewell! — Oh, she stirs.—

How is it, Madam? Speak comfort.

Are. 'Tis not gently done,
To put me in a miserable life, 16
And hold me there. I prithee, let me go;
I shall do best without thee; I am well.

Enter PHILASTER.

Phi. I am to blame to be so much in rage.
I'll tell her coolly when and where I heard
This killing truth. I will be temperate 20
In speaking, and as just in hearing. —
Oh, monstrous! Tempt me not, you gods! good gods,

Tempt not a frail man! What's he, that has a heart,
But he must ease it here!

Bel. My lord, help, help! The princess! 26
Are. I am well; forbear.

Phi. [Aside.] Let me love lightning, let me be embrac'd

And kist by scorpions, or adore the eyes
Of basilisks, rather than trust the tongues
Of hell-bred women! Some good god look down, 30

And shrink these veins up! Stick me here a stone,

Lasting to ages in the memory
Of this damn'd act! — Hear me, you wicked ones!

You have put hills of fire into this breast,
Not to be quench'd with tears; for which may guilt 35

Sit on your bosoms! At your meals and beds Despair await you! What, before my face?
Poison of asp's between your lips! Diseases
Be your best issues! Nature make a curse,
And throw it on you!

Are. Dear Philaster, leave 40
To be enrag'd, and hear me.

Phi. I have done;
Forgive my passion. Not the calmed sea,
When Aeolus locks up his windy brood,
Is less disturb'd than I. I'll make you know 't.

Dear Arethusa, do but take this sword, 45
Offers his drawn sword.

And search how temperate a heart I have;
Then you and this your boy may live and reign
In lust without control. — Wilt thou, Bellario?
I prithee kill me; thou art poor, and may'st 49

Nourish ambitious thoughts; when I am dead,
Thy way were freer. Am I raging now?
If I were mad, I should desire to live.

Sirs,<sup>1</sup> feel my pulse, whether you have known
A man in a more equal tune to die.

Bel. Alas, my lord, your pulse keeps madman's time! 53

So does your tongue.

Phi. You will not kill me, then?

Are. Kill you!

Bel. Not for the world.

Phi. I blame not thee,
Bellario; thou hast done but that which gods
Would have transform'd themselves to do. Be
gone,

Leave me without reply; this is the last 60
Of all our meetings — (Exit BELLARIO.) Kill me with this sword;

Be wise, or worse will follow: we are two Earth cannot bear at once. Resolve to do,
Or suffer. 65

Are. If my fortune be so good to let me fall
Upon thy hand, I shall have peace in death.
Yet tell me this, will there be no slanders,
No jealousy in the other world; no ill there?

Phi. No.

Are. Show me, then, the way. 70

Phi. Then guide my feeble hand,
You that have power to do it, for I must Perform a piece of justice! — If your youth
Have any way offended Heaven, let prayers
Short and effectual reconcile you to it. 75

Are. I am prepared.

Enter a Country Fellow.

C. Fell. I'll see the King, if he be in the forest; I have hunted him these two hours. If I should come home and not see him, my sisters would laugh at me. I can see nothing 80 but people better hors'd than myself, that out-ride me; I can hear nothing but shouting.
These kings had need of good brains; this whooping is able to put a mean man out of his wits. There's a courtier with his sword 85 drawn; by this hand, upon a woman, I think!

Phi. Are you at peace?

Are. With heaven and earth.

Phi. May they divide thy soul and body!

Wounds her.

C. Fell. Hold, dastard! strike a woman!
Thou'rt a craven. I warrant thee, thou 90 wouldest be loth to play half a dozen venies<sup>2</sup> at wasters<sup>3</sup> with a good fellow for a broken head.

Phi. Leave us, good friend,

Are. What ill-bred man art thou, to intrude thyself

Upon our private sports, our recreation? 95

C. Fell. God 'uds<sup>4</sup> me, I understand you not;
but

I know the rogue has hurt you.

Phi. Pursue thy own affairs: it will be ill
To multiply blood upon my head; which thou
Wilt force me to. 100

C. Fell. I know not your rhetoric; but I can lay it on, if you touch the woman.

Phi. Slave, take what thou deservest!

They fight.

Are. Heavens guard my lord!

C. Fell. Oh, do you breathe? 104

Phi. I hear the tread of people. I am hurt.
The gods take part against me: could this boor

Have held me thus else? I must shift for life,
Though I do loathe it. I would find a course

To lose it rather by my will than force.

C. Fell. I cannot follow the rogue. I pray thee, wench, come and kiss me now. <sup>111</sup>

Enter PHARAMOND, DION, CLEREMONT, THRASILINE, and Woodmen.

Pha. What art thou?

C. Fell. Almost kill'd I am for a foolish woman; a knave has hurt her. <sup>114</sup>

Pha. The princess, gentlemen! — Where 's the wound, madam! Is it dangerous?

Are. He has not hurt me.

C. Fell. By God, she lies; h'as hurt her in the breast;

Look else.

Pha. O sacred spring of innocent blood!

Dion. 'Tis above wonder! Who should dare this? <sup>120</sup>

Are. I felt it not.

Pha. Speak, villain, who has hurt the princess?

C. Fell. Is it the princess?

Dion. Ay.

C. Fell. Then I have seen something yet. <sup>125</sup>

Pha. But who has hurt her?

C. Fell. I told you, a rogue; I ne'er saw him before, I.

Pha. Madam, who did it?

Are. Some dishonest wretch; Alas, I know him not, and do forgive him!

C. Fell. He 's hurt too; he cannot go far; [130] I made my father's old fox<sup>1</sup> fly about his ears.

Pha. How will you have me kill him?

Are. Not at all; 'tis some distracted fellow.

Pha. By this hand, I'll leave ne'er a piece of him bigger than a nut, and bring him [135] all to you in my hat.

Are. Nay, good sir,

If you do take him, bring him quick<sup>2</sup> to me,

And I will study for a punishment

Great as his fault. <sup>140</sup>

Pha. I will.

Are. But swear.

Cha. By all my love, I will. —

Woodmen, conduct the princess to the King,

And bear that wounded fellow to dressing. —

Come, gentlemen, we'll follow the chase close.

Exeunt [on one side] PHARAMOND, DION, CLEREMONT, and THRASILINE; [exit on the other] ARETHUSA [attended by] 1 Woodman.

C. Fell. I pray you, friend, let me see [145] the King.

2 Wood. That you shall, and receive thanks.

C. Fell. If I get clear with this, I'll go see no more gay sights. Exeunt. <sup>150</sup>

[SCENE IV.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter BELLARIO.

Bel. A heaviness near death sits on my brow, And I must sleep. Bear me, thou gentle bank,

<sup>3</sup> Another part of the forest.

For ever, if thou wilt. You sweet ones all,

Let me unworthy press you; I could wish [Lies down.]

I rather were a coarse strew'd o'er with you <sup>5</sup>

Than quick above you. Dulness<sup>4</sup> shuts mine eyes,

And I am giddy: oh, that I could take

So sound a sleep that I might never wake!

[Sleeps.]

Enter PHILASTER.

Phi. I have done ill; my conscience calls me false

To strike at her that would not strike at me. <sup>10</sup> When I did fight, methought I heard her pray

The gods to guard me. She may be abus'd,

And I a loathed villain; if she be,

She will conceal who hurt her. He has wounds

And cannot follow; neither knows he me. <sup>15</sup>

Who's this? Bellario sleeping! If thou be'st

Guilty, there is no justice that thy sleep

Should be so sound, and mine, whom thou hast wrong'd,

So broken. (Cry within.) Hark! I am pursued.

You gods

I'll take this offer'd means of my escape. <sup>20</sup>

They have no mark to know me but my blood,

If she be true; if false, let mischief light

On all the world at once! Sword, print my

wounds

Upon this sleeping boy! I ha' none, I think,

Are mortal, nor would I lay greater on thee. <sup>25</sup>

Wounds BELLARIO.

Bel. Oh, death, I hope, is come! Blest be that hand!

It meant me well. Again, for pity's sake!

Phi. I have caught myself; Falls.

The loss of blood hath stay'd my flight. Here,

here, <sup>29</sup>

Is he that struck thee: take thy full revenge;

Use me, as I did mean thee, worse than death;

I'll teach thee to revenge. This luckless hand

Wounded the princess; tell my followers<sup>5</sup>

Thou didst receive these hurts in staying me,

And I will second thee; get a reward. <sup>35</sup>

Bel. Fly, fly, my lord, and save yourself!

Phi. How's this?

Wouldst thou I should be safe?

Bel. Else were it vain

For me to live. These little wounds I have

Ha' not bled much. Reach me that noble

hand;

I'll help to cover you.

Phi. Art thou then true to me? <sup>40</sup>

Bel. Or let me perish loath'd! Come, my good lord,

Creep in amongst those bushes; who does

know

But that the gods may save your much-lov'd breath?

Phi. Then I shall die for grief, if not for

this,

That I have wounded thee. What wilt thou do? <sup>45</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Pursuers.

Bel. Shift for myself well. Peace! I hear 'em come. [PHILASTER creeps into a bush.] [Voices] within. Follow, follow, follow! that way they went.

Bel. With my own wounds I'll bloody my own sword.

I need not counterfeit to fall; Heaven knows That I can stand no longer. Falls. 60

Enter PHARAMOND, DION, CLEREMONT, and THRASILINE.

Pha. To this place we have trackt him by his blood.

Cle. Yonder, my lord, creeps one away.

Dion. Stay, sir! what are you?

Bel. A wretched creature, wounded in these woods 64

By beasts. Relieve me, if your names be men, Or I shall perish.

Dion. This is he, my lord, Upon my soul, that hurt her. 'Tis the boy. That wicked boy, that serv'd her.

Pha. Oh, thou damn'd In thy creation! What cause couldst thou shape To hurt the princess? 60

Bel. Then I am betrayed. 60
Dion. Betrayed! No, apprehended.

Bel. I confess, (Urge it no more) that, big with evil thoughts I set upon her, and did make my aim, Her death. For charity let fall at once The punishment you mean, and do not load 65 This weary flesh with tortures.

Pha. I will know Who hir'd thee to this deed.

Bel. Mine own revenge.
Pha. Revenge! for what?

Bel. It pleas'd her to receive Me as her page and, when my fortunes ebb'd, That men strid o'er them careless, she did shower 70

Her welcome graces on me, and did swell My fortunes till they overflow'd their banks, Threat'ning the men that crost 'em; when, as swift

As storms arise at sea, she turn'd her eyes To burning suns upon me, and did dry 75 The streams she had bestow'd, leaving me worse

And more condemn'd than other little brooks, Because I had been great. In short, I knew I could not live, and therefore did desire To die reveng'd.

Pha. If tortures can be found 80 Long as thy natural life, resolve to feel The utmost rigour.

PHILASTER creeps out of the bush.
Cle. Help to lead him hence.

Phi. Turn back, you ravishers of innocence! Know ye the price of that you bear away So rudely?

Pha. Who's that?

Dion. 'Tis the Lord Philaster. 85

Phi. 'Tis not the treasure of all kings in one, The wealth of Tagus, nor the rocks of pearl That pave the court of Neptune, can weigh down

That virtue. It was I that hurt the princess. Place me, some god, upon a pyramis<sup>1</sup> 90 Higher than hills of earth, and lend a voice Loud as your thunder to me, that from hence I may discourse to all the under-world The worth that dwells in him!

Pha. How's this?

Bel. My lord, some man

Weary of life, that would be glad to die. 95

Phi. Leave these untimely courtesies, Bellario.

Bel. Alas, he's mad! Come, will you lead me on?

Phi. By all the oaths that men ought most to keep,

And gods to punish most when men do break, He touch'd her not. — Take heed, Bellario, 100 How thou dost drown the virtues thou hast shown

With perjury. — By all that's good, 't was I! You know she stood betwixt me and my right.

Pha. Thy own tongue be thy judge!

Cle. It was Philaster.

Dion. Is 't not a brave boy? 105

Well, sirs, I fear me we were all deceived.

Phi. Have I no friend here?

Dion. Yes.

Phi. Then show it: some Good body lend a hand to draw us nearer.

Would you have tears shed for you when you die?

Then lay me gently on his neck, that there 110 I may weep floods and breathe forth my spirit. 'T is not the wealth of Plutus, nor the gold

[Embraces Bel.]

Lockt in the heart of earth, can buy away This arm-full from me; this had been a ransom 114

To have redeem'd the great Augustus Cæsar, Had he been taken. You hard-hearted men, More stony than these mountains, can you see Such clear pure blood drop, and not cut your flesh

To stop his life, to bind whose bitter wounds, Queens ought to tear their hair, and with their tears 120

Bathe 'em? — Forgive me, thou that art the wealth

Of poor Philaster!

Enter KING, ARETHUSA, and Guard.

King. Is the villain ta'en?

Pha. Sir, here be two confess the deed; but sure

It was Philaster.

Phi. Question it no more;

It was.

King. The fellow that did fight with him, 125 Will tell us that.

Are. Aye me! I know he will.

King. Did not you know him?

Are. Sir, if it was he,

He was disguis'd.

Phi. I was so. — Oh, my stars, That I should live still. Aside.

<sup>1</sup> Pyramid.

King. Thou ambitious fool,
Thou that hast laid a train for thy own life! —
Now I do mean to do, I'll leave to talk. 121
Bear them to prison.

Are. Sir, they did plot together to take hence
This harmless life; should it pass unreveng'd,
I should to earth go weeping. Grant me, then,
By all the love a father bears his child, 126
Their custodies, and that I may appoint
Their tortures and their deaths.

Dion. Death! Soft; our law will not reach that for this fault.

King. 'Tis granted; take 'em to you with a guard. — 140

Come, princely Pharamond, this business past,
We may with security go on
To your intended match.

[Exeunt all except DION, CLEREMONT, and THRASILINE.]

Cle. I pray that this action lose not Philaster
the hearts of the people. 145

Dion. Fear it not; their over-wise heads will think it but a trick. Exeunt.

ACT V

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter DION, CLEREMONT, and THRASILINE.

Thra. Has the King sent for him to death?

Dion. Yes; but the King must know 'tis not in his power to war with Heaven.

Cle. We linger time; the King sent for Philaster and the headsmen an hour ago. 5

Thra. Are all his wounds well?

Dion. All; they were but scratches; but the loss of blood made him faint.

Cle. We dally, gentlemen.

Thra. Away! 10

Dion. We'll scuffle hard before we perish. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter PHILASTER, ARETHUSA, and BELLARIO.

Are. Nay, faith, Philaster, grieve not; we are
well.

Bel. Nay, good my lord, forbear; we're wondrous well.

Phi. Oh, Arethusa, oh, Bellario,
Leave to be kind!

I shall be shut from Heaven, as now from earth,
If you continue so. I am a man 5

False to a pair of the most trusty ones
That ever earth bore; can it bear us all?

Forgive, and leave me. But the King hath sent
To call me to my death: oh, shew it me, 10

And then forget me! And for thee, my boy,
I shall deliver words will mollify

The hearts of beasts to spare thy innocence.

Bel. Alas, my lord, my life is not a thing
Worthy your noble thoughts! 'Tis not a life, 15

'Tis but a piece of childhood thrown away.
Should I outlive you, I should then outlive
Virtue and honour; and when that day comes,

If ever I shall close these eyes but once,
May I live spotted for my perjury, 20
And waste my limbs to nothing!

Are. And I (the woful'st maid that ever was, Forc'd with my hands to bring my lord to
death)

Do by the honour of a virgin swear
To tell no hours beyond it!

Phi. Make me not hated so. 25

Are. Come from this prison all joyful to our deaths!

Phi. People will tear me, when they find you true

To such a wretch as I; I shall die loath'd.

Enjoy your kingdoms peaceably, whilst I
For ever sleep forgotten with my faults. 30

Every just servant, every maid in love,
Will have a piece of me, if you be true.

Are. My dear lord, say not so.

Bel. A piece of you!
He was not born of woman that can cut
It and look on. 35

Phi. Take me in tears betwixt you, for my
heart

Will break with shame and sorrow.

Are. Why, 'tis well.

Bel. Lament no more.

Phi. Why, what would you have done
If you had wrong'd me basely, and had found Your<sup>3</sup> life no price compar'd to mine?<sup>3</sup> For love, sirs, 40

Deal with me truly.

Bel. 'Twas mistaken, sir.

Phi. Why, if it were?

Bel. Then, sir, we would have ask'd
You pardon.

Phi. And have hope to enjoy it?

Are. Enjoy it! ay.

Phi. Would you indeed? Be plain.

Bel. We would, my lord.

Phi. Forgive me, then.

Are. So, so. 45

Bel. 'Tis as it should be now.
Phi. Lead to my death. Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>4</sup>

*Enter KING, DION, CLEREMONT, THRASILINE
[and Attendants].*

King. Gentlemen, who saw the prince?

Cle. So please you, sir, he's gone to see the city

And the new platform, with some gentlemen
Attending on him.

King. Is the princess ready
To bring her prisoner out?

Thra. She waits your grace. 5

King. Tell her we stay. Exit THRASILINE.

Dion. [Aside.] King, you may be deceiv'd yet.
The head you aim at cost more setting on

Than to be lost so lightly. If it must off, —
Like a wild overflow, that swoops before him

A golden staek, and with it shakes down bridges, 10

Cracks the strong hearts of pines, whose cableroots
Held out a thousand storms, a thousand thunders,

And, so made mightier, takes whole villages
Upon his back, and in that heat of pride 14
Charges strong towns, towers, castles, palaces,
And lays them desolate ; so shall thy head,
Thy noble head, bury the lives of thousands,
That must bleed with thee like a sacrifice,
In thy red ruins.

Enter ARETHUSA, PHYLASTER, BELLARIO in a robe and garland [and THRASILINE].

King. How now ? What masque is this ? 20
Bel. Right royal sir, I should

Sing you an epithalamion of these lovers,
But having lost my best airs with my fortunes,
And wanting a celestial harp to strike
This blessed union on, thus in glad story 25
I give you all. These two fair cedar-branches,
The noblest of the mountain where they grew,
Straightest and tallest, under whose still shades
The worthier beasts have made their lairs, and slept

Free from the fervour of the Sirian star 30
And the fell thunder-stroke, free from the clouds

When they were big with humour, and deliver'd
In thousand spouts their issues to the earth ;
Oh, there was none but silent quiet there !
Till never-pleas'd Fortune shot up shrubs, 35
Base under-branches, to divorce these branches ;
And for a while they did so, and did reign
Over the mountain, and choke up his beauty
With brakes, rude thorns and thistles, till the sun

Scorcht them even to the roots and dried them
there. 40

And now a gentle gale hath blown again,
That made these branches meet and twine together,

Never to be divided. The god that sings
His holy numbers over marriage-beds Hath knit their noble hearts ; and here they
stand 45

Your children, mighty King ; and I have done.

King. How, how ?
Are. Sir, if you love it in plain truth,
(For now there is no masquing in 't,) this gentleman,

The prisoner that you gave me, is become
My keeper, and through all the bitter throes 50
Your jealousies and his ill fate have wrought
him,

Thus nobly hath he struggled, and at length
Arrived here my dear husband.

King. Your dear husband ! —
Call in the Captain of the Citadel —

There you shall keep your wedding. I'll provide 55

A masque shall make your Hymen turn his safron

Into a sullen coat, and sing sad requiems
To your departing souls.

Blood shall put out your torches ; and, instead
Of gaudy flowers about your wanton necks, 60

An axe shall hang, like a prodigious meteor, Ready to crop your loves' sweets. Hear, you
gods !

From this time do I shake all title off
Of father to this woman, this base woman ;
And what there is of vengeance in a lion 65
Chaff among dogs or robb'd of his dear young,
The same, enforce'd more terrible, more mighty,
Expect from me !

Are. Sir, by that little life I have left to swear by, 69

There 's nothing that can stir me from myself.
What I have done, I have done without repentance,

For death can be no bugbear unto me,
So long as Pharamond is not my headsman.

Dion. [Aside.] Sweet peace upon thy soul,
thou worthy maid,

Whene'er thou diest ! For this time I'll excuse
thee, 75

Or be thy prologue.

Phi. Sir, let me speak next ;
And let my dying words be better with you
Than my dull living actions. If you aim

At the dear life of this sweet innocent,
You are a tyrant and a savage monster, 80

[That feeds upon the blood you gave a life to ;]<sup>1</sup>
Your memory shall be as foul behind you,

As you are living ; all your better deeds
Shall be in water writ, but this in marble ; 85

No chronicle shall speak you, though your own,
But for the shame of men. No monument,

Though high and big as Pelion, shall be able
To cover this base murder : make it rich

With brass, with purest gold, and shining jasper.

Like the Pyramides ; lay on epitaphs 90
Such as make great men gods ; my little marble,

That only clothes my ashes, not my faults,
Shall far outshine it. And for after-issues,

Think not so madly of the heavenly wisdoms,
That they will give you more for your mad
rage 95

To cut off, unless it be some snake, or something Like yourself, that in his birth shall strangle
you.

Remember my father, King ! There was a fault,

But I forgive it. Let that sin persuade you
To love this lady ; if you have a soul, 100

Think, save her, and be saved. For myself,
I have so long expected this glad hour,

So languisht under you, and daily withered,
That, Heaven knows, it is a joy to die ;

I find a recreation in't. 105

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Where is the King ?
King. Here.

Mess. Get you to your strength,
And rescue the Prince Pharamond from danger ;

He 's taken prisoner by the citizens,
Fearing<sup>2</sup> the Lord Philaster.

Dion. [Aside.] Oh, brave followers! Mutiny, my fine dear countrymen, mutiny! 100 Now, my brave valiant foremen, shew your weapons

In honour of your mistresses!

Enter a Second Messenger.

2 Mess. Arm, arm, arm, arm!

King. A thousand devils take 'em!

Dion. [Aside.] A thousand blessings on 'em!

2 Mess. Arm, O King! The city is in mutiny, 110

Led by an old gray ruffian, who comes on in rescue of the Lord Philaster.

King. Away to the citadel! I'll see them safe,

And then cope with these burghers. Let the guard 120

And all the gentlemen give strong attendance.

Exeunt all except DION, CLEREMONT, and THRASILINE.

Cle. The city up! This was above our wishes.

Dion. Ay, and the marriage too. By my life, This noble lady has deceiv'd us all.

A plague upon myself, a thousand plagues, 125 For having such unworthy thoughts of her dear honour!

Oh, I could beat myself! Or do you beat me, And I'll beat you; for we had all one thought.

Cle. No no, 't will but lose time. 129

Dion. You say true. Are your swords sharp?

— Well, my dear countrymen What-ye-lacks,<sup>1</sup> if you continue, and fall not back upon the first broken skin, I'll have you chronicle and chronicle, and cut and chronicle, and all-to-be-prais'd and sung in sonnets, and bawled 135 in new brave ballads, that all tongues shall troll you in saecula saeculorum, my kind can-carriers.

Thra. What, if a toy<sup>2</sup> take 'em i' th' heels now, and they run all away, and cry, "the devil take the hindmost?" 140

Dion. Then the same devil take the foremost too, and souse him for his breakfast! If they all prove cowards, my curses fly among them, and be speeding! May they have murrains reign to keep the gentlemen at home un- 145 bound in easy frieze! May the moths branch<sup>3</sup> their velvets, and their silks only be worn before sore eyes! May their false lights undo 'em, and discover presses,<sup>4</sup> holes, stains, and oldness in their stuffs, and make them shop- 150 rid! May they keep whores and horses, and break; and live mew'd up with necks of beef and turnips! May they have many children, and none like the father! May they know no language but that gibberish they prattle to 155 their parcels, unless it be the goatish Latin they write in their bonds — and may they write that false, and lose their debts!

Re-enter KING.

King. Now the vengeance of all the gods confound them! How they swarm together! 160 What a hum they raise! — Devils choke your wild throats! — If a man had need to use their valours, he must pay a brokage for it, and then bring 'em on, and they will fight like sheep. 'Tis Philaster, none but Philaster, must allay this heat. They will not hear me speak, but 165 fling dirt at me and call me tyrant. Oh, run, dear friend, and bring the Lord Philaster! Speak him fair; call him prince; do him all the courtesy you can; commend me to him. Oh, my 170 wits, my wits! Exit CLEREMONT.

Dion. [Aside.] Oh, my brave countrymen! as I live, I will not buy a pin out of your walls for this. Nay, you shall cozen me, and I'll thank you, and send you brawn and bacon, and soil<sup>5</sup> you every long vacation a brace of fore- 175 men,<sup>6</sup> that at Michaelmas shall come up fat and kicking.

King. What they will do with this poor prince, the gods know, and I fear. 180

Dion. [Aside.] Why, sir, they'll flay him, and make church-buckets on 's skin, to quench rebellion; then clap a rivet in 's sconce, and hang him up for a sign.

Enter CLEREMONT with PHILASTER.

King. Oh, worthy sir, forgive me! Do not make 185

Your miseries and my faults meet together, To bring a greater danger. Be yourself, Still sound amongst diseases. I have wrong'd 190 you;

And though I find it last, and beaten to it, Let first your goodness know it. Calm the people, 195

And be what you were born to. Take your love,

And with her my repentance, all my wishes, And all my prayers. By the gods, my heart speaks this;

And if the least fall from me not perform'd, May I be struck with thunder!

Phi. Mighty sir, 195 I will not do your greatness so much wrong, As not to make your word truth. Free the princess

And the poor boy, and let me stand the shock Of this mad sea-breach, which I'll either turn, 200

Or perish with it.

King. Let your own word free them. 205

Phi. Then thus I take my leave, kissing your hand,

And hanging on your royal word. Be kingly, And be not mov'd, sir. I shall bring you peace Or never bring myself back.

King. All the gods go with thee. Exeunt.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>7</sup>

Enter an old Captain and Citizens with PHARAMOND.

Cap. Come, my brave myrmidons, let us fall on.

Let your caps swarm, my boys, and your nimble tongues

Forget your mother-gibberish of "what do you lack?"<sup>1</sup>

And set your mouths ope, children, till your palates

Fall frighted half a fathom past the cure

Of bay-salt and gross pepper, and then cry

"Philaster, brave Philaster!"<sup>2</sup> Let Philaster

Be deeper in request, my ding-dongs,<sup>1</sup>

My pairs of dear indentures,<sup>2</sup> kings of clubs,<sup>2</sup>

Than your cold water-camlets,<sup>3</sup> or your paintings<sup>10</sup>

Spitted with copper.<sup>4</sup> Let not your hasty silks,

Or your branch'd cloth of bodkin,<sup>5</sup> or your tissues,

Dearly belov'd of spiced cake and custards,

Your Robin Hoods, Scarlets, and Johns, tie

your affections

In darkness to your shops. No dainty duckers,<sup>6</sup>

Up with your three-pil'd spirits, your wrought

yalours;<sup>7</sup>

And let your uncut cholers<sup>8</sup> make the King feel

The measure of your mightiness. Philaster!

Cry, my rose-nobles,<sup>9</sup> cry!

All. Philaster! Philaster!

Cap. How do you like this, my lord-prince?

These are mad boys, I tell you; these are

things<sup>21</sup>

That will not strike their top-sails to a foist,<sup>10</sup>

And let a man of war, an argosy,

Hull<sup>11</sup> and cry cockles.<sup>12</sup>

Pha. Why, you rude slave, do you know what you do?<sup>25</sup>

Cap. My pretty prince of puppets, we do

know;

And give your greatness warning that you talk

No more such bug's-words,<sup>13</sup> or that solder'd

crown

Shall be scratch'd with a musket.<sup>14</sup> Dear prince

Pippin,

Down with your noble blood, or, as I live,<sup>30</sup>

I'll have you coddled.<sup>15</sup> — Let him loose, my spirits:

Make us a round ring with your bills, my Hee-

tors,

And let us see what this trim man dares do.

Now, sir, have at you! here I lie;

And with this swashing blow (do you see, sweet prince?)<sup>35</sup>

I could hulk<sup>16</sup> your grace, and hang you up cross-legg'd.

Like a hare at a poultier's, and do this with this wiper.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Apprentices, who were bound by indentures, and whose usual weapons were clubs. Throughout these scenes, it is, of course, London citizens who are in view.

Pha. You will not see me murder'd, wicked villains?

1 Cit. Yes, indeed, will we, sir; we have not seen one

For a great while.

Cap. He would have weapons, would he? <sup>40</sup>

Give him a broadside, my brave boys, with your pikes;

Branch me his skin in flowers like a satin,

And between every flower a mortal cut. —

Your royalty shall ravel!<sup>18</sup> — Jag him, gentlemen;

I'll have him cut to the kell,<sup>19</sup> then down the

seams.<sup>45</sup>

O for a whip to make him galloon-laces!<sup>20</sup>

I'll have a coach-whip.

Pha. Oh, spare me, gentlemen!

Cap. Hold, hold;

The man begins to fear and know himself.

He shall for this time only be seel'd up,<sup>21</sup> <sup>50</sup>

With a feather through his nose, that he may only

See heaven, and think whither he is going.

Nay, my beyond-sea sir, we will proclaim you:

You would be king!

Thou tender heir apparent to a church-ale,<sup>22</sup> <sup>55</sup>

Thou slight prince of single sarcenet,<sup>23</sup>

Thou royal ring-tail,<sup>24</sup> fit to fly at nothing

But poor men's poultry, and have every boy

Beat thee from that too with his bread and butter!

Pha. Gods keep me from these hell-hounds!

1 Cit. Shall 's geld him, captain? <sup>61</sup>

Cap. No, you shall spare his dowcets, my

dear donsels;<sup>25</sup>

As you respect the ladies, let them flourish.

The curses of a longing woman kill

As speedy as a plague, boys. <sup>65</sup>

1 Cit. I'll have a leg, that 's certain.

2 Cit. I'll have an arm.

3 Cit. I'll have his nose, and at mine own charge build

A college and clap 't upon the gate.<sup>26</sup>

4 Cit. I'll have his little gut to string a kit<sup>27</sup>

with;

For certainly a royal gut will sound like silver.

Pha. Would they were in thy belly, and I past <sup>71</sup>

My pain once!

5 Cit. Good captain, let me have his liver to feed ferrets.

Cap. Who will have parcels else? Speak.

Pha. Good gods, consider me! I shall be tortur'd. <sup>75</sup>

1 Cit. Captain, I'll give you the trimming of your two-hand sword,

And let me have his skin to make false scabbards.

2 Cit. He had no horns, sir, had he?

Cap. No, sir, he 's a pollard.<sup>1</sup>

What wouldst thou do with horns?

2 Cit. Oh, if he had had, <sup>80</sup>

I would have made rare hafts and whistles of 'em;

But his shin-bones, if they be sound, shall serve me.

Enter PHILASTER.

All. Long live Philaster, the brave Prince Philaster!

Phi. I thank you, gentlemen. But why are these

Rude weapons brought abroad, to teach your hands <sup>85</sup>

Uncivil trades?

Cap. My royal Rosicleer,<sup>2</sup>

We are thy myrmidons, thy guard, thy roarers;<sup>3</sup>

And when thy noble body is in durance, Thus do we clap our musty murrions<sup>4</sup> on,

And trace the streets in terror. Is it peace, <sup>90</sup>

Thou Mars of men? Is the King sociable, And bids thee live? Art thou above thy foe-men, And free as Phoebus? Speak. If not, this stand<sup>5</sup>

Of royal blood shall be abroach, a-tilt, And run even to the lees of honour. <sup>95</sup>

Phi. Hold, and be satisfied. I am myself; Free as my thoughts are; by the gods, I am!

Cap. Art thou the dainty darling of the King?

Art thou the Hylas to our Hercules? Do the lords bow, and the regarded scarlets<sup>6</sup>

Kiss their gumm'd golls,<sup>7</sup> and cry, "We are your servants"<sup>8</sup>? <sup>101</sup>

Is the court navigable and the presence stuck With flags of friendship? If not, we are thy castle, And this man sleeps.

Phi. I am what I desire to be, your friend; I am what I was born to be, your prince. <sup>105</sup>

Pha. Sir, there is some humanity in you; You have a noble soul. Forget my name,

And know my misery; set me safe aboard From these wild cannibals, and as I live, <sup>110</sup>

I'll quit this land for ever. There is nothing,— Perpetual prisonment, cold, hunger, sickness

Of all sorts, of all dangers, and all together, The worst company of the worst men, madness, age, To be as many creatures as a woman, <sup>115</sup>

And do as all they do, nay, to despair,— But I would rather make it a new nature,

And live with all these, than endure one hour Amongst these wild dogs.

Phi. I do pity you.— Friends, discharge your fears; <sup>120</sup>

Deliver me the prince. I'll warrant you I shall be old enough to find my safety.

3 Cit. Good sir, take heed he does not hurt you;

He is a fierce man, I can tell you, sir.

Cap. Prince, by your leave, I'll have a sur-cingle,<sup>8</sup> <sup>125</sup>

And make<sup>9</sup> you like a hawk. [PHAR.] strives.

Phi. Away, away, there is no danger in him: Alas, he had rather sleep to shake his fit off!

Look you, friends, how gently he leads! Upon my word,

He's tame enough, he needs no further watching. <sup>130</sup>

Good my friends, go to your houses, And by me have your pardons and my love;

And know there shall be nothing in my power You may deserve, but you shall have your wishes. To give you more thanks, were to flatter you.

Continue still your love; and for an earnest, <sup>135</sup> Drink this. [Gives money.]

All. Long mayst thou live, brave prince, brave prince, brave prince!

Exeunt PHIL. and PHAR.

Cap. Go thy ways, thou art the king of courtesy!

Fall off again, my sweet youths. Come, <sup>140</sup>

And every man trace to his house again, And hang his pewter up; then to the tavern,

And bring your wives in muffs. We will have music;

And the red grape shall make us dance and rise, boys. Exeunt.

[SCENE V.]<sup>10</sup>

Enter KING, ARETHUSA, GALATEA, MEGRA, DION, CLEBREMONT, THRASILINE, BELLARIO, and Attendants.

King. Is it appeas'd?

Dion. Sir, all is quiet as this dead of night, As peaceable as sleep. My lord Philaster Brings on the prince himself.

King. Kind gentleman! I will not break the least word I have given <sup>15</sup>

In promise to him. I have heap'd a world Of grief upon his head, which yet I hope To wash away.

Enter PHILASTER and PHARAMOND.

Cle. My lord is come.

King. My son! Blest be the time that I have leave to call

Such virtue mine! Now thou art in mine arms, Methinks I have a salve unto my breast <sup>11</sup>

For all the stings that dwell there. Streams of grief

That I have wrong'd thee, and as much of joy That I repent it, issue from mine eyes;

Let them appease thee. Take thy right; take her; <sup>15</sup>

She is thy right too; and forget to urge My vexed soul with that I did before.

Phi. Sir, it is blotted from my memory,

<sup>10</sup> An apartment in the palace.

Past and forgotten. — For you, prince of Spain, Whom I have thus redeem'd, you have full
leave 20

To make an honourable voyage home.
And if you would go furnish'd to your realm
With fair provision, I do see a lady,
Methinks, would gladly bear you company.
How like you this piece?

Meg. Sir, he likes it well, 25
For he hath tried it, and hath found it worth
His princely liking. We were ta'en abed;
I know your meaning. I am not the first
That nature taught to seek a fellow forth;
Can shame remain perpetually in me, 30
And not in others? Or have princes salves
To cure ill names, that meaner people want?

Phi. What mean you?
Meg. You must get another ship,
To bear the princess and her boy together. 35
Dion. How now!

Meg. Others took me, and I took her and
him
At that all women may be ta'en sometime.
Ship us all four, my lord; we can endure
Weather and wind alike.

King. Clear thou thyself, or know not me for father. 40

Are. This earth, how false it is! What means is left for me

To clear myself? It lies in your belief.
My lords, believe me; and let all things else
Struggle together to dishonour me.

Bel. Oh, stop your ears, great King, that I may speak 45

As freedom would! Then I will call this lady
As base as are her actions. Hear me, sir;
Believe your heated blood when it rebels
Against your reason, sooner than this lady.

Meg. By this good light, he bears it handsomely. 50

Phi. This lady! I will sooner trust the wind
With feathers, or the troubled sea with pearl,
Than her with any thing. Believe her not.
Why, think you, if I did believe her words,
I would outlive 'em? Honour cannot take 55
Revenge on you; then what were to be known
But death?

King. Forget her, sir, since all is knit Between us. But I must request of you
One favour, and will sadly<sup>1</sup> be denied.

Phi. Command, what'er it be.
King. Swear to be true 60

To what you promise.
Phi. By the powers above,

Let it not be the death of her or him,
And it is granted!

King. Bear away that boy
To torture; I will have her clear'd or buried.

Phi. Oh, let me call my word back, worthy sir!
Ask something else; bury my life and right 65
In one poor grave; but do not take away
My life and fame at once.

King. Away with him! It stands irrevocable.
Phi. Turn all your eyes on me. Here stands
a man, 70

<sup>1</sup> Shall be sorry to be denied.

The falsest and the basest of this world.
Setswords against this breast, some honest man,
For I have liv'd till I am pitied!
My former deeds were hateful; but this last
Is pitiful, for I unwillingly 75
Have given the dear preserver of my life
Unto his torture. Is it in the power
Of flesh and blood to carry this, and live?

Offers to stab himself.
Are. Dear sir, be patient yet! Oh, stay that
hand!

King. Sirs, strip that boy.
Dion. Come, sir; your tender flesh 80

Will try your constancy.
Bel. Oh, kill me, gentlemen!

Dion. No.— Help, sirs.
Bel. Will you torture me?

King. Haste there;
Why stay you?

Bel. Then I shall not break my vow,
You know, just gods, though I discover all.

King. How 's that? Will he confess?
Dion. Sir, so he says. 85

King. Speak then.
Bel. Great King, if you command

This lord to talk with me alone, my tongue
Urg'd by my heart, shall utter all the thoughts
My youth hath known; and stranger things than these

You hear not often.
King. Walk aside with him. 90

[DION and BELLARIO walk apart.]

Dion. Why speak'st thou not?
Bel. Know you this face, my lord?

Dion. No.
Bel. Have you not seen it, nor the like?

Dion. Yes, I have seen the like, but readily
I know not where.

Bel. I have been often told
In court of one Euphrasia, a lady, 95

And daughter to you; betwixt whom and me
They that would flatter my bad face would swear
There was such strange resemblance, that we two

Could not be known asunder, drest alike.
Dion. By Heaven, and so there is!

Bel. For her fair sake, 100
Who now doth spend the spring-time of her life
In holy pilgrimage, move to the King,
That I may scape this torture.

Dion. But thou speak'st
As like Euphrasia as thou dost look.

How came it to thy knowledge that she lives 105
In pilgrimage?

Bel. I know it not, my lord;
But I have heard it, and do scarce believe it.

Dion. Oh, my shame! is it possible? Draw near,

That I may gaze upon thee. Art thou she,
Or else her murderer? <sup>2</sup> Where wert thou
born? 110

Bel. In Syracusa.
Dion. What 's thy name?

Bel. Euphrasia.

<sup>2</sup> In some barbarous countries, it was believed that the murderer inherited the form and qualities of his victim. (Mason.)

Dion. Oh, 't is just, 't is she !
Now I do know thee. Oh, that thou hadst died,
And I had never seen thee nor my shame !
How shall I own thee ? Shall this tongue of
mine 116

E'er call thee daughter more ?
Bel. Would I had died indeed ! I wish it too ;
And so I must have done by vow, ere publish'd
What I have told, but that there was no means
To hide it longer. Yet I joy in this, 120
The princess is all clear.

King. What, have you done ?

Dion. All is discovered.

Phi. Why then hold you me ?
All is discovered ! Pray you, let me go.

Offers to stab himself.

King. Stay him.

Are. What is discovered ?

Dion. Why, my shame.
It is a woman ; let her speak the rest. 125

Phi. How ? That again !

Dion. It is a woman.

Phi. Blest be you powers that favour innocence !

King. Lay hold upon that lady.

Phi. It is a woman, sir ! — Hark, gentlemen,
It is a woman ! — Arethusa, take 130

My soul into thy breast, that would be gone
With joy. It is a woman ! Thou art fair,
And virtuous still to ages, in despite
Of malice.

King. Speak you, where lies his shame ?

Bel. I am his daughter. 135

Phi. The gods are just.
Dion. I dare accuse none ; but, before you
two,

The virtue of our age, I bend my knee
For mercy. [Kneels.]

Phi. [raising him.] Take it freely ; for I know, Though what thou didst were undiscreetly
done, 140

'T was meant well.

Are. And for me,
I have a power to pardon sins, as oft
As any man has power to wrong me.

Cle. Noble and worthy !

Phi. But, Bellario,
(For I must call thee still so,) tell me why 145
Thou didst conceal thy sex. It was a fault,
A fault, Bellario, though thy other deeds
Of truth outweigh'd it : all these jealousies
Had flown to nothing if thou hadst discovered
What now we know.

Bel. My father oft would speak 150
Your worth and virtue ; and, as I did grow
More and more apprehensive, I did thirst
To see the man so prais'd. But yet all this Was but a maiden-longing, to be lost
As soon as found ; till, sitting in my window, 155
Printing my thoughts in lawn, I saw a god,
I thought, (but it was you,) enter our gates.
My blood flew out and back again, as fast
As I had puff'd it forth and suckt it in 159
Like breath. Then was I call'd away in haste

<sup>1</sup> Quick to understand.

To entertain you. Never was a man,
Heav'd from a sheep-cote to a sceptre, rais'd
So high in thoughts as I. You left a kiss
Upon these lips then, which I mean to keep 165
From you for ever. I did hear you talk,
Far above singing. After you were gone,
I grew acquainted with my heart, and search'd
What stirr'd it so : alas, I found it love !
Yet far from lust ; for, could I but have liv'd
In presence of you, I had had my end. 170
For this I did delude my noble father
With a feign'd pilgrimage, and drest myself
In habit of a boy ; and, for I knew
My birth no match for you, I was past hope
Of having you ; and, understanding well 175
That when I made discovery of my sex
I could not stay with you, I made a vow,
By all the most religious things a maid
Could call together, never to be known,
Whilst there was hope to hide me from men's
eyes, 180

For other than I seem'd, that I might ever Abide with you. Then sat I by the fount,
Where first you took me up.

King. Search out a match
Within our kingdom, where and when thou wilt,
And I will pay thy dowry ; and thyself 185
Wilt well deserve him.

Bel. Never, sir, will I
Marry ; it is a thing within my vow :
But, if I may have leave to serve the princess,
To see the virtues of her lord and her,
I shall have hope to live.

Are. I, Philaster, 190
Cannot be jealous, though you had a lady
Drest like a page to serve you ; nor will I Suspect her living here. — Come, live with me ;
Live free as I do, She that loves my lord,
Curst be the wife that hates her ! 195

Phi. I grieve such virtue should be laid in earth

Without an heir. — Hear me, my royal father :
Wrong not the freedom of our souls so much,
To think to take revenge of that base woman ;
Her malice cannot hurt us. Set her free 200
As she was born, saving from shame and sin.

King. Set her at liberty. — But leave the
court ;

This is no place for such. — You, Pharamond,
Shall have free passage, and a conduct home Worthy so great a prince. When you come
there, 205

Remember 't was your faults that lost you her,
And not my purpos'd will.

Phi. I do confess,
Renowned sir.

King. Last, join your hands in one. Enjoy,
Philaster,

This kingdom, which is yours, and, after me, 210
Whatever I call mine. My blessing on you !
All happy hours be at your marriage-joys,
That you may grow yourselves over all lands,
And live to see your plenteous branches spring
Wherever there is sun ! Let princes learn 215
By this to rule the passions of their blood ;
For what Heaven wills can never be withstood.

Exeunt omnes.

ACT I

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter CLEON, STRATO, LYSIPPUS, and DIPHILOS.

Cle. The rest are making ready, sir.

Lys. So let them; there's time enough.

Diph. You are the brother to the King, my lord;

We'll take your word.

Lys. Strato, thou hast some skill in poetry; <sup>5</sup>
 What think'st thou of the masque? Will it be well?

Stra. As well as masques can be.

Lys. As masques can be!
Stra. Yes; they must commend their king,
 and speak in praise

Of the assembly, bless the bride and bridegroom
 In person of some god; they're tied to rules <sup>10</sup>
 Of flattery.

Cle. See, good my lord, who is return'd!

Enter MELANTIUS. <sup>3</sup>

Lys. Noble Melantius, the land by me
 Welcomes thy virtues home to Rhodes;
 Thou that with blood abroad buyest our peace!
 The breath of kings is like the breath of <sup>15</sup>
 gods;

My brother wisht thee here, and thou art here.
 He will be too kind, and weary thee
 With often welcomes; but the time doth give
 thee

A welcome above his or all the world's.

Mel. My lord, my thanks; but these scratcht limbs of mine <sup>20</sup>

Have spoke my love and truth unto my friends,
 More than my tongue e'er could. My mind's the same

It ever was to you: where I find worth,
 I love the keeper till he let it go,
 And then I follow it.

Diph. Hail, worthy brother! <sup>25</sup>
 He that rejoices not at your return
 In safety is mine enemy for ever.

Mel. I thank thee, Diphilus. But thou art faulty:

I sent for thee to exercise thine arms
 With me at Patria; thou cam'st not, Diphilus;
 'T was ill.

Diph. My noble brother, my excuse <sup>31</sup>
 Is my king's strict command, which you, my
 lord,

Can witness with me.

Lys. 'T is most true, Melantius;
 He might not come till the solemnities
 Of this great match were past.

Diph. Have you heard of it? <sup>35</sup>

Mel. Yes, and have given cause to those that here

Envy my deeds abroad to call me gamesome:
 I have no other business here at Rhodes.

Lys. We have a masque to-night, and you must tread

A soldier's measure. <sup>40</sup>

Mel. These soft and silken wars are not for
 me:

The music must be shrill and all confus'd
 That stirs my blood; and then I dance with arms.

But is Amintor wed?

Diph. This day.

Mel. All joys upon him! for he is my friend.
 Wonder not that I call a man so young my friend: <sup>45</sup>

His worth is great; valiant he is and temperate;

And one that never thinks his life his own,
 If his friend need it. When he was a boy,

As oft as I return'd (as, without boast, <sup>50</sup>

<sup>1</sup> An apartment in the palace.

I brought home conquest, he would gaze upon
me
And view me round, to find in what one limb
The virtue lay to do these things he heard ;
Then would he wish to see my sword, and feel
The quickness of the edge, and in his hand <sup>55</sup>
Weigh it. He oft would make me smile at this.
His youth did promise much, and his ripe years
Will see it all perform'd.

Enter ASPATIA, passing by.

Hail, maid and wife !

Thou fair Aspatia, may the holy knot
That thou hast tied to-day last till the hand <sup>60</sup>
Of age undo 't ! May'st thou bring a race
Unto Amintor, that may fill the world
Successively with soldiers !

Asp. My hard fortunes
Deserve not scorn, for I was never proud
When they were good. Exit.

Mel. How 's this ?

Lys. You are mistaken, sir ; <sup>65</sup>
She is not married.

Mel. You said Amintor was.

Diph. 'Tis true ; but —

Mel. Pardon me ; I did receive Letters at Patria from my Amintor,
That he should marry her.

Diph. And so it stood <sup>70</sup>
In all opinion long ; but your arrival
Made me imagine you had heard the change.

Mel. Who hath he taken then ?

Lys. A lady, sir,
That bears the light about <sup>1</sup> her, and strikes
dead

With flashes of her eye ; the fair Evadne,
Your virtuous sister.

Mel. Peace of heart betwixt them ! <sup>75</sup>
But this is strange.

Lys. The King, my brother, did it
To honour you ; and these solemnities
Are at his charge.

Mel. 'Tis royal, like himself. But I am sad <sup>80</sup>
My speech bears so unfortunate a sound
To beautiful Aspatia. There is rage

Hid in her father's breast, Calianax,
Bent long against me ; and he should not think,
If I could call it back, that I would take

So base revenges, as to scorn the state <sup>85</sup>
Of his neglected daughter. Holds he still His greatness with the King ?

Lys. Yes. But this lady
Walks discontented, with her watery eyes
Bent on the earth. The unfrequented woods

Are her delight ; where, when she sees a bank
Stuck full of flowers, she with a sigh will tell <sup>90</sup>
Her servants what a pretty place it were
To bury lovers in ; and make her maids

Pluck 'em, and strow her over like a corpse.
She carries with her an infectious grief, <sup>95</sup>
That strikes all her beholders : she will sing
The mournful'st things that ever ear hath

heard,
And sigh, and sing again ; and when the rest

Of our young ladies, in their wanton blood,
Tell mirthful tales in course, <sup>2</sup> that fill the room
With laughter, she will, with so sad a look, <sup>101</sup>
Bring forth a story of the silent death
Of some forsaken virgin, which her grief
Will put in such a phrase that, ere she end,
She'll send them weeping one by one away. <sup>105</sup>

Mel. She has a brother under my command, <sup>3</sup>
Like her ; a face as womanish as hers ;
But with a spirit that hath much outgrown
The number of his years.

Enter AMINTOR.

Cle. My lord the bridegroom !

Mel. I might run fiercely, not more hastily,
Upon my foe. I love thee well, Amintor ; <sup>111</sup>
My mouth is much too narrow for my heart ;
I joy to look upon those eyes of thine ;
Thou art my friend, but my disordered speech
Cuts off my love.

Amin. Thou art Melantius ; <sup>116</sup>
All love is spoke in that. A sacrifice,
To thank the gods Melantius is return'd

In safety ! Victory sits on his sword,
As she was wont. May she build there and

dwell ;
And may thy armour be, as it hath been, <sup>120</sup>
Only thy valour and thine innocence !
What endless treasures would our enemies give,
That I might hold thee still thus !

Mel. I am poor
In words ; but credit me, young man, thy mother <sup>124</sup>

Could do no more but weep for joy to see thee
After long absence. All the wounds I have Fetcht not so much away, nor all the cries
Of widowed mothers. But this is peace,
And that was war.

Amin. Pardon, thou holy god
Of marriage-bed, and frown not, I am fore'd, <sup>131</sup>
In answer of such noble tears as those,
To weep upon my wedding-day !

Mel. I fear thou art grown too fickle ; for I hear

A lady mourns for thee, men say, to death,
Forsaken of thee, on what terms <sup>4</sup> I know not.

Amin. She had my promise ; but the King forbad it, <sup>136</sup>

And made me make this worthy change, thy
sister,

Accompanied with graces [far] <sup>5</sup> above <sup>6</sup> her,
With whom I long to lose my lusty youth
And grow old in her arms.

Mel. Be prosperous ! <sup>140</sup>

Enter Messenger.

Mess. My lord, the masquers rage for you.
Lys. Cleon, Strato, Diphilus ! We are gone.

Amin. We'll all attend you. —

Exeunt LYSIPPUS, CLEON, STRATO,
DIPHILUS [and Messenger].

We shall trouble you

With our solemnities.

Mel. Not so, Amintor ;

But if you laugh at my rude carriage 146
In peace, I'll do as much for you in war,
When you come thither. Yet I have a mistress
To bring to your delights; rough though I am,

I have a mistress, and she has a heart 149
She says; but, trust me, it is stone, no better;
There is no place that I can challenge in 't.
But you stand still, and here my way lies.

Exeunt [severally].

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter CALLANAX with DIAGORAS.

Cal. Diagoras, look to the doors better, for shame! You let in all the world, and anon the King will rail at me. Why, very well said.<sup>2</sup> By Jove, the King will have the show i' th' court!

Diag. Why do you swear so, my lord? You know he'll have it here. 5

Cal. By this light, if he be wise, he will not.

Diag. And if he will not be wise, you are for-sworn.

Cal. One may wear his heart out with swearing, and get thanks on no side. I'll be gone, [11 look to 't who will.

Diag. My lord, I shall never keep them out.
Pray, stay; your looks will terrify them.

Cal. My looks terrify them, you coxcom- [16 bly ass, you! I'll be judged by all the company whether thou hast not a worse face than I.

Diag. I mean, because they know you and your office.

Cal. Office! I would I could put it off! I [20 am sure I sweat quite through my office. I might have made room at my daughter's wedding; — they ha' near kill'd her among them;
and now I must do service for him that hath forsaken her. Serve that will! Exit. 25

Diag. He's so humorous<sup>3</sup> since his daughter was forsaken! (Knock within.) Hark, hark!
there, there! so, so! codes, codes! 4 What now?

Mel. (within.) Open the door.

Diag. Who's there? 30

Mel. (within.) Melantius.

Diag. I hope your lordship brings no troop with you; for, if you do, I must return them.

[Opens the door.]

Enter MELANTIUS and a Lady.

Mel. None but this lady, sir.

Diag. The ladies are all plac'd above, save [35 those that come in the King's troop; the best of Rhodes sit there, and there's room.

Mel. I thank you, sir. — When I have seen you placed, madam, I must attend the King; but, the masque done, I'll wait on you again. 40

Diag. [Opening another door.] Stand back there! — Room for my Lord Melantius! (Ex-eunt MELANTIUS and Lady, other door.) — Pray, bear back — this is no place for such youth and their trulls<sup>5</sup> — let the doors shut again. — No!
— do your heads itch? I'll scratch them for [46

<sup>1</sup> A hall in the palace, with a gallery full of spectators.

you. [Shuts the door.] — So, now thrust and hang.
[Knocking within.] — Again! who is 't now? — I cannot blame my Lord Calianax for going away; would he were here! He would run [60 raging among them, and break a dozen wiser heads than his own in the twinkling of an eye.

— What's the news now?

[Voice] within. I pray you, can you help me to the speech of the master-cook? 55

Diag. If I open the door, I'll cook some of your calves-heads. Peace, rogues! [Knocking within.] — Again! who is 't?

Mel. (within.) Melantius.

Re-enter CALLANAX.

Cal. Let him not in. 60

Diag. O, my lord, I must. [Opening the door.]
— Make room there for my lord. Is your lady plac'd?

Re-enter MELANTIUS.

Mel. Yes, sir.

I thank you. — My Lord Calianax, well met. 65
Your causeless hate to me I hope is buried.

Cal. Yes, I do service for your sister here,
That brings my own poor child to timeless
death.

She loves your friend Amintor; such another
False-hearted lord as you.

Mel. You do me wrong, 70

A most unmanly one, and I am slow
In taking vengeance: but be well advis'd.

Cal. It may be so. — Who plac'd the lady
there

So near the presence of the King?

Mel. I did.

Cal. My lord, she must not sit there.

Mel. Why? 75

Cal. The place is kept for women of more
worth.

Mel. More worth than she! It misbecomes your age

And place to be thus womanish: forbear!

What you have spoke, I am content to think
The palsy shook your tongue to.

Cal. Why, 't is well, 80
If I stand here to place men's wenches.

Mel. I

Shall quite forget this place, thy age, my safety,
And, through all, cut that poor sickly week
Thou hast to live away from thee.

Cal. Nay, I know you can fight for your
whore. 85

Mel. Bate me the King, and, be he flesh and
blood,

He lies that says it! Thy mother at fifteen
Was black and sinful to her.

Diag. Good my lord —

Mel. Some god pluck threescore years from that fond<sup>6</sup> man, 90

That I may kill him, and not stain mine honour!
It is the curse of soldiers, that in peace

They shall be brav'd by such ignoble men

As, if the land were troubled, would with tears
And knees beg succour from 'em. Would that

blood,

<sup>6</sup> Foolish.

That sea of blood, that I have lost in fight, <sup>95</sup>
Were running in thy veins, that it might make
thee

Apt to say less, or able to maintain,
Should'st thou say more! This Rhodes, I see, is nought

But a place privileg'd to do men wrong.
Cal. Ay, you may say your pleasure.

Enter AMINTOR.

Amin. What vile injury <sup>100</sup>
Has stirr'd my worthy friend, who is as slow
To fight with words as he is quick of hand?

Mel. That heap of age, which I should reverence

If it were temperate, but testy years
Are most contemptible.

Amin. Good sir, forbear. <sup>105</sup>
Cal. There is just such another as yourself.

Amin. He will wrong you, or me, or any man,
And talk as if he had no life to lose,
Since this our match. The King is coming in;
I would not for more wealth than I enjoy <sup>110</sup>
He should perceive you raging. He did hear
You were at difference now, which hast'ned him.

Hautboys play within.

Cal. Make room there!

Enter KING, EVADNE, ASPATIA, Lords, and Ladies.

King. Melantius, thou art welcome, and my
love

Is with thee still; but this is not a place <sup>115</sup>
To brabble<sup>1</sup> in. — Calianax, join hands.

Cal. He shall not have mine hand.

King. This is no time
To force you to't. I do love you both: —
Calianax, you look well to your office; —
And you, Melantius, are welcome home. <sup>120</sup>
Begin the masque.

Mel. Sister, I joy to see you and your choice;
You lookt with my eyes when you took that man.
Be happy in him! Recorders<sup>2</sup> [play].

Evad. O, my dearest brother,
Your presence is more joyful than this day <sup>125</sup>
Can be unto me.

THE MASQUE

NIGHT rises in mists.

Night. Our reign is come; for in the raging<sup>3</sup>
sea

The sun is drown'd, and with him fell the Day.
Bright Cynthia, hear my voice! I am the
Night,

For whom thou bear'st about thy borrowed
light.

Appear! no longer thy pale visage shroud, <sup>5</sup>
But strike thy silver horns quite through a cloud,

And send a beam upon my swarthy face,
By which I may discover all the place
And persons, and how many longing eyes
Are come to wait on our solemnities. <sup>10</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Quenching.

Enter CYNTHIA.

How dull and black am I! I could not find
This beauty<sup>4</sup> without thee, I am so blind:
Methinks they show like to those eastern streaks,

That warn us hence before the morning breaks.
Back, my pale servant! for these eyes know
how <sup>15</sup>

To shoot far more and quicker rays than
thou.

Cynth. Great queen, they be a troop for whom alone

One of my clearest moons I have put on;
A troop, that looks as if thyself and I
Had pluckt our reins in and our whips laid by, <sup>20</sup>

To gaze upon these mortals, that appear Brighter than we.

Night. Then let us keep 'em here,
And never more our chariots drive away,
But hold our places and outshine the Day.

Cynth. Great queen of shadows, you are pleas'd to speak <sup>25</sup>

Of more than may be done. We may not break

The gods' decrees; but, when our time is
come,

Must drive away, and give the Day our room.
Yet, while our reign lasts, let us stretch our
power

To give our servants one contented hour, <sup>30</sup>
With such unwonted solemn grace and state,
As may forever after force them hate

Our brother's glorious beams, and wish the
Night

Crown'd with a thousand stars and our cold
light:

For almost all the world their service bend <sup>35</sup>
To Phoebus, and in vain my light I lend,
Gaz'd on unto my setting from my rise

Almost of none but of unquiet eyes.

Night. Then shine at full, fair queen, and by thy power

Produce a birth, to crown this happy hour, <sup>40</sup>
Of nymphs and shepherds; let their songs discover,

Easy and sweet, who is a happy lover;
Or, if thou woo'st<sup>5</sup> 't, then call thine own Endymion

From the sweet flow'ry bed he lies upon,
On Latmus' top, thy pale beams drawn away, <sup>45</sup>
And of his long night let him make a day.

Cynth. Thou dream'st, dark queen; that fair boy was not mine,

Nor went I down to kiss him. Ease and wine
Have bred these bold tales: poets, when they
rage,

Turn gods to men, and make an hour an age. <sup>50</sup>
But I will give a greater state and glory,
And raise to time a nobler memory

Of what these lovers are. — Rise, rise, I say,
Thou power of deeps, thy surges laid away,
Neptune, great king of waters, and by me. <sup>55</sup>
Be proud to be commanded!

<sup>5</sup> Will.

NEPTUNE rises.

Nept. Cynthia, see
Thy word hath fetcht me hither: let me know
Why I ascend.

Cynth. Doth this majestic show
Give thee no knowledge yet?

Nept. Yes, now I see Something intended, Cynthia, worthy thee. 60
Go on; I'll be a helper.

Cynth. Hie thee, then,
And charge the Wind fly from his rocky den,
Let loose his subjects; only Boreas,
Too foul for our intentions as he was,
Still keep him fast chain'd: we must have none
here 65

But vernal blasts and gentle winds appear,
Such as blow flowers, and through the glad boughs sing
Many soft welcomes to the lusty spring;
These are our music. Next, thy wat'ry race
Bring on in couples (we are pleas'd to grace 70
This noble night), each in their richest things
Your own deeps or the broken vessel brings.
Be prodigal, and I shall be as kind
And shine at full upon you.

Nept. Oh, the Wind!
Commanding Aeolus!

Enter AEOLUS out of a Rock.

Aeol. Great Neptune!
Nept. He. 75

Aeol. What is thy will?
Nept. We do command thee free
Favonius and thy milder winds, to wait
Upon our Cynthia; but tie Boreas strait,
He's too rebellious.

Aeol. I shall do it. [Exit AEOLUS.]
Nept. Do.

Aeol. [within.] Great master of the flood and all below, 80
Thy full command has taken.—Oh, the Main!

Neptune!
Nept. Here.

[Re-enter AEOLUS, followed by FAVONIUS and other Winds.]

Aeol. Boreas has broken his chain,
And, struggling with the rest, has got away.

Nept. Let him alone, I'll take him up at sea;

I will not long be thence. Go once again, 85
And call out of the bottoms of the main
Blue Proteus and the rest; charge them put on Their greatest pearls, and the most sparkling
stone

The beaten rock breeds; tell this night is
done

By me a solemn honour to the Moon: 90
Fly, like a full sail.

Aeol. I am gone. [Exit.]
Cynth. Dark Night,

Strike a full silence, do a thorough right
To this great chorus, that our music may

Touch high as Heaven, and make the east break day

At midnight. Music. 95

[First] SONG.

[During which PROTEUS and other Sea-deities enter.]

Cynthia, to thy power and thee
We obey.
Joy to this great company!
And no day 100
Come to steal this night away,
Till the rites of love are ended,
And the lusty bridegroom say,
Welcome, light, of all befriended!

Face out, you watery powers below;
Let your feet, 105
Like the galleys when they row,
Even beat.
Let your unknown measures, set
To the still winds, tell to all,
That gods are come, immortal, great, 110
To honour this great nuptial.

The Measure.

SECOND SONG.

Hold back thy hours, dark Night, till we have done;
The Day will come too soon:
Young maids will curse thee, if thou steal'st away,
And leav'st their losses open to the day: 115
Stay, stay, and hide
The blushes of the bride.

Stay, gentle Night, and with thy darkness cover
The kisses of her lover;
Stay, and confound her tears and her shrill cryings,
Her weak denials, vows, and often-dyings; 121
Stay, and hide all:
But help not, though she call.

Nept. Great queen of us and Heaven, hear what I bring
To make this hour a full one.<sup>2</sup>

Cynth. Speak, sea's king. 125
Nept. The tunes my Amphitrite joys to
have,

When she will dance upon the rising wave,
And court me as she sails. My Tritons, play
Music to lay a storm! I'll lead the way.

A Measure, NEPTUNE leads it.

[Third] SONG.

To bed, to bed! Come, Hymen, lead the bride, 130
And lay her by her husband's side;
Bring in the virgins every one,
That grieve to lie alone,
That they may kiss while they may say a maid;
To-morrow 't will be other kist and said. 135
Hesperus, be long a-shining,
Whilst these lovers are a-twining.

Aeol. [within.] Ho, Neptune!
Nept. Aeolus!

[Re-enter AEOLUS.]

Aeol. The sea goes high,
Boreas hath rais'd a storm: go and apply
Thy trident; else, I prophesy, ere day 140

<sup>1</sup> Crushed (?) or beaten by the waves (?).

Many a tall ship will be cast away.
Descend with all the gods and all their power,
To strike a calm.

Cynth. [We thank you for this hour:
My favour to you all.]<sup>1</sup> To gratulate 146
So great a service, done at my desire,
Ye shall have many floods, fuller and higher
Than you have wisht for; and no ebb shall dare
To let the Day see where your dwellings are.
Now back unto your governments in haste, <sup>150</sup>
Lest your proud charge should swell above the
waste,
And win upon the island.

Nept. We obey.
NEPTUNE descends and the Sea-Gods. [Exeunt FAVONIUS and other Winds.]

Cynth. Hold up thy head, dead Night; see'st thou not Day?

The east begins to lighten. I must down,
And give my brother place.

Night. Oh, I could frown <sup>155</sup>
To see the Day, the Day that flings his light
Upon my kingdom and contemns old Night!
Let him go on and flame! I hope to see
Another wild-fire in his axle-tree,
And all fall drencht. But I forget; — speak, queen: <sup>160</sup>

The Day grows on; I must no more be seen.
Cynth. Heave up thy drowsy head and see
A greater light, a greater majesty,
Between our set<sup>2</sup> and us! Whip up the team:
The Day breaks here, and yon same flashing stream<sup>3</sup> <sup>165</sup>
Shot from the south. Say, which way wilt thou go?

Night. I'll vanish into mists.
Cynth. I into Day.

Exeunt NIGHT and CYNTHIA.
Finis Masque.

King. Take lights there! — Ladies, get the bride to bed. —

We will not see you laid; good night, Amintor:
We'll ease you of that tedious ceremony. <sup>170</sup>
Were it my case, I should think time run slow.

If thou be'st noble, youth, get me a boy,
That may defend my kingdoms from my foes.

Amin. All happiness to you!
King. Good night, Melantius. Exeunt.

ACT II

[SCENE I.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter EVADNE, ASPATIA, DULA, and other
Ladies.

Dula. Madam, shall we undress you for this fight?

The wars are nak'd that you must make tonight.

<sup>1</sup> So Q1. Q2. A thanks to every one, and.
<sup>2</sup> Setting, the West. Qq. Seel, emended by Seward.

Evad. You are very merry, Dula.
Dula. I should be Far merrier, madam, if it were with me
As it is with you.

Evad. How's that?
Dula. That I might go
To bed with him wi' th' credit that you do.

Evad. Why, how now, wench?
Dula. Come, ladies, will you help?

Evad. I am soon undone.
Dula. And as soon done:

Good store of clothes will trouble you at both.
Evad. Art thou drunk, Dula?

Dula. Why, here 's none but we. <sup>10</sup>
Evad. Thou think'st belike there is no modesty

When we're alone.
Dula. Ay, by my troth, you hit my thoughts aright.

Evad. You prick me, lady.
Lady. 'Tis against my will.

Dula. Anon you must endure more and lie still; <sup>15</sup>

You're best to practise.
Evad. Sure, this wench is mad.

Dula. No, faith, this is a trick that I have had

Since I was fourteen.
Evad. 'Tis high time to leave it.

Dula. Nay, now I'll keep it till the trick leave me.

A dozen wanton words put in your head <sup>20</sup>
Will make you livelier in your husband's bed.

Evad. Nay, faith, then take it.<sup>5</sup>
Dula. Take it, madam! Where?

We all, I hope, will take it that are here.
Evad. Nay, then I'll give you o'er.

Dula. So will I make
The ablest man in Rhodes, or his heart ache. <sup>25</sup>

Evad. Wilt take my place to-night?
Dula. I'll hold your cards

Against any two I know.
Evad. What wilt thou do?

Dula. Madam, we'll do't, and make 'em leave play too.

Evad. Aspatia, take her part.
Dula. I will refuse it:

She will pluck down a side; <sup>30</sup> she does not use it.

Evad. Why, do, I prithee.
Dula. You will find the play

Quickly, because your head lies well that way.
Evad. I thank thee, Dula. Would thou couldst instil

Some of thy mirth into Aspatia!
Nothing but sad thoughts in her breast do dwell: <sup>35</sup>

Methinks, a mean betwixt you would do well.
Dula. She is in love: hang me, if I were <sup>40</sup>

But I could run<sup>7</sup> my country. I love too
To do those things that people in love do.

Asp. It were a timeless<sup>8</sup> smile should prove my cheek. <sup>40</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Cause the loss of the game.
<sup>7</sup> Drive at a fast pace. 8 Untimely.

It were a fitter hour for me to laugh,
When at the altar the religious priest
Were pacifying the offended powers With sacrifice, than now. This should have been

My rite;<sup>1</sup> and all your hands have been employ'd <sup>45</sup>

In giving me a spotless offering
To young Amintor's bed, as we are now
For you. Pardon, Evadne: would my worth
Were great as yours, or that the King, or he,
Or both, thought so! Perhaps he found me worthless: <sup>50</sup>

But till he did so, in these ears of mine,
These credulous ears, he pour'd the sweetest words

That art or love could frame. If he were false,
Pardon it, Heaven! and, if I did want
Virtue, you safely may forgive that too; <sup>55</sup>
For I have lost none that I had from you.

Evad. Nay, leave this sad talk, madam.

Asp. Would I could!
Then I should leave the cause.

Evad. See, if you have not spoil'd all Dula's mirth!

Asp. Thou think'st thy heart hard; but, if thou be'st caught, <sup>60</sup>

Remember me; thou shalt perceive a fire
Shot suddenly into thee.

Dula. That's not so good;
Let 'em shtob anything but fire, I fear 'em
not.

Asp. Well, wench, thou may'st be taken.

Evad. Ladies, good-night; I'll do the rest myself. <sup>65</sup>

Dula. Nay, let your lord do some.

Asp. [singing.]

Lay a garland on my hearse
Of the dismal yew —

Evad. That's one of your sad songs, madam.

Asp. Believe me, 't is a very pretty one. <sup>70</sup>

Evad. How is it, madam?

Asp. [singing.]

Lay a garland on my hearse
Of the dismal yew;
Maidens, willow-branches bear;
Say I died true. <sup>75</sup>

My love was false, but I was firm
From my hour of birth:

Upon my buried body lie
Lightly, gentle earth!

Evad. Fie on 't, madam! The words are so strange, they <sup>80</sup>

Are able to make one dream of hobgoblins. —
"I could never have the power" — sing that,

Dula.

Dula. [singing.]

I could never have the power
To love one above an hour,
But my heart would prompt mine eye <sup>85</sup>
On some other man to fly.

Venus, fix mine eyes fast,
Or, if not, give me all that I shall see at last!

Evad. So, leave me now.

Dula. Nay, we must see you laid. <sup>90</sup>

<sup>1</sup> So Dyce. Q<sub>1</sub> right. Other Q<sub>q</sub>. and F night.

Asp. Madam, good night. May all the marriage-joys

That longing maids imagine in their beds
Prove so unto you! May no discontent
Grow 'twixt your love and you! but, if there do,
Inquire of me, and I will guide your moan; <sup>95</sup>

Teach you an artificial<sup>2</sup> way to grieve,
To keep your sorrow waking. Love your lord
No worse than I; but, if you love so well,
Alas, you may displease him! so did I.
This is the last time you shall look on me. — <sup>100</sup>
Ladies, farewell. As soon as I am dead, Come all and watch one night about my hearse;

Bring each a mournful story and a tear,
To offer at it when I go to earth;
With flattering ivy clasp my coffin round; <sup>105</sup>
Write on my brow my fortune; let my bier
Be borne by virgins, that shall sing by course<sup>3</sup>
The truth of maids and perjuries of men.

Evad. Alas, I pity thee.

All. Madam, good night. Exit EVADNE.

1 Lady. Come, we'll let in the bridegroom.

Dula. Where's my lord? <sup>110</sup>

1 Lady. Here, take this light.

Enter AMINTOR.

Dula. You'll find her in the dark.

1 Lady. Your lady's scarce a-bed yet; you must help her.

Asp. Go, and be happy in your lady's love.
May all the wrongs that you have done to me
Be utterly forgotten in my death! <sup>115</sup>

I'll trouble you no more; yet I will take
A parting kiss, and will not be denied.

[Kisses AMINTOR.]
You'll come, my lord, and see the virgins weep

When I am laid in earth, though you yourself
Can know no pity. Thus I wind myself <sup>120</sup>

Into this willow-garland, and am prouder
That I was once your love, though now re-
fus'd,

Than to have had another true to me.
So with my prayers I leave you, and must try
Some yet unpraectis'd way to grieve and die. <sup>125</sup>

Exit.

Dula. Come, ladies, will you go?

All. Good night, my lord.

Amin. Much happiness unto you all!

Exeunt [DULA and] LADIES.

I did that lady wrong. Methinks, I feel
A grief shoot suddenly through all my veins;

Mine eyes rain: this is strange at such a time. <sup>130</sup>

It was the King first mov'd me to 't; but he Has not my will in keeping. Why do I
Perplex myself thus? Something whispers me,

Go not to bed. My guilt is not so great
As mine own conscience, too sensible, <sup>135</sup>

Would make me think; I only brake a promise,

And 't was the King that forc'd me. Timorous
flesh,

Why shak'st thou so? Away, my idle fears!

Re-enter EVADNE.

Yonder she is, the lustre of whose eye
Can blot away the sad remembrance 140
Of all these things. — Oh, my Evadne, spare
That tender body; let it not take cold!
The vapours of the night will not fall here.
To bed, my love: Hymen will punish us
For being slack performers of his rites. 146
Cam'st thou to call me?

Evad. No.

Amin. Come, come, my love,
And let us lose ourselves to one another.

Why art thou up so long?

Evad. I am not well.

Amin. To bed then; let me wind thee in these arms

Till I have banisht sickness.

Evad. Good my lord, 150

I cannot sleep.

Amin. Evadne, we will watch;

I mean no sleeping.

Evad. I'll not go to bed.

Amin. I prithee, do.

Evad. I will not for the world.

Amin. Why, my dear love?

Evad. Why! I have sworn I will not.

Amin. Sworn!

Evad. Ay.

Amin. How? Sworn, Evadne! 155

Evad. Yes, sworn, Amintor; and will swear
again,

If you will wish to hear me.

Amin. To whom have you sworn this?

Evad. If I should name him, the matter were not great.

Amin. Come, this is but the coyness of a bride. 160

Evad. The coyness of the bride!

Amin. How prettily

That frown becomes thee!

Evad. Do you like it so?

Amin. Thou canst not dress thy face in such a look

But I shall like it.

Amin. Why do you ask? 165

Evad. That I may show you one less pleasing to you.

Amin. How's that?

Evad. That I may show you one less pleasing to you.

Amin. I prithee, put thy jests in milder looks;

It shows as thou wert angry.

Evad. So perhaps 170

I am indeed.

Amin. Why, who has done thee wrong?

Name me the man, and by thyself I swear,

Thy yet unconquered self, I will revenge thee!

Evad. Now I shall try thy truth. If thou dost love me,

Thou weigh'st not anything compar'd with
me: 175

Life, honour, joys eternal, all delights

This world can yield, or hopeful people feign,
Or in the life to come, are light as air
To a true lover when his lady frowns,
And bids him, "Do this." Wilt thou kill this
man? 180

Swear, my Amintor, and I'll kiss the sin
Off from thy lips.

Amin. I wo' not swear, sweet love,
Till I do know the cause.

Evad. I would thou wouldst.
Why, it is thou that wrong'st me; I hate
thee;

Thou should'st have kill'd thyself. 185

Amin. If I should know that, I should quickly kill

The man you hated.

Evad. Know it, then, and do 't.

Amin. Oh, no! what look soe'er thou shalt put on

To try my faith, I shall not think thee false;

I cannot find one blemish in thy face, 190
Where falsehood should abide. Leave, and to bed.

If you have sworn to any of the virgins
That were your old companions, to preserve
Your maidenhead a night, it may be done
Without this means.

Evad. A maidenhead, Amintor, 195
At my years!

Amin. Sure she raves; this cannot be
Her natural temper. — Shall I call thy maids?
Either thy healthful sleep hath left thee long,
Or else some fever rages in thy blood.

Evad. Neither, Amintor: think you I am mad, 200

Because I speak the truth?

Amin. [Is this the truth?]<sup>2</sup>
Will you not lie with me to-night?

Evad. To-night!
You talk as if [you thought]<sup>2</sup> I would hereafter.

Amin. Hereafter! yes, I do.

Evad. You are deceiv'd.
Put off amazement, and with patience mark 205

What I shall utter, for the oracle

Knows nothing truer. 'Tis not for a night

Or two that I forbear thy bed, but ever.

Amin. I dream. Awake, Amintor!

Evad. You hear right:
I sooner will find out the beds of snakes, 210

And with my youthful blood warm their cold
flesh,

Letting them curl themselves about my limbs,
Than sleep one night with thee. This is not feign'd,

Nor sounds it like the coyness of a bride.

Amin. Is flesh so earthly to endure all
this? 215

Are these the joys of marriage? Hymen, keep
This story, that will make succeeding youth

Neglect thy ceremonies, from all ears;

Let it not rise up, for thy shame and mine

To after-ages: we will scorn thy laws, 220

If thou no better bless them. Touch the heart
Of her that thou hast sent me, or the world

Shall know; there's not an altar that will smoke

<sup>2</sup> Only in Q<sub>4</sub>.

In praise of thee ; we will adopt us sons ;
Then virtue shall inherit, and not blood. 225
If we do lust, we'll take the next we meet,
Serving ourselves as other creatures do ;
And never take note of the female more,
Nor of her issue. — I do rage in vain ;
She can but jest. — Oh, pardon me, my love ! 230
So dear the thoughts are that I hold of thee,
That I must break forth. Satisfy my fear ;
It is a pain, beyond the hand of death,
To be in doubt. Confirm it with an oath,
If this be true.

Evad. Do you invent the form ; 235
Let there be in it all the binding words
Devils and conjurers can put together,
And I will take it. I have sworn before,
And here by all things holy do again,
Never to be acquainted with thy bed ! 240
Is your doubt over now ?

Amin. I know too much ; would I had doubted still !

Was ever such a marriage-night as this !
You powers above, if you did ever mean
Man should be us'd thus, you have thought a
way 245

How he may bear himself, and save his honour :
Instruct me in it ; for to my dull eyes
There is no mean, no moderate course to run ;
I must live scorn'd, or be a murderer.
Is there a third ? Why is this night so calm ? 250
Why does not Heaven speak in thunder to us,
And drown her voice ?

Evad. This rage will do no good.
Amin. Evadne, hear me. Thou hast ta'en an oath,

But such a rash one, that to keep it were Worse than to swear it. Call it back to thee ; 255
Such vows as that never ascend to Heaven ;
A tear or two will wash it quite away.
Have mercy on my youth, my hopeful youth,
If thou be pitiful ! for, without boast,
This land was proud of me. What lady was
there, 260

That men call'd fair and virtuous in this isle,
That would have shunn'd my love ? It is in
thee

To make me hold this worth. Oh, we vain
men,

That trust [out]<sup>1</sup> all our reputation
To rest upon the weak and yielding hand 265
Of feeble woman ! But thou art not stone ;
Thy flesh is soft, and in thine eyes doth dwell
The spirit of love ; thy heart cannot be hard.
Come, lead me from the bottom of despair
To all the joys thou hast ; I know thou wilt ; 270
And make me careful lest the sudden change
O'ercome my spirits.

Evad. When I call back this oath,
The pains of hell environ me !

Amin. I sleep, and am too temperate. Come to bed !

Or by those hairs, which, if thou hadst a soul 275
Like to thy locks, were threads for kings to wear

About their arms —

<sup>1</sup> In Q<sub>3</sub> only.

Evad. Why, so perhaps they are.
Amin. I'll drag thee to my bed, and make thy tongue

Undo this wicked oath, or on thy flesh
I'll print a thousand wounds to let out life ! 280

Evad. I fear thee not : do what thou dar'st
to me !

Every ill-sounding word or threat'ning look
Thou shew'st to me will be reveng'd at full.

Amin. It will not sure, Evadne ?
Evad. Do not you hazard that.

Amin. Ha' ye your champions ? 285
Evad. Alas, Amintor, think'st thou I forbear

To sleep with thee, because I have put on A maiden's strictness ? Look upon these cheeks,

And thou shalt find the hot and rising blood
Unapt for such a vow. No ; in this heart 290

There dwells as much desire and as much will
To put that wished<sup>2</sup> act in practice as ever yet
Was known to woman ; and they have been shown

Both. But it was the folly of thy youth
To think this beauty, to what land<sup>3</sup> soe'er 295

It shall be call'd, shall stoop to any second.
I do enjoy the best, and in that height

Have sworn to stand or die. You guess the man.

Amin. No ; let me know the man that wrongs me so,

That I may cut his body into motes, 300
And scatter it before the northern wind.

Evad. You dare not strike him.
Amin. Do not wrong me so.

Yes, if his body were a poisonous plant
That it were death to touch, I have a soul
Will throw me on him.

Evad. Why, 't is the King.
Amin. The King ! 305

Evad. What will you do now ?
Amin. 'T is not the King !

Evad. What did he make this match for, dull Amintor ?

Amin. Oh, thou hast nam'd a word, that wipes away

All thoughts revengful ! In that sacred name,
"The King," there lies a terror. What frail
man 310

Dares lift his hand against it ? Let the gods
Speak to him when they please : till when, let us
Suffer and wait.

Evad. Why should you fill yourself so full of heat,

And haste so to my bed ? I am no virgin. 315
Amin. What devil put it in thy fancy, then,
To marry me ?

Evad. Alas, I must have one
To father children, and to bear the name
Of husband to me, that my sin may be More honourable !

Amin. What strange thing am I ! 320
Evad. A miserable one ; one that myself Am sorry for.

Amin. Why, show it then in this :

Why, show it then in this :

<sup>3</sup> Bullen conjectures hand.

If thou hast pity, though thy love be none,
Kill me; and all true lovers, that shall live
In after ages crost in their desires, <sup>325</sup>
Shall bless thy memory, and call thee good,
Because such mercy in thy heart was found,
To rid <sup>1</sup> a ling'ring wretch.

Evad. I must have one
To fill thy room again, if thou wert dead;
Else, by this night, I would! I pity thee. <sup>330</sup>
Amin. These strange and sudden injuries have fall'n

So thick upon me, that I lose all sense
Of what they are. Methinks, I am not wrong'd;
Nor is it aught, if from the censuring world
I can but hide it. Reputation, <sup>335</sup>
Thou art a word, no more! — But thou hast
shown

An impudence so high, that to the world
I fear thou wilt betray or shame thyself.

Evad. To cover shame, I took thee; never
fear

That I would blaze <sup>2</sup> myself.
Amin. Nor let the King <sup>340</sup> Know I conceive he wrongs 'me; then mine
honour

Will thrust me into action, though <sup>3</sup> my flesh
Could bear with patience. And it is some ease
To me in these extremes, that I know this Before I toucht thee; else, had all the sins <sup>345</sup>
Of mankind stood betwixt me and the King,
I had gone through 'em to his heart and thine.
I have lost <sup>4</sup> one desire: 'tis not his crown
Shall buy me to thy bed, now I resolve <sup>5</sup>
He has dishonour'd thee. Give me thy hand: <sup>350</sup>
Be careful of thy credit, and sin close; <sup>6</sup>
'Tis all I wish. Upon thy chamber-floor
I'll rest to-night, that morning visitors
May think we did as married people use: <sup>354</sup>
And prithee, smile upon me when they come,
And seem to toy, as if thou hadst been pleased
With what we did.

Evad. Fear not; I will do this.
Amin. Come, let us practise; and, as wandonists
As ever loving ' bride and bridegroom met,
Let's laugh and enter here.

Evad. I am content. <sup>360</sup>
Amin. Down all the swellings of my troubled
heart!

When we walk thus intwin'd, let all eyes see
If ever lovers better did agree. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>8</sup>

Enter ASPATIA, ANTIPHILA, and OLYMPIAS.

Asp. Away, you are not sad! force it no further.

Good gods, how well you look! Such a fall colour

Young bashful brides put on: sure, you are new married!

Ant. Yes, madam, to your grief.
Asp. Alas, poor wenches!

<sup>1</sup> Despatch. <sup>2</sup> Proclaim.
<sup>3</sup> So edd. 1778. Early Qq. and F that.
<sup>6</sup> Am convinced. <sup>7</sup> Q<sub>1</sub> longing.

Go learn to love first; learn to lose yourselves; <sup>5</sup>
Learn to be flattered, and believe and bless
The double tongue that did it; make a faith
Out of the miracles of ancient lovers,
Such as spake truth and died in 't; and, like
me,

Believe all faithful, and be miserable. <sup>10</sup>
Did you ne'er love yet, wenches? Speak,
Olympias:

Thou hast an easy temper, fit for stamp.

Olym. Never.
Asp. Nor you, Antiphila? <sup>15</sup>
Ant. Nor I.

Asp. Then, my good girls, be more than women, wise;

At least be more than I was; and be sure <sup>15</sup>
You credit any thing the light gives life to,
Before a man. Rather believe the sea

Weeps for the ruin'd merchant, when he roars;
Rather, the wind courts but the pregnant sails, When the strong cordage cracks; rather, the sun <sup>20</sup>

Comes but to kiss the fruit in wealthy autumn,
When all falls blasted. If you needs must love,
(Forc'd by ill fate,) take to your maiden-bosoms
Two dead-cold aspics, and of them make lovers.
They cannot flatter nor forswear; one kiss <sup>25</sup>
Makes a long peace for all. But man —

Oh, that beast man! Come, let's be sad, my girls:

That down-cast of thine eye, Olympias,
Shows a fine sorrow. — Mark, Antiphila;
Just such another was the nymph Oenone, <sup>30</sup>
When Paris brought home Helen. — Now, a tear;

And then thou art a piece expressing fully
The Carthage queen, when from a cold sea-rock,

Full with her sorrow, she tied fast her eyes <sup>34</sup>
To the fair Trojan ships; and, having lost them, Just as thine does, down stole a tear. — An-tiphila,

What would this wench do, if she were Aspatia?
Here she would stand, till some more pitying
god

Turn'd her to marble! — 'Tis enough, my wench!

Show me the piece of needlework you wrought.
Ant. Of Ariadne, madam?

Asp. Yes, that piece. — <sup>41</sup>
This should be Theseus; h'as a cozening face. —
You meant him for a man?

Ant. He was so, madam.
Asp. Why, then, 'tis well enough. — Never look back;

You have a full wind and a false heart, The-seus. — <sup>45</sup>

Does not the story say, his keel was split,
Or his masts spent, or some kind rock or other
Met with his vessel?

Ant. Not as I remember.
Asp. It should ha' been so. Could the gods know this,

And not, of all their number, raise a storm? <sup>50</sup>
But they are all as evil. This false smile
Was well exprest; just such another caught
me. —

You shall not go so.<sup>1</sup>—

Antiphila, in this place work a quicksand,
And over it a shallow smiling water, 55
And his ship ploughing it; and then a Fear:
Do that Fear to the life,<sup>2</sup> wench.

Ant. 'T will wrong the story.

Asp. 'T will make the story, wrong'd by wanton poets,

Live long and be believ'd. But where's the lady?

Ant. There, madam. 60

Asp. Fie, you have mist it here, Antiphila;
You are much mistaken, wench.

These colours are not dull and pale enough
To show a soul so full of misery

As this sad lady's was. Do it by me, 65

Do it again by me, the lost Aspatia;

And you shall find all true but the wild island.

I stand upon the sea-breach now, and think<sup>3</sup>

Mine arms thus, and mine hair blown with the wind,

Wild as that desert; and let all about me 70

Tell that I am forsaken. Do my face

(If thou had'st ever feeling of a sorrow)

Thus, thus, Antiphila: strive to make me look

Like Sorrow's monument; and the trees about

me,

Let them be dry and leafless; let the rocks 75

Groan with continual surges; and behind me,

Make all a desolation. See, see, wenches,

A miserable life<sup>4</sup> of this poor picture!

Olym. Dear madam!

Asp. I have done. Sit down; and let us

Upon that point fix all our eyes, that point

there. 80

Make a dull silence, till you feel a sudden sad-

ness

Give us new souls.

Enter CALLANAX.

Cal. The King may do this, and he may not do it:

My child is wrong'd, disgrac'd.—Well, how now, huswives? 84

What, at your ease! Is this a time to sit still?

Up, you young lazy whores, up, or I'll swinge
you!

Olym. Nay, good my lord—

Cal. You'll lie down shortly. Get you in, and work!

What, are you grown so resty you want heats?

We shall have some of the court-boys do that office. 90

Ant. My lord, we do no more than we are
chang'd:

It is the lady's pleasure we be thus in grief she is forsaken.

Cal. There's a rogue too,
A young dissembling slave!—Well, get you
in.—

I'll have a bout with that boy. 'T is high time
Now to be valiant: I confess my youth 95

Was never prone that way. What, made an ass!

<sup>4</sup> Living representation.

A court-stale!<sup>5</sup> Well, I will be valiant,
And beat some dozen of these whelps; I will!
And there's another of 'em, a trim cheating
soldier; 100

I'll maul that rascal; has out-brav'd me
twice;

But now, I thank the gods, I am valiant.—
Go, get you in.—I'll take a course with all.

Exunt.

ACT III

[SCENE I.]<sup>6</sup>

Enter CLEON, STRATO, and DIPHILUS.

Cle. Your sister is not up yet.

Diph. Oh, brides must take their morning's rest; the night is troublesome.

Strato. But not tedious.

Diph. What odds, he has not my sister's [5
maidenhead to-night?

Strato. None; it's odds against any bridegroom living, he ne'er gets it while he lives.

Diph. You're merry with my sister; you'll please to allow me the same freedom with [10 your mother.

Strato. She's at your service.

Diph. Then she's merry enough of herself;
she needs no tickling. Knock at the door.

Strato. We shall interrupt them. 15

Diph. No matter; they have the year before them. [STRATO knocks at the door.]

Good morrow, sister. Spare yourself to-day;
The night will come again.

Enter AMINTOR.

Amin. Who's there? My brother! I'm no readier<sup>7</sup> yet. 20

Your sister is but now up.

Diph. You look as you had lost your eyes tonight:

I think you ha' not slept.

Amin. I' faith I have not.

Diph. You have done better, then.

Amin. We ventur'd for a boy; when he is twelve, 25

'A shall command against the foes of Rhodes.
Shall we be merry?

Strato. You cannot; you want sleep.

Amin. 'Tis true.—(Aside.) But she,

As if she had drank Lethe, or had made
Even with Heaven, did fetch so still a sleep, 30

So sweet and sound —

Diph. What's that?

Amin. Your sister frets

This morning; and does turn her eyes upon me,
As people on their headsman. She does chafe,

And kiss, and chafe again, and clap my cheeks:
She's in another world. 35

Diph. Then I had lost: I was about to lay
You had not got her maidenhead to-night.

Amin. [Aside.] Ha! does he not mock me?
You'd lost indeed;

I do not use to bungle.

Cleo. You do deserve her.
Amin. (Aside.) I laid my lips to hers, and that wild breath, <sup>40</sup>
 That was so rude and rough to me last night,
 Was sweet as April. I'll be guilty too,
 If these be the effects.

Enter MELANTIUS.

Mel. Good day, Amintor; for to me the name
 Of brother is too distant: we are friends, <sup>45</sup>
 And that is nearer.

Amin. Dear Melantius!
 Let me behold thee. Is it possible?

Mel. What sudden gaze is this?

Amin. 'Tis wondrous strange!

Mel. Why does thine eye desire so strict a view
 Of that it knows so well? There's nothing
 here <sup>50</sup>
 That is not thine.

Amin. I wonder much, Melantius,
 To see those noble looks, that make me think
 How virtuous thou art: and, on the sudden,
 'Tis strange to me thou shouldst have worth and honour;

Or not be base, and false, and treacherous, <sup>55</sup>
 And every ill. But —

Mel. Stay, stay, my friend;
 I fear this sound will not become our loves.
 No more; embrace me.<sup>1</sup>

Amin. Oh, mistake me not!
 I know thee to be full of all those deeds <sup>60</sup>
 That we frail men call good; but by the course
 Of nature thou shouldst be as quickly chang'd
 As are the winds; dissembling as the sea,
 That now wears brows as smooth as virgins' be,
 Tempting the merchant to invade his face,
 And in an hour calls his billows up, <sup>65</sup>
 And shoots 'em at the sun, destroying all
 'A carries on him.—(Aside.) Oh, how near am
 I

To utter my sick thoughts!

Mel. But why, my friend, should I be so by nature?

Amin. I have wed thy sister, who hath vir-tuous thoughts <sup>70</sup>
 Enough for one whole family; and it is strange
 That you should feel no want.

Mel. Believe me, this is compliment too cunning for me.

Diph. What should I be then by the course of nature, <sup>74</sup>
 They having both robb'd me of so much virtue?

Str. Oh, call the bride, my Lord Amintor,
 That we may see her blush, and turn her eyes
 down.

It is the prettiest sport!

Amin. Evadne!

Evad. (within.) My lord?

Amin. Come forth, my love;
 Your brothers do attend to wish you joy. <sup>80</sup>

Evad. [within.] I am not ready yet.

Amin. Enough, enough.

Evad. [within.] They'll mock me.

Amin. Faith, thou shalt come in.

Enter EVADNE.

Mel. Good morrow, sister. He that understands

Whom you have wed, need not to wish you joy;
 You have enough: take heed you be not proud.

Diph. Oh, sister, what have you done? <sup>85</sup>

Evad. I done! why, what have I done?

Str. My Lord Amintor swears you are no maid now.

Evad. Fish!

Str. I' faith, he does.

Evad. I knew I should be mockt. <sup>90</sup>

Diph. With a truth.

Evad. If 't were to do again,
 In faith I would not marry.

Amin. (Aside.) Nor I, by Heaven!

Diph. Sister, Dula swears
 She heard you cry two rooms off.

Evad. Fie, how you talk!

Diph. Let's see you walk, Evadne. By my troth, <sup>95</sup>

You're spoil'd.<sup>2</sup>

Mel. Amintor.—

Amin. Ha!

Mel. Thou art sad.

Amin. Who, I? I thank you for that.
 Shall Diphilus, thou, and I, sing a catch?

Mel. How! <sup>100</sup>

Amin. Prithee, let's.

Mel. Nay, that's too much the other way.

Amin. I'm so light'ned with my happiness! —
 How dost thou, love? Kiss me.

Evad. I cannot love you, you tell tales of
 me. <sup>105</sup>

Amin. Nothing but what becomes us.—
 Gentlemen,

Would you had all such wives, and all the
 world,

That I might be no wonder! You're all sad:

What, do you envy me? I walk, methinks,
 On water, and ne'er sink, I am so light. <sup>110</sup>

Mel. 'Tis well you are so.

Amin. Well! how can I be other,
 When she looks thus?—Is there no music
 there?

Let's dance.

Mel. Why this is strange, Amintor!

Amin. I do not know myself; yet I could wish

My joy were less. <sup>115</sup>

Diph. I'll marry too, if it will make one
 thus.

Evad. (Aside.) Amintor, hark.

Amin. What says my love?—I must obey.

Evad. You do it survily; 't will be perceiv'd.

Cleo. My lord, the King is here. <sup>120</sup>

Enter KING and LYSIPPUS.

Amin. Where?

Str. And his brother.

King. Good morrow, all!—

Amintor, joy on joy fall thick upon thee!—

And, madam, you are alter'd since I saw you;

<sup>2</sup> In Qq. and F this sentence is given to Evadne, her name becoming a speech-tag.

I must salute you; you are now another's. 126
 How lik'd you your night's rest?
Evad. Ill, sir.
Amin. Indeed,
 She took but little.
Lys. You'll let her take more,
 And thank her too, shortly.
King. Amintor, wert thou truly honest till 130
 Thou wert married?
Amin. Yes, sir.
King. Tell me, then, how shows
 The sport unto thee?
Amin. Why, well.
King. What did you do?
Amin. No more, nor less, than other couples use;
 You know what 'tis; it has but a coarse name.
King. But, prithee, I should think, by her black eye, 135
 And her red cheek, she should be quick and stirring
 In this same business; ha?
Amin. I cannot tell;
 I ne'er tried other, sir; but I perceive
 She is as quick as you delivered.
King. Well, you'll trust me then, Amintor, to choose 140
 A wife for you again?
Amin. No, never, sir.
King. Why, like you this so ill?
Amin. So well I like her.
 For this I bow my knee in thanks to you,
 And unto Heaven will pay my grateful tribute
 Hourly; and do hope we shall draw out 145
 A long contented life together here,
 And die both, full of grey hairs, in one day:
 For which the thanks is yours. But if the powers
 That rule us please to call her first away, Without pride spoke, this world holds not a wife 150
 Worthy to take her room.
King. I do not like this.—All forbear the
 room,
 But you, Amintor, and your lady.
 [Exeunt all but the KING, AMINTOR, and EVADNE.]
 I have some speech with you, that may concern
 Your after living well. 155
Amin. [Aside.] 'A will not tell me that he lies with her!
 If he do, something heavenly stay my heart,
 For I shall be apt to thrust this arm of mine
 To acts unlawful!
King. You will suffer me
 To talk with her, Amintor, and not have 160
 A jealous pang?
Amin. Sir, I dare trust my wife
 With whom she dares to talk, and not be jealous. [Retires.]
King. How do you like Amintor?
Evad. As I did, sir.
King. How's that?
Evad. As one that, to fulfil your will and pleasure, 165
 I have given leave to call me wife and love.
King. I see there is no lasting faith in sin;

They that break word with Heaven will break
 again
 With all the world, and so dost thou with me.
Evad. How, sir?
King. This subtle woman's ignorance 170
 Will not excuse you: thou hast taken oaths,
 So great that, methought, they did misbecome
 A woman's mouth, that thou wouldst ne'er enjoy
 A man but me.
Evad. I never did swear so;
 You do me wrong.
King. Day and night have heard it. 175
Evad. I swore indeed that I would never
 love
 A man of lower place; but, if your fortune
 Should thrust you from this height, I bade you trust
 I would forsake you, and would bend to him
 That won your throne. I love with my ambition, 180
 Not with my eyes. But, if I ever yet
 Touch any other, leprosy light here
 Upon my face! which for your royalty
 I would not stain!
King. Why, thou dissemblest, and
 It is in me to punish thee.
Evad. Why, it is in me, 185
 Then, not to love you, which will more afflict
 Your body than your punishment can mine.
King. But thou hast let Amintor lie with
 thee.
Evad. I ha' not.
King. Impudence! he says himself so.
Evad. 'A lies.
King. 'A does not.
Evad. By this light, he does, 190
 Strangely and basely! and I'll prove it so.
 I did not only shun him for a night,
 But told him I would never close with him.
King. Speak lower; it is false.
Evad. I am no man
 To answer with a blow; or, if I were, 195
 You are the King. But urge me not; 't is most true.
King. Do not I know the uncontrolled
 thoughts
 That youth brings with him, when his blood is high
 With expectation and desire of that
 He long hath waited for? Is not his spirit, 200
 Though he be temperate, of a valiant strain
 As this our age hath known? What could he
 do,
 If such a sudden speech had met his blood,
 But ruin thee for ever, if he had not kill'd
 thee?
 He could not bear it thus: he is as we, 205
 Or any other wrong'd man.
Evad. It is dissembling.
King. Take him! farewell: henceforth I am thy foe;
 And what disgraces I can blot thee with, look
 for.
Evad. Stay, sir!—Amintor!—You shall hear.—Amintor!
Amin. [coming forward.] What, my love. 210

Evad. Amintor, thou hast an ingenious<sup>1</sup> look,
And shouldst be virtuous: it amazeth me
That thou canst make such base malicious lies!

Amin. What, my dear wife?

Evad. Dear wife! I do despise thee.

Why, nothing can be baser than to sow<sup>215</sup>
Dissension amongst lovers.

Amin. Lovers! Who?

Evad. The king and me —

Amin. Oh, God!

Evad. Who should live long, and love without distaste,

Were it not for such pickthanks,<sup>2</sup> as thyself.
Did you lie with me? Swear now, and be pun-isht<sup>220</sup>

In hell for this!

Amin. The faithless sin I made

To fair Aspatia is not yet reveng'd;
It follows me. — I will not lose a word

To this vile woman: but to you, my King,<sup>224</sup>

The anguish of my soul thrusts out this truth:

You're a tyrant! and not so much to wrong

An honest man thus, as to take a pride

In talking with him of it.

Evad. Now, sir, see

How loud this fellow lied!

Amin. You that can know to wrong, should know how men<sup>230</sup>

Must right themselves. What punishment is due

From me to him that shall abuse my bed?

Is it not death? Nor can that satisfy,

Unless I send your limbs<sup>3</sup> through all the land,

To show how nobly I have freed myself.<sup>235</sup>

King. Draw not thy sword; thou know'st I cannot fear

A subject's hand; but thou shalt feel the weight

Of this, if thou dost rage.

Amin. The weight of that!

If you have any worth, for Heaven's sake, think

I fear not swords; for, as you are mere man,<sup>240</sup>

I dare as easily kill you for this deed,

As you dare think to do it. But there is

Divinity about you that strikes dead

My rising passions: as you are my King,

I fall before you, and present my sword<sup>245</sup>

To cut mine own flesh, if it be your will.

Alas, I am nothing but a multitude

Of walking griefs! Yet, should I murder you,

I might before the world take the excuse

Of madness: for, compare my injuries,<sup>250</sup>

And they will well appear too sad a weight

For reason to endure. But, fall I first

Amongst my sorrows, ere my treacherous hand

Touch holy things! But why (I know not what I have to say), why did you choose out me<sup>255</sup>

To make thus wretched? There were thousands,

fools

Easy to work on, and of state enough,

Within the island.

Evad. I would not have a fool;

It were no credit for me.

Amin. Worse and worse!<sup>260</sup>

Thou, that dar'st talk unto thy husband thus,
Profess thyself a whore, and, more than so,
Resolve to be so still! — It is my fate
To bear and bow beneath a thousand griefs,
To keep that little credit with the world! —
But there were wise ones too; you might have ta'en<sup>265</sup>

Another.

King. No: for I believ'd thee honest,

As thou wert valiant.

Amin. All the happiness<sup>4</sup>

Bestow'd upon me turns into disgrace.

Gods, take your honesty again, for I<sup>270</sup>

Am loaden with it! — Good my lord the King,

Be private in it.

King. Thou mayst live, Amintor,

Free as thy king, if thou wilt wink at this,

And be a means that we may meet in secret.

Amin. A bawd! Hold, hold, my breast! A<sup>275</sup> bitter curse

Seize me, if I forget not all respects

That are religious, on another word

Sounded like that; and through a sea of sins

Will wade to my revenge, though I should call

Pains here and after life upon my soul!<sup>280</sup>

King. Well, I am resolute<sup>5</sup> you lay not with

her;

And so I leave you. Exit.

Evad. You must needs be prating;

And see what follows!

Amin. Prithee, vex me not.

Leave me; I am afraid some sudden start

Will pull a murder on me.

Evad. I am gone; <sup>285</sup>

I love my life well. Exit.

Amin. I hate mine as much.

This 'tis to break a troth! I should be glad,

If all this tide of grief would make me mad. Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>6</sup>

Enter MELANTIUS.

Mel. I'll know the cause of all Amintor's
griefs,

Or friendship shall be idle.

Enter CALLANAX.

Cal. Oh, Melantius,

My daughter will die!

Mel. Trust me, I am sorry:

Would thou hadst ta'en her room!

Cal. Thou art a slave,

A cut-throat slave, a bloody treacherous slave!<sup>7</sup>

Mel. Take heed, old man; thou wilt be heard to rave,

And lose thine offices.

Cal. I am valiant grown

At all these years, and thou art but a slave!

Mel. Leave!

Some company will come, and I respect<sup>10</sup>

Thy years, not thee, so much, that I could wish

To laugh at thee alone.

Cal. I'll spoil your mirth:

I mean to fight with thee. There lie, my cloak.

This was my father's sword, and he durst fight.
Are you prepar'd?

Mel. Why wilt thou dote thyself<sup>15</sup>
Out of thy life? Hence, get thee to bed,
Have careful looking-to, and eat warm things,
And trouble not me: my head is full of thoughts
More weighty than thy life or death can be.

Cal. You have a name in war, where you stand safe<sup>20</sup>

Amongst a multitude; but I will try
What you dare do unto a weak old man
In single fight. You will give ground, I fear.
Come, draw,

Mel. I will not draw, unless thou pull'st thy death<sup>25</sup>

Upon thee with a stroke. There's no one blow, That thou canst give hath strength enough to kill me.

Tempt me not so far, then: the power of earth
Shall not redeem thee.

Cal. [Aside.] I must let him alone;
He's stout and able; and, to say the truth,<sup>30</sup>
However I may set a face and talk,
I am not valiant. When I was a youth,
I kept my credit with a testy trick
I had 'mongst cowards, but durst never fight.

Mel. I will not promise to preserve your life,
If you do stay.

Cal. [Aside.] I would give half my land<sup>35</sup>
That I durst fight with that proud man a little.
If I had men to hold him, I would beat him
Till he askt me mercy.

Mel. Sir, will you be gone?

Cal. [Aside.] I dare not stay; but I will go home, and beat<sup>40</sup>

My servants all over for this. Exit.

Mel. This old fellow haunts me.
But the distracted carriage of mine Amintor
Takes deeply on me.<sup>1</sup> I will find the cause:<sup>44</sup>
I fear his conscience cries, he wrong'd Aspatia.

Enter AMINTOR.

Amin. [Aside.] Men's eyes are not so subtle to perceive

My inward misery: I bear my grief Hid from the world. How art thou wretched
then?

For aught I know, all husbands are like me;
And every one I talk with of his wife<sup>50</sup>
Is but a well dissembler of his woes,
As I am. Would I knew it! for the rareness
Afflicts me now.

Mel. Amintor, we have not enjoy'd our<sup>54</sup> friendship of late, for we were wont to change our souls in talk.

Amin. Melantius, I can tell thee a good jest of Strato and a lady the last day.

Mel. How was 't?

Amin. Why, such an odd one!<sup>60</sup>

Mel. I have long'd to speak with you; not of an idle jest, that's forc'd, but of matter you are bound to utter to me.

Amin. What is that, my friend?

Mel. I have observ'd your words fall from your tongue<sup>65</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Affects me deeply.

Wildly; and all your carriage

Like one that strove to shew his merry mood,
When he were ill dispos'd. You were not wont
To put such scorn into your speech, or wear
Upon your face ridiculous jollity.<sup>70</sup>
Some sadness sits here, which your cunning would

Cover o'er with smiles, and 't will not be. What is it?

Amin. A sadness here! What cause
Can fate provide for me to make me so?<sup>74</sup>
Am I not lov'd through all this isle? The King
Rains greatness on me. Have I not received
A lady to my bed, that in her eye
Keeps mounting fire, and on her tender cheeks
Inevitable<sup>2</sup> colour, in her heart

A prison for all virtue? Are not you,<sup>80</sup>
Which is above all joys, my constant friend?
What sadness can I have? No; I am light,
And feel the courses of my blood more warm
And stirring than they were. Faith, marry too;
And you will feel so unexpress a joy<sup>85</sup>
In chaste embraces, that you will indeed
Appear another.

Mel. You may shape, Amintor,
Causes to cozen the whole world withal,
And you yourself too; but 't is not like a friend
To hide your soul from me. 'T is not your nature<sup>90</sup>

To be thus idle. I have seen you stand
As you were blasted 'midst of all your mirth;
Call thrice aloud, and then start, feigning joy
So coldly! — World, what do I here? A friend
Is nothing. Heaven, I would ha' told that man
My secret sins! I'll search an unknown land,<sup>95</sup>
And there plant friendship; all is withered here.
Come with a compliment! I would have fought,
Or told my friend 'a lied, ere sooth'd<sup>2</sup> him so. —
Out of my bosom!<sup>100</sup>

Amin. But there is nothing.

Mel. Worse and worse! farewell:
From this time have acquaintance, but no friend.

Amin. Melantius, stay: you shall know what that is.

Mel. See how you play'd with friendship! Be advise'd

How you give cause unto yourself to say<sup>105</sup>
You ha' lost a friend.

Amin. Forgive what I ha' done;

For I am so o'ergone with injuries
Unheard of, that I lose consideration
Of what I ought to do. Oh, oh!

Mel. Do not weep.
What is 't? May I once but know the man<sup>110</sup>
Hath turn'd my friend thus!

Amin. I had spoke at first,

But that —

Mel. But what?

Amin. I held it most unfit
For you to know. Faith, do not know it yet.

Mel. Thou see'st my love, that will keep company<sup>114</sup>

With thee in tears; hide nothing, then, from me;
For when I know the cause of thy distemper,
With mine old armour I'll adorn myself,

My resolution, and cut through thy foes,
Unto thy quiet, till I place thy heart
As peaceable as spotless innocence. 120

What is it?

Amin. Why, 't is this — it is too big
To get out — let my tears make way awhile.

Mel. Punish me strangely, Heaven, if he escape

Of life or fame, that brought this youth to this!

Amin. Your sister —

Mel. Well said.

Amin. You will wish 't unknown, 125
When you have heard it.

Mel. No.

Amin. Is much to blame,

And to the King has given her honour up,

And lives in whoredom with him.

Mel. How 's this?

Thou art run mad with injury indeed;

Thou couldst not utter this else. Speak again;

For I forgive it freely; tell thy griefs. 131

Amin. She 's wanton: I am loth to say, a

whore,

Though it be true.

Mel. Speak yet again, before mine anger grow

Up beyond throwing down. What are thy

griefs? 135

Amin. By all our friendship, these.

Mel. What, am I tame?

After mine actions, shall the name of friend

Blot all our family, and strike the brand

Of whore upon my sister, unreveng'd?

My shaking flesh, be thou a witness for me, 140

With what unwillingness I go to scourge

This railer, whom my folly hath call'd friend?

I will not take thee basely: thy sword 143

[Draws his sword.]

Hangs near thy hand: draw it, that I may whip

Thy rashness to repentance; draw thy sword!

Amin. Not on thee, did thine anger go as high

As the wild surges. Thou shouldst do me ease

Here and eternally, if thy noble hand

Would cut me from my sorrows.

Mel. This is base

And fearful.<sup>1</sup> They that use to utter lies 150

Provide not blows but words to qualify<sup>2</sup>

The men they wrong'd. Thou hast a guilty cause.

Amin. Thou pleasest me; for so much more like this

Will raise my anger up above my griefs,

(Which is a passion easier to be borne,) 155

And I shall then be happy.

Mel. Take, then, more

To raise thine anger: 't is mere cowardice

Makes thee not draw; and I will leave thee

dead.

However. But if thou art so much prest

With guilt and fear as not to dare to fight, 160

I'll make thy memory loath'd, and fix a scandal

Upon thy name forever.

Amin. [drawing his sword.] Then I draw,

As justly as our magistrates their swords

To cut offenders off. I knew before

'T would grate your ears; but it was base in you

To urge a weighty secret from your friend, 165
And then rage at it. I shall be at ease,
If I be kill'd; and, if you fall by me,
I shall not long outlive you.

Mel. Stay awhile. —

The name of friend is more than family, 170

Or all the world besides: I was a fool.

Thou searching human nature, that didst wake

To do me wrong, thou art inquisitive, 173

And thrusts me upon questions that will take

My sleep away! Would I had died, ere knowu

This sad dishonour! — Pardon me, my friend!

[Sheaths his sword.]

If thou wilt strike, here is a faithful heart;

Pierce it, for I will never heave my hand

To thine. Behold the power thou hast in me!

I do believe my sister is a whore, 180

A leprous one. Put up thy sword, young man.

Amin. How should I bear it, then, she being

so?

I fear, my friend, that you will lose me shortly;

[Sheaths his sword.]

And I shall do a foul act on myself,

Through these disgraces.

Mel. Better half the land 185

Were buried quick<sup>3</sup> together. No, Amintor;

Thou shalt have ease. Oh, this adulterous King,

That drew her to 't! Where got he the spirit

To wrong me so?

Amin. What is it, then, to me,

If it be wrong to you?

Mel. Why, not so much. 190

The credit of our house is thrown away.

But from his iron den I'll waken Death,

And hurl him on this King. My honesty

Shall steel my sword; and on its horrid point

I'll wear my cause, that shall amaze the eyes

Of this proud man, and be too glitt'ring 195

For him to look on.

Amin. I have quite undone my fame.

Mel. Dry up thy watery eyes,

And cast a manly look upon my face; 200

For nothing is so wild as I, thy friend,

Till I have freed thee. Still this swelling breast.

I go thus from thee, and will never cease

My vengeance till I find thy heart at peace.

Amin. It must not be so. Stay. Mine eyes would tell 205

How loth I am to this; but, love and tears,

Leave me awhile! For I have hazarded

All that this world calls happy. — Thou hast

wrought

A secret from me, under name of friend,

Which art could ne'er have found, nor torture 210

wrung

From out my bosom. Give it me again;

For I will find it, wheresoe'er it lies,

Hide in the mortal'st part. Invent a way

To give it back.

Mel. Why would you have it back?

I will to death pursue him with revenge, 215

Amin. Therefore I call it back from thee; for

I know

Thy blood so high, that thou wilt stir in this,

And shame me to posterity. Take to thy weapon! [Draws his sword.]

Mel. Hear thy friend, that bears more years than thou.

Amin. I will not hear: but draw, or I —

Mel. Aminitor! <sup>220</sup>

Amin. Draw, then; for I am full as resolute As fame and honour can enforce me be: I cannot linger. Draw!

Mel. I do. But is not My share of credit equal with thine, If I do stir?

Amin. No; for it will be call'd <sup>225</sup> Honour in thee to spill thy sister's blood, If she her birth abuse; and, on the King A brave revenge: but on me, that have walkt With patience in it, it will fix the name Of fearful cuckold. Oh, that word! Be quick.

Mel. Then, join with me.

Amin. I dare not do a sin, <sup>231</sup> Or else I would. Be speedy.

Mel. Then, dare not fight with me; for that's a sin. —

His grief distracts him. — Call thy thoughts again, <sup>234</sup>

And to thyself pronounce the name of friend, And see what that will work. I will not fight.

Amin. You must.

Mel. [sheathing his sword.] I will be kill'd first. Though my passions Offered the like to you, 'tis not this earth Shall buy my reason to it. Think awhile, <sup>240</sup> For you are (I must weep when I speak that) Almost besides yourself.

Amin. [sheathing his sword.] Oh, my soft temper!

So many sweet words from thy sister's mouth, I am afraid would make me take her to <sup>245</sup> Embrace, and pardon her. I am mad indeed, And know not what I do. Yet, have a care Of me in what thou dost.

Mel. Why, thinks my friend I will forget his honour? or, to save The bravery of our house, will lose his fame, <sup>250</sup> And fear to touch the throne of majesty?

Amin. A curse will follow that; but rather live

And suffer with me.

Mel. I will do what worth Shall bid me, and no more.

Amin. Faith, I am sick, And desperately I hope; yet, leaning thus, <sup>255</sup> I feel a kind of ease.

Mel. Come, take again Your mirth about you.

Amin. I shall never do 't.

Mel. I warrant you; look up; we'll walk together;

Put thine arm here; all shall be well again.

Amin. Thy love (oh, wretched!) ay, thy love Melantius; <sup>260</sup>

Why, I have nothing else.

Mel. Be merry, then. Exeunt.

Re-enter MELANTIUS.

Mel. This worthy young man may do violence Upon himself; but I have cherish'd him To my best power, and sent him smiling from me,

To counterfeit again. Sword, hold thine edge; My heart will never fail me.

Enter DIPHILUS.

Diphilus! <sup>265</sup>

Thou com'st as sent.

Diph. Yonder has been such laughing

Mel. Betwixt whom?

Diph. Why, our sister and the King I thought their spleens would break; they laugh'd us all

Out of the room. <sup>270</sup>

Mel. They must weep, Diphilus.

Diph. Must they?

Mel. They must.

Thou art my brother; and, if I did believe Thou hadst a base thought, I would rip it out, Lie where it durst.

Diph. You should not; I would first Mangle myself and find it.

Mel. That was spoke <sup>275</sup> According to our strain.<sup>1</sup> Come, join thy hands to mine,

And swear a firmness to what project I Shall lay before thee.

Diph. You do wrong us both. People hereafter shall not say there past A bond, more than our loves, to tie our lives And deaths together. <sup>281</sup>

Mel. It is as nobly said as I would wish.

Anon I'll tell you wonders: we are wrong'd.

Diph. But I will tell you now, we'll right ourselves.

Mel. Stay not: prepare the armour in my house; <sup>285</sup>

And what friends you can draw unto our side, Not knowing of the cause, make ready too.

Haste, Diphilus, the time requires it, haste! — Exit DIPHILUS.

I hope my cause is just; I know my blood Tells me it is; and I will credit it. <sup>290</sup>

To take revenge, and lose myself withal,

Were idle; and to scape impossible,

Without I had the fort, which (misery!) Remaining in the hands of my old enemy

Calianax — but I must have it. See <sup>295</sup>

Re-enter CALIANAX.

Where he comes shaking by me! — Good my lord,

Forget your spleen to me. I never wrong'd you, But would have peace with every man.

Cal. 'Tis well; If I durst fight, your tongue would lie at quiet.

Mel. You're touchy without all cause.

Cal. Do, mock me. <sup>300</sup>

Mel. By mine honour, I speak truth.

Cal. Honour! where is 't?

Mel. See, what starts you make Into your idle hatred, to my love

And freedom to you. I come with resolution To obtain a suit of you.

Cal. A suit of me! <sup>305</sup>

'Tis very like it should be granted, sir.

Mel. Nay, go not hence.

<sup>1</sup> Race, stock.

'Tis this; you have the keeping of the fort,
And I would wish you, by the love you ought
To bear unto me, to deliver it 310
Into my hands.

Cal. I am in hope thou art mad,
To talk to me thus.

Mel. But there is a reason
To move you to it: I would kill the King,
That wrong'd you and your daughter.

Cal. Out, traitor!

Mel. Nay, but stay: I cannot scape, the deed
once done, 315

Without I have this fort.

Cal. And should I help thee?
Now thy treacherous mind betrays itself.

Mel. Come, delay me not;
Give me a sudden answer, or already
Thy last is spoke! Refuse not offered love 320
When it comes clad in secrets.

Cal. [Aside.] If I say
I will not, he will kill me; I do see 't
Write in his looks; and should I say I will,
He'll run and tell the King. — I do not shun
Your friendship, dear Melantius; but this cause
Is weighty: give me but an hour to think. 325

Mel. Take it. — [Aside.] I know this goes unto the King;

But I am arm'd. Exit.

Cal. Methinks I feel myself
But twenty now again. This fighting fool
Wants policy: I shall revenge my girl, 330
And make her red again. I pray my legs
Will last that pace that I will carry them:
I shall want breath before I find the King. Exit.

ACT IV

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter MELANTIUS, EVADNE, and Ladies.

Mel. Save you!

Evad. Save you, sweet brother.

Mel. In my blunt eye, methinks, you look,
Evadne —

Evad. Come, you would make me blush.

Mel. I would, Evadne;
I shall displease my ends else.

Evad. You shall, if you Command me; I am bashful. Come, sir, how do 5

I look?

Mel. I would not have your women hear me
Break into commendation of you; 't is not Seemly.

Evad. Go wait me in the gallery.

Exeunt Ladies.

Now speak.

Mel. I'll lock the door first.

Evad. Why?

Mel. I will not have your gilded things, that dance 10

In visitation with their Milan skins,<sup>2</sup>
Choke up my business.

Evad. You are strangely dispos'd, sir.

Mel. Good madam, not to make you merry.

Evad. No; if you praise me, it will make me sad.

Mel. Such a sad commendation I have for you.

Evad. Brother, 10
The court hath made you witty, and learn to riddle.

Mel. I praise the court for 't: has it learn'd you nothing?

Evad. Me!

Mel. Ay, Evadne; thou art young and handsome,

A lady of a sweet complexion, 20
And such a flowing carriage, that it cannot Choose but inflame a kingdom.

Evad. Gentle brother!

Mel. 'Tis yet in thy repentance, foolish
woman,

To make me gentle.

Evad. How is this?

Mel. 'Tis base; 24
And I could blush, at these years, through all
My honour'd scars, to come to such a parley.

Evad. I understand you not.

Mel. You dare not, fool!
They that commit thy faults fly the remembrance.

Evad. My faults, sir! I would have you know,
I care not 25

If they were written here, here in my forehead.

Mel. Thy body is too little for the story;
The lusts of which would fill another woman,
Though<sup>3</sup> she had twins within her.

Evad. This is saucy:
Look you intrude no more! There's your way.

Mel. Thou art my way, and I will tread upon
thee, 35

Till I find truth out.

Evad. What truth is that you look for?

Mel. Thy long-lost honour. Would the gods had set me

Rather to grapple with the plague, or stand
One of their loudest bolts! Come, tell me quickly,

Do it without enforcement, and take heed 40
You swell me not above my temper.

Evad.

How, sir!

Where got you this report?

Mel. Where there was people,
In every place.

Evad. They and the seconds of it
Are base people: believe them not, they lied. 44

Mel. Do not play with mine anger; do not wretch!

[Seizes her.]

I come to know that desperate fool that drew
thee

From thy fair life. Be wise, and lay him open.

Evad. Unhand me, and learn manners! Such another

Forgetfulness forfeits your life.

Mel. Quench me this mighty humour, and then tell me 50

Whose whore you are; for you are one, I know it.

<sup>3</sup> Theobald read, As though sh'ad. Other edd. take fill in sense of "cover with writing;" Dyce as "inflame," which is perhaps best.

<sup>2</sup> Gloves manufactured at Milan.

Let all mine honours perish but I'll find him
Though he lie lock'd up in thy blood! Be sudden;

There is no facing it; and be not flattered.
The burnt air, when the Dog<sup>1</sup> reigns, is not fouler

Than thy contagious name, till thy repentance
(If the gods grant thee any) purge thy sickness.
Evad. Begone! you are my brother; that's your safety.

Mel. I'll be a wolf first. 'Tis, to be thy
brother,

An infamy below the sin of coward. <sup>60</sup>
I am as far from being part of thee
As thou art from thy virtue. Seek a kindred 'Mongst sensual beasts, and make a goat thy
brother;

A goat is cooler. Will you tell me yet?

Evad. If you stay here and rail thus, I shall tell you

I'll ha' you whipt! Get you to your command,
And there preach to your sentinels, and tell
them

What a brave man you are: I shall laugh at you.
Mel. You're grown a glorious whore! Where be your fighters? <sup>65</sup>

What mortal fool durst raise thee to this daring,
And I alive! By my just sword, he'd safer
Bestrid a billow when the angry North Ploughs up the sea, or made Heaven's fire his foe!

Work me no higher. Will you discover yet?

Evad. The fellow's mad. Sleep, and speak sense. <sup>75</sup>

Mel. Force my swol'n heart no further; I would save thee.

Your great maintainers are not here, they dare
not.

Would they were all, and armed! I would speak loud;

Here's one should thunder to 'em! Will you tell me? —

Thou hast no hope to scape. He that dares
most, <sup>80</sup>

And damns away his soul to do thee service,
Will sooner snatch meat from a hungry lion
Than come to rescue thee. Thou hast death about thee; —

Has undone thine honour, poison'd thy virtue,
And, of a lovely rose, left thee a canker.<sup>2</sup> <sup>85</sup>

Evad. Let me consider.

Mel. Do, whose child thou wert,
Whose honour thou hast murdered, whose grave opened,

And so pull'd on the gods that in their justice
They must restore him flesh again and life, <sup>90</sup>
And raise his dry bones to revenge this scandal.

Evad. The gods are not of my mind; they had better

Let 'em lie sweet still in the earth; they'll stink
here.

Mel. Do you raise mirth out of my easiness?
Forsake me, then, all weaknesses of nature,

[Draws his sword.]

attacking plants. Cf. V. i. 76.

That make men women! Speak, you whore, speak truth, <sup>95</sup>

Or, by the dear soul of thy sleeping father,
This sword shall be thy lover! Tell, or I'll kill
thee;

And, when thou hast told all, thou wilt deserve
it.

Evad. You will not murder me?

Mel. No; 'tis a justice, and a noble one, <sup>100</sup>
To put the light out of such base offenders.

Evad. Help!

Mel. By thy foul self, no human help shall help thee,

If thou criest! When I have kill'd thee, as I
Have vow'd to do, if thou confess not, naked <sup>105</sup>

As thou hast left thine honour will I leave thee,
That on thy branded flesh the world may read

Thy black shame and my justice. Wilt thou bend yet?

Evad. Yes.

Mel. Up, and begin your story. <sup>110</sup>

Evad. Oh, I am miserable!

Mel. 'Tis true, thou art. Speak truth still.

Evad. I have offended: noble sir, forgive me!

Mel. With what secure slave?

Evad. Do not ask me, sir;
Mine own remembrance is a misery <sup>115</sup>

Too mighty for me.

Mel. Do not fall back again;
My sword's unsheathed yet.

Evad. What shall I do?

Mel. Be true, and make your fault less.

Evad. I dare not tell.

Mel. Tell, or I'll be this day a-killing thee.

Evad. Will you forgive me, then? <sup>120</sup>

Mel. Stay; I must ask mine honour first.

I have too much foolish nature in me: speak.

Evad. Is there none else here?

Mel. None but a fearful<sup>3</sup> conscience; that's too many.

Who is 't?

Evad. Oh, hear me gently! It was the King.

Mel. No more. My worthy father's and my services <sup>125</sup>

Are liberally rewarded! King, I thank thee!
For all my dangers and my wounds thou hast paid me

In my own metal: these are soldiers' thanks! —
How long have you liv'd thus, Evadne?

Evad. Too long. <sup>130</sup>

Mel. Too late you find it. Can you be sorry? <sup>4</sup>

Evad. Would I were half as blameless!

Mel. Evadne, thou wilt to thy trade again.

Evad. First to my grave.

Mel. Would gods thou hadst been so blest!
Dost thou not hate this King now? Prithee, hate him: <sup>135</sup> Couldst thou not curse him? I command thee, curse him;

Curse till the gods hear, and deliver him
To thy just wishes. Yet I fear, Evadne,

You had rather play your game out.

Evad. No; I feel
Too many sad confusions here, to let in <sup>140</sup>
Any loose flame hereafter.

<sup>4</sup> Q very sorry.

Mel. Dost thou not feel, 'mongst all those,
one brave anger,
That breaks out nobly, and directs thine arm
To kill this base King?

Evad. All the gods forbid it!

Mel. No, all the gods require it; 145
They are dishonoured in him.

Evad. 'Tis too fearful.

Mel. You're valiant in his bed, and bold enough

To be a stale whore, and have your madam's
name

Discourse for grooms and pages; and hereafter,
When his cool majesty hath laid you by, 150

To be at pension with some needy sir
For meat and coarser clothes; thus far you
know

No fear. Come, you shall kill him.

Evad. Good sir!

Mel. An 't were to kiss him dead, thou 'dst smother him:

Be wise, and kill him. Canst thou live, and
know 155

What noble minds shall make thee, see thyself
Found out with every finger, made the shame

Of all successions, and in this great ruin
Thy brother and thy noble husband broken?

Thou shalt not live thus. Kneel, and swear to help me, 160

When I shall call thee to it; or, by all
Holy in Heaven and earth, thou shalt not live

To breathe a full hour longer; not a thought!
Come 't is a righteous oath. Give me thy hands,

And, both to Heaven held up, swear, by that wealth 165

This lustful thief stole from thee, when I say it,
To let his foul soul out.

Evad. Here I swear it; [Kneels.]

And, all you spirits of abused ladies,
Help me in this performance!

Mel. [raising her.] Enough. This must be known to none 170

But you and I, Evadne; not to your lord,
Though he be wise and noble, and a fellow

Dares step as far into a worthy action
As the most daring, ay, as far as justice.

Ask me not why. Farewell. Exit. 175

Evad. Would I could say so to my black disgrace!

Oh, where have I been all this time? How
friended,

That I should lose myself thus desperately.
And none for pity show me how I wand' red?

There is not in the compass of the light 180
A more unhappy creature: sure, I am monstrous;

For I have done those follies, those mad mis-
chiefs,

Would dare<sup>1</sup> a woman. Oh, my loaden soul,
Be not so cruel to me; choke not up
The way to my repentance!

Enter AMINTOR.

Oh, my lord! 185

Amin. How now?

<sup>1</sup> Frighten.

Evad. My much abused lord! [Kneels.]

Amin. This cannot be!

Evad. I do not kneel to live; I dare not hope
it;

The wrongs I did are greater. Look upon me,
Though I appear with all my faults.

Amin. Stand up.

This is a new way to beget more sorrow; 190
Heaven knows I have too many. Do not mock
me:

Though I am tame, and bred up with my wrongs,

Which are my foster-brothers, I may leap,
Like a hand-wolf,<sup>2</sup> into my natural-wildness, 195

And do an outrage. Prithee, do not mock me.

Evad. My whole life is so leprous, it infects
All my repentance. I would buy your pardon,

Though at the highest set,<sup>3</sup> even with my life:
That slight contrition, that's no sacrifice 199

For what I have committed.

Amin. Sure, I dazzle;

There cannot be a faith in that foul woman,
That knows no god more mighty than her mis-
chiefs.

Thou dost still worse, still number on thy faults,

To press my poor heart thus. Can I believe
There's any seed of virtue in that woman 205

Left to shoot up, that dares go on in sin
Known, and so known as thine is? Oh, Evadne!

Would there were any safety in thy sex,
That I might put a thousand sorrows off,

And credit thy repentance! but I must not. 210
Thou hast brought me to that dull calamity,
To that strange misbelief of all the world

And all things that are in it, that I fear
I shall fall like a tree, and find my grave,
Only rememb'ring that I grieve.

Evad. My lord, 215

Give me your griefs: you are an innocent,
A soul as white as Heaven; let not my sins

Perish your noble youth. I do not fall here
To shadow by dissembling with my tears,

(As all say women can,) or to make less 220
What my hot will hath done, which Heaven and you

Know to be tougher than the hand of time
Can cut from man's remembrance; no, I do not;

I do appear the same, the same Evadne,
Drest in the shames I liv'd in, the same monster. 225

But these are names of honour to what I am;

I do present myself the foulest creature,
Most poisonous, dangerous, and despis'd of men,

Lerna<sup>4</sup> e'er bred or Nilus. I am hell, 129

Till you, my dear lord, shoot your light into me,
The beams of your forgiveness; I am soul-sick,

And wither with the fear of one condemn'd,
Till I have got your pardon.

Amin. Rise, Evadne.

Those heavenly powers that put this good into
thee

Grant a continuance of it! I forgive thee: 235
Make thyself worthy of it; and take heed,

<sup>4</sup> The marsh where the Hydra lived which Hercules slew.

Take heed, Evadne, this be serious.
Mock not the powers above, that can and dare
Give thee a great example of their justice
To all ensuing ages,<sup>1</sup> if thou play'st <sup>240</sup>
With thy repentance, the best sacrifice.

Evad. I have done nothing good to win belief,
My life hath been so faithless. All the creatures,

Made for Heaven's honours, have their ends,
and good ones

All but the cozening crocodiles, false women.
They reign here like those plagues, those killing sores, <sup>245</sup>

Men pray against; and when they die, like tales

Ill told and unbeliev'd, they pass away,
And go to dust forgotten. But, my lord,
Those short days I shall number to my rest <sup>250</sup>
(As many must not see me) shall, though too late,
Though in my evening, yet perceive a will,
Since I can do no good, because a woman,
Reach constantly at something that is near it :
I will redeem one minute of my age, <sup>255</sup>
Or, like another Niobe, I'll weep,
Till I am water.

Amin. I am now dissolved :
My frozen soul melts. May each sin thou hast,
Find a new mercy ! Rise ; I am at peace.
Hadst thou been thus, thus excellently good, <sup>260</sup>
Before that devil-king tempted thy frailty, Sure thou hadst made a star. Give me thy
hand :

From this time I will know thee ; and, as far
As honour gives me leave, be thy Amintor.
When we meet next, I will salute thee fairly, <sup>265</sup>
And pray the gods to give thee happy days :
My charity shall go along with thee,
Though my embraces must be far from thee.
I should ha' kill'd thee, but this sweet repentance

Locks up my vengeance : for which thus I kiss
thee — <sup>270</sup>

The last kiss we must take : and would to
Heaven

The holy priest that gave our hands together
Had given us equal virtues ! Go, Evadne ;
The gods thus part our bodies. Have a care
My honour falls no farther : I am well, then.

Evad. All the dear joys here, and above hereafter, <sup>275</sup>

Crown thy fair soul ! Thus I take leave, my
lord ;

And never shall you see the foul Evadne.
Till she have tried all honoured means, that
may

Set her in rest and wash her stains away. <sup>280</sup>
Exeunt [severally].

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

*A Banquet spread. Enter KING and CALLANAX.
Hautboys play within.*

King. I cannot tell how I should credit this
From you, that are his enemy.
Cal. I am sure

<sup>2</sup> A hall in the palace.

He said it to me ; and I'll justify it
What way he dares oppose — but with my sword.

King. But did he break, without all circumstance,

To you, his foe, that he would have the fort, <sup>5</sup>
To kill me, and then scape ?

Cal. If he deny it,
I'll make him blush.

King. It sounds incredibly.

Cal. Ay, so does every thing I say of late.

King. Not so, Calianax.

Cal. Yes, I should sit <sup>10</sup> Mute, whilst a rogue with strong arms cuts your throat.

King. Well, I will try him ; and, if this be true,

I'll pawn my life I'll find it ; if 't be false,
And that you clothe your hate in such a lie,
You shall hereafter dote in your own house, <sup>15</sup>
Not in the court.

Cal. Why, if it be a lie.
Mine ears are false, for I'll be sworn I heard it.
Old men are good for nothing ; you were best
Put me to death for hearing, and free him
For meaning it. You would ha' trusted me <sup>20</sup>
Once, but the time is altered.

King. And will still,
Where I may do with justice to the world.

You have no witness.

Cal. Yes, myself.

King. No more,

I mean, there were that heard it.

Cal. How ? no more !
Would you have more ? Why, am not I <sup>25</sup>
enough

To hang a thousand rogues ?

King. But so you may
Hang honest men too, if you please.

Cal. I may !

'T is like I will do so : there are a hundred
Will swear it for a need too, if I say it —

King. Such witnesses we need not.
Cal. And 't is hard <sup>30</sup>

If my word cannot hang a boisterous knave.

King. Enough. — Where's Strato ?

Enter STRATO.

Strato. Sir ?
King. Why, where's all the company ? Call Amintor in ;

Evadne. Where's my brother, and Melantius ?
Bid him come too ; and Diphilus. Call all <sup>35</sup>

That are without there. Exit STRATO.
If he should desire

The combat of you, 't is not in the power
Of all our laws to hinder it, unless

We mean to quit 'em.
Cal. Why, if you do think <sup>40</sup>

'T is fit an old man and a councillor
To fight for what he says, then you may grant
it.

Enter AMINTOR, EVADNE, MELANTIUS, DIPHI-LUS, LYSIPPUS, CLEON, STRATO, and DIA-GORAS.

King. Come, sirs ! — Amintor, thou art yet a bridegroom,

And I will use thee so ; thou shalt sit down.—
Evadne, sit ;—and you, Amintor, too ;
This banquet is for you, sir.—Who has brought 45

A merry tale about him, to raise laughter
Amongst our wine ? Why, Strato, where art
thou ?

Thou wilt chop out with them unseasonably,
When I desire 'em not.

Strat. 'T is my ill luck, sir, so to spend them,
then. 50

King. Reach me a bowl of wine.—Melantius,
thou

Art sad.

Mel. I should be, sir, the merriest here,
But I ha' ne'er a story of mine own
Worth telling at this time.

King. Give me the wine.— 55
Melantius, I am now considering
How easy 't were for any man we trust
To poison one of us in such a bowl.

Mel. I think it were not hard, sir, for a knave.

Cal. [Aside.] Such as you are. 60

King. I' faith, 't were easy. It becomes us
well.

To get plain-dealing men about ourselves ;
Such as you all are here.—Amintor, to thee ;
And to thy fair Evadne. [Drinks.]

Mel. [Aside.] Have you thought
Of this, Calianax ?

Cal. Yes, marry, have I. 65

Mel. And what's your resolution ?

Cal. You shall have it,—

[Aside.] Soundly, I warrant you.
King. Reach to Amintor, Strato.

Amin. Here, my love ;

[Drinks and then hands the cup to EVADNE.]

This wine will do thee wrong, for it will set
Blushes upon thy cheeks ; and, till thou dost 70
A fault, 't were pity.

King. Yet I wonder much
[At] the strange desperation of these men,
That dare attempt such acts here in our state :
He could not scape that did it.

Mel. Were he known,
Unpossible.

King. It would be known, Melantius. 75

Mel. It ought to be. If he got then away,
He must wear all our lives upon his sword :

He need not fly the island ; he must leave
No one alive.

King. No ; I should think no man Could kill me, and scape clear, but that old
man. 80

Cal. But I ! Heaven bless me ! I ! should I,
my liege ?

King. I do not think thou wouldst ; but yet
thou mightst,

For thou hast in thy hands the means to scape,
By keeping of the fort.—He has, Melantius,
And he has kept it well.

Mel. From cobwebs, sir, 85
'T is clean swept ; I can find no other art
In keeping of it now. 'T was ne'er besieg'd
Since he commanded.

Cal. I shall be sure
Of your good word ; but I have kept it safe
From such as you.

Mel. Keep your ill temper in : 90
I speak no malice ; had my brother kept it,
I should ha' said as much.

King. You are not merry.
Brother, drink wine. Sit you all still :— [Aside.]

Calianax,
I cannot trust this. I have thrown out words,
That would have fetcht warm blood upon the
cheeks 95

Of guilty men, and he is never mov'd ;
He knows no such thing.

Cal. Impudence may scape,
When feeble virtue is accus'd.

King. 'A must,
If he were guilty, feel an alteration
At this our whisper, whilst we point at him :
You see he does not.

Cal. Let him hang himself ; 100
What care I what he does ? This he did say.

King. Melantius, you can easily conceive
What I have meant ; for men that are in fault
Can subtly apprehend when others aim 105

At what they do amiss : but I forgive
Freely before this man,—Heaven do so too !

I will not touch thee, so much as with shame
Of telling it. Let it be so no more.

Cal. Why, this is very fine ! 110

Mel. I cannot tell
What 't is you mean ; but I am apt enough
Rudely to thrust into an ignorant fault.

But let me know it. Happily 't is nought
But misconstruction ; and, where I am clear,
I will not take forgiveness of the gods, 115

Much less of you.

King. Nay, if you stand so stiff,
I shall call back my mercy.

Mel. I want smoothness
To thank a man for pardoning of a crime
I never knew.

King. Not to instruct your knowledge, but to show you 120

My ears are every where ; you meant to kill me,
And get the fort to scape.

Mel. Pardon me, sir ;
My bluntness will be pardoned. You preserve
A race of idle people here about you,
Facers <sup>2</sup> and talkers, to defame the worth 125
Of those that do things worthy. The man that uttered this

Had perisht without food, be 't who it will,
But for this arm, that fenc'd him from the foe ;
And if I thought you gave a faith to this,
The plainness of my nature would speak more.
Give me a pardon (for you ought to do 't) 130
To kill him that spake this.

Cal. [Aside.] Ay, that will be
The end of all ; then I am fairly paid
For all my care and service.

Mel. That old man,
Who calls me enemy, and of whom I 135
(Though I will never match my hate so low)

Have no good thought, would yet, I think, excuse me,
 And swear he thought me wrong'd in this,
Cal. Who, I?
 Thou shameless fellow! didst thou not speak to me
 Of it thyself?
Mel. Oh, then it came from him! 140
Cal. From me! who should it come from but from me?
Mel. Nay, I believe your malice is enough; But I have lost my anger. — Sir, I hope you are well satisfied.
King. Lysippus, cheer Amintor and his lady. — There's no sound 145
 Comes from you; I will come and do't myself.
Amin. [Aside.] You have done already, sir, for me, I thank you.
King. Melantius, I do credit this from him, How slight soe'er you make't.
Mel. 'Tis strange you should.
Cal. 'Tis strange 'a should believe an old man's word 150
 That never lied in 's life!
Mel. I talk not to thee. — Shall the wild words of this distempered man, Frantic with age and sorrow, make a breach Betwixt your majesty and me? 'T was wrong To hearken to him; but to credit him, 155
 As much at least as I have power to bear. But pardon me — whilst I speak only truth, I may commend myself — I have bestow'd My careless blood with you, and should be loth To think an action that would make me lose 160
 That and my thanks too. When I was a boy, I thrust myself into my country's cause, And did a deed that pluckt five years from time,
 And styl'd me man then. And for you, my
King,
 Your subjects all have fed by virtue of 165
 My arm. This sword of mine hath plough'd the ground,
 And reapt the fruit in peace;
 And you yourself have liv'd at home in ease. So terrible I grew, that without swords, My name hath fetcht you conquest: and my heart 170
 And limbs are still the same; my will as great To do you service. Let me not be paid With such a strange distrust.
King. Melantius,
 I held it great injustice to believe Thine enemy, and did not; if I did, 175
 I do not; let that satisfy. — What, struck With sadness all? More wine!
Cal. A few fine words Have overthrow'n my truth. Ah, thou'rt a villain!
Mel. [Aside.] Why, thou wert better let me have the fort:
 Dotard, I will disgrace thee thus for ever; 180
 There shall no credit lie upon thy words. Think better, and deliver it.
Cal. My liege,
 He's at me now again to do it. — Speak;

Deny it, if thou canst. — Examine him Whilst he is hot; for, if he cool again, 185
 He will forswear it.
King. This is lunacy,
 I hope, Melantius.
Mel. He hath lost himself
 Much, since his daughter mist the happinss
 My sister gain'd; and, though he call me foe, I pity him.
Cal. Pity! A pox upon you! 190
Mel. Mark his disordered words: and at the masque Diagoras knows he rag'd and rail'd at me, And call'd a lady "whore," so innocent She understood him not. But it becomes Both you and me too to forgive distraction: 195
 Pardon him, as I do.
Cal. I'll not speak for thee, For all thy cunning. — If you will be safe, Chop off his head; for there was never known So impudent a rascal.
King. Some, that love him, Get him to bed. Why, pity should not let 200 Age make itself contemptible; we must be All old. Have him away.
Mel. [Aside.] Calianax,
 The king believes you; come, you shall go home,
 And rest; you ha' done well. You'll give it up,
 When I have us'd you thus a month, I hope. 205
Cal. Now, now, 'tis plain, sir; he does move me still.
 He says, he knows I'll give him up the fort, When he has us'd me thus a month. I am mad, Am I not, still?
All. Ha, ha, ha!
Cal. I shall be mad indeed, if you do thus. Why should you trust a sturdy fellow there 210 (That has no virtue in him, all's in his sword) Before me? Do but take his weapons from him,
 And he's an ass; and I am a very fool, Both with 'em<sup>1</sup> and without 'em,<sup>1</sup> as you use me. 216
All. Ha, ha, ha!
King. 'Tis well, Calianax: but if you use This once again, I shall entreat some other To see your offices be well discharg'd. — Be merry, gentlemen. — It grows somewhat late. — 220
 Amintor, thou wouldst be a-bed again.
Amin. Yes, sir.
King. And you, Evadne. — Let me take Thee in my arms, Melantius, and believe Thou art, as thou deserv'st to be, my friend Still and for ever. — Good Calianax, 225
 Sleep soundly; it will bring thee to thyself.
Exeunt all except MELANTIUS and CALLANAX:
Cal. Sleep soundly! I sleep soundly now, I hope;
 I could not be thus else. — How dar'st thou stay
 Alone with me, knowing how thou hast us'd me?
<sup>1</sup> So Dyce. Old edd. him.

Mel. You cannot blast me with your tongue, and that's
The strongest part you have about you. 230

Cal. I
Do look for some great punishment for this ;
For I begin to forget all my hate,
And take 't unkindly that mine enemy
Should use me so extraordinarily scurvily. 236

Mel. I shall melt too, if you begin to take Unkindnesses: I never meant you hurt.

Cal. Thou 'lt anger me again. Thou wretched rogue,
Meant me no hurt! Disgrace me with the King!

Lose all my offices! This is no hurt. 240
Is it? I prithee, what dost thou call hurt?

Mel. To poison men, because they love me
not;
To call the credit of men's wives in question;
To murder children betwixt me and land; 244
This is all hurt.

Cal. All this thou think'st is sport;
For mine is worse: but use thy will with me;
For betwixt grief and anger I could cry.

Mel. Be wise, then, and be safe; thou may'st
revenge—

Cal. Ay, o' the King: I would revenge of
thee.

Mel. That you must plot yourself.

Cal. I'm a fine plotter.
Mel. The short is, I will hold thee with the
King. 251

In this perplexity, till peevishness
And thy disgrace have laid thee in thy grave.
But if thou wilt deliver up the fort,
I'll take thy trembling body in my arms, 255
And bear thee over dangers. Thou shalt hold Thy wonted state.

Cal. If I should tell the King,
Canst thou deny 't again?

Mel. Try, and believe.

Cal. Nay, then, thou canst bring any thing about.

Melantius, thou shalt have the fort. Why, well.

Mel. Here let our bate be buried; and this hand 261
Shall right us both. Give me thy aged breast
To compass.

Cal. Nay, I do not love thee yet;
I cannot well endure to look on thee;
And if I thought it were a courtesy, 265
Thou shouldst not have it. But I am disgrac'd;
My offices are to be ta'en away;
And, if I did but hold this fort a day,
I do believe the King would take it from me,
And give it thee, things are so strangely carried. 270

Ne'er thank me for 't; but yet the King shall
know

There was some such thing in 't I told him of,
And that I was an honest man.

Mel. He'll buy
That knowledge very dearly.

Re-enter DIPHILUS.

Diphilus,

What news with thee?

Diph. This were a night indeed
To do it in: the King hath sent for her. 276

Mel. She shall perform it then.—Go, Diphilus,

And take from this good man, my worthy
friend,

The fort; he 'll give it thee.
Diph. Ha' you got that?

Cal. Art thou of the same breed? Canst thou deny 280

This to the King too?
Diph. With a confidence

As great as his.
Cal. Faith, like enough.

Mel. Away, and use him kindly.
Cal. Touch not me;

I hate the whole strain.<sup>1</sup> If thou follow me
A great way off, I 'll give thee up the fort; 285
And hang yourselves.

Mel. Begone.
Diph. He 's finely wrought.

Exeunt CALLANAX and DIPHILUS.

Mel. This is a night, spite of astronomers,<sup>2</sup>
To do the deed in. I will wash the stain
That rests upon our house off with his blood.

Re-enter AMINTOR.

Amin. Melantius, now assist me: if thou
be'st 290

That which thou say'st, assist me. I have lost
All my distempers, and have found a rage

So pleasing! Help me.
Mel. [Aside.] Who can see him thus,

And not swear vengeance?—What 's the matter, friend?

Amin. Out with thy sword; and, hand in hand with me, 295

Rush to the chamber of this hated King,
And sink him with the weight of all his sins

To hell for ever.
Mel. 'T were a rash attempt,

Not to be done with safety. Let your reason
Plot your revenge, and not your passion. 300

Amin. If thou refuseth me in these extremes,
Thou art no friend. He sent for her to me;

By Heaven! to me, myself! and, I must tell
you,

I love her as a stranger: there is worth
In that vile woman, worthy things, Melantius;

And she repents. I 'll do 't myself alone, 305
Though I be slain. Farewell.

Mel. [Aside.] He 'll overthrow
My whole design with madness.—Amintor,

Think what thou dost: I dare as much as
valour;

But 'tis the King, the King, the King, Amintor, 310

With whom thou fightest! [Aside.]—I know he is honest,<sup>3</sup>

And this will work with him.

Amin. I cannot tell
What thou hast said; but thou hast charm'd my sword

Out of my hand, and left me shaking here, Defenceless.

<sup>1</sup> Family.      <sup>2</sup> Astrologers.      <sup>3</sup> Loyal.

Mel. I will take it up for thee. 315
Amin. What a wild beast is uncollected<sup>1</sup>
 man!

The thing that we call honour bears us all
 Headlong unto sin, and yet itself is nothing.

Mel. Alas, how variable are thy thoughts!
Amin. Just like my fortunes. I was run to
 that 320

I purpos'd to have chid thee for. Some plot,
 I did distrust, thou hadst against the King,
 By that old fellow's carriage. But take heed;
 There's not the least limb growing to a King
 But carries thunder in 't.

Mel. I have none 325
 Against him.

Amin. Why, come, then; and still remember
 We may not think revenge.

Mel. I will remember. Exeunt.

ACT V

[SCENE I.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter EVADNE and a Gentleman [of the Bedchamber].

Evad. Sir, is the King a-bed?

Gent. Madam, an hour ago.

Evad. Give me the key, then, and let none be near;

'T is the King's pleasure.

Gent. I understand you, madam; would
 't were mine!

I must not wish good rest unto your ladyship. 5

Evad. You talk, you talk.

Gent. 'T is all I dare do, madam; but the
 King

Will wake, and then, methinks —

Evad. Saving your imagination, pray, good night, sir.

Gent. A good night be it, then, and a long one, madam. 10

I am gone. Exit.

Evad.<sup>3</sup> The night grows horrible; and all about me

Like my black purpose. Oh, the conscience
King abed.

Of a lost virgin,<sup>4</sup> whither wilt thou pull me?
 To what things dismal as the depth of hell 15

Wilt thou provoke me? Let no woman dare
 From this hour be disloyal, if her heart be flesh,

If she have blood, and can fear. 'T is a daring
 Above that desperate fool's that left his peace,

And went to sea to fight: 't is so many sins, 20
 An age cannot repent 'em; and so great,

The gods want mercy for. Yet I must through
 'em:

I have begun a slaughter on my honour,
 And I must end it there. — 'A sleeps. Good Heavens! 24

Why give you peace to this untemperate beast,
 That hath so long transgressed you? I must kill
 him,

And I will do it bravely: the mere joy

Tells me, I merit in it. Yet I must not Thus tamely do it as he sleeps — that were
 To rock him to another world: my vengeance 30
 Shall take him waking, and then lay before
 him

The number of his wrongs and punishments.
 I'll shape his sins like Furies, till I waken

His evil angel, his sick conscience,
 And then I'll strike him dead. — King, by your leave; — Ties his arms to the bed. 35

I dare not trust your strength; your grace and I Must grapple upon even terms no more.

So, if he rail me not from my resolution,
 I shall be strong enough. — My lord the King!

My lord! — 'A sleeps, as if he meant to wake 40
 No more. — My lord! — Is he not dead already? —

Sir! My lord!

King. Who's that?

Evad. Oh, you sleep soundly sir!
King. My dear Evadne,

I have been dreaming of thee; come to bed.

Evad. I am come at length, sir; but how welcome? 45

King. What pretty new device is this,
 Evadne?

What, do you tie me to you? By my love,
 This is a quaint one. Come, my dear, and kiss
 me;

I'll be thy Mars; to bed, my queen of love.
 Let us be caught together, that the gods 50
 May see and envy our embraces.

Evad. Stay, sir, stay;
 You are too hot, and I have brought you physic
 To temper your high veins.

King. Prithce, to bed, then; let me take it warm;

There thou shalt know the state of my body
 better. 55

Evad. I know you have a surfeited foul body;
 And you must bleed. [Draws a knife.]

King. Bleed!

Evad. Ay, you shall bleed. Lie still; and, if the devil,

Your lust, will give you leave, repent. This steel

Comes to redeem the honour that you stole, 60
 King, my fair name; which nothing but thy
 death

Can answer to the world.

King. How's this, Evadne?

Evad. I am not she; nor bear I in this breast
 So much cold spirit to be call'd a woman:

I am a tiger; I am any thing 65
 That knows not pity. Stir not! If thou dost,

I'll take thee unprepar'd, thy fears upon thee,
 That make thy sins look double, and so send
 thee

(By my revenge, I will!) to look those torments
 Prepar'd for such black souls. 70

King. Thou dost not mean this; 't is impossible;

Thou art too sweet and gentle.

Evad. No, I am not:

I am as foul as thou art, and can number
 As many such hells here. I was once fair,

Once I was lovely; not a blowing rose 75

More chastely sweet, till thou, thou, thou, foul canker,<sup>1</sup> (Stir not!) didst poison me. I was a world of virtue,

Till your eurst court and you (Hell bless you
for't!)

With your temptations on temptations
Made me give up mine honour; for which,
King,

I am come to kill thee. 80

King. No!
Evd. I am.

King. Thou art not!
I prithee speak not these things. Thou art gentle,

And wert not meant thus rugged.
Evd. Peace, and hear me.

Stir nothing but your tongue, and that for mercy

To those above us; by whose lights I vow, 85
Those blessed fires<sup>2</sup> that shot to see our sin,
If thy hot soul had substance with thy blood,
I would kill that too; which, being past my
steel,

My tongue shall reach. Thou art a shameless villain;

A thing out of the overcharge of nature 90
Sent, like a thick cloud, to disperse a plague
Upon weak catching<sup>3</sup> women; such a tyrant,
That for his lust would sell away his subjects,
Ay, all his Heaven hereafter!

King. Hear, Evadne,
Thou soul of sweetness, hear! I am thy King.

Evd. Thou art my shame! Lie still; there's none about you, 96

Within your cries; all promises of safety
Are but deluding dreams. Thus, thus, thou foul
man,

Thus I begin my vengeance! Stabs him.
King. Hold, Evadne!

I do command thee hold.
Evd. I do not mean, sir, 100

To part so fairly with you; we must change
More of these love-tricks yet.

King. What bloody villain
Provokt thee to this murder?

Evd. Thou, thou monster!
King. Oh!

Evd. Thou kept'st me brave<sup>4</sup> at court, and whor'd me, King; 105

Then married me to a young noble gentleman,
And whor'd me still.

King. Evadne, pity me!
Evd. Hell take me, then! This for my lord
Amintor.

This for my noble brother! And this stroke
For the most wrong'd of women! Kills him.

King. Oh! I die. 110
Evd. Die all our faults together! I forgive thee. Exit.

Enter two [Gentlemen] of the bed-chamber.

1 Gent. Come, now she's gone, let's enter; the King expects it, and will be angry.

<sup>4</sup> Finely dressed.

2 Gent. 'T is a fine wench; we'll have a snap at her one of these nights, as she goes from [116]
him.

1 Gent. Content. How quickly he had done with her! I see kings can do no more that way than other mortal people.

2 Gent. How fast he is! I cannot hear him breathe. 120

1 Gent. Either the tapers give a feeble light,
Or he looks very pale.

2 Gent. And so he does:
Pray Heaven he be well; let's look. — Alas!

He's stiff, wounded, and dead! Treason,
treason!

1 Gent. Run forth and call. 125
2 Gent. Treason, treason! Exit.

1 Gent. This will be laid on us:
Who can believe a woman could do this?

Enter CLEON and LYSIPPUS.

Cleon. How now! where's the traitor?

1 Gent. Fled, fled away; but there her woeful act

Lies still. 150
Cleon. Her act! a woman!

Lys. Where's the body?
1 Gent. There.

Lys. Farewell, thou worthy man! There were two bonds

That tied our loves, a brother and a king,
The least of which might fetch a flood of tears;

But such the misery of greatness is, 155
They have no time to mourn; then, pardon me!

Sirs, which way went she?

Enter STRATO.

Stra. Never follow her;
For she, alas! was but the instrument.

News is now brought in that Melantius 160
Has got the fort, and stands upon the wall,
And with a loud voice calls those few that

pass
At this dead time of night, delivering
The innocence of this act.

Lys. Gentlemen,
I am your King.

Stra. We do acknowledge it. 165
Lys. I would I were not! Follow, all; for this Must have a sudden stop. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter MELANTIUS, DIPHILOS, and CALLANAX, on the Walls.

Mel. If the dull people can believe I am arm'd,

(Be constant, Diphilus,) now we have time
Either to bring our banisht honours home,

Or create new ones in our ends.

Diph. I fear not;
My spirit lies not that way. — Courage, Cali-anax! 5

Cal. Would I had any! you should quickly know it.

Mel. Speak to the people; thou art eloquent.

<sup>5</sup> Before the Fort.

Cal. 'T is a fine eloquence to come to the gallows:
You were born to be my end; the devil take
you!
Now must I hang for company. 'T is strange, 10
I should be old, and neither wise nor valiant.

Enter LYSIPPUS, DIAGORAS, CLEON, STRATO, and Guard.

Lys. See where he stands, as boldly confident
As if he had his full command about him.

Stra. He looks as if he had the better cause,
sir;

Under your gracious pardon, let me speak
it! 15

Though he be mighty-spirited, and forward
To all great things, to all things of that danger
Worse men shake at the telling of, yet certainly

I do believe him noble, and this action
Rather pull'd on than sought: his mind was ever 20

As worthy as his hand.

Lys. 'T is my fear, too.
Heaven forgive all! — Summon him, Lord
Cleon.

Cleon. Ho, from the walls there!

Mel. Worthy Cleon, welcome:
We could have wisht you here, lord; you are honest.

Cal. (Aside.) Well, thou art as flattering a knave, though 25

I dare not tell thee so —

Lys. Melantius!

Mel. Sir?

Lys. I am sorry that we meet thus; our old
love

Never requir'd such distance. Pray to Heaven,
You have not left yourself, and sought this safety

More out of fear than honour! You have lost 30
A noble master, which your faith, Melantius,
Some think might have preserv'd: yet you know best.

Cal. (Aside.) When time was, I was mad:
some that dares fight,

I hope will pay this rascal.

Mel. Royal young man, those tears look lovely on thee: 35

Had they been shed for a deserving one,
They had been lasting monuments. Thy
brother,

Whilst he was good, I call'd him King, and serv'd him

With that strong faith, that most unwearied
valour,

Pull'd people from the farthest sun to seek
him, 40

And buy his friendship. I was then his soldier.
But since his hot pride drew him to disgrace
me,

And brand my noble actions with his lust,
(That never-cur'd dishonour of my sister,
Base stain of whore, and, which is worse, the joy 45
To make it still so,) like myself, thus I

Have flung him off with my allegiance;
And stand here, mine own justice, to revenge
What I have suffered in him, and this old man
Wro'g'd almost to lunacy.

Cal. Who, I? 50
You would draw me in. I have had no wrong;
I do disclaim ye all.

Mel. The short is this.
'T is no ambition to lift up myself
Urgeth me thus; I do desire again
To be a subject, so I may be free: 55
If not, I know my strength, and will unbuild
This goodly town. Be speedy, and be wise,
In a reply.

Stra. Be sudden, sir, to tie
All up again. What's done is past recall,
And past you to revenge; and there are thousands 60

That wait for such a troubled hour as this.

Throw him the blank.
Lys. Melantius, write in that
Thy choice: my seal is at it.

(Throws a paper to MELANTIUS.)
Mel. It was our honours drew us to this act,
Not gain; and we will only work our pardons. 65

Cal. Put my name in too.
Diph. You disclaim'd us all
But now, Calianax.

Cal. That's all one;
I'll not be hang'd hereafter by a trick:
I'll have it in.

Mel. You shall, you shall. —
Come to the back gate, and we'll call you
King, 70
And give you up the fort.

Lys. Away, away. Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter ASPATIA, in man's apparel, [and with artificial scars on her face.]

Asp. This is my fatal hour. Heaven may forgive

My rash attempt, that causelessly hath laid
Griefs on me that will never let me rest,
And put a woman's heart into my breast.
It is more honour for you that I die; 5
For she that can endure the misery
That I have on me, and be patient too,
May live and laugh at all that you can do.

Enter Servant.

God save you, sir!

Ser. And you, sir! What's your business?
Asp. With you, sir, now; to do me the fair
office 10

To help me to your lord.

Ser. What, would you serve him?
Asp. I'll do him any service; but, to haste,
For my affairs are earnest, I desire
To speak with him.

Ser. Sir, because you are in such haste, I
would 15
Be loth delay you longer: you can not.

<sup>1</sup> Anteroom to Amintor's apartments.

Asp. It shall become you, though, to tell your lord.

Ser. Sir, he will speak with nobody ;
[But in particular, I have in charge,
About no weighty matters.]<sup>1</sup>

Asp. This is most strange. 20
Art thou gold-proof? There's for thee; help me to him. [Gives money.]

Ser. Pray be not angry, sir: I'll do my best. Exit.

Asp. How stubbornly this fellow answer'd me!

There is a vile dishonest trick in man,
More than in women. All the men I meet 25
Appear thus to me, are harsh and rude,
And have a subtilty in every thing,
Which love could never know; but we fond women

Harbour the easiest and the smoothest thoughts,
And think all shall go so. It is unjust 30
That men and women should be matcht together.

Enter AMINTOR and his man.

Amin. Where is he?

Ser. There, my lord.

Amin. What would you, sir?
Asp. Please it your lordship to command your man

Out of the room, I shall deliver things
Worthy your hearing.

Amin. Leave us. [Exit Servant.]

Asp. [Aside.] Oh, that that shape 35
Should bury falsehood in it!

Amin. Now your will, sir.
Asp. When you know me, my lord, you needs must guess

My business; and I am not hard to know;
For, till the chance of war markt this smooth
face

With these few blemishes, people would call
me 40

My sister's picture, and her mine. In short,
I am brother to the wrong'd Aspatia.

Amin. The wrong'd Aspatia! Would thou wert so too

Unto the wrong'd Amintor! Let me kiss
That hand of thine, in honour that I bear 45
Unto the wrong'd Aspatia. Here I stand
That did it. Would he could not! Gentle youth,
Leave me; for there is something in thy looks
That calls my sins in a most hideous form
Into my mind; and I have grief enough 50
Without thy help.

Asp. I would I could with credit
Since I was twelve years old, I had not seen
My sister till this hour I now arriv'd:
She sent for me to see her marriage,—
A woful one! but they that are above 55
Have ends in everything. She us'd few words,
But yet enough to make me understand
The baseness of the injuries you did her.
That little training I have had is war:
I may behave myself rudely in peace; 60
I would not, though. I shall not need to tell
you

<sup>1</sup> Only in Q<sub>1</sub>.

I am but young, and would be loth to lose
Honour, that is not easily gain'd again.

Fairly I mean to deal; the age is strict
For single combats; and we shall be stopt, 65
If it be publisht. If you like your sword,
Use it; if mine appear a better to you,
Change; for the ground is this, and this the
time,

To end our difference. [Draws.]

Amin. Charitable youth,
If thou be'st such, think not I will maintain 70
So strange a wrong; and, for thy sister's sake, Know, that I could not think that desperate
thing

I durst not do; yet, to enjoy this world,
I would not see her; for, beholding thee,
I am I know not what. If I have aught 75
That may content thee, take it, and begone,
For death is not so terrible as thou;
Thine eyes shoot guilt into me.

Asp. Thus, she swore,
Thou wouldst behave thyself, and give me
words

That would fetch tears into my eyes; and so 80
Thou dost indeed, But yet she bade me watch
Lest I were cozen'd; and be sure to fight
Ere I return'd.

Amin. That must not be with me.
For her I'll die directly; but against her
Will never hazard it.

Asp. You must be urg'd. 85
I do not deal unceivily with those
That dare to fight; but such a one as you

Must be us'd thus. She strikes him.

Amin. I prithee, youth, take heed.
Thy sister is a thing to me so much 90
Above mine honour, that I can endure
All this — Good gods! a blow I can endure;
But stay not, lest thou draw a timeless<sup>2</sup> death
Upon thyself.

Asp. Thou art some prating fellow;
One that hath studied out a trick to talk, 95
And move soft hearted people; to be kickt.

She kicks him.
Thus to be kickt. — [Aside.] Why should he be so slow

In giving me my death?

Amin. A man can bear
No more, and keep his flesh. Forgive me,
then!

I would endure yet, if I could. Now show 100
[Draws.]

The spirit thou pretend'st, and understand
Thou hast no hour to live.

They fight; [ASPATIA is wounded.]
What dost thou mean?

Thou canst not fight: the blows thou mak'st at
me

Are quite besides; and those I offer at thee, Thou spread'st thine arms, and tak'st upon thy
breast, 105

Alas, defenceless!

Asp. I have got enough.
And my desire. There is no place so fit
For me to die as here. [Falls.]

<sup>2</sup> Untimely.

Enter EVADNE, her hands bloody, with a knife.

Evad. Amintor, I am loaden with events,
That thy to make thee happy; I have joys, 110
That in a moment can call back thy wrongs,
And settle thee in thy free state again.
It is Evadne still that follows thee,
But not her mischiefs. 114

Amin. Thou canst not fool me to believe
again;
But thou hast looks and things so full of news,
That I am stay'd.

Evad. Noble Amintor, put off thy amaze,
Let thine eyes loose, and speak. Am I not fair?
Looks not Evadne beauteous with these rites
now? 120

Were those hours half so lovely in thine eyes
When our hands met before the holy man?
I was too foul inside to look fair then:
Since I knew ill, I was not free till now.

Amin. There is presage of some important
thing 125
About thee, which, it seems, thy tongue hath lost.

Thy hands are bloody, and thou hast a knife.

Evad. In this consists thy happiness and
mine.

Joy to Amintor! for the King is dead.

Amin. Those have most power to hurt us, that we love; 130

We lay our sleeping lives within their arms.
Why, thou hast rais'd up mischief to his height,
And found one to out-name<sup>1</sup> thy other faults;
Thou hast no intermission of thy sins
But all thy life is a continued ill. 135
Black is thy colour now, disease thy nature.
Joy to Amintor! Thou hast toucht a life,
The very name of which had power to chain
Up all my rage, and calm my wildest wrongs.

Evad. 'Tis done; and, since I could not find
a way 140

To meet thy love so clear as through his life,
I cannot now repent it.

Amin. Couldst thou procure the gods to speak
to me,

To bid me love this woman and forgive, 144
I think I should fall out with them. Behold, Here lies a youth whose wounds bleed in my
breast,

Sent by a violent fate to fetch his death
From my slow hand! And, to augment my woe,
You now are present, stain'd with a king's
blood

Violently shed. This keeps night here, 150
And throws an unknown wildness<sup>2</sup> about me.

Asp. Oh, oh, oh!

Amin. No more; pursue me not.

Evad. Forgive me, then,
And take me to thy bed: we may not part.

[Kneels.]
Amin. Forbear, be wise, and let my rage go this way. 155

Evad. 'Tis you that I would stay, not it.

Amin. Take heed;
It will return with me.

Evad. If it must be,
I shall not fear to meet it. Take me home.

Amin. Thou monster of cruelty, forbear!

Evad. For Heaven's sake look more calm!
Thine eyes are sharper 160

Than thou canst make thy sword.

Amin. Away, away!
Thy knees are more to me than violence.

I am worse than sick to see knees follow me
For that I must not grant. For God's sake,
stand.

Evad. Receive me, then.

Amin. I dare not stay thy language. 165
In midst of all my anger and my grief,
Thou dost awake something that troubles me,
And says, I lov'd thee once. I dare not stay;
There is no end of woman's reasoning.

[Leaves her.]
Evad. [rising.] Amintor, thou shalt love me now again. 170

Go; I am calm. Farewell, and peace for ever!
Evadne, whom thou hat'st, will die for thee.

[Stabs herself.]
Amin. [returning.] I have a little human nature yet,

That's left for thee, that bids me stay thy
hand.

Evad. Thy hand was welcome, but it came too late. 175

Oh, I am lost! the heavy sleep makes haste,
[She dies.]

Asp. Oh, oh, oh!

Amin. This earth of mine doth tremble, and I feel

A stark affrighted motion in my blood.

My soul grows weary of her house, and I 180
All over am a trouble to myself.

There is some hidden power in these dead
things,

That calls my flesh unto 'em; I am cold.

Be resolute and bear 'em company.

There's something yet, which I am loth to
leave: 185

There's man enough in me to meet the fears
That death can bring; and yet would it were
done!

I can find nothing in the whole discourse
Of death, I durst not meet the boldest way;

Yet still, betwixt the reason and the act, 190
The wrong I to Aspatia did stands up;

I have not such another fault to answer.

Though she may justly arm herself with scorn
And hate of me, my soul will part less troubled,

When I have paid to her in tears my sorrow. 195
I will not leave this act unsatisfied,

If all that's left in me can answer it.

Asp. Was it a dream? There stands Amintor still;

Or I dream still.

Amin. How dost thou? speak; receive my love and help. 200

Thy blood climbs up to his old place again;

There's hope of thy recovery.

Asp. Did you not name Aspatia?

Amin. I did.

Asp. And talkt of tears and sorrow unto
her?

Amin. 'Tis true; and, till these happy signs in thee 205

Did stay my course, 't was thither I was going.

Asp. Thou art there already, and these wounds are hers.

Those threats I brought with me sought not revenge,

But came to fetch this blessing from thy hand:
I am Aspatia yet. 210

Amin. Dare my soul ever look abroad again?

Asp. I shall sure live, Amintor; I am well;
A kind of healthful joy wanders within me.

Amin. The world wants lives to excuse thy loss; 214

Come, let me bear thee to some place of help.
Asp. Amintor, thou must stay; I must rest
here;

My strength begins to disobey my will.
How dost thou, my best soul? I would fain live

Now, if I could. Wouldst thou have lov'd me,
then?

Amin. Alas, 220
All that I am 's not worth a hair from thee!

Asp. Give me thy hand; mine hands grope up and down,

And cannot find thee; I am wondrous sick.
Have I thy hand, Amintor?

Amin. Thou greatest blessing of the world,
thou hast. 225

Asp. I do believe thee better than my sense.
Oh, I must go! farewell! Dies.

Amin. She swoons.<sup>1</sup>—Aspatia!—Help! for God's sake, water,

Such as may chain life ever to this frame!—
Aspatia, speak!—What, no help yet? I fool!

I'll chafe her temples. Yet there's nothing stirs. 231

Some hidden power tell her, Amintor calls,
And let her answer me!—Aspatia, speak!—

I have heard, if there be any life, but bow
The body thus, and it will show itself. 235

Oh, she is gone! I will not leave her yet.
Since out of justice we must challenge nothing,

I'll call it mercy, if you'll pity me,
You heavenly powers, and lend for some few years

The blessed soul to this fair seat again! 240
No comfort comes; the gods deny me too.

I'll bow the body once again.—Aspatia!—
The soul is fled for ever; and I wrong

Myself, so long to lose her company. 244
Must I talk now? Here 's to be with thee, love!

Kills himself.

Re-enter Servant.

Serv. This is a great grace to my lord, to have the new king come to him. I must tell him he is ent'ring.—Oh, God!—Help, help!

Enter LYSIPPUS, MELANTIUS, CALLANAX, CLEON, DIPHILUS, and STRATO.

Lys. Where's Amintor?

Stra. Oh, there, there!

<sup>1</sup> Qq. sounds.

Lys. How strange is this!

Cal. What should we do here? 250

Mel. These deaths are such acquainted things
with me,

That yet my heart dissolves not. May I stand Stiff here for ever!—Eyes, call up your tears!

This is Amintor. Heart, he was my friend;
Melt! now it flows.—Amintor, give a word 255
To call me to thee.

Amin. Oh!

Mel. Melantius calls his friend Amintor. Oh,
Thy arms are kinder to me than thy tongue!
Speak, speak! 260

Amin. What?

Mel. That little word was worth all the sounds

That ever I shall hear again.

Diph. Oh, brother,
Here lies your sister slain! You lose yourself
In sorrow there.

Mel. Why, Diphilus, it is 265
A thing to laugh at, in respect of this.

Here was my sister, father, brother, son;
All that I had.—Speak once again; what
youth

Lies slain there by thee?

Amin. 'Tis Aspatia.
My last is said. Let me give up my soul 270
Into thy bosom. [Dies.]

Cal. What's that? What's that? Aspatia!

Mel. I never did
Repent the greatness of my heart till now;

It will not burst at need. 274

Cal. My daughter dead here too! And you have all fine new tricks to grieve; but I ne'er knew any but direct crying.

Mel. I am a prattler: but no more.
[Offers to stab himself.]

Diph. Hold, brother!

Lys. Stop him.

Diph. Fie, how unmanly was this offer in
you! 280

Does this become our strain? <sup>1</sup>

Cal. I know not what the matter is, but I am grown very kind, and am friends with you all now. You have given me that among you will kill me quickly; but I'll go home, and live as long as I can. [Exit.] 285

Mel. His spirit is but poor that can be kept
From death for want of weapons.

Is not my hands a weapon sharp enough
To stop my breath? or, if you tie down those,

I vow, Amintor, I will never eat, 291
Or drink, or sleep, or have to do with that

That may preserve life! This I swear to keep.

Lys. Look to him, though, and bear those bodies in.

May this a fair example be to me 295
To rule with temper; for on lustful kings

Unlookt-for sudden deaths from God are sent;

But curst is he that is their instrument.
[Exeunt.]

TO THE READER

If you be not reasonably assur'd of your knowledge in this kind of poem, lay down the book, or read this, which I would wish had been the prologue. It is a pastoral tragi-comedy, which the people seeing when it was play'd, having ever had a singular gift in defining, concluded to be a play of country hired shepherds in gray cloaks, with curtail'd dogs in strings, sometimes laughing together, and sometimes killing one another; and, missing Whitsun-ales, cream, wassail, and morris-dances, began to be angry. In their error I would not have you fall, lest you incur their censure.<sup>1</sup> Understand, therefore, a pastoral to be a representation of shepherds and shepherdesses with their actions and passions, which must be such as may agree with their natures, at least not exceeding former fictions and vulgar traditions; they are not to be adorn'd with any art, but such improper ones as nature is said to bestow, as singing and poetry; or such as experience may teach them, as the virtues of herbs and fountains, the ordinary course of the sun, moon, and stars, and such like. But you are ever to remember shepherds to be such as all the ancient poets, and modern, of understanding, have received them; that is, the owners of flocks, and not hirelings. A tragi-comedy is not so called in respect of mirth and killing, but in respect it wants deaths, which is enough to make it no tragedy, yet brings some near it, which is enough to make it no comedy, which must be a representation of familiar people, with such kind of trouble as no life be question'd;<sup>2</sup> so that a god is as lawful in this as in a tragedy, and mean people as in a comedy. Thus much I hope will serve to justify my poem, and make you understand it; to teach you more for nothing, I do not know that I am in conscience bound.

JOHN FLETCHER.

ACT I

SCENE I.

Enter CLORIN, a shepherdess, having buried her love in an arbour.

Clorin. Hail, holy earth, whose cold arms do embrace

The truest man that ever fed his flocks
By the fat plains of fruitful Thessaly!
Thus I salute thy grave; thus do I pay
My early vows and tribute of mine eyes
To thy still-loved ashes; thus I free
Myself from all ensuing heats and fires
Of love; all sports, delights, and [jolly]<sup>3</sup> games,
That shepherds hold full dear, thus put I off.

<sup>3</sup> Q., Q. omits Some copies of Q. read merry.

Now no more shall these smooth brows be be-girt <sup>1c</sup>

With youthful coronals,<sup>4</sup> and lead the dance;
No more the company of fresh fair maids
And wanton shepherds be to me delightful,
Nor the shrill pleasing sound of merry pipes
Under some shady dell, when the cool wind <sup>15</sup>
Plays on the leaves: all be far away,
Since thou art far away, by whose dear side
How often have I sat crown'd with fresh flowers

For summer's queen, whilst every shepherd's
boy

Puts on his lusty green, with gaudy hook, <sup>20</sup>
And hanging scrip of finest cordevan,<sup>5</sup>
But thou art gone, and these are gone with thee,
And all are dead but thy dear memory;

<sup>5</sup> Leather (from Cordova in Spain).

That shall outlive thee, and shall ever spring,
 Whilst there are pipes or jolly shepherds sing. 25
 And here will I, in honour of thy love,
 Dwell by thy grave, forgetting all those joys
 That former times made precious to mine
 eyes;

Only rememb'ring what my youth did gain
 In the dark, hidden virtuous use of herbs: 30
 That will I practise, and as freely give
 All my endeavours, as I gain'd them, free.
 Of all green wounds I know the remedies
 In men or cattle, be they stung with snakes,
 Or charm'd with powerful words of wicked
 art, 35

Or be they love-sick, or through too much heat
 Grown wild or lunatic, their eyes or ears
 Thick'ned with misty film of dulling rheum;
 These I can cure, such secret virtue lies
 In herbs applied by a virgin's hand. 40
 My meat shall be what these wild woods afford, Berries and chestnuts, plantains, on whose
 cheeks

The sun sits smiling, and the lofty fruit
 Full'd from the fair head of the straight-grown pine;

On these I'll feed with free content, and
 rest, 45
 When night shall blind the world, by thy side
 blest.

Enter a Satyr [with a basket of fruit].

Sat. Through yon same bending plain,
 That flings his arms down to the main,
 And through these thick woods, have I run,
 Whose bottom never kist the sun 50
 Since the lusty spring began;
 All to please my master Pan,
 Have I trotted without rest
 To get him fruit; for at a feast
 He entertains, this coming night, 55
 His paramour, the Syren bright. —
 But, behold, a fairer sight!

He stands amazed.

By that heavenly form of thine,
 Brightest fair, thou art divine,
 Sprung from great immortal race 60
 Of the gods; for in thy face
 Shines more awful majesty
 Than dull weak mortality
 Dare with misty eyes behold,
 And live: therefore on this mould 65
 Lowly do I bend my knee
 In worship of thy deity.
 Deign it, goddess, from my hand
 To receive what'er this land
 From her fertile womb doth send
 Of her choice fruits; and but lend Belief to that the Satyr tells:
 Fairer by the famous wells
 To this present day ne'er grew,
 Never better nor more true. 75
 Here be grapes, whose lusty blood
 Is the learned poets' good,
 Sweeter yet did never crown
 The head of Bacchus; nuts more brown
 Than the squirrel's teeth that crack them; 80
 Deign, O fairest fair, to take them!

For these black-ey'd Dryope
 Hath oftentimes commanded me
 With my clasped knee to climb:
 See how well the lusty time 85
 Hath deckt their rising cheeks in red,
 Such as on your lips is spread!
 Here be berries for a queen,
 Some be red, some be green;
 These are of that luscious meat, 90
 The great god Pan himself doth eat:
 All these, and what the woods can yield,
 The hanging mountain or the field,
 I freely offer, and ere long
 Will bring you more, more sweet and strong; 95
 Till when, humbly leave I take,
 Lest the great Pan do awake,
 That sleeping lies in a deep glade,
 Under a broad beech's shade.
 I must go, I must run 100
 Swifter than the fiery sun. Exit.

Clo. And all my fears go with thee!
 What greatness, or what private hidden power,
 Is there in me, to draw submission
 From this rude man and beast? Sure I am mortal, 105

The daughter of a shepherd; he was mortal,
 And she that bore me mortal: prick my hand,
 And it will bleed; a fever shakes me, and
 The self-same wind that makes the young lambs shrink

Makes me a-cold: my fear says I am mortal. 110
 Yet I have heard (my mother told it me,
 And now I do believe it), if I keep
 My virgin-flower uncropt, pure, chaste, and fair,
 No goblin, wood-god, fairy, elf, or fiend, 115
 Satyr, or other power that haunts these groves,
 Shall hurt my body, or by vain illusion
 Draw me to wander after idle fires;
 Or voices calling me in dead of night,
 To make me follow, and so toll<sup>1</sup> me on,
 Through mires and standing pools {to find my ruin;} 120

Else why should this rough thing, who never knew

Manners nor smooth humanity,<sup>2</sup> whose heats<sup>3</sup>
 Are rougher than himself and more mis-shapen, Thus mildly kneel to me? Sure there is a
 power 124

In that great name of virgin, that binds fast
 All rude uncivil bloods, all appetites
 That break their confines. Then, strong chastity,

Be thou my strongest guard, for here I'll
 dwell

In opposition against fate and hell!
 [Retires into her bower.]

[SCENE II.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter an Old Shepherd, with four couples of Shepherds and Shepherdesses, [among whom are PERIGOT and AMORET.]

Old Shep. Now we have done this holy festival

<sup>4</sup> In the neighbourhood of a village.

In honour of our great god, and his rites
Perform'd, prepare yourselves for chaste
And uncorrupted fires; that as the priest
With powerful hand shall sprinkle on your brows 5

His pure and holy water, ye may be
From all hot flames of lust and loose thoughts
free.

Kneel, shepherds, kneel; here comes the priest of Pan.

Enter Priest.

Priest. Shepherds, thus I purge away
[Sprinkling them with water.]

Whatsoever this great day, 10
Or the past hours, gave not good,
To corrupt your maiden blood.
From the high rebellious heat
Of the grapes, and strength of meat,
From the wanton quick desires 15
They do kindle by their fires
I do wash you with this water;
Be you pure and fair hereafter!
From your livers and your veins
Thus I take away the stains; 20
All your thoughts be smooth and fair:
Be ye fresh and free as air!
Never more let lustful heat
Through your purged conduits<sup>1</sup> beat,
Or a plighted troth be broken, 25
Or a wanton verse be spoken
In a shepherdess's ear:
Go your ways, ye are all clear.

They rise and sing in praise of PAN.

THE SONG.

Sing his praises that doth keep
Our flocks from harm, 30
Pan, the father of our sheep;
And arm in arm
Tread we softly in a round,
Whilst the hollow neighbouring ground 35
Fills the music with her sound.

Pan, O great god Pan, to thee
Thus do we sing!
Thou that keep'st us chaste and free
As the young spring;
Ever be thy honour spoke, 40
From that place the Morn is broke
To that place Day doth unyoke!

Ereunt omnes but PERIGOT and AMORET.

Peri. Stay, gentle Amoret, thou fair-brow'd
maid;
Thy shepherd prays thee stay, that holds thee
dear,
Equal with his soul's good.

Amo. Speak; I give 45
Thee freedom, shepherd; and thy tongue be still

The same it ever was, as free from ill
As he whose conversation never knew
The court or city; be thou ever true!

Peri. When I fall off from my affection, 50

<sup>1</sup> Veins.

Or mingle my clean thoughts with foul desires,
First, let our great god cease to keep my flocks,
That, being left alone without a guard,
The wolf, or winter's rage, summer's great heat
And want of water, rots, or what to us 55
Of ill is yet unknown, fall speedily,
And in their general ruin let me go!

Amo. I pray thee, gentle shepherd, wish not
so:

I do believe thee; 't is as hard for me
To think thee false, and harder, than for thee
To hold me foul.

Peri. Oh, you are fairer far 61
Than the chaste blushing morn, or that fair star
That guides the wand'ring seaman through the deep;

Straighter than the straightest pine upon the steep

Head of an aged mountain; and more white 65
Than the new milk we strip before day-light
From the full-freighted bags of our fair flocks;
Your hair more beauteous than those hanging locks

Of young Apollo!

Amo. Shepherd, be not lost;
Y' are sail'd too far already from the coast 70
Of your discourse.

Peri. Did you not tell me once
I should not love alone, I should not lose
Those many passions, vows, and holy oaths, I've sent to heaven? Did you not give your
hand,

Even that fair hand, in hostage? Do not, then,
Give back again those sweets to other men, 75
You yourself vow'd were mine.

Amo. Shepherd, so far as maiden's modesty
May give assurance, I am once more thine,
Once more I give my hand. Be ever free 80
From that great foe to faith, foul jealousy!

Peri. I take it as my best good; and desire,
For stronger confirmation of our love,
To meet this happy night in that fair grove, 85
Where all true shepherds have rewarded been
For their long service: say, sweet, shall it hold?

Amo. Dear friend, you must not blare me,
if I make

A doubt of what the silent night may do,
Coupled with this day's heat, to move your
blood.

Maids must be fearful. Sure you have not been Wash'd white enough, for yet I see a stain 91
Stick in your liver:<sup>2</sup> go and purge again.

Peri. Oh, do not wrong my honest simple truth!

Myself and my affections are as pure
As those chaste flames that burn before the shrine 95

Of the great Dian: only my intent
To draw you thither was to plight our troths,
With interchange of mutual chaste embraces,
And ceremonious tying of our souls.

For to that holy wood is consecrate 100

A virtuous well, about whose flowery banks
The nimble-footed fairies dance their rounds
By the pale moonshine, dipping oftentimes

<sup>2</sup> Seat of the passions.

Their stolen children, so to make them free
From dying flesh and dull mortality. 108
By this fair fount hath many a shepherd sworn,
And given away his freedom, many a troth
Been plight, which neither envy nor old time
Could ever break, with many a chaste kiss given,

In hope of coming happiness; by this 110
Fresh fountain many a blushing maid
Hath crown'd the head of her long-loved shepherd

With gaudy flowers, whilst he happy sung
Lays of his love and dear captivity. 114

There grows all herbs fit to cool looser flames
Our sensual parts provoke, chiding our bloods,
And quenching by their power those hidden sparks

That else would break out, and provoke our sense

To open fires; so virtuous is that place.
Then, gentle shepherdess, believe, and grant.
In troth, it fits not with that face to scant 121
Your faithful shepherd of those chaste desires
He ever aim'd at, and —

Amo. Thou hast prevail'd: farewell. This coming night

Shall crown thy chaste hopes with long-wish'd delight. 125

Peri. Our great god Pan reward thee for that good

Thou hast given thy poor shepherd! Fairest bud

Of maiden virtues, when I leave to be
The true admirer of thy chastity,

Let me deserve the hot polluted name 130
Of a wild woodman, or affect some dame

Whose often prostitution hath begot
More foul diseases than ever yet the hot

Sun bred thorough his burnings, whilst the Dog
Pursues the raging Lion, throwing fog 135

And deadly vapour from his angry breath,
Filling the lower world with plague and death!

Exit AMORET.

Enter AMARILLIS, another Shepherdess that is in love with PERIGOT.

Amar. Shepherd, may I desire to be believ'd,
What I shall blushing tell?

Peri. Fair maid, you may.

Amar. Then, softly thus: I love thee, Peri-
got; 140

And would be gladder to be lov'd again
Than the cold earth is in his frozen arms

To clip<sup>1</sup> the wanton spring. Nay, do not start,
Nor wonder that I woo thee; thou that art

The prime of our young grooms, even the top
Of all our lusty shepherds. What dull eye, 145

That never was acquainted with desire,
Hath seen thee wrestle, run, or cast the stone

With nimble strength and fair delivery,
And hath not sparkled fire, and speedily 150

Sent secret heat to all the neighbouring veins?
Who ever heard thee sing, that brought again

That freedom back was lent unto thy voice?
Then, do not blame me, shepherd, if I be

One to be numb'ed in this company, 155
Since none that ever saw thee yet were free.

Peri. Fair shepherdess, much pity I can lend
To your complaints; but sure I shall not love.

All that is mine, myself and my best hopes,
Are given already. Do not love him, then, 160

That cannot love again; on other men
Bestow those heats, more free, that may return

You fire for fire, and in one flame equal burn.

Amar. Shall I rewarded be so slenderly
For my affection, most unkind of men? 165

If I were old, or had agreed with art
To give another nature to my cheeks,

Or were I common mistress to the love
Of every swain, or could I with such ease

Call back my love as many a wanton doth, 170
Thou mightst refuse me, shepherd; but to thee

I am only fixt and set; let it not be
A sport, thou gentle shepherd, to abuse

The love of silly<sup>2</sup> maid.

Peri. Fair soul, ye use
These words to little end: for, know, I may 175

Better call back that time was yesterday,
Or stay the coming night, than bring my love

Home to myself again, or recreate prove.
I will no longer hold you with delays:

This present night I have appointed been 180
To meet that chaste fair that enjoys my soul,

In yonder grove, there to make up our loves.
Be not deceiv'd no longer, choose again:

These neighbouring plains have many a comely
swain,

Fresher and freer<sup>3</sup> far than I e'er was; 185
Bestow that love on them, and let me pass.

Farewell: be happy in a better choice! Exit.

Amar. Cruel, thou hast struck me deadlier with thy voice

Than if the angry heavens with their quick flames

Had shot me through. I must not leave to love,
I cannot; no, I must enjoy thee, boy. 195

Though the great dangers 'twixt my hopes and
that

Be infinite. There is a shepherd dwells
Down by the moor, whose life hath ever shown

More sullen discontent than Saturn's brow 195
When he sits frowning on the births of men;

One that doth wear himself away in loneliness,
And never joys, unless it be in breaking

The holy plighted troths of mutual souls;
One that lusts after every several beauty, 200

But never yet was known to love or like,
Were the face fairer or more full of truth

Than Phoebe in her fulness, or the youth
Of smooth Lyaeus; whose nigh-starved flocks

Are always scabby, and infect all sheep 205
They feed withal; whose lambs are ever lost,

And die before their weaning: and whose dog
Looks, like his master, lean and full of scurf,

Not caring for the pipe or whistle. This man
may,

If he be well wrought, do a deed of wonder, 210
Forcing me passage to my long desires:

And here he comes, as fitly to my purpose
As my quick thoughts could wish for.

<sup>3</sup> More gracious.

Enter Sullen Shepherd.

Sull. Shep. Fresh beauty, let me not be thought unceivil,
Thus to be partner of your loneliness: 't was 215
My love (that ever-working passion) drew
Me to this place, to seek some remedy
For my sick soul. Be not unkind and fair,
For such the mighty Cupid in his doom
Hath sworn to be aveng'd on; then, give room
To my consuming fires, that so I may 221
Enjoy my long desires, and so allay
Those flames that else would burn my life
away.

Amar. Shepherd, were I but sure thy heart were sound
As thy words seem to be, means might be 225
found
To cure thee of thy long pains; for to me
That heavy youth-consuming misery
The love-sick soul endures never was pleasing.
I could be well content with the quick easing
Of thee and thy hot fires, might it procure 230
Thy faith and farther service to be sure.

Sull. Shep. Name but that work, danger, or what can
Be compass'd by the wit or art of man;
And, if I fail in my performance, may
I never more kneel to the rising day! 235
Amar. Then, thus I try thee, shepherd. This same night

That now comes stealing on, a gentle pair
Have promis'd equal love, and do appoint
To make you wood the place where hands and hearts
Are to be tied for ever. Break their meeting 240
And their strong faith, and I am ever thine.

Sull. Shep. Tell me their names, and if I do not move
By my great power, the centre of their love
From his fixt being, let me never more
Warm me by those fair eyes I thus adore. 245
Amar. Come; as we go, I'll tell thee what they are,
And give thee fit directions for thy work.

Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter CLOE.

Cloe. How have I wrong'd the times or men,
that thus,
After this holy feast, I pass unknown
And unsaluted? 'T was not wont to be Thus frozen with the younger company
Of jolly shepherds; 't was not then held good 5
For lusty grooms to mix their quicker blood
With that dull humour, most unfit to be
The friend of man, cold and dull chastity.
Sure I am held not fair, or am too old,
Or else not free enough, or from my fold 10
Drive not a flock sufficient great to gain
The greedy eyes of wealth-alluring swain.
Yet, if I may believe what others say,
My face has foil<sup>2</sup> enough; nor can they lay
Justly too strict a coyness to my charge; 15

<sup>1</sup> Another part of the wood.

My flocks are many, and the downs as large
They feed upon. Then, let it ever be Their coldness, not my virgin-modesty
Makes me complain.

Enter THENOT.

The. Was ever man but I
Thus truly taken with uncertainty; 20
Where shall that man be found that loves a mind
Made up in constancy, and dares not find
His love rewarded? Here, let all men know,
A wretch that lives to love his mistress so.
Cloe. Shepherd, I pray thee stay. Where hast thou been? 25

Or whither go'st thou? Here be woods as green
As any; air [likewise]<sup>3</sup> as fresh and sweet
As where smooth Zephyrus plays on the fleet Face of the curled streams; with flowers as many

As the young spring gives, and as choice as any; 30
Here be all new delights, cool streams and wells,
Arbours o'ergrown with woodbines, caves, and dells;

Choose where thou wilt, whilst I sit by and sing,
Or gather rushes, to make many a ring
For thy long fingers; tell thee tales of love, —
How the pale Phoebe, hunting in a grove, 35
First saw the boy Endymion, from whose eyes
She took eternal fire that never dies;
How she convey'd him softly in a sleep,
His temples bound with poppy, to the steep 40
Head of old Latmus, where she stoops each
night,
Gilding the mountain with her brother's light,
To kiss her sweetest.

The. Far from me are these
Hot flashes, bred from wanton heat and ease;
I have forgot what love and loving meant; 45
Rhymes, songs, and merry rounds, that oft are sent

To the soft ear of maid, are strange to me:
Only I live t' admire a chastity,
That neither pleasing age, smooth tongue, nor
gold,

Could ever break upon, so sure<sup>4</sup> a mould 50
Is that her mind was cast in; 't is to her
I only am reserv'd; she is my form I stir
By, breathe and move; 't is she, and only she,
Can make me happy, or give misery.

Cloe. Good shepherd, may a stranger crave to know 55

To whom this dear observance<sup>5</sup> you do owe?
The. You may, and by her virtue learn to square

And level out your life; for to be fair,
And nothing virtuous, only fits the eye
Of gaudy youth and swelling vanity. 60
Then, know, she's call'd the Virgin of the Grove,
She that hath long since buri'd her chaste love,
And now lives by his grave, for whose dear

<sup>3</sup> Q<sub>1</sub>-Q<sub>4</sub> omit.    <sup>4</sup> F<sub>2</sub> pure.    <sup>5</sup> Worship.

She hath vow'd herself into the holy roll
Of strict virginity: 't is her I so admire, 65
Not any looser blood or new desire. [Exit.]

Cloe. Farewell, poor swain! thou art not for my bend;<sup>1</sup>
I must have quicker souls, whose words may tend

To some free action. Give me him dare love
At first encounter, and as soon dare prove! 70

THE SONG.

[Sings.] Come, shepherds, come!
Come away
Without delay,

Whilst the gentle time doth stay.
Green woods are dumb, 75

And will never tell to any
Those dear kisses, and those many
Sweet embraces that are given;
Dainty pleasures, that would even Raise in coldest age a fire, 80
And give virgin-blood desire.

Then, if ever,
Now or never,
Come and have it:
Think not I 85
Dare deny,
If you crave it.

Enter DAPHNIS.

[Aside.] Here comes another. Better be my speed,

Thou god of blood! But certain, if I read
Not false, this is that modest shepherd, he 90
That only dare salute, but ne'er could be Brought to kiss any, hold discourse, or sing,
Whisper, or boldly ask that wished thing
We all are born for; one that makes loving faces,

And could be well content to covet graces, 95
Were they not got by boldness. In this thing
My hopes are frozen; and, but fate doth bring Him hither, I would sooner choose
A man made out of snow, and freer use
An eunuch to my ends; but since he's here, 100
Thus I attempt him. — Thou, of men most
dear,

Welcome to her that only for thy sake
Hath been content to live! Here, boldly take
My hand in pledge, this hand, that never yet 105
Was given away to any; and but sit Down on this rushy bank, whilst I go pull
Fresh blossoms from the boughs, or quickly cull
The choicest delicates from yonder mead,
To make thee chains or chaplets, or to spread
Under our fainting bodies, when delight 110
Shall lock up all our senses. How the sight
Of those smooth rising cheeks renew the story
Of young Adonis, when in pride and glory
He lay infolded 'twixt the beating arms
Of willing Venus! Methinks stronger charms 115
Dwell in those speaking eyes, and on that brow
More sweetness than the painters can allow
To their best pieces. Not Narcissus, he
That wept himself away in memory
Of his own beauty, nor Silvanus' boy, 120

Nor the twice-ravish'd maid, for whom old Troy
Fell by the hand of Pyrrhus, may to thee
Be otherwise compar'd, than some dead tree
To a young fruitful olive.

Daph. I can love,
But I am loth to say so, lest I prove 125
Too soon unhappy.

Cloe. Happy, thou wouldst say.
My dearest Daphnis, blush not; if the day
To thee and thy soft heats be enemy,
Then take the coming night; fair youth, 't is free

To all the world. Shepherd, I'll meet thee
then 130

When darkness hath shut up the eyes of men,
In yonder grove. Speak, shall our meeting hold?
Indeed you are too bashful; be more bold,
And tell me ay.

Daph. I am content to say so,
And would be glad to meet, might I but pray 135

so
Much from your fairness, that you would be true.

Cloe. Shepherd, thou hast thy wish.

Daph. Fresh maid, adieu.
Yet one word more: since you have drawn me
on

To come this night, fear not to meet alone
That man that will not offer to be ill, 140
Though your bright self would ask it, for his fill

Of this world's goodness; do not fear him, then,
But keep your pointed time. Let other men
Set up their bloods to sale, mine shall be ever Fair as the soul it carries, and unchaste never.

Exit.

Cloe. Yet am I poorer than I was before. 145
Is it not strange, among so many a score
Of lusty bloods, I should pick out these things
Whose veins, like a dull river far from springs,
Is still the same, slow, heavy, and unfit 150
For stream or motion, though the strong winds hit

With their continual power upon his sides?
Oh, happy be your names that have been brides,
And tasted those rare sweets for which I pine!
And far more heavy be thy grief and tine, 155
Thou lazy swain, that mayst relieve my needs,
Than his, upon whose liver always feeds
A hungry vulture!

Enter ALEXIS.

Alex. Can such beauty be Safe in his own guard, and not draw the eye
Of him that passeth on, to greedy gaze 160
Or covetous desire, whilst in a maze
The better part contemplates, giving rein,
And wished freedom to the labouring vein?
Fairest and whitest, may I crave to know
The cause of your retirement, why you go 165
Thus all alone? Methinks the downs are sweeter,

And the young company of swains more meeter,
Than these forsaken and untrodden places.
Give not yourself to loneliness, and those graces

Hide from the eyes of men, that were intended
To live amongst us swains.

Cloe. Thou art befriended, 171
Shepherd: in all my life I have not seen
A man in whom greater contents hath been,
Than thou thyself art. I could tell thee more,
Were there but any hope left to restore 176
My freedom lost. Oh, lend me all thy red, Thou shame-fast Morning, when from Tithon's<sup>1</sup>
bed

Thou risest ever-maiden!

Alex. If for me,
Thou sweetest of all sweets, these flashes be,
Speak, and be satisf'd. Oh, guide her tongue,
My better angel; force my name among 181
Her modest thoughts, that the first word may
be—

Cloe. Alexis, when the sun shall kiss the sea,
Taking his rest by the white Thetis' side,
Meet me in the holy wood, where I'll abide 185
Thy coming, shepherd.

Alex. If I stay behind,
An everlasting dulness, and the wind,
That as he passeth by shuts up the stream
Of Rhine or Volga, whilst the sun's hot beam
Beats back again, seize me, and let me turn 190
To coldness more than ice! Oh, how I burn
And rise in youth and fire! I dare not stay.

Cloe. My name shall be your word.

Alex. Fly, fly, thou day! Exit.
Cloe. My grief is great, if both these boys should fail: 194

He that will use all winds must shift his sail.
Exit.

ACT II

SCENE I.<sup>2</sup>

Enter Old Shepherd with a bell ringing, and the Priest of Pan following.

Priest. Shepherds all, and maidens fair,
Fold your flocks up, for the air
'Gins to thicken, and the sun
Already his great course hath run.
See the dew-drops how they kiss 5
Every little flower that is;
Hanging on their velvet heads,
Like a rope of crystal beads;
See the heavy clouds down<sup>3</sup> falling,
And bright Hesperus loud<sup>3</sup> calling 10
The dead Night from under ground;
At whose rising mists unsound,<sup>4</sup>
Damps and vapours fly apace,
Hovering o'er the wanton face
Of these pastures, where they come, 15
Striking dead both bud and bloom.
Therefore, from such danger lock
Every one his loved flock;
And let your dogs lie loose without,
Lest the wolf come as a scout 20
From the mountain, and, ere day,
Bear a lamb or kid away;

<sup>1</sup> Tithonus'. F. reads Titans.      <sup>2</sup> A pasture.
<sup>3</sup> Dyce emend. Qq. 1-4 transpose down and loud, F<sub>2</sub> low falling . . . down calling.
<sup>4</sup> Unwholesome.

Or the crafty thievish fox
Break upon your simple flocks.
To secure yourselves from these, 25
Be not too secure in ease.
Let one eye his watches keep,
Whilst the t'other eye doth sleep;
So you shall good shepherds prove,
And for ever hold the love 30
Of our great god. Sweetest slumbers,
And soft silence, fall in numbers
On your eyelids! So, farewell:
Thus I end my evening's knell. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter CLORIN, the Shepherdess, sorting of herbs, and telling the natures of them.

Cloe. Now let me know what my best art hath
done,
Help'd by the great power of the virtuous moon
In her full light. Oh, you sons of earth,
You only brood, unto whose [happy]<sup>6</sup> birth
Virtue was given, holding more of nature 5
Than man, her first-born and most perfect
creature,
Let me adore you! you, that only can
Help or kill nature, drawing out that span
Of life and breath even to the end of time;
You, that these hands did [crop]<sup>7</sup> long before prime 10
Of day, give me your names, and, next, your hidden power.

This is the clote,<sup>8</sup> bearing a yellow flower;
And this, black horehound; both are very good
For sheep or shepherd bitten by a wood<sup>9</sup>
Dog's venom'd teeth: these rhamnus<sup>10</sup> branches
are, 15

Which, stuck in entries, or about the bar
That holds the door, kill all enchantments,
charms

(Were they Medea's verses), that do harms
To men or cattle: these for frenzy be
A speedy and a sovereign remedy, 20
The bitter wormwood, sage, and marigold;
Such sympathy with man's good they do hold:
This tormentil,<sup>11</sup> whose virtue is to part
All deadly killing poison from the heart:
And, here, narcissus root, for swellings best: 25
Yellow lysimachus,<sup>12</sup> to give sweet rest
To the faint shepherd, killing, where it comes,
All busy gnats, and every fly that hums:
For leprosy, darnel and celandine,
With calamint, whose virtues do refine 30
The blood of man, making it free and fair
As the first hour it breath'd, or the best air:
Here, other two; but your rebellious use
Is not for me, whose goodness is abuse;
Therefore, foul standergrass,<sup>13</sup> from me and
mine 35

I banish thee, with lustful turpentine;
You that entice the veins and stir the heat
To civil matiny, scaling the seat
Our reason moves in, and deluding it

<sup>7</sup> Q<sub>1</sub> lop.      <sup>10</sup> Buckthorn.      <sup>13</sup> Orchis mascula.
<sup>8</sup> Water-lily.      <sup>11</sup> Septfoil.

With dreams and wanton [fancies]<sup>1</sup> till the fit
 Of burning lust be quencht, by appetite 41
 Robbing the soul of blessedness and light :
 And thou, light vervain, too, thou must go after,
 Provoking easy souls to mirth and laughter ;
 No more shall I dip thee in water now, 46
 And sprinkle every post and every bough
 With thy well-pleasing juice, to make the grooms
 Swell with high mirth, and with joy all the rooms.

Enter THENOT.

The. This is the cabin where the best of all
 Her sex that ever breath'd, or ever shall 60
 Give heat or happiness to the shepherd's side,
 Doth only to her worthy self abide.
 Thou blessed star, I thank thee for thy light,
 Thou by whose power the darkness of sad night
 Is banisht from the earth, in whose dull place
 Thy chaster beams play on the heavy face 66
 Of all the world, make the blue sea smile,
 To see how cunningly thou dost beguile
 Thy brother of his brightness, giving day
 Again from chaos ; whither than that way 69
 That leads to Jove's high court, and chaster far

Than chastity itself, you blessed star
 That brightly shines ! thou, all the constancy
 That in all women was or e'er shall be ;
 From whose fair eye-balls flies that holy fire 68
 That styl'd is the mother of desire,
 Infusing into every gentle breast
 A soul of greater price, and far more blest,
 Than that quick power which gives a difference
 'Twixt man and creatures of a lower sense ! 70
Clo. Shepherd, how cam'st thou hither to this place ?

No way is trodden ; all the verdant grass
 The spring shot up stands yet unbruised here
 Of any foot ; only the dappled deer,
 Far from the feared sound of crooked horn, 76
 Dwells in this fastness.

The. Chaster than the morn,
 I have not wand'rd, or by strong illusion
 Into this virtuous place have made intrusion :
 But hither am I come (believe me, fair),
 To seek you out, of whose great good the air 80
 Is full, and strongly labours, whilst the sound Breaks against heaven, and drives into a stound<sup>2</sup>

Th' amazed shepherd, that such virtue can
 Be resident in lesser than a man.

Clo. If any art I have, or hidden skill, 85
 May cure thee of disease or fest'rd ill
 Whose grief or greenness to another's eye
 May seem impossible of remedy,
 I dare yet undertake it.

The. 'T is no pain 90
 I suffer through disease, no beating vein
 Conveys infection dangerous to the heart,
 No part imposthum'd, to be cur'd by art,
 This body holds ; and yet a feller grief
 Than ever skilful hand did give relief,

Dwells on my soul, and may be heal'd by you,
 Fair, beauteous virgin.

Clo. Then, shepherd, let me sue 96
 To know thy grief : that man yet never knew
 The way to health that durst not show his sore.

The. Then, fairest, know, I love you.
Clo. Swain, no more !
 Thou hast abus'd the strictness of this place, 100
 And off'rd sacrilegious foul disgrace
 To the sweet rest of these interred bones ;
 For fear of whose ascending, fly at once,
 Thou and thy idle passions, that the sight
 Of death and speedy vengeance may not fright
 Thy very soul with horror.

The. Let me not, 106
 Thou all perfection, merit such a blot
 For my true zealous faith.

Clo. Dar'st thou abide
 To see this holy earth at once divide,
 And give her body up ? for sure it will, 110
 If thou pursu'st with wanton flame to fill
 This hallowed place : therefore repent and go,
 Whilst I with prayers appease his ghost below,
 That else would tell thee what it were to be
 A rival in that virtuous love that he 116
 Embraces yet.

The. 'T is not the white or red
 Inhabits in your cheek that thus can wed
 My mind to adoration ; nor your eye,
 Though it be full and fair, your forehead high
 And smooth as Pelops' shoulder ; not the smile
 Lies watching in those dimples to beguile 121
 The easy soul ; your hands and fingers long,
 With veins enamell'd richly ; nor your tongue,
 Though it spoke sweeter than Arion's harp ;
 Your hair woven into many a curious warp, 126
 Able in endless error to enfold
 The [wand'ring]<sup>3</sup> soul ; not the true perfect mould

Of all your body, which as pure doth show
 In maiden-whiteness as the Alpine snow :
 All these, were but your constancy away. 130
 Would please me less than a black stormy day
 The wretched seaman toiling through the deep.
 But, whilst this honour'd strictness you do
 keep,

Though all the plagues that e'er begotten were
 In the great womb of air were settled here, 136
 In opposition, I would, like the tree,
 Shake off those drops of weakness, and be free
 Even in the arm of danger.

Clo. Wouldst thou have Me raise again, fond man, from silent grave
 Those sparks, that long ago were buried here 140
 With my dead friend's cold ashes ?

The. Dearest dear,
 I dare not ask it, nor you must not grant :
 Stand strongly to your vow, and do not faint.
 Remember how he lov'd you, and be still
 The same opinion speaks you : let not will, 146
 And that great god of women, appetite,
 Set up your blood again ; do not invite Desire and fancy from their long exile,
 To seat them once more in a pleasing smile :
 Be, like a rock, made firmly up 'gainst all 150

<sup>3</sup> Q<sub>1</sub> errant.

The power of angry heaven, or the strong fall
Of Neptune's battery. If you yield, I die
To all affection; 'tis that loyalty
You tie unto this grave I so admire:
And yet there 's something else I would desire,
If you would hear me, but withal deny. 155
Oh, Pan, what an uncertain destiny
Hangs over all my hopes! I will retire;
For, if I longer stay, this double fire
Will lick my life up.

Clo. Do; and let time wear out 160
What art and nature cannot bring about.

The. Farewell, thou soul of virtue, and be blest

For ever, whilst [that here] <sup>1</sup> I wretched rest
Thus to myself! Yet grant me leave to dwell
In kenning <sup>2</sup> of this arbour: yon same dell, 165
O'erthopt with mourning cypress and sad yew,
Shall be my cabin, where I'll early rue,
Before the sun hath kist this dew away,
The hard uncertain chance which faith doth lay
Upon his head.

Clo. The gods give quick release 170
And happy cure unto thy hard disease!

Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter Sullen Shepherd.

Sull. Shep. I do not love this wench that I should meet;

For ne'er did my unconstant eye yet greet
That beauty, were it sweeter or more fair
Than the new blossoms when the morning-air
Blows gently on them, or the breaking light, 5
When many maiden-blushes to our sight
Shoot from his early face: were all these set
In some neat form before me, 't would not get
The least love from me; some desire it might,
And present burning. All to me in sight 10
Are equal; be they fair, or black, or brown,
Virgin, or careless wanton, I can crown
My appetite with any; swear as oft,
And weep, as any; melt my words as soft
Into a maiden's ears, and tell how long 15
My heart has been her servant, and how strong
My passions are; call her unkind and cruel;
Offer her all I have to gain the jewel
Maidens so highly [prize]; <sup>4</sup> then loathe, and fly:
This do I hold a blessed destiny. 20

Enter AMARILLIS.

Amar. Hail, shepherd! Pan bless both thy flock and thee,

For being mindful of thy word to me!

Sull. Shep. Welcome, fair shepherdess! Thy loving swain

Gives thee the self-same wishes back again; <sup>24</sup>
Who till this present hour ne'er knew that eye
Could make me cross mine arms, or daily die
With fresh consumings. Boldly tell me, then,
How shall we part their faithful loves, and
when?

Shall I belie him to her? Shall I swear
His faith is false and he loves every where? <sup>30</sup>

I'll say he mockt her th' other day to you;
Which will by your confirming show as true,
For [she] <sup>5</sup> is of so pure an honesty,
To think, because [she] <sup>6</sup> will not, none will lie. 25
Or else to him I'll slander Amoret, <sup>35</sup>
And say, she but seems chaste; I'll swear she met

Me 'mongst the shady sycamores last night,
And loosely off'red up her flame and sprite
Into my bosom; made a wanton bed 30
Of leaves and many flowers, where she spread
Her willing body to be prest by me;

There have I carv'd her name on many a tree,
Together with mine own. To make this show
More full of seeming, — Hobinal, you know, 45
Son to the aged shepherd of the glen,
Him I have sorted out of many men,
To say he found us at our private sport,
And rous'd us 'fore our time by his resort.

This to confirm, I've promis'd to the boy
Many a pretty knack and many a toy; 50
As gins to catch him birds, with bow and bolt
To shoot at conies, <sup>6</sup> squirrels, in theholt;
A pair of painted buskins, and a lamb
Soft as his own locks or the down of swan.

This I have done to win you; which doth give Me double pleasure: discord makes me live. 60

Amar. Lov'd swain, I thank ye. These tricks might prevail

With other rustic shepherds, but will fail
Even once to stir, much more to overthrow, 65
His fixed love from judgment, who doth know
Your nature, my end, and his chosen's merit;
Therefore some stronger way must force his
spirit,

Which I have found: give second, and my love
Is everlasting thine.

Sull. Shep. Try me, and prove.

Amar. These happy pair of lovers meet straightway, 68

Soon as they fold their flocks up with the day,
In the thick grove bordering upon yon hill,
In whose hard side nature hath carv'd a well,
And, but that matchless spring which poets
know,

Was ne'er the like to this. By it doth grow, 70
About the sides, all herbs which witches use,
All simples good for medicine or abuse,
All sweets that crown the happy nuptial day,
With all their colours; there the month of May
Is ever dwelling, all is young and green;

There's not a grass on which was ever seen
The falling autumn or cold winter's hand;

So full of heat and virtue is the land
About this fountain, which doth slowly break,
Below yon mountain's foot, into a creek 80

That waters all the valley, giving fish
Of many sorts to fill the shepherd's dish.

This holy well, my grandam that is dead,
Right wise in charms, hath often to me said,
Hath power to change the form of any creature,
Being thrice dipt o'er the head, into what feature 85

Or shape 't would please the letter-down to crave,

<sup>6</sup> Q<sub>2</sub> ff. nimble.

Who must pronounce this charm too, which she gave [Showing a scroll.]

Me on her death-bed; told me what, and how,
I should apply unto the patients' brow 90
That would be chang'd, casting them thrice asleep,

Before I trusted them into this deep.
All this she show'd me, and did charge me prove

This secret of her art, if crost in love.
I'll this attempt now, shepherd; I have here 95
All her prescriptions, and I will not fear
To be myself dipt. Come, my temples bind
With these sad herbs, and when I sleep you
find,

As you do speak your charm, thrice down me
let,

And bid the water raise me Amoret; 100
Which being done, leave me to my affair,
And ere the day shall quite itself outwear,
I will return unto my shepherd's arm;
Dip me again, and then repeat this charm,
And pluck me up myself, whom freely take,
And the hott'st fire of thine affection slake. 105

Sull. Shep. And if I fit thee not, then fit not
me.

I long the truth of this well's power to see.
Exeunt.

SCENE IV.<sup>1</sup>

Enter DAPHNIS.

Daph. Here will I stay, for this the covert is Where I appointed Cloe. Do not miss, Thou bright-ey'd virgin; come, oh come, my fair!

Be not abus'd with fear, nor let cold care
Of honour stay thee from thy shepherd's arm, 6

Who would as hard be won to offer harm
To thy chaste thoughts, as whiteness from the day,

Or you great round to move another way.
My language shall be honest, full of truth,
My flame as smooth and spotless as my
youth; 10

I will not entertain that wand'ring thought,
Whose easy current may at length be brought
To a loose vastness.

Alexis. (within.) Cloe!

Daph.

And I must answer. — Cloe! — Oh, the choice

Of dear embraces, chaste and holy strains 15
Our hands shall give! I charge you, all my veins,

Through which the blood and spirit take their
way,

Lock up your disobedient heats, and stay
Those mutinous desires that else would grow
To strong rebellion; do not wilder show 20
Than blushing modesty may entertain.

Alexis. (within.) Cloe! [again,

Daph.

These sounds that blessed name
And I will meet it. Let me not mistake;

Enter ALEXIS.

This is some shepherd. Sure, I am awake:
What may this riddle mean? I will retire, 25
To give myself more knowledge. [Retires.]

Alexis. Oh, my fire,
How thou consum'st me! — Cloe, answer me!

Alexis, strong Alexis, high and free,
Calls upon Cloe. See, mine arms are full
Of entertainment, ready for to pull 30
That golden fruit which too, too long hath hung

Tempting the greedy eye. Thou stay'st at too
long;

I am impatient of those mad delays:
I must not leave unsought those many ways
That lead into this centre, till I find 35
Quench for my burning lust. I come, unkind!

Exit.
Daph. [coming forward.] Can my imagination work me so much ill,

That I may credit this for truth, and still Believe mine eyes? Or shall I firmly hold
Her yet untainted, and these sights but bold 40 Illusion? Sure, such fancies oft have been Sent to abuse true love, and yet are seen Daring to blind the virtuous thought with error;

But be they far from me with their fond terror!

I am resolv'd my Cloe yet is true. 45
(Cloe within.)

Cloe! Hark! Cloe! Sure, this voice is new,
Whose shrillness, like the sounding of a bell,
Tells me it is a woman. — Cloe, tell
Thy blessed name again.

Cloe. (within.) Here!
Daph. Oh, what a grief is this, to be so near, 50

And not encounter!

Enter CLOE.

Cloe. Shepherd, we are met:
Draw close into the covert, lest the wet,
Which falls like lazy mist upon the ground,
Soak through your startups.<sup>2</sup>

Daph. Fairest, are you found?
How have we wand'ring, that the better part
Of this good night is perisht? Oh, my heart!
How have I long'd to meet you, how to kiss 55
Those lily hands, how to receive the bliss
That charming tongue gives to the happy ear

Of him that drinks your language! But I fear
I am too much unmanner'd, far too rude, 61
And almost grown lascivious, to intrude
These hot behaviours; where regard of fame,
Honour and modesty, a virtuous name,
And such discourse as one fair sister may 65
Without offence unto the brother say, Should rather have been tend'red. But, believe,

Here dwells a better temper: do not grieve,
Then, ever kindest, that my first salute
Seasons so much of fancy; I am mute 70

<sup>2</sup> High laced boots.

Henceforth to all discourses but shall be
 Suiting to your sweet thoughts and modesty.
 Indeed, I will not ask a kiss of you,
 No, not to wring your fingers, nor to sue
 To those blest pair of fixed stars for smiles; 75
 All a young lover's cunning, all his wiles,
 And pretty wanton dyings shall to me
 Be strangers; only to your chastity
 I am devoted ever.

Cloe. Honest swain,
 First let me thank you, then return again 80
 As much of my love. — [Aside.] No, thou art too cold,

Unhappy boy, not temp'rd to my mould;
 Thy blood falls heavy downward. 'T is not
 fear

To offend in boldness wins; they never wear
 Deserved favours that deny to take 85
 When they are offered freely. Do I wake,
 To see a man of his youth, years, and feature,
 And such a one as we call goodly creature,
 Thus backward? What a world of precious
 art

Were merely lost, to make him do his part! 90
 But I will shake him off, that dares not hold:
 Let men that hope to be belov'd be bold.

Daphnis, I do desire, since we are met
 So happily, our lives and fortunes set
 Upon one stake, to give assurance now, 95
 By interchange of hands and holy vow,
 Never to break again. Walk you that way,
 Whilst I in zealous meditation stray
 A little this way. When we both have ended These rites and duties, by the woods befriended 100

And secrecy of night, retire and find
 An aged oak, whose hollowness may bind
 Us both within his body; thither go;
 It stands within yon bottom.

Daph. Be it so. Exit.

Cloe. And I will meet there never more with
 thee, 105

Thou idle shamefastness!
Alexis. (within.) Cloe! 'T is he

Cloe. That dare, I hope, be bolder.
Alexis. (within.) Cloe! Now,

Great Pan, for Syrinx' sake, bid speed our plough! Exit.

ACT III

SCENE I.

Enter Sullen Shepherd, with AMARILLIS in a sleep.

Sull. Shep. From thy forehead thus I take These herbs, and charge thee not awake
 Till in yonder holy well
 Thrice, with powerful magic spell
 Fill'd with many a baleful word 5
 Thou hast been dipt. Thus, with my cord
 Of blasted hemp, by moonlight twin'd
 I do thy sleepy body bind.

1 Part of the wood with the holy well.

I turn thy head unto the east,
 And thy feet unto the west, 10
 Thy left arm to the south put forth,
 And thy right unto the north.
 I take thy body from the ground,
 In this deep and deadly swound,
 And into this holy spring 15
 I let thee slide down by my string. —

[Lets her down into the well.]

Take this maid, thou holy pit,
 To thy bottom; nearer yet;
 In thy water pure and sweet,
 By thy leave I dip her feet; 20
 Thus I let her lower yet,
 That her ankles may be wet;
 Yet down lower, let her knee
 In thy waters washed be;
 There stop. — Fly away, 25

Every thing that loves the day!
 Truth, that hath but one face,
 Thus I charm thee from this place.
 Snakes that cast your coats for new,
 Chameleons that alter hue, 30

Hares that yearly sexes change,
 Proteus alt'ring oft and strange,
 Hecate with shapes three,
 Let this maiden changed be,
 With this holy water wet, 35
 To the shape of Amoret!
 Cynthia, work thou with my charm! —
 Thus I draw thee, free from harm,

[Draws her out of the well, in the shape of AMORET.]

Up out of this blessed lake.
 Rise both like her and awake! She awaketh. 40
Amar. Speak, shepherd, am I Amoret to sight?

Or hast thou mist in any magic rite,
 For want of which any defect in me
 May make our practices discovered be?
Sull. Shep. By yonder moon, but that I here do stand, 45

Whose breath hath thus transform'd<sup>2</sup> thee, and whose hand
 Let thee down dry, and pluckt thee up thus wet,

I should myself take thee for Amoret!
 Thou art in clothes, in feature, voice and hue,
 So like, that sense cannot distinguish you. 50

Amar. Then, this deceit, which cannot crossed
 be,

At once shall lose her him, and gain thee me.
 Hither she needs must come, by promise made;
 And, sure, his nature never was so bad,
 To bid a virgin meet him in the wood, 55
 When night and fear are up, but understood
 'T was his part to come first. Being come, I'll
 say,

My constant love made me come first and stay;
 Then will I lead him further to the grove:
 But stay you here, and, if his own true love 60
 Shall seek him here, set her in some wrong path,

Which say her lover lately trodden hath;
 I'll not be far from hence. If need there be,

<sup>2</sup> Q<sub>1</sub> and Q<sub>2</sub>, reformed.

Here is another charm, whose power will free
 The dazzled sense, read by the moonbeams
 clear,
 And in my own true shape make me appear.

Enter PERIGOT.

Sull. Shep. Stand close; here 's Perigot, whose constant heart
 Longs to behold her in whose shape thou art.

[Retires with AMARILLIS.]

Peri. This is the place. — Fair Amoret! —
 The hour

Is yet scarce come. Here every sylvan power
 Delights to be, about yon sacred well,
 Which they have blest with many a powerful spell;

For never traveller in dead of night,
 Nor stray'd beasts have fall'n in; but when
 sight

Hath fail'd them, then their right way they have found

By help of them, so holy is the ground.

But I will farther seek, lest Amoret
 Should be first come, and so stray long un-
 met. —

My Amoret, Amoret! Exit.

[Amar. coming forward. Perigot!]<sup>1</sup>

Peri. [within.] My love!

Amar. I come, my love! Exit.
Sull. Shep. Now she hath got

Her own desires, and I shall gainer be
 Of my long-lookt-for hopes, as well as she.
 How bright the moon shines here, as if she strove

To show her glory in this little grove

Enter AMORET.

To some new-loved shepherd! Yonder is Another Amoret. Where differs this
 From that? But that she Perigot hath met,
 I should have ta'en this for the counterfeit.
 Herbs, woods, and springs, the power that in you lies,

If mortal men could know your properties!
Amo. Methinks it is not night; I have no fear,
 Walking this wood, of lion or of bear,
 Whose names at other times have made me
 quake,

When any shepherdess in her tale spake
 Of some of them, that underneath a wood
 Have torn true lovers that together stood;
 Methinks there are no goblins, and men's talk,
 That in these woods the nimble fairies walk,
 Are fables: such a strong heart I have got Because I come to meet with Perigot. —
 My Perigot! Who's that? my Perigot?

Sull. Shep. [coming forward.] Fair maid!

Amo. Aye me, thou art not Perigot?

Sull. Shep. But I can tell you news of Peri-
 got.

An hour together under yonder tree
 He sat with wreathed arms, and call'd on thee
 And said, "Why, Amoret, stay'st thou so long?"

Then starting up, down yonder path he flung,
 Lest thou hadst miss'd thy way. Were it day-
 light,

He could not yet have borne him out of sight.
Amo. Thanks, gentle shepherd; and beshrew
 my stay,

That made me fearful I had lost my way.
 As fast as my weak legs (that cannot be Weary with seeking him) will carry me,
 I'll follow; and, for this thy care of me,<sup>2</sup>
 Pray Pan thy love may ever follow thee! Exit.

Sull. Shep. How bright she was, how lovely did she show!

Was it not pity to deceive her so?
 She pluckt her garments up, and tript away,
 And with a virgin-innocence did pray
 For me that perjur'd her. Whilst she was here,
 Methought the beams of light that did appear
 Were shot from her; methought the moon gave none

But what it had from her. She was alone
 With me; if then her presence did so move,
 Why did I not assay to win her love?

[Would she?<sup>3</sup> not sure have yielded unto me?
 Women love only opportunity,
 And not the man; or if she had deni'd,
 Alone, I might have forc'd her to have tri'd
 Who had been stronger. Oh, vain fool, to let Such blest occasion pass! I'll follow yet;
 My blood is up; I cannot now forbear.

Enter ALEXIS and CLOE.

I come, sweet Amoret! — Soft, who is here?
 A pair of lovers? He shall yield her me:
 Now lust is up, alike all women be. [Retires.]

Alexis. Where shall we rest? But for the love of me,

Cloe, I know, ere this would weary be.
Cloe. Alexis, let us rest here, if the place
 Be private, and out of the common trace

Of every shepherd; for, I understand,
 This night a number are about the wood:
 Then, let us choose some place, where, out of
 sight,

We freely may enjoy our stol'n delight.
Alexis. Then, boldly here, where we shall ne'er be found.

No shepherd's way lies here, 'tis hallow'd
 ground;

No maid seeks here her strayed cow or sheep;
 Fairies and fawns and satyrs do it keep.
 Then, carelessly rest here, and clip and kiss,
 And let no fear make us our pleasures miss.

Cloe. Then, lie by me: the sooner we begin,
 The longer ere the day desery our sin.

[They lie down.]

Sull. Shep. [coming forward.] Forbear to touch my love; or, by yon flame,
 The greatest power that shepherds dare to
 name,

Here where thou sit'st, under this holy tree,
 Her to dishonour, thou shalt buried be!

Alexis. If Pan himself should come out of the lawns,

With all his troops of satyrs and of fawns,

And bid me leave, I swear by her two eyes
(A greater oath than thine), I would not rise!
Sull. Shep. Then, from the cold earth never thou shalt move, <sup>160</sup>

But lose at one stroke both thy life and love.

[Wounds him with his spear.]

Cloe. Hold, gentle shepherd!

Sull. Shep. Fairest shepherdess,
Come you with me; I do not love you less Than that fond man, that would have kept you
there

From me of more desert.

Alexis. Oh, yet forbear <sup>165</sup>
To take her from me! Give me leave to die
By her!

Enter Satyr; Sullen Shepherd runs one way, and CLOE another.

Sat. Now, whilst the moon doth rule the sky,<sup>170</sup>

And the stars, whose feeble light
Gives a pale shadow to the night,
Are up, great Pan commanded me
To walk this grove about, whilst he,
In a corner of the wood,

Where never mortal foot hath stood,
Keeps dancing, music, and a feast,
To entertain a lovely guest;

Where he gives her many a rose, <sup>175</sup>
Sweeter than the breath that blows
The leaves; grapes, berries of the best;
I never saw so great a feast.

But, to my charge. Here must I stay, <sup>180</sup>
To see what mortals lose their way,
And by a false fire, seeming bright,
Train them in and leave them right,
Then must I watch if any be

Forcing of a chastity; <sup>185</sup>
If I find it, then in haste
Give my wreathed horn a blast,
And the fairies all will run,
Wildly dancing by the moon.

And will pinch him to the bone, <sup>190</sup>
Till his lustful thoughts be gone.

Alexis. Oh, death!

Sat. Back again about this ground;
Sure, I hear a mortal sound. —

I bind thee by this powerful spell. <sup>195</sup>
By the waters of this well,
By the glimmering moonbeams bright,
Speak again, thou mortal wight!

Alexis. Oh!

Sat. Here the foolish mortal lies, <sup>200</sup>
Sleeping on the ground. — Arise! —
The poor wight is almost dead;
On the ground his wounds have bled,
And his clothes foul'd with his blood:

To my goddess in the wood <sup>205</sup>
Will I lead him, whose hands pure
Will help this mortal wight to cure.

[Exit carrying ALEXIS.]

Re-enter CLOE.

Cloe. Since I beheld yon shaggy man, my
breast

Doth pant; each bush, methinks, should hide a beast.

Yet my desire keeps still above my fear: <sup>210</sup>

I would fain meet some shepherd, knew I
where;

For from one cause of fear I am most free,
It is impossible to ravish me,
I am so willing. Here upon this ground

I left my love, all bloody with his wound; <sup>215</sup>
Yet, till that fearful shape made me begone,
Though he were hurt, I furnisht was of one;

But now both lost. — Alexis, speak or move,
If thou hast any life; thou art yet my love! —
He's dead, or else is with this little might <sup>220</sup>

Crept from the bank for fear of that ill
sprite. —

Then, where art thou that struck'st my love?
Oh, stay!

Bring me thyself in change, and then I'll say
Thou hast some justice. I will make thee trim With flowers and garlands that were meant for him; <sup>225</sup>

I'll clip thee round with both mine arms, as fast
As I did mean he should have been embrac'd.
But thou art fled. — What hope is left for me?
I'll run to Daphnis in the hollow tree, Whom I did mean to mock; though hope be small <sup>230</sup>

To make him bold, rather than none at all,
I'll try him; his heart, and my behaviour too,
Perhaps may teach him what he ought to do.

Exit.

Re-enter Sullen Shepherd.

Sull. Shep. This was the place. 'Twas but my feeble sight,

Mixt with the horror of my deed, and night, <sup>235</sup>
That shapt these fears, and made me run away,
And lose my beauteous hardly-gotten prey. —
Speak, gentle shepherdess! I am alone,
And tender love for love. — But she is gone
From me, that, having struck her lover dead,
For silly fear left her alone and fled. <sup>241</sup>

And see, the wounded body is remov'd
By her of whom it was so well below'd.

Enter PERIGOT, and AMARILLIS in the shape of AMORET.

But all these fancies must be quite forgot.
I must lie close; here comes young Perigot, <sup>245</sup>
With subtle Amarillis in the shape
Of Amoret. Pray, love, he may not scape!

[Retires.]

Amar. Beloved Perigot, show me some place,
Where I may rest my limbs weak with the chase
Of thee, an hour before thou cam'st at least. <sup>250</sup>

Peri. Beshrew my tardy steps! Here shalt thou rest

Upon this holy bank: no deadly snake
Upon this turf herself in folds doth make;
Here is no poison for the toad to feed;
Here boldly spread thy hands; no venom'd weed <sup>255</sup>

Dares blister them; no slimy snail dare creep
Over thy face when thou art fast asleep;
Here never durst the babbling cuckoo spit;<sup>1</sup>
No slough of falling star did ever hit

<sup>1</sup> The popular explanation of the foam secreted by the cicada.

Upon this bank : let this thy cabin be ; 260
This other, set with violets, for me.

[They lie down.]

Amar. Thou dost not love me, Perigot.

Peri. Fair maid,

You only love to hear it often said ;

You do not doubt.

Amar. Believe me, but I do.

Peri. What, shall we now begin again to woo ? 265

'T is the best way to make your lover last,
To play with him when you have caught him fast.

Amar. By Pan I swear, beloved<sup>1</sup> Perigot,
And by yon moon, I think thou lov'st me not.

Peri. By Pan I swear, — and, if I falsely swear, 270

Let him not guard my flocks ; let foxes tear
My earliest lambs, and wolves, whilst I do sleep,

Fall on the rest ; a rot among my sheep, —
I love thee better than the careful ewe 274

The new-year'd<sup>2</sup> lamb that is of her own hue :
I dote upon thee more than that young lamb

Doth on the bag that feeds him from his dam !
Were there a sort<sup>3</sup> of wolves got in my fold,

And one ran after thee, both young and old
Should be devour'd, and it should be my strife
To save thee, whom I love above my life. 281

Amar. How should I trust thee, when I see these choose

Another bed, and dost my side refuse ?

Peri. 'T was only that the chaste thoughts might be shown

'Twixt thee and me, although we were alone.

Amar. Come, Perigot will show his power, that he 286

Can make his Amoret, though she weary be,
Rise nimbly from her couch, and come to his.
Here, take thy Amoret ; embrace and kiss.

[Lies down beside him.]

Peri. What means my love ?

Amar. To do as lovers should, 290

That are to be enjoy'd, not to be woo'd.
There's ne'er a shepherdess in all the plain

Can kiss thee with more art ; there's none can feign

More wanton tricks.

Peri. Forbear, dear soul, to try
Whether my heart be pure ; I'll rather die 295

Than nourish one thought to dishonour thee.

Amar. Still think 'st thou such a thing as chastity

Is amongst women ? Perigot, there's none
That with her love is in a wood alone,

And would come home a maid : be not abus'd
With thy fond first belief ; let time be us'd. 301

[PERIGOT rises.]

Why dost thou rise ?

Peri. My true heart thou hast slain !
Amar. Faith, Perigot, I'll pluck thee down
again.

Peri. Let go, thou serpent, that into my
breast

Hast with thy cunning div'd ! — Art not in jest ? 305

Amar. Sweet love, lie down.

Peri. Since this I live to see,
Some bitter north wind blast my flocks and
me !

Amar. You swore you lov'd, yet will not do my will.

Peri. Oh, be as thou wert once, I'll love thee
still !

Amar. I am as still I was, and all my kind ;
Though other shows we have, poor men to blind. 311

Peri. Then, here I end all love ; and, lest my vain

Belief should ever draw me in again,
Before thy face, that hast my youth misled,
I end my life ! my blood be on thy head ! 315

[Offers to kill himself with his spear.]

Amar. [rising.] Oh, hold thy hands, thy Amoret doth cry !

Peri. Thou counsel'st well ; first, Amoret shall die,

That is the cause of my eternal smart !
Amar. Oh, hold ! [Exit.]

Peri. This steel shall pierce thy lustful
heart !

[Exit,] running after her. The Sul- len Shepherd steps out and un- charms her.

Sull. Shep. Up and down, every where, 320

I strew the herbs, to purge the air ;
Let your odour drive hence

All mists that dazzle sense.
Herbs and springs, whose hidden might

Alters shapes, and mocks the sight, 325

Thus I charge ye to undo
All before I brought ye to !

Let her fly, let her scape ;
Give again her own shape ! [Retires.]

Re-enter AMARILLIS in her own shape, [and PERIGOT following with his spear.]

Amar. Forbear, thou gentle swain ! thou dost mistake ; 330

She whom thou follow'st fled into the brake,
And as I crost thy way, I met thy wrath ;

The only fear of which near slain me hath.
Peri. Pardon, fair shepherdess : my rage and
night

Were both upon me, and beguil'd my sight : 335

But far be it from me to spill the blood
Of harmless maids that wander in the wood !

Exit AMARILLIS.

Enter AMORET.

Amo. Many a weary step, in yonder path,
Poor hopeless Amoret twice trodden hath,

To seek her Perigot ; yet cannot hear 340

His voice. — My Perigot ! She loves thee dear
That calls.

Peri. See yonder where she is ! How fair
She shows ! and yet her breath infects the air.

Amo. My Perigot !
Peri. Here.

Amo. Happy !
Peri. Hapless ! first

It lights on thee : the next blow is the worst. 345
[Wounds her.]

<sup>3</sup> Band.

Amo. Stay, Perigot! My love, thou art unjust.
Peri. Death is the best reward that 's due to just.
Sull. Shep. Now shall their love be crost: for, being struck, I'll throw her in the fount, lest being took
 By some night-traveller, whose honest care 350
 May help to cure her. —

[Comes forward.]
 Shepherdess, prepare

Yourself to die!
Amo. No mercy I do crave;
 Thou canst not give a worse blow than I have.
 Tell him that gave me this, who lov'd him too,
 He struck my soul, and not my body through;
 Tell him, when I am dead, my soul shall be 355
 At peace, if he but think he injur'd me.

Sull. Shep. In this fount be thy grave. Thou wert not meant
 Sure for a woman, thou art so innocent. —

He flings her into the well.
 She cannot scape, for, underneath the ground, 360
 In a long hollow the clear spring is bound,
 Till on you side, where the morn's sun doth look,
 The struggling water breaks out in a brook.

Exit.
 The God of the River riseth with AMORET in his arms.

God of the R. What powerful charms my streams do bring Back again unto their spring, 365

 With such force that I their god,
 Three times striking with my rod,
 Could not keep them in their ranks?
 My fishes shoot into the banks;
 There 's not one that stays and feeds, 370
 All have hid them in the weeds.
 Here 's a mortal almost dead,
 Fall'n into my river-head,
 Hallowed so with many a spell,
 That till now none ever fell. 375
 'Tis a female young and clear,
 Cast in by some ravisher:
 See, upon her breast a wound,
 On which there is no plaster bound.

Yet, she 's warm, her pulses beat, 380
 'Tis a sign of life and heat. —
 If thou be'st a virgin pure,
 I can give a present cure:
 Take a drop into thy wound,
 From my watery locks, more round 385
 Than orient pearl, and far more pure
 Than unchaste flesh may endure. —
 See, she pants, and from her flesh
 The warm blood gusheth out afresh.

She is an unpolluted maid; 390
 I must have this bleeding stay'd.
 From my banks I pluck this flower
 With holy hand, whose virtuous power
 Is at once to heal and draw.
 The blood returns. I never saw 395
 A fairer mortal. Now doth break
 Her deadly slumber. — Virgin, speak.

Amo. Who hath restor'd my sense, given me new breath,
 And brought me back out of the arms of death?

God of the R. I have heal'd thy wounds.
Amo. Aye, me! 400
God of the R. Fear not him that succour'd thee.

I am this fountain's god: below,
 My waters to a river grow,
 And 'twixt two banks with osiers set,
 That only prosper in the wet, 405
 Through the meadows do they glide,
 Wheeling still on every side,
 Sometimes winding round about,
 To find the evenest channel out.

And if thou wilt go with me, 410
 Leaving mortal company,
 In the cool streams shalt thou lie,
 Free from harm as well as I:
 I will give thee for thy food

No fish that useth in the mud; 415
 But trout and pike, that love to swim
 Where the gravel from the brim
 Through the pure streams may be seen;

Orient pearl fit for a queen,
 Will I give, thy love to win, 420
 And a shell to keep them in;
 Not a fish in all my brook
 That shall disobey thy look,
 But, when thou wilt, come sliding by,

And from thy white hand take a fly: 425
 And, to make thee understand
 How I can my waves command,
 They shall bubble, whilst I sing,
 Sweeter than the silver string. [Sings.]

THE SONG

Do not fear to put thy feet 430
 Naked in the river sweet;
 Think not leech, or newt, or toad,
 Will bite thy foot when thou hast trod;
 Nor let the water rising high,
 As thou wad'st in, make thee cry 435
 And sob; but ever live with me,
 And not a wave shall trouble thee.

Amo. Immortal power, that rul'st this holy flood,

I know myself unworthy to be woo'd
 By thee, a god; for ere this, but for thee, 440
 I should have shown my weak mortality:
 Besides, by holy oath betwixt us twain,
 I am betroth'd unto a shepherd-swain,
 Whose comely face, I know, the gods above 445
 May make me leave to see, but not to love.

God of the R. May he prove to thee as true!
 Fairest virgin, now adieu:
 I must make my waters fly,
 Lest they leave their channels dry,
 And beasts that come unto the spring 450
 Miss their morning's watering;
 Which I would not; for of late
 All the neighbour-people sate
 On my banks, and from the fold
 Two white lambs of three weeks old 455
 Offered to my deity;

For which this year they shall be free

From raging floods, that, as they pass,
Leave their gravel in the grass;
Nor shall their meads be overflown 460
When their grass is newly mown.

Amo. For thy kindness to me shown,
Never from thy banks be blown
Any tree, with windy force,
Cross thy streams, to stop my course; 465
May no beast that comes to drink,
With his horns cast down thy brink;
May none that for thy fish do look,
Cut thy banks to dam thy brook;
Barefoot may no neighbour wade 470
In thy cool streams, wife nor maid,
When the spawns on stones do lie,
To wash their hemp, and spoil the fry!

God of the R. Thanks, virgin. I must down
again.

Thy wound will put thee to no pain. 475
Wonder not so soon 't is gone;
A holy hand was laid upon. [Descends.]

Amo. And I, unhappy born to be,
Must follow him that flies from me. Exit.

ACT IV

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>Enter PERIGOT.

Peri. She is untrue, unconstant, and unkind;
She's gone, she's gone! Blow high, thou northwest wind,

And raise the sea to mountains; let the trees
That dare oppose thy raging fury leese<sup>2</sup>
Their firm foundation; creep into the earth, 5
And shake the world, as at the monstrous birth
Of some new prodigy; whilst I constant stand,
Holding this trusty boar-spear in my hand,
And falling thus upon it.

[Offers to fall on his spear.]Enter AMARILLIS running.

Amar. Stay thy dead-doing hand! Thou art too hot 10

Against thyself. Believe me, comely swain,
If that thou diest, not all the showers of rain
The heavy clouds send down can wash away
That foul unmanly guilt the world will lay
Upon thee. Yet thy love untainted stands: 15
Believe me, she is constant; not the sands
Can be so hardly numb'ed as she won.
I do not trifle, shepherd; by the moon,
And all those lesser lights our eyes do view,
All that I told thee, Perigot, is true. 20
Then, be a free man; put away despair
And will to die; smooth gently up that fair
Dejected forehead; be as when those eyes
Took the first heat.

Peri. Alas, he double dies
That would believe, but cannot! 'T is not well
You keep me thus from dying, here to dwell 25
With many worse companions. But, oh, death!
I am not yet enamour'd of this breath
So much but I dare leave it; 't is not pain

<sup>1</sup> Part of the wood.<sup>2</sup> Lose.

In forcing of a wound, nor after-gain 30
Of many days, can hold me from my will.
'T is not myself, but Amoret, bids kill.

Amar. Stay but a little, little; but one hour;
And if I do not show thee, through the power
Of herbs and words I have, as dark as night, 35
Myself turn'd to thy Amoret, in sight,
Her very figure, and the robe she wears,
With tawny buskins, and the hook she bears
Of thine own carving, where your names are set,
Wrought underneath with many a curious fret,
The primrose-chaplet, tawdry-lace,<sup>3</sup> and ring, 41
Thou gav'st her for her singing, with each
thing

Else that she wears about her, let me feel
The first fell stroke of that revenging steel!

Peri. I am contented, if there be a hope, 45
To give it entertainment for the scope
Of one poor hour. Go; you shall find me next
Under your shady beech, even thus perplexed,
And thus believing.

Amar. Bind, before I go,
Thy soul by Pan unto me, not to do 50
Harm or outrageous wrong upon thy life,
Till my return.

Peri. By Pan, and by the strife
He had with Phoebus for the mastery,
When golden Midas judg'd their minstrelsy,
I will not! Exeunt [severally]. 55

[SCENE II.]<sup>4</sup>Enter SATYR with ALEXIS.

Sat. Softly gliding as I go,
With this burthen full of woe,
Through still silence of the night
Guided by the glow-worm's light,
Hither am I come at last. 5
Many a thicket have I past;
Not a twig that durst deny me,
Not a bush that durst desery me
To the little bird that sleeps
On the slender spray; nor creeps 10
That hardy worm with pointed tail,
But if I be under sail,
Flying faster than the wind,
Leaving all the clouds behind,
But doth hide her tender head 15
In some hollow tree, or bed
Of seeded nettles; not a hare
Can be started from his fare
By my footing; nor a wish
Is more sudden, nor a fish 20
Can be found with greater ease
Cut the vast unbounded seas,
Leaving neither print nor sound,
Than I, when nimbly on the ground
I measure many a league an hour. 25
But, behold, the happy power<sup>5</sup>
That must ease me of my charge,
And by holy hand enlarge
The soul of this sad man, that yet
Lies fast bound in deadly fit: 30
Heaven and great Pan succour it!—

<sup>3</sup> Lace bought at St. Audrey's-Fair at Ely.<sup>4</sup> The wood before Clorin's bower.<sup>5</sup> Q<sub>1</sub>-Q<sub>4</sub> lower.

Hail, thou beauty of the bower,
 Whiter than the paramour
 Of my master ! Let me crave
 Thy virtuous help, to keep from grave 35
 This poor mortal, that here lies,
 Waiting when the Destinies
 Will undo<sup>1</sup> his thread of life :
 View the wound, by cruel knife
 Trencht into him. 40

Clo. [coming from the bower.] What art thou call'st me from my holy rites,
 And with the feared name of death affrights
 My tender ears ? Speak me thy name and will.

Sat. I am the Satyr that did fill
 Your lap with early fruit ; and will, 45
 When I hap to gather more,
 Bring you better and more store.<sup>2</sup>
 Yet I come not empty now :
 See, a blossom from the bough ;
 But beshrew his heart that purg'd it,
 And his perfect sight that cull'd it 50
 From the other springing blooms !
 For a sweeter youth the grooms
 Cannot show me, nor the downs,
 Nor the many neighbouring towns. 55
 Low in yonder glade I found him ;
 Softly in mine arms I bound him ;
 Hither have I brought him sleeping
 In a trance, his wounds fresh weeping,
 In remembrance such youth may 60
 Spring and perish in a day.

Clo. Satyr, they wrong thee that do term thee
 rude ;
 Though thou be'st outward-rough and tawpy-
 hu'd,

Thy manners are as gentle and as fair
 As his who brags himself born only heir 65
 To all humanity. — Let me see thy wound :
 This herb will stay the current, being bound
 Fast to the orifice, and this restrain
 Ulcers and swellings, and such inward pain
 As the cold air hath forc'd into the sore ; 70
 This to draw out such putrefying gore
 As inward falls.

Sat. Heaven grant it may do good !

Clo. Fairly wipe away the blood.
 Hold him gently, till I fling 75
 Water of a virtuous<sup>3</sup> spring
 On his temples ; turn him twice
 To the moonbeams ; pinch him thrice ;
 That the labouring soul may draw
 From his great eclipse.

Sat. I saw 80
 His eyelids moving.

Clo. Give him breath ;
 All the danger of cold death
 Now is vanisht ! With this plaster
 And this unction do I master
 All the fest' red ill that may 85
 Give him grief another day.

Sat. See, he gathers up his sprite,
 And begins to hunt for light ;
 Now 'a gaps and breathes again :
 How the blood runs to the vein 90
 That erst was empty !

Alexis. O my heart !
 My dearest, dearest Cloe ! Oh, the smart Runs through my side ! I feel some pointed
 thing 95

Pass through my bowels, sharper than the sting
 Of scorpion. —

Pan, preserve me ! — What are you ?
 Do not hurt me : I am true
 To my Cloe, though she fly,
 And leave me to this destiny.

There she stands, and will not lend 100
 Her smooth white hand to help her friend.

But I am much mistaken, for that face
 Bears more austerity and modest grace,
 More reproving and more awe, 105
 Than these eyes yet ever saw

In my Cloe. Oh, my pain
 Eagerly renews again !

Give me your help for his sake you love best.

Clo. Shepherd, thou canst not possibly take
 rest,

Till thou hast laid aside all heats, desires, 110
 Provoking thoughts that stir up lusty fires, Commerce with wanton eyes, strong blood, and will

To execute ; these must be purg'd until
 The vein grow whiter ; then repent, and pray

Great Pan to keep you from the like decay, 115
 And I shall undertake your cure with ease ;

Till when, this virtuous plaster will displease<sup>4</sup> Your tender sides. Give me your hand, and rise !

Help him a little, Satyr ; for his thighs
 Yet are feeble.

Alexis. [rising.] Sure, I have lost much blood.

Sat. 'Tis no matter ; 't was not good. 120
 Mortal, you must leave your wooing :

Though there be a joy in doing,
 Yet it brings much grief behind it ;
 They best feel it, that do find it. 125

Clo. Come, bring him in ; I will attend his sore. —

When you are well, take heed you lust no more.
 [ALEXIS is led into the bower.]

Sat. Shepherd, see, what comes of kissing ;
 By my head, 't were better missing.

Brightest, if there be remaining 130
 Any service, without feigning

I will do it ; were I set
 To catch the nimble wind, or get
 Shadows gliding on the green,

Or to steal from the great queen 135
 Of fairies all her beauty ;

I would do it, so much duty
 Do I owe those precious eyes.

Clo. I thank thee, honest Satyr. If the cries
 Of any other, that be hurt or ill 140
 Draw thee unto them, prithee, do thy will

To bring them hither.

Sat. I will ; and when the weather
 Serves to angle in the brook,
 I will bring a silver hook, 145
 With a line of finest silk,

And a rod as white as milk,
 To deceive the little fish.

<sup>1</sup> F<sub>2</sub> cut off.

<sup>4</sup> Discomfort.

So I take my leave, and wish
On this bower may ever dwell 160
Spring and summer!
Clo. Friend, farewell. Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter AMORET.

Amo. This place is ominous; for here I lost
My love and almost life, and since have crost
All these woods over; ne'er a nook or dell,
Where any little bird or beast doth dwell,
But I have sought it; ne'er a bending brow 5
Of any hill, or glade the wind sings through,
Nor a green bank nor shade where shepherds
use

To sit and riddle, sweetly pipe, or choose
Their valentines, that I have mist, to find
My love in. Perigot! Oh, too unkind, 10
Why hast thou fled me? Whither art thou
gone?

How have I wrong'd thee. Was my love alone
To thee worthy this scorn'd recompense? 'T is
well;

I am content to feel it. But I tell Thee, shepherd, and these lusty woods shall 15
hear,

Forsaken Amoret is yet as clear
Of any stranger fire, as heaven is
From foul corruption, or the deep abyss
From light and happiness; and thou mayst
know

All this for truth, and how that fatal blow 20
Thou gav'st me, never from desert of mine
Fell on my life, but from suspect of thine,
Or fury more than madness. Therefore here,
Since I have lost my life, my love, my dear,
Upon this cursed place, and on this green 25
That first divorce'd us, shortly shall be seen
A sight of so great pity, that each eye
Shall daily spend his spring in memory
Of my untimely fall.

Enter AMARILLIS.

Amar. [Aside.] I am not blind,
Nor is it through the working of my mind 30
That this shows Amoret. Forsake me, all
That dwell upon the soul, but what men call
Wonder, or, more than wonder, miracle!
For, sure, so strange as this, the oracle
Never gave answer of; it passeth dreams, 35
Or madmen's fancy, when the many streams
Of new imaginations rise and fall.
'T is but an hour since these ears heard her call
For pity to young Perigot; whilst he Directed by his fury, bloodily 40
Lanc'd up her breast, which bloodless fell and cold;

And, if belief may credit what was told,
After all this, the Melancholy Swain
Took her into his arms, being almost slain,
And to the bottom of the holy well 46
Flung her, for ever with the waves to dwell.
'T is she, the very same; 't is Amoret,
And living yet; the great powers will not let <sup>1</sup> Part of the wood with the holy well.

Their virtuous love be crost. — Maid, wipe
away

Those heavy drops of sorrow, and allay 60
The storm that yet goes high, which, not de-prest,

Breaks heart and life and all before it rest.

Thy Perigot —
Amo. Where, which is Perigot?
Amar. Sits there below, lamenting much,
God wot,

Thee and thy fortune. Go, and comfort him; 65
And thou shalt find him underneath a brim
Of sailing pines, that edge yon mountain in.

Amo. I go, I run. Heaven grant me I may win
His soul again! Exit.

Enter Sullen Shepherd.

Sull. Shep. Stay, Amarillis, stay!
You are too fleet; 't is two hours yet to day. 60
I have perform'd my promise; let us sit
And warm our bloods together, till the fit
Come lively on us.

Amar. Friend, you are too keen;
The morning riseth, and we shall be seen;
Forbear a little.

Sull. Shep. I can stay no longer. 65
Amar. Hold, shepherd, hold! Learn not to be a wronger

Of your word. Was not your promise laid,
To break their loves first?

Sull. Shep. I have done it, maid.
Amar. No; they are yet unbroken, met
again,

And are as hard to part yet as the stain 70
Is from the finest lawn.

Sull. Shep. I say they are Now at this present parted, and so far
That they shall never meet

Amar. Swain, 't is not so;
For do but to yon hanging mountain go,
And there believe your eyes.

Sull. Shep. You do but hold 75
Off with delays and trifles. — Farewell, cold
And frozen bashfulness, unfit for men! —
Thus I salute thee, virgin!

[Attempts to seize her.]
Amar. And thus, then,
I bid you follow: catch me if you can! Exit.

Sull. Shep. And, if I stay behind, I am no man! Exit, running after her. 80

[SCENE IV.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter PERIGOT.

Peri. Night, do not steal away; I woo thee
yet

To hold a hard hand o'er the rusty bit
That guides thy lazy team. Go back again,
Boötes, thou that driv'st thy frozen wain
Round as a ring, and bring a second night, 5
To hide my sorrows from the coming light;
Let not the eyes of men stare on my face,
And read my falling; give me some black place,
Where never sunbeam shot his wholesome
light,

<sup>2</sup> A dale in the wood.

That I may sit and pour out my sad sprite 10
Like running water, never to be known
After the forced fall and sound is gone.

Enter AMORET, looking for PERIGOT.

Amo. This is the bottom. 1— Speak, if thou be here.

My Perigot! Thy Amoret, thy dear,
Calls on thy loved name.

Peri. What art thou dare 15
Tread these forbidden paths, where death and care

Dwell on the face of darkness?

Amo. 'Tis thy friend,
Thy Amoret, come hither, to give end
To these consumings. Look up, gentle boy:
I have forgot those pains and dear annoy 20
I suffer'd for thy sake, and am content
To be thy love again. Why hast thou rent
Those curled locks, where I have often hung Ribands and damask-roses, and have flung
Waters distill'd, to make thee fresh and gay, 25
Sweeter than nosegays on a bridal day?
Why dost thou cross thine arms, and hang thy
face

Down to thy bosom, letting fall apace
From those two little heavens, upon the ground, Showers of more price, more orient, and more
round, 30

Than those that hang upon the moon's pale brow?

Cease these complainings, shepherd: I am now
The same I ever was, as kind and free,
And can forgive before you ask of me;
Indeed, I can and will.

Peri. So spoke my fair! 35
Oh, you great working powers of earth and air,
Water and forming fire, why have you lent
Your hidden virtues of so ill intent?
Even such a face, so fair, so bright of hue,
Had Amoret; such words, so smooth and new,
Came flowing from her tongue; such was her
eye, 41

And such the pointed sparkle that did fly
Forth like a bleeding shaft; all is the same,
The robe and buskins, painted hook, and frame
Of all her body. Oh me, Amoret! 45

Amo. Shepherd, what means this riddle? Why hath set

So strong a difference 'twixt myself and me,
That I am grown another? Look, and see
The ring thou gav'st me, and about my wrist
That curious bracelet thou thyself dist twist 50
From those fair tresses. Know'st thou Amoret?
Hath not some newer love forc'd thee forget
Thy ancient faith?

Peri. Still nearer to my love!
These be the very words she oft did prove
Upon my temper; so she still would take . 55
Wonder into her face, and silent make Signs with her head and hand, as who would
say,

"Shepherd, remember this another day."

Amo. Am I not Amoret? Where was I lost?
Can there be heaven, and time, and men, and most 60

† Dell.

Of these unconstant? Faith, where art thou fled?

Are all the vows and protestations dead,
The hands held up, the wishes and the heart?
Is there not one remaining, not a part
Of all these to be found? Why, then, I see 65
Men never knew that virtue, constancy.

Peri. Men ever were most blessed, till cross
fate

Brought love and women forth, unfortunate
To all that ever tasted of their smiles;
Whose actions are all double, full of wiles; 70
Like to the subtle hare, that 'fore the hounds
Makes many turnings, leaps, and many rounds,
This way and that way, to deceive the scent
Of her pursuers.

Amo. 'Tis but to prevent
Their speedy coming on, that seek her fall; 75
The hands of cruel men, more bestial,
And of a nature more refusing good
Than beasts themselves, or fishes of the flood.

Peri. Thou art all these, and more than nature meant

When she created all; frowns, joys, content; 80
Extreme fire for an hour, and presently
Colder than sleepy poison, or the sea
Upon whose face sits a continual frost;
Your actions ever driven to the most,
Then down again as low, that none can find 85
The rise or falling of a woman's mind.

Amo. Can there be any age, or days, or time,
Or tongues of men, guilty so great a crime
As wronging simple maid? Oh, Perigot,
Thou that wast yesterday without a blot; 90
Thou that wast every good and every thing
That men call blessed; thou that wast the spring

From whence our looser grooms drew all their
best;

Thou that wast always just and always blest
In faith and promise; thou that hadst the name 95
Of virtuous given thee, and made good the same

Ev'n from thy cradle; thou that wast that all
That men delighted in! Oh, what a fall
Is this, to have been so, and now to be
The only best in wrong and infamy! 100

And I to live to know this! and by me,
That lov'd thee dearer than mine eyes, or that
Which we esteem'd our honour, virgin state!
Dearer than swallows love the early morn,
Or dogs of chase the sound of merry horn; 105
Dearer than thou canst love thy new love, if
thou hast

Another, and far dearer than the last;
Dearer than thou canst love thyself, though all
The self-love were within thee that did fall 109
With that coy swain that now is made a flower,
For whose dear sake Echo weeps many a shower!

And am I thus rewarded for my flame?
Lov'd worthily to get a wanton's name?
Come, thou forsaken willow, wind my head,
And noise it to the world, my love is dead! 115
I am forsaken, I am cast away,
And left for every lazy groom to say
I was unconstant, light, and sooner lost

Than the quick clouds we see, or the chill frost
When the hot sun beats on it! Tell me yet, 120
Canst thou not love again thy Amoret?

Peri. Thou art not worthy of that blessed
name;

I must not know thee. Fling thy wanton flame
Upon some lighter blood that may be hot
With words and feigned passions; Perigot 125
Was ever yet unstain'd, and shall not now
Stoop to the meltings of a borrowed brow.

Amo. Then hear me, Heaven, to whom I call for right,
And you, fair twinkling stars, that crown the
night; 120

And hear me, woods, and silence of this place,
And ye, sad hours, that move a sullen pace;
Hear me, ye shadows, that delight to dwell
In horrid darkness, and ye powers of hell,
Whilst I breathe out my last! I am that maid,
That yet-untainted Amoret, that play'd 135

The careless prodigal, and gave away
My soul to this young man that now dares say
I am a stranger, not the same, more wild;<sup>1</sup>
And thus with much belief I was beguil'd.

I am that maid, that have delay'd, deni'd, 140
And almost scorn'd the loves of all that tri'd
To win me, but this swain; and yet confess
I have been woo'd by many with no less Soul of affection; and have often had Rings, belts, and cracknels,<sup>2</sup> sent me from the lad 145

That feeds his flocks down westward; lambs and doves

By young Alexis; Daphnis sent me gloves;
All which I gave to thee: nor these nor they
That sent them did I smile on, or e'er lay
Up to my after-memory. But why 150
Do I resolve to grieve, and not to die?

Happy had been the stroke thou gav'st, if home;
By this time had I found a quiet room,
Where every slave is free, and every breast,
That living bred new care, now lies at rest; 155
And thither will poor Amoret.

Peri. Thou must.
Was ever any man so loth to trust
His eyes as I? or was there ever yet
Any so like as this to Amoret?
For whose dear sake I promise, if there be 160
A living soul within thee, thus to free
Thy body from it? He hurts her again.

Amo. [falling.] So, this work hath end.
Farewell, and live; be constant to thy friend
That loves thee next.

Enter SATYR; PERIGOT runs off.

Sat. See, the day begins to break, 165
And the light shoots like a streak
Of subtle fire; the wind blows cold,
Whilst the morning doth unfold;
Now the birds begin to rouse,
And the squirrel from the boughs 170
Leaps, to get him nuts and fruit.
The early lark, that erst was mute,
Carols to the rising day
Many a note and many a lay:

<sup>1</sup> Vile. F<sub>2</sub> wild.

<sup>2</sup> Biscuits.

Therefore here I end my watch, 175
Lest the wand'ring swain should catch
Harm, or lose himself.

Amo. Ah me!

Sat. Speak again, whate'er thou be;
I am ready; speak, I say;
By the dawning of the day, 180
By the power of night and Pan,
I enforce thee speak again!

Amo. Oh, I am most unhappy.

Sat. Yet more blood!
Sure, these wanton swains are wood.<sup>3</sup> 185

Can there be a hand or heart
Dare commit so wild a part
As this murder? By the moon,
That hid herself when this was done,
Never was a sweeter face: 190
I will bear her to the place
Where my goddess keeps, and crave
Her to give her life or grave.

Exit [carrying AMORET].

[SCENE V.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter CLORIN.

Clo. Here whilst one patient takes his rest secure,

I steal abroad to do another cure. —
Pardon, thou buried body of my love,
That from thy side I dare so soon remove;
I will not prove unconstant, nor will leave 5
Thee for an hour alone. When I deceive
My first-made vow, the wildest of the wood
Tear me, and o'er thy grave let out my blood!
I go by wit to cure a lover's pain,
Which no herb can; being done, I'll come again. Exit. 10

Enter THENOT.

The. Poor shepherd, in this shade for ever lie,
And seeing thy fair Clorin's cabin, die!

[Lying down.]

Oh, hapless love, which being answer'd, ends!
And, as a little infant cries and bends
His tender brows, when, rolling of his eye, 15
He hath esp'd something that glisters nigh,
Which he would have; yet, give it him, away
He throws it straight, and cries afresh to play
With something else, such my affection, set
On that which I should loathe, if I could get. 20

Re-enter CLORIN.

Clo. [Aside.] See, where he lies! Did ever man but he

Love any woman for her constancy
To her dead lover, which she needs must end
Before she can allow him for her friend,
And he himself must needs the cause destroy 25
For which he loves, before he can enjoy?
Poor shepherd, Heaven grant I at once may
free

Thee from thy pain, and keep my loyalty! —
Shepherd, look up.

The. Thy brightness doth amaze;
So Phoebus may at noon bid mortals gaze; 30

<sup>4</sup> The wood before Clorin's bower.

Thy glorious constancy appears so bright,
I dare not meet the beams with my weak sight.

Clo. Why dost thou pine away thyself for me?

The. Why dost thou keep such spotless constancy?

Clo. Thou holy shepherd, see what for thy sake

Clorin, thy Clorin, now dare undertake.

He starts up.

The. Stay there, thou constant Clorin! If there be

Yet any part of woman left in thee,
To make thee light, think yet before thou speak.

Clo. See, what a holy vow for thee I break;
I, that already have my fame far spread
For being constant to my lover dead.

The. Think yet, dear Clorin, of your love;
how true,
If you had died, he would have been to you.

Clo. Yet, all I'll lose for thee —

The. Think but how blest

A constant woman is above the rest!

Clo. And offer up myself, here on this ground,
To be dispos'd by thee.

The. Why dost thou wound.

His heart with malice against women more,
That hated all the sex but thee before?

How much more pleasant had it been to me

To die than to behold this change in thee!

Yet, yet return; let not the woman sway!

Clo. Insult not on her now, nor use delay,
Who for thy sake hath ventur'd all her fame.

The. Thou hast not ventur'd, but bought certain shame;

Your sex's curse, foul falsehood, must and shall,
I see, once in your lives, light on you all.

I hate thee now. Yet turn!

Clo. Be just to me:

Shall I at once lose both my fame and thee?

The. Thou hadst no fame; that which thou didst like good

Was but thy appetite that sway'd thy blood

For that time to the best: for as a blast

That through a house comes, usually doth cast

Things out of order, yet by chance may come,

And blow some one thing to his proper room,

So did thy appetite, and not thy zeal,

Sway thee by chance to do some one thing well.

Yet turn!

Clo. Thou dost but try me, if I would

Forsake thy dear embraces for my old

Love's, though he were alive: but do not fear.

The. I do contemn thee now, and dare come near,

And gaze upon thee; for methinks that grace,

Austerity, which sate upon that face,

Is gone, and thou like others. False maid, see,

This is the gain of foul inconstancy! Exit.

Clo. 'Tis done: great Pan, I give thee thanks

for it! —

What art could not have heal'd is cur'd by wit.

Re-enter THEBOT.

The. Will ye be constant yet? Will ye remove

Into the cabin to your buried love?

Clo. No, let me die, but by thy side remain.

The. There's none shall know that thou didst ever stain

Thy worthy strictness, but shall honour'd be,

And I will lie again under this tree,

And pine and die for thee with more delight

Than I have sorrow now to know thee light.

Clo. Let me have thee, and I'll be where thou wilt.

The. Thou art of women's race, and full of guilt.

Farewell all hope of that sex! Whilst I thought

There was one good, I fear'd to find one naught:

But since their minds I all alike espy,

Henceforth I'll choose, as others, by mine eye.

Exit.

Clo. Blest be ye powers that gave such quick redress,

And for my labours sent so good success!

I rather choose, though I a woman be,

He should speak ill of all than die for me.

[Exit into the bower.]

ACT V

SCENE I.

Enter Priest [of Pan] and Old Shepherd.

Priest. Shepherds, rise, and shake off sleep!

See, the blushing morn doth peep

Through the windows, whilst the sun

To the mountain-tops is run,

Gilding all the vales below

With his rising flames, which grow

Greater by his climbing still.

Up, ye lazy grooms, and fill

Bag and bottle for the field!

Clasp your cloaks fast, lest they yield

To the bitter north-east wind.

Call the maidens up, and find

Who lay longest, that she may

Go without a friend all day;

Then reward your dogs, and pray

Pan to keep you from decay:

So unfold, and then away!

What, not a shepherd stirring? Sure, the

grooms

Have found their beds too easy, or the rooms

Fill'd with such new delight and heat, that they

Have both forgot their hungry sheep and day.

Knock, that they may remember what a shame

Sloth and neglect lays on a shepherd's name.

Old Shep. [after knocking at several doors.]

It is to little purpose; not a swain

This night hath known his lodging here, or lain

Within these cotes; the woods, or some near

town

That is a neighbour to the bordering down,

Hath drawn them thither 'bout some lusty

sport,

Or spiced wassail bowl, to which resort

All the young men and maids of many a cote,

Whilst the trim minstrel strikes his merry note.

<sup>1</sup> A village.

Priest. God pardon sin! — Show me the way that leads
To any of their haunts.
Old Shep. This to the meads,
And that down to the woods.
Priest. Then, this for me.
Come, shepherd, let me crave your company. <sup>35</sup>
Exeunt.

[SCENE II] <sup>1</sup>

Enter CLORIN in her cabin, ALEXIS with her.

Clo. Now your thoughts are almost pure,
And your wound begins to cure;
Strive to banish all that's vain,
Lest it should break out again.
Alexis. Eternal thanks to thee, thou holy
maid!
I find my former wand'ring thoughts well staid
Through thy wise precepts: and my outward pain
By thy choice herbs is almost gone again.
Thy sex's vice and virtue are reveal'd
At once; for what one hurt another heal'd. <sup>10</sup>
Clo. May thy grief more appease!
Relapses are the worst disease.
Take heed how you in thought offend;
So mind and body both will mend.

Enter SATYR, carrying AMORET.

Amo. Be'st thou the wildest creature of the wood, <sup>15</sup>
That bear'st me thus away, drown'd in my
blood,
And dying, know I cannot injur'd be;
I am a maid; let that name fight for me.
Sat. Fairest virgin, do not fear
Me, that doth thy body bear,
Not to hurt, but heal'd to be; <sup>20</sup>
Men are ruder far than we. —
See, fair goddess, in the wood
They have let out yet more blood.
Some savage man hath struck her breast, <sup>25</sup>
So soft and white, that no wild beast
Durst ha' toucht, asleep or 'wake;
So sweet, that adder, newt, or snake,
Would have lain, from arm to arm,
On her bosom to be warm <sup>30</sup>
All a night, and, being hot,
Gone away, and stung her not.
Quickly clap herbs to her breast.
A man, sure, is a kind of beast.
Clo. With spotted hand on spotless breast <sup>35</sup>
I put these herbs, to give thee rest;
Which till I heal thee, will abide,
If both be pure; if not, off slide. —
See, it falls off from the wound!
Shepherdess, thou art not sound, <sup>40</sup>
Full of lust.

Sat. Who would have thought it?
So fair a face!
Clo. Why, that hath brought it.
Amo. For aught I know or think, these words
my last,
Yet, Pan so help me as my thoughts are chaste!
Clo. And so may Pan bless this my cure, <sup>45</sup>

As all my thoughts are just and pure!
Some uncleanness nigh doth lurk,
That will not let my medicines work. —
Satyr, search if thou canst find it.
Sat. Here away methinks I wind <sup>2</sup> it: <sup>50</sup> Stronger yet. — Oh, here they be;
Here, here, in a hollow tree,
Two fond mortals have I found.
Clo. Bring them out; they are unsound.

Enter CLOE and DAPHNIS.

Sat. By the fingers thus I wring ye, <sup>55</sup>
To my goddess thus I bring ye;
Strife is vain, come gently in. —
I scented them; they're full of sin.
Clo. Hold, Satyr; take this glass,
Sprinkle over all the place, <sup>60</sup>
Purge the air from lustful breath,
To save this shepherdess from death:
And stand you still whilst I do dress
Her wound, for fear the pain increase.
Sat. From this glass I throw a drop <sup>65</sup>
Of crystal water on the top
Of every grass, on flowers a pair:
Send a fume, and keep the air
Pure and wholesome, sweet and blest,
Till this virgin's wound be drest. — <sup>70</sup>
Clo. Satyr, help to bring her in.
Sat. By Pan, I think she hath no sin,
[Carrying AMORET into the bower.]
She is so light. — Lie on these leaves.
Sleep, that mortal sense deceives,
Crown thine eyes and ease thy pain; <sup>75</sup>
May'st thou soon be well again!
Clo. Satyr, bring the shepherd near;
Try him, if his mind be clear.
Sat. Shepherd, come.
Daph. My thoughts are pure.
Sat. The better trial to endure. <sup>80</sup>
Clo. In this flame his finger thrust,
Which will burn him if he lust;
But if not, away will turn,
As loth unspotted flesh to burn. — [Satyr applies DAPHNIS's finger to the taper.]

See, it gives back; <sup>3</sup> let him go, <sup>85</sup>
Farewell, mortal: keep thee so.
[Exit DAPHNIS.]
Stay, fair nymph; fly not so fast;
We must try if you be chaste. —
Here's a hand that quakes for fear;
Sure, she will not prove so clear. <sup>90</sup>
Clo. Hold her finger to the flame;
That will yield her praise or shame.
Sat. To her doom she dares not stand,
[Applies CLOE's finger to the taper.]
But plucks away her tender hand;
And the taper darting sends <sup>95</sup>
His hot beams at her fingers' ends. —
Oh, thou art foul within, and hast
A mind, if nothing else, unchaste!
Alex. Is not that Cloe? 'Tis my love, 'tis
she!
Clo. fair Cloe!
Clo. My Alexis!

<sup>3</sup> Withdraws.

Alex. He. 100
Cloe. Let me embrace thee.
Clo. Take her hence,
 Lest her sight disturb his sense.
Alex. Take not her; take my life first!
Clo. See his wound again is burst!
 Keep her near, here in the wood, 105
 Till I ha' stopt these streams of blood.
 [Satyr leads off CLOE.]
 Soon again he ease shall find,
 If I can but still his mind.
 This curtain thus I do display,
 To keep the piercing air away. 110
 [Draws a curtain before the bower.]

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter Old Shepherd and Priest of Pan.

Priest. Sure, they are lost for ever; 'tis in vain
 To find them out with trouble and much pain
 That have a ripe desire and forward will
 To fly the company of all but ill.
 What shall he counsell'd now? Shall we retire,
 Or constant follow still that first desire 5
 We had to find them?
Old Shep. Stay a little while;
 For, if the morning's mist do not beguile
 My sight with shadows, sure I see a swain:
 One of this jolly troop's come back again. 10

Enter THENOT.

Priest. Dost thou not blush, young shepherd, to be known
 Thus without care leaving thy flocks alone,
 And following what desire and present blood
 Shapes out before thy burning sense for good;
 Having forgot what tongue hereafter may 15
 Tell to the world thy falling off, and say
 Thou art regardless both of good and shame,
 Spurning at virtue and a virtuous name?
 And like a glorious desperate man, that buys
 A poison of much price, by which he dies, 20
 Dost there lay out for lust, whose only gain
 Is foul disease, with present age and pain,
 And then a grave? These be the fruits that grow
 In such hot veins, that only beat to know Where they may take most ease, and grow ambitious 25
 Through their own wanton fire and pride delicious.
The. Right holy sir, I have not known this
 night
 What the smooth face of mirth was, or the
 sight
 Of any looseness; music, joy, and ease,
 Have been to me as bitter drugs to please 30
 A stomach lost with weakness, not a game
 That I am skill'd at thoroughly: nor a dame,
 Went her tongue smoother than the feet of time,
 Her beauty ever-living like the rhyme
 Our blessed Tityrus<sup>2</sup> did sing of yore; 35
 No, were she more enticing than the store
 Of fruitful summer, when the loaden tree

<sup>1</sup> A pasture.<sup>2</sup> Chaucer.

Bids the faint traveller be bold and free;
 'T were but to me like thunder 'gainst the bay,
 Whose lightning may enclose, but never stay 40
 Upon his charmed branches; such am I
 Against the catching flames of woman's eye.
Priest. Then, wherefore hast thou wand' red?
The. 'T was a vow
 That drew me out last night, which I have now
 Strictly perform'd, and homewards go to give 45
 Fresh pasture to my sheep, that they may live.
Priest. 'T is good to hear you, shepherd, if the heart
 In this well-sounding music bear his part.
 Where have you left the rest?

The. I have not seen,
 Since yesternight we met upon this green 50
 To fold our flocks up, any of that train;
 Yet have I walkt those woods round, and have lain
 All this long night under an aged tree;
 Yet neither wand'ring shepherd did I see, 55
 Or shepherdess; or drew into mine ear
 The sound of living thing, unless it were
 The nightingale, among the thick-leav'd spring
 That sits alone in sorrow, and doth sing
 Whole nights away in mourning; or the owl,
 Or our great enemy,<sup>3</sup> that still doth howl 60
 Against the moon's cold beams.
Priest. Go, and beware
 Of after-falling.

The. Father, 'tis my care. Exit.

Enter DAPHNIS.

Old Shep. Here comes another straggler;
 sure I see
 A shame in this young shepherd. — Daphnis?
Daph. He.
Priest. Where hast thou left the rest, that should have been 65
 Long before this grazing upon the green
 Their yet-imprison'd flocks?
Daph. Thou holy man,
 Give me a little breathing, till I can
 Be able to unfold what I have seen;
 Such horror, that the like hath never been 70
 Known to the ear of shepherd. Oh, my heart
 Labours a double motion to impart
 So heavy tidings! You all know the bower
 Where the chaste Clorin lives, by whose great
 power
 Sick men and cattle have been cur'd; 75
 There lovely Amoret, that was assur'd<sup>4</sup>
 To lusty Perigot, bleeds out her life,
 Forc'd by some iron hand and fatal knife;
 And, by her, young Alexis.

Enter AMARILLIS, running from her Sullen Shepherd.

Amar. If there be
 Ever a neighbour-brook or hollow tree, 80
 Receive my body, close me up from lust
 That follows at my heels! Be ever just,
 Thou god of shepherds, Pan, for her dear sake
 That loves the rivers' brinks, and still doth shake

<sup>3</sup> The wolf.<sup>4</sup> Betrothed.

In cold remembrance of thy quick pursuit; 85
Let me be made a reed, and, ever mute,
Nod to the waters' fall, whilst every blast Sings through my slender leaves that I was chaste!

Priest. This is a night of wonder. — Amarill,
Be comforted: the holy gods are still 90
Revenge of these wrongs.

Amar. Thou blessed man,
Honour'd upon these plains, and lov'd of Pan,
Hear me, and save from endless infamy
My yet-unblasted flower, virginity!
By all the garlands that have crown'd that
head, 95

By thy chaste office, and the marriage-bed
That still is blessed by thee; by all the rites
Due to our god, and by those virgin-lights
That burn before his altar; let me not Fall from my former state, to gain the blot 100
That never shall be purg'd! I am not now
That wanton Amarillis: here I vow
To Heaven, and thee, grave father, if I may Scape this unhappy night, to know the day
A virgin, never after to endure 105
The tongues or company of men unpure!
I hear him come; save me!

Priest. Retire a while
Behind this bush, till we have known that vile Abuser of young maidens. [They retire.]

Enter Sullen [Shepherd].

Sull. Shep. Stay thy pace,
Most lov'd Amarillis; let the chase 110
Grow calm and milder: fly me not so fast:
I fear the pointed brambles have unlac'd
Thy golden buskins. Turn again, and see
Thy shepherd follow, that is strong and free,
Able to give thee all content and ease. 115

I am not bashful, virgin; I can please
At first encounter, hug thee in mine arm,
And give thee many kisses, soft and warm
As those the sun prints on the smiling cheek
Of plums or mellow peaches; I am sleek 120
And smooth as Neptune when stern Aeolus
Locks up his surly winds, and nimbly thus
Can show my active youth. Why dost thou fly?

Remember, Amarillis, it was I
That kill'd Alexis for thy sake, and set 125
An everlasting hate 'twixt Amoret
And her beloved Perigot; 't was I That drown'd her in the well, where she must lie

Till time shall leave to be. Then, turn again, 125
Turn with thy open arms, and clip<sup>1</sup> the swain
That hath perform'd all this; turn, turn, I say;
I must not be deluded.

Priest [coming forward.] Monster, stay!
Thou that art like a canker to the state
Thou liv'st and breath'st in, eating with debate
Through every honest bosom, forcing still 135
The veins of any that may serve thy will;
Thou that hast offer'd with a sinful hand
To seize upon this virgin, that doth stand
Yet trembling here!

Sull. Shep. Good holiness, declare

<sup>1</sup> Embrace.

What had the danger been, if being bare 140
I had embrac'd her; tell me, by your art,
What coming wonders would that sight impart.

Priest. Lust and a branded soul.

Sull. Shep. Yet, tell me more;
Hath not our mother Nature, for her store
And great encrease, said it is good and just, 145
And will'd that every living creature must Beget his like?

Priest. You're better read than I,
I must confess, in blood and lechery. —
Now to the bower, and bring this beast along,
Where he may suffer penance for his wrong. 150

Exeunt.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter PERIGOT, with his hand bloody.

Peri. Here will I wash it in the morning's dew,

Which she on every little grass doth strew
In silver drops against the sun's appear;<sup>3</sup>
'T is holy water, and will make me clear.
My hand will not be cleans'd. — My wronged
love, 155

If thy chaste spirit in the air yet move,
Look mildly down on him that yet doth stand
All full of guilt, thy blood upon his hand;
And though I struck thee undeservedly,
Let my revenge on her that injur'd thee 160
Make less a fault which I intended not,
And let these dew-drops wash away my spot! —
It will not cleanse. Oh, to what sacred flood
Shall I resort, to wash away this blood?

Amidst these trees the holy Clorin dwells, 165
In a low cabin of cut boughs, and heals
All wounds: to her I will myself address,
And my rash faults repentantly confess;
Perhaps she'll find a means, by art or prayer,
To make my hand, with chaste blood stained,
fair. 170

That done, not far hence, underneath some tree
I'll have a little cabin built, since she Whom I ador'd is dead; there will I give Myself to strictness, and, like Clorin, live.

Exit.

[SCENE V.]<sup>4</sup>

The curtain is drawn, CLORIN appears sitting in the cabin, AMORET sitting on the one side of her, ALEXIS and CLOE on the other; the Satyr standing by.

Clo. Shepherd, once more your blood is staid:
Take example by this maid,
Who is heal'd ere you be pure;
So hard it is lewd lust to cure.

Take heed, then, how you turn your eye 175
On this<sup>5</sup> other lustfully. —
And, shepherdess, take heed lest you
Move his willing eye thereto:
Let no wring, nor pinch, nor smile,
Of yours his weaker sense beguile. — 180
Is your love yet true and chaste,
And for ever so to last?

Alexis. I have forgot all vain desires,

<sup>5</sup> Q<sub>1</sub>-Q<sub>4</sub> these; F<sub>2</sub> each.

All looser thoughts, ill-temp' red fires :
 True love I find a pleasant fume, 15
 Whose moderate heat can ne'er consume.
Cloe. And I a new fire feel in me,
 Whose chaste flame is not quencht to be.
Clo. Join your hands with modest touch,
 And for ever keep you such. 20

Enter PERIGOT.

Peri. [Aside.] Yon is her cabin : thus far off
 I'll stand,
 And call her forth ; for my unhallowed hand
 I dare not bring so near yon sacred place. —
 Clorin, come forth, and do a timely grace
 To a poor swain.

Clo. What art thou that dost call ? 25
 Clorin is ready to do good to all :
 Come near.

Peri. I dare not.
Clo. Satyr, see
 Who it is that calls on me.

Sat. [coming from the bower.] There, at hand, some swain doth stand,
 Stretching out a bloody hand. 30

Peri. Come, Clorin, bring thy holy waters
 clear,
 To wash my hand.

Clo. [coming out.] What wonders have been
 here

To-night ! Stretch forth thy hand, young
 swain ;
 Wash and rub it, whilst I rain
 Holy water.

Peri. Still you pour, 35
 But my hand will never scour.

Clo. Satyr, bring him to the bower :
 We will try the sovereign power
 Of other waters.

Sat. Mortal, sure, 40
 'Tis the blood of maiden pure
 That stains thee so.

The Satyr leadeth him to the bower, where he spieth AMORET, and kneeling down, she knoweth him.

Peri. Whate'er thou be,
 Be'st thou her sprite, or some divinity,
 That in her shape thinks good to walk this grove,
 Pardon poor Perigot !

Amo. I am thy love,
 Thy Amoret, for evermore thy love : 45
 Strike once more on my naked breast, I'll prove

As constant still. Oh, couldst thou love me yet,
 How soon could I my former griefs forget !

Peri. So over-great with joy that you live,
 now

I am, that no desire of knowing how 50
 Doth seize me. Hast thou still power to forgive ?

Amo. Whilst thou hast power to love, or I to live :
 More welcome now than hadst thou never
 gone

Astray from me !
Peri. And when thou lov'st alone, 55

And not I [thee,] death, or some ling'ring pain
 That's worse, light on me !

Clo. Now your stain
 Perhaps will cleans'd be ;<sup>1</sup> once again.
 See, the blood that erst did stay,
 With the water drops away.
 All the powers again are pleas'd, 60
 And with this new knot are appeas'd.
 Join your hands, and rise together :
 Pan be blest that brought you hither !

Enter Priest of Pan and Old Shepherd.

Go back again, whate'er thou art ; unless Smooth maiden-thoughts possess thee, do not press 65
 This hallowed ground. — Go, Satyr, take his
 hand,

And give him present trial.
Sat. Mortal, stand,

Till by fire I have made known
 Whether thou be such a one
 That mayst freely tread this place. 70
 Hold thy hand up. — Never was [Applying the Priest's hand to the taper.]

More untainted flesh than this.
 Fairest, he is full of bliss.

Clo. Then boldly speak, why dost thou seek
 this place ?

Priest. First, honour'd virgin, to behold thy
 face, 75

Where all good dwells that is ; next, for to try
 The truth of late report was given to me, —
 Those shepherds that have met with foul mis-
 chance

Through much neglect and more ill governance,

Whether the wounds they have may yet endure 80

The open air, or stay a longer cure ;
 And lastly, what the doom may be shall light Upon those guilty wretches, through whose spite

All this confusion fell ; for to this place,
 Thou holy maiden, have I brought the race 85
 Of these offenders, who have freely told Both why and by what means they gave this bold

Attempt upon their lives.

Clo. Fume all the ground,
 And sprinkle holy water, for unsound

And foul infection 'gins to fill the air : 90
 It gathers yet more strongly ; take a pair

[The Satyr fumes the ground, etc.]

Of censers fill'd with frankincense and myrrh,
 Together with cold camphire : quickly stir

Thee, gentle Satyr, for the place begins
 To sweat and labour with th' abhorred sins 95

Of those offenders : let them not come nigh,
 For full of itching flame and leprosy
 Their very souls are, that the ground goes
 back,

And shrinks to feel the sullen weight of black

And so unheard-of venom. — Hie thee fast, 100
 Thou holy man, and banish from the chaste

<sup>1</sup> Moorman's conj. for Qq. cleanse thee. F<sub>2</sub> reads, This perhaps will cleanse again.

These manlike monsters; let them never
more

Be known upon these downs, but, long before
The next sun's rising, put them from the sight
And memory of every honest wight : 105
Be quick in expedition, lest the sores
Of these weak patients break into new gores.<sup>1</sup>

Exil. Priest.
Peri. My dear, dear Amoret, how happy are Those blessed pairs, in whom a little jar
Hath bred an everlasting love, too strong 110
For time, or steel, or envy to do wrong!
How do you feel your hurts? Alas, poor heart,
How much I was abus'd! Give me the smart,
For it is justly mine.

Amo. I do believe.
It is enough, dear friend; leave off to grieve, 115
And let us once more, in despite of ill,
Give hands and hearts again.

Peri. With better will
Than e'er I went to find in hottest day
Cool crystal of the fountain, to allay 119
My eager thirst. May this band never break!
Hear us, oh, Heaven!

Amo. Be constant.
Peri. Else Pan wreak

With double vengeance my disloyalty!
Let me not dare to know the company
Of men, or any more behold those eyes!

Amo. Thus, shepherd, with a kiss all envy
dies. 125

Re-enter Priest of Pan.

Priest. Bright maid, I have perform'd your will. The swain

In whom such heat and black rebellions reign
Hath undergone your sentence and disgrace;
Only the maid I have reserv'd, whose face Shows much amendment; many a tear doth fall 130

In sorrow of her fault. Great fair, recall
Your heavy doom, in hope of better days,
Which I dare promise; once again praise
Her heavy spirit, that near drowned lies
In self-consuming care that never dies. 135

Clo. I am content to pardon; call her in.—
The air grows cool again, and doth begin
To purge itself: how bright the day doth show
After this stormy cloud!—Go, Satyr, go,
And with this taper boldly try her hand. 140
If she be pure and good, and firmly stand
To be so still, we have perform'd a work
Worthy the gods themselves.

Satyr brings AMARILLIS in.
Sat. Come forward, maiden; do not lurk,
Nor hide your face with grief and shame; 145
Now or never get a name
That may raise thee, and re-cure
All thy life that was impure.
Hold your hand unto the flame;
If thou be'st a perfect dame, 150
Or hast truly vow'd to mend,
This pale fire will be thy friend.—

[Applies her hand to the taper.]

See, the taper hurts her not!

<sup>1</sup> Bleedings.

Go thy ways; let never spot
Henceforth seize upon thy blood: 155
Thank the gods, and still be good.

Clo. Young shepherdess, now ye are brought
again

To virgin-state, be so, and so remain
To thy last day, unless the faithful love 159
Of some good shepherd force thee to remove;
Then labour to be true to him, and live
As such a one that ever strives to give
A blessed memory to after-time;
Be famous for your good, not for your crime.—
Now, holy man, I offer up again 165
These patients, full of health and free from pain.

Keep them from after-ills; be ever near
Unto their actions; teach them how to clear
The tedious way they pass through from suspect;

Keep them from wronging others, or neglect 170
Of duty in themselves; correct the blood
With thrifty bits<sup>2</sup> and labour; let the flood,
Or the next neighbouring spring, give remedy
To greedy thirst and travail, not the tree 174
That hangs with wanton clusters; let not wine,
Unless in sacrifice or rites divine,
Be ever known of shepherds; have a care,
Thou man of holy life! Now do not spare Their faults through much remissness, nor forget 179

To cherish him whose many pains and sweat
Hath giv'n increase and added to the downs.
Sort all your shepherds from the lazy dawns
That feed their heifers in the budded brooms.
Teach the young maidens strictness, that the grooms

May ever fear to tempt their blowing youth. 185
Banish all compliment, but single truth,
From every tongue and every shepherd's heart;
Let them still use persuading, but no art.
Thus, holy priest, I wish to thee and these
All the best goods and comforts that may
please. 190

All. And all those blessings Heaven did ever
give,

We pray upon this bower may ever live.
Priest. Kneel, every shepherd, whilst with powerful hand

I bless your after-labours, and the land
You feed your flocks upon. Great Pan defend
you 195

From misfortune, and amend you;
Keep you from those dangers still
That are followed by your will;
Give ye means to know at length,
All your riches, all your strength, 200
Cannot keep your foot from falling
To lewd lust, that still is calling
At your cottage, till his power
Bring again that golden hour
Of peace and rest to every soul; 205
May his care of you control
All diseases, sores, or pain,
That in after-time may reign
Either in your flocks or you;

<sup>2</sup> Well-earned morsels. (Moorman.)

Give ye all affections new, 210
 New desires, and tempers new,
 That ye may be ever true!
 Now rise, and go; and, as ye pass away,
 Sing to the God of Sheep that happy lay
 That honest Dorus taught ye,— Dorus, he 215
 That was the soul and god of melody.

They all sing [and strew the ground with flowers].

THE SONG.

All ye woods, and trees, and bowers,
 All ye virtues and ye powers
 That inhabit in the lakes,
 In the pleasant springs or brakes, 220
     Move your feet
     To our sound,
     Whilst we greet
     All this ground

With his honour and his name 225
 That defends our flocks from blame.

He is great, and he is just,
 He is ever good, and must
 Thus be honour'd. Daffadillies,
 Roses, pinks, and loved lilies, 230
     Let us fling,
     Whilst we sing,
     Ever holy,
     Ever holy,

Ever honour'd, ever young! 235
 Thus great Pan is ever sung!

Exeunt [all except Clorin and Satyr].

Sat. Thou divinest, fairest, brightest,
 Thou most powerful maid and whitest,
 Thou most virtuous and most blessed,
 Eyes of stars, and golden-tressed 240

Like Apollo; tell me, sweetest,
 What new service now is meetest
 For the Satyr? Shall I stray
 In the middle air, and stay
 The sailing rack,<sup>1</sup> or nimbly take 245
 Hold by the moon, and gently make
 Smit to the pale queen of night
 For a beam to give thee light?
 Shall I dive into the sea,

And bring thee coral, making way 250
 Through the rising waves that fall
 In snowy fleeces? Dearest, shall
 I catch thee wanton fawns, or flies
 Whose woven wings the summer dyes
 Of many colours? get thee fruit, 255
 Or steal from Heaven old Orpheus' lute?
 All these I'll venture for, and more,
 To do her service all these woods adore.

Clo. No other service, Satyr, but thy watch
 About these thickets,<sup>2</sup> lest harmless people 260 catch

Mischief or sad mischance.

Sat. Holy virgin, I will dance
 Round about these woods as quick
 As the breaking light, and prick<sup>3</sup>
 Down the lawns and down the valves 265
 Faster than the windmill sails.

So I take my leave, and pray
 All the comforts of the day,
 Such as Phoebus' heat doth send
 On the earth, may still befriend 270
 Thee and this harbour!

Clo. And to thee
 All thy master's love be free! Exeunt.

ACT I

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter Monsieur DE GARD and a Foot-boy.

De Gard. Sirrah, you know I have rid hard ; stir my horse well,

And let him want no litter.

F. Boy. I am sure I have run hard ;

Would somebody would walk me, and see me litter'd,

For I think my fellow-horse cannot in reason desire more rest, nor take up his chamber before me :

But we are the beasts now, and the beasts are our masters.

De Gard. When you have done, step to the ten-crown ordinary —

F. Boy. With all my heart, sir ; for I have a twenty-crown stomach.

De Gard. And there bespeak a dinner.

F. Boy. [going.] Yes, sir, presently.<sup>2</sup> 10

De Gard. For whom, I beseech you, sir ?

F. Boy. For myself, I take it, sir.

De Gard. In truth, you shall not take it ; 'tis not meant for you.

There 's for your provender. [Gives money.] Bespeak a dinner

For Monsieur Mirabel and his companions ;

They 'll be in town within this hour. When you have done, sirrah, 15

Make ready all things at my lodging for me, And wait me there.

F. Boy. The ten-crown ordinary ?

De Gard. Yes, sir, if you have not forgot it.

F. Boy. I 'll forget my feet first :

'T is the best part of a footman's faith. Exit.

De Gard. These youths, 20

For all they have been in Italy to learn thrift, And seem to wonder at men's lavish ways, Yet they cannot rub off old friends, their French itches ;

They must meet sometimes to disport their bodies

With good wine and good women, and good store too. 25

Let 'em be what they will, they are arm'd at all points,

And then hang saying, let the sea grow high !

This ordinary can fit 'em of all sizes.

Enter LA CASTRE and ORIANA.

They must salute their country with old customs.

Ori. Brother !

De Gard. My dearest sister !

Ori. Welcome, welcome ! 30

Indeed, ye are welcome home, most welcome !

De Gard. Thank ye.

You are grown a handsome woman, Oriana [Blush at your faults] : I am wondrous glad to see ye. —

Monsieur La Castre, let not my affection To my fair sister make me be held unmannerly.

I am glad to see ye well, to see ye lusty, 38
 Good health about ye, and in fair company;
 Believe me, I am proud —

La Cast. Fair sir, I thank ye.
 Monsieur De Gard, you are welcome from your journey;

Good men have still good welcome. Give me your hand, sir. 40

Once more, you are welcome home. You look still younger.

De Gard. Time has no leisure to look after
 us;

We wander every where; Age cannot find us.

La Cast. And how does all?

De Gard. All well, sir, and all lusty.

La Cast. I hope my son be so. I doubt not,
 sir. 45

But you have often seen him in your journeys,
 And bring me some fair news.

De Gard. Your son is well, sir,
 And grown a proper gentleman; he is well and lusty.

Within this eight hours I took leave of him,
 And over-hied him, having some slight business
 That forc'd me out o' th' way. I can assure
 you, 51

He will be here to-night.

La Cast. Ye make me glad, sir,
 For, o' my faith, I almost long to see him.

Methinks, he has been away —

De Gard. 'T is but your tenderness.
 What are three years? A love-sick wench will allow it. 55

His friends that went out with him are come back too,

Belleur and young Pinac. He bid me say little,
 Because he means to be his own glad messenger.

La Cast. I thank ye for this news, sir. He shall be welcome,

And his friends too; indeed, I thank you heartily. 60

And how (for I dare say you will not flatter
 him)

Has Italy wrought on him? Has he mew'd<sup>1</sup> yet
 His wild fantastic toys? They say that climate
 Is a great purger of those humorous fluxes.

How is he improved, I pray ye?

De Gard. No doubt, sir, well; 65
 H'as borne himself a full and noble gentleman:
 To speak him farther is beyond my charter.

La Cast. I am glad to hear so much good.
 Come, I see

You long to enjoy your sister; yet I must entreat ye,

Before I go, to sup with me to-night, 70
 And must not be deny'd.

De Gard. I am your servant.

La Cast. Where you shall meet fair, merry,
 and noble company;

My neighbour Nantolet and his two fair daughters.

De Gard. Your supper's season'd well, sir; I shall wait upon ye.

La Cast. Till then I'll leave ye; and y' are once more welcome. Exit. 75

De Gard. I thank ye, noble sir! Now, Oriana, How have ye done since I went? Have ye had your health well?
 And your mind free?

Ori. You see, I am not bated;
 Merry, and eat my meat.

De Gard. A good preservative.
 And how have you been us'd? You know,
 Oriana, 80

Upon my going out, at your request,
 I left your portion in La Castre's hands,
 The main means you must stieck to. For that reason,

And 'tis no little one, I ask ye, sister,
 With what humanity he entertains ye, 85
 And how ye find his courtesey?

Ori. Most ready.

I can assure you, sir, I am us'd most nobly.

De Gard. I am glad to hear it; but, I prithee,
 tell me

And tell me true, what end had you, Oriana,
 In trusting your money here? He is no kins-
 man, 90

Nor any tie upon him of a guardian;
 Nor dare I think ye doubt my prodigality.

Ori. No, certain, sir; none of all this provoked<sup>2</sup> me;

Another private reason.

De Gard. 'T is not private,
 Nor carried so; 't is common, my fair sister;
 Your love to Mirabel: your blushes tell it. 95
 'T is too much known, and spoken of too
 largely;

And with no little shame I wonder at it.

Ori. Is it a shame to love?

De Gard. To love indiscreetly:
 A virgin should be tender of her honour, 100
 Close, and secure.

Ori. I am as close as can be,
 And stand upon as strong and honest guards
 too;

Unless this warlike age need a portcullis:

Yet I confess, I love him.

De Gard. Hear the people.

Ori. Now, I say, hang the people! He that dares 105

Believe what they say dares be mad, and give
 His mother, nay, his own wife, up to rumour.

All grounds of truth they build on is a tavern,
 And their best censure's sack, sack in abundance; 109

For, as they drink, they think: they ne'er speak modestly,

Unless the wine be poor, or they want money.
 Believe them! Believe Amadis de Gaul,

The Knight o' the Sun, or Palmerin of England;

For these, to them, are modest and true stories.
 Pray, understand me; if their tongues be truth,

And if in vino veritas be an oracle, 114
 What woman is, or has been ever, honest?

Give 'em but ten round cups, they'll swear
 Lucretia

Died not for want of power to resist Tarquin,
 But want of pleasure, that he stay'd no longer;
 And Portia, that was famous for her piety 121

<sup>2</sup> Incited.

To her lov'd lord, they'll face ye out, died o'
th' pox.

De Gard. Well, there is something, sister.

Ori. If there be, brother,

'T is none of their things; 't is not yet so monstrous:

My thing is marriage; and, at his return, 126
I hope to put their squint eyes right again.

De Gard. Marriage? 'T is true his father is a rich man,

Rich both in land and money; he his heir,
A young and handsome man, I must confess,
too;

But of such qualities, and such wild flings, 130
Such admirable imperfections, sister,

(For all his travel and bought experience.)

I should be loth to own him for my brother.

Methinks, a rich mind in a state indifferent
Would prove the better fortune.

Ori. If he be wild, 135

The reclaiming him to good and honest, brother,
Will make much for my honour; which, if I prosper,

Shall be the study of my love, and life too.

De Gard. Ye say well; would he thought as well, and loved too!

He marry! He'll be hanged first. He knows
no more 140

What the conditions and the ties of love are,
The honest purposes and grounds of marriage,

Nor will know, nor be ever brought t' endeavour,
our,

Than I do how to build a church. He was ever
A loose and strong defier of all order; 145

His loves are wanderers, they knock at each
door,

And taste each dish, but are no residents.

Or say, he may be brought to think of marriage,
(As 't will be no small labour), thy hopes are strangers. 149

I know there is a labour'd match now follow'd,
Now at this time, for which he was sent for home too.

Be not abus'd: <sup>1</sup> Nantolet has two fair daughters,

And he must take his choice.

Ori. Let him take freely.

For all this I despair not; my mind tells me

That I, and only I, must make him perfect; 155

And in that hope I rest.

De Gard. Since y' are so confident,

Prosper your hope! I'll be no adversary;

Keep yourself fair and right, he shall not wrong
ye.

Ori. When I forget my virtue, no man know
me!

Exeunt.

SCENE II.<sup>2</sup>

Enter MIRABEL, PINAC, BELLEUR, and Servants.

Mir. Welcome to Paris, once more, gentlemen!

We have had a merry and a lusty ordinary,
And wine, and good meat, and a bouncing reckoning;

And let it go for once; 't is a good physic.

Only the wenches are not for my diet; 5

They are too lean and thin, their embraces brawn-fallen.<sup>3</sup>

Give me the plump Venetian, fat and lusty,
That meets me soft and supple; smiles upon me,
As if a cup of full wine leap'd to kiss me,

These slight things I affect not.

Pin. They are ill-built; 10

Pin-buttocked,<sup>4</sup> like your dainty Barbaries,<sup>5</sup>
And weak i' the pasterns; they'll endure no hardness.

Mir. There's nothing good or handsome bred amongst us;

Till we are travell'd, and live abroad, we are coxcombs.

Ye talk of France — a slight unseason'd country,
15

Abundance of gross food, which makes us blockheads.

We are fair set out indeed, and so are forehorses: —

Men say, we are great courtiers, — men abuse
us;

We are wise, and valiant too, — non credo, signor;

Our women the best linguists, — they are parrots; 20

O' this side the Alps they are nothing but mere drolleries.<sup>6</sup>

Ha! Roma la Santa, Italy for my money!

Their policies, their customs, their frugalities,
Their courtesies so open, yet so reserv'd too,

As, when you think y' are known best, ye are a stranger. 25

Their very pick-teeth<sup>7</sup> speak more man than we do.

And season of more salt.

Pin. 'T is a brave country;

Not pester'd with your stubborn precise puppies,
That turn all useful and allow'd contentments

To scabs and scruples — hang 'em, capon-worshippers. 30

Bel. I like that freedom well, and like their women too,

And would fain do as others do; but I am so bashful,

So naturally an ass! Look ye, I can look upon
'em,

And very willingly I go to see 'em, 34

(There's no man willing), and I can kiss 'em,
And make a shift —

Mir. But, if they chance to flout ye,
Or say, "Ye are too bold! Fie, sir, remember!

I pray, sit farther off —"

Bel. 'T is true — I am humbled,

I am gone; I confess ingenuously, I am silenced;
The spirit of amber<sup>8</sup> cannot force me answer. 40

Pin. Then would I sing and dance —

Bel. You have wherewithal, sir.

Pin. And charge her up again.

Bel. I can be hang'd first:

Yet, where I fasten well, I am a tyrant.

Mir. Why, thou dar'st fight?

<sup>2</sup> A street before the same house.

Bel. Yes, certainly, I dare fight,
And fight with any man at any weapon. <sup>46</sup>
Would th' other were no more! But, a pox on 't!

When I am sometimes in my height of hope,
And reasonable valiant that way, my heart
harden'd,

Some scornful jest or other chops between me
And my desire. What would ye have me to do, then, gentlemen? <sup>50</sup>

Mir. Belleur, you must be bolder. Travel three years,

And bring home such a baby to betray ye
As bashfulness! A great fellow, and a soldier!

Bel. You have the gift of impudence; be thankful.

Every man has not the like talent. I will study,
And, if it may be reveal'd to me —

Mir. Learn of me, <sup>56</sup>
And of Pinac. No doubt, you'll find employ-
ment;

Ladies will look for courtship.

Pin. 'Tis but fleshing,
But standing one good brunt or two. Hast thou any mind to marriage?

We'll provide thee some soft-natur'd wench,
that's dumb too. <sup>60</sup>

Mir. Or an old woman that cannot refuse thee in charity.

Bel. A dumb woman, or an old woman, that were eager,

And car'd not for discourse, I were excellent at.

Mir. You must now put on boldness, there's no avoiding it,

And stand all hazards, fly at all games bravely;
They'll say, you went out like an ox, and re-turn'd like an ass, else. <sup>66</sup>

Bel. I shall make danger, <sup>1</sup> sure.

Mir. I am sent for home now;
I know it is to marry; but my father shall pardon me:

Although it be a weighty <sup>2</sup> ceremony, <sup>69</sup>
And may concern me hereafter in my gravity,
I will not lose the freedom of a traveller.

A new strong lusty bark cannot ride at one anchor.

Shall I make divers suits to show to the same
eyes?

'Tis dull and homespun; — study several pleasures,

And want employments for 'em? I'll be hang'd
first. <sup>75</sup>

Tie me to one smock? Make my travels fruitless?

I'll none of that; for every fresh behaviour,
By your leave, father, I must have a fresh mistress,

And a fresh favour <sup>3</sup> too.

Bel. I like that passingly;
As many as you will, so they be willing, <sup>80</sup>
Willing, and gentle, gentle.

Pin. There's no reason
A gentleman, and a traveller, should be clapt
up,

(For 't is a kind of bilboes <sup>4</sup> to be married).
Before he manifest to the world his good parts;
Tug ever, like a rascal, at one oar? <sup>85</sup>
Give me the Italian liberty!

Mir. That I study,
And that I will enjoy. Come, go in, gentlemen;
There mark how I behave myself, and follow. <sup>86</sup>
Exeunt.

SCENE III.<sup>4</sup>

Enter LA CASTRE, NANTOLET, LUGIER, ROSA-LURA, and LILLIA BIANCA.

La Cast. You and your beauteous daughters are most welcome.

Beshrew my blood, they are fair ones! — Welcome beauties,

Welcome, sweet birds. {courtesies.

Nant. They are bound much to your
La Cast. I hope we shall be nearer acquainted.

Nant. That's my hope too: <sup>5</sup>
For, certain, sir, I much desire your alliance.

You see 'em; they are no gypsies. For their breeding,

It has not been so coarse but they are able To rank themselves with women of fair fashion;

Indeed, they have been trained well.

Lug. Thank me, <sup>10</sup>
Nant. Fit for the heirs of that state I shall leave 'em:

To say more, is to sell 'em. They say your son,
Now he has travell'd, must be wondrous curious

And choice in what he takes; these are no coarse ones.

Sir, here's a merry wench — let him look to himself — <sup>15</sup>

All heart, 't' faith — may chance to startle him;
For all his care, and travell'd caution,

May creep into his eye. If he love gravity,
Affect a solemn face, there's one will fit him.

La Cast. So young and so demure?
Nant. She is my daughter, <sup>20</sup>

Else I would tell you, sir, she is a mistress
Both of those manners and that modesty

You would wonder at. She is no often-speaker,
But, when she does, she speaks well; nor no
reveller,

Yet she can dance, and has studied the court elements, <sup>25</sup>

And sings, as some say, handsomely; if a
woman,

With the decency of her sex, may be a scholar,
I can assure ye, sir, she understands too.

La Cast. These are fit garments, sir.

Lug. Thank them that cut 'em.
Yes, they are handsome women; they have handsome parts too, <sup>30</sup>

Pretty becoming parts.

La Cast. 'Tis like they have, sir.

Lug. Yes, yes, and handsome education they have had too,

Had it abundantly; they need not blush at it.
I taught it, I'll avouch it.

La Cast.

Ye say well, sir.

Lug. I know what I say, sir, and I say but right, sir. <sup>35</sup>I am no trumpet of their commendations
Before their father; else I should say farther.La Cast. Pray ye, what 's this gentleman?Nant. One that lives with me, sir;

A man well bred and learn'd, but blunt and bitter;

Yet it offends no wise man; I take pleasure in 't. <sup>40</sup>Many fair gifts he has, in some of which,
That lie most easy to their understandings,

He's handsomely bred up my girls, I thank him.

[Lug.] I have put it to 'em, that 's my part,
I have urg'd it.It seems, they are of years now to take hold on 't. <sup>45</sup>Nant. He 's wondrous blunt.La Cast. By my faith, I was afraid of him.Does he not fall out with the gentlewomen sometimes?Nant. No, no; he 's that way moderate and discreet, sir.Ros. If he did, we should be too hard for him.Lug. Well said, sulphur! <sup>50</sup>Too hard for thy husband's head, if he wear not armour.Enter MIRABEL, PINAC, BELLEUR, DE GARD, and ORIANA.Nant. Many of these bickerings, sir.La Cast. I am glad they are no oracles.

Sure as I live, he beats them, he 's so puissant.

Ori. Well, if ye do forget —Mir. Prithee, hold thy peace. <sup>55</sup>I know thou art a pretty wench; I know thou lov'st me;Preserve it till we have a fit time to discourse on 't,And a fit place. I'll ease thy heart, I warrant
thee.

Thou seest I have much to do now.

Ori. I am answer'd, sir;With me ye shall have nothing on these conditions. <sup>60</sup>De Gard. Your father and your friends.La Cast. You are welcome home, sir;Bless ye, ye are very welcome! Pray, know this gentleman,

And these fair ladies.

Nant. Monsieur Mirabel,

I am much affected with your fair return, sir;

You bring a general joy.

Mir. I bring you service, <sup>65</sup>

And these bright beauties, sir.

Nant. Welcome home, gentlemen,

Welcome with all my heart!

Bel. & Pin. We thank ye, sir.La Cast. Your friends will have their share too.Bel. Sir, we hopeThey'll look upon us, though we show like strangers.Nant. Monsieur De Gard, I must salute you also, <sup>70</sup>And this fair gentlewoman; you are welcome from your travel too.

All welcome, all.

De Gard. We render ye our loves, sir.
The best wealth we bring home. — By your favours, beauties. —[Aside to Ori.] One of these two: you know my meaning.Ori. Well, sir;They are fair and handsome, I must needs confess it, <sup>75</sup>And, let it prove the worst, I shall live after it.
Whilst I have meat and drink, love cannot starve me;

For, if I die o' th' first fit, I am unhappy,
And worthy to be buried with my heels upward.Mir. To marry, sir?La Cast. You know I am an old man, <sup>80</sup>
And every hour declining to my grave,
One foot already in; more sons I have not,Nor more I dare not seek whilst you are worthy.In you lies all my hope, and all my name,
The making good or wretched of my memory, <sup>85</sup>
The safety of my state.Mir. And you have provided,
Out of this tenderness, these handsome gentle-women,Daughters to this rich man, to take my choice of?La Cast. I have, dear son.Mir. 'Tis true, ye are old and feeble;
Would ye were young again, and in full vigour! <sup>90</sup>

I love a bounteous father's life, a long one;

I am none of those that, when they shoot to ripeness,Do what they can to break the boughs they grew on.I wish ye many years and many riches,
And pleasures to enjoy 'em; but, for marriage, <sup>95</sup>

I neither yet believe in 't, nor affect 't;

Nor think it fit.

La Cast. You will render me your reasons?
Mir. Yes, sir, both short and pithy, and these
they are: —

You would have me marry a maid?

La Cast. A maid! what else?Mir. Yes, there be things called widows, dead men's wills, <sup>100</sup>I never lov'd to prove those; nor never long'd yetTo be buried alive in another man's cold monument.And there be maids appearing, and maids being;The appearing are fantastic things, mere shadows;And, if you mark 'em well, they want their heads, too; <sup>105</sup>Only the world, to cozen<sup>2</sup> misty eyes, Has clapt 'em on new faces: the maids beingA man may venture on, if he be so mad to marry,

1 Desire.

2 Cheat.

If he have neither fear before his eyes, nor
fortune;
And let him take heed how he gather these
too; <sup>110</sup>
For, look ye, father, they are just like melons,
Musk-melons are the emblems of these maids;
Now they are ripe, now cut 'em, they taste pleasantly,
And are a dainty fruit, digested easily;
Neglect this present time, and come to-morrow, <sup>115</sup>
They are so ripe they are rotten gone, their sweetness
Run into humour, and their taste to surfeit.
Lil Cast. Why, these are now ripe, son.
Mir. I'll try them presently,
And, if I like their taste —
La Cast. Pray ye, please yourself, sir.
Mir. That liberty is my due, and I'll maintain it. — <sup>120</sup>
Lady, what think you of a handsome man now?
Ros. A wholesome too, sir?
Mir. That 's as you make your bargain.
A handsome, wholesome man, then, and a kind
man,
To cheer your heart up, to rejoice ye, lady?
Ros. Yes, sir, I love rejoicing.
Mir. To lie close to ye? <sup>125</sup> Close as a cockle? Keep the cold nights from
ye?
Ros. That will be look'd for too; our bodies
ask it.
Mir. And get two boys at every birth?
Ros. That 's nothing?
I have known a cobbler do it, a poor thin cobbler,
A cobbler out of mouldy cheese perform it, <sup>130</sup> Cabbage, and coarse black bread. Methinks, a
gentleman
Should take foul scorn to have an awl out-name<sup>1</sup> him.
Two at a birth! Why, every house-dove has it.
That man that feeds well, promises as well too,
I should expect indeed something of worth from. <sup>135</sup>
You talk of two!
Mir. [Aside.] She would have me get two dozen,
Like buttons, at a birth.
Ros. You love to brag, sir.
If you proclaim these offers at your marriage,
(Ye are a pretty-timber'd man, take heed.)
They may be taken hold of, and expected, <sup>140</sup>
Yes, if not hoped for at a higher rate too.
Mir. I will take heed, and thank ye for your counsel.
Father, what think ye?
La Cast. 'Tis a merry gentlewoman;
Will make, no doubt, a good wife.
Mir. Not for me.
I marry her, and, happily,<sup>2</sup> get nothing: <sup>145</sup>
In what a state am I then, father? I shall suffer,
For any thing I hear to the contrary, *more ma-
jorum*;

<sup>1</sup> Surpass.<sup>2</sup> Haply.

I were as sure to be a cuckold, father,
A gentleman of antler —
La Cast. Away, away, fool!
Mir. As I am sure to fail her expectation. <sup>150</sup>
I had rather get the pox than get her babies.
La Cast. Ye are much to blame. If this do not affect<sup>3</sup> ye,
Pray, try the other; she 's of a more demure
way.
Bel. [Aside.] That I had but the audacity to talk thus!
I love that plain-spoken gentlewoman admirably; <sup>155</sup>
And, certain, I could go as near to please her,
If down-right doing — she has a per'lous countenance —
If I could meet one that would believe me,
And take my honest meaning without circumstance —
Mir. You shall have your will, sir; I will try the other; <sup>160</sup>
But 't will be to small use. — I hope, fair lady,
(For, methinks, in your eyes I see more mercy,)
You will enjoy your lover a less penance;
And though I'll promise much, as men are liberal,
And vow an ample sacrifice of service, <sup>165</sup>
Yet your discretion, and your tenderness,
And thriftiness in love, good huswife's careful-
ness
To keep the stock entire —
Lil. Good sir, speak louder,
That these may witness, too, you talk of nothing.
I should be loth alone to bear the burden <sup>170</sup>
Of so much indiscretion.
Mir. Hark ye, hark ye!
'Ods-bobs,<sup>4</sup> you are angry, lady.
Lil. Angry! no, sir;
I never own'd an anger to lose poorly.
Mir. But you can love, for all this; and delight too,
For all your set austerity to hear <sup>175</sup>
Of a good husband, lady?
Lil. You say true, sir;
For, by my troth, I have heard of none these ten year,
They are so rare; and there are so many, sir,
So many longing women on their knees too,
That pray the dropping-down of these good husbands — <sup>180</sup>
The dropping-down from Heaven; for they are not bred here —
That you may guess at all my hope, but hearing —
Mir. Why may not I be one?
Lil. You were near 'em once, sir,
When ye came o'er the Alps; those are near Heaven.
But since ye miss'd that happiness, there 's no hope of ye, <sup>185</sup>
Mir. Can ye love a man?
Lil. Yes, if the man be lovely,
That is, be honest, modest. I would have him valiant,

<sup>3</sup> Please.<sup>4</sup> God's body!

His anger slow, but certain for his honour;
 Travell'd he should be, but through himself exactly,

For 't is fairer to know manners well than countries. 190

He must be no vain talker, nor no lover
 To hear himself talk; they are brags of a wanderer,

Of one finds no retreat for fair behaviour.
 Would ye learn more?

Mir. Yes.

Lil. Learn to hold your peace, then:
 Fond<sup>1</sup> girls are got with tongues, women with tempers. 195

Mir. Women, with I know what; but let that vanish.

Go thy way, good-wife Bias! Sure, thy husband

Must have a strong philosopher's stone, he will ne'er please thee else. —

Here 's a starch'd piece of austerity! — Do you hear, father?

Do you hear this moral lecture?

La Cast. Yes, and like it. 200

Mir. Why, there 's your judgment now;
 there 's an old bolt shot!

This thing must have the strangest observation,<sup>2</sup>

(Do you mark me, father?) when she is married
 once,

The strangest custom too of admiration
 On all she does and speaks, 't will be past sufferance. 205

I must not lie with her in common language,
 Nor cry, "Have at thee, Kate!" — I shall be hiss'd then;

Nor eat my meat without the sauce of sentences,

Your powder'd beef and problems, a rare diet!
 My first son, Monsieur Aristotle, I know it, 210

Great master of the metaphysics, or so;
 The second, Solon, and the best law-setter;

And I must look<sup>3</sup> Egyptian god-fathers, Which will be no small trouble; my eldest
 daughter,

Sappho, or such a fiddling kind of poetess. 215

And brought up, invita Minerva, at her needle!
 My dogs must look their names too, and all Spartan,

Lelaps, Melampus; no more Fox and Bawdy-
 face.

I married to a sullen set of sentences!
 To one that weighs her words and her behaviours 220

In the gold-weights<sup>4</sup> of discretion! I'll be hang'd first.

La Cast. Prithee, reclaim thyself.

Mir. Pray ye, give me time, then.

If they can set me any thing to play at,
 That seems fit for a gamester, have at the fairest,

Till I see more, and try more!

La Cast. Take your time, then; 225

I'll bar ye no fair liberty. — Come, gentlemen;

And ladies, come; to all, once more, a welcome!

And, now let 's in to supper.

[Exeunt LA CASTRE, NANTOLET,
 LUGIER, ROSALURA, and LIL-
 LIA BLANCA.]

Mir. How dost like 'em?

Pin. They are fair enough, but of so strange behaviours — 230

Mir. Too strange for me. I must have those have mettle,

And mettle to my mind. Come, let 's be merry.

Bel. Bless me from this woman! I would stand the cannon,
 Before ten words of hers.

[Exeunt MIRABEL, PINAC, and BELLEUR.]

De Gard. Do you find him now?
 Do you think he will be ever firm?

Ori. I fear not. Exeunt. 235

ACT II

SCENE I.<sup>5</sup>

Enter MIRABEL, PINAC, and BELLEUR.

Mir. Ne'er tell me of this happiness; 't is nothing;

The state<sup>6</sup> they bring with being sought-to,<sup>7</sup> scurvy:

I had rather make mine own play, and I will do.
 My happiness is in mine own content,

And the despising of such glorious<sup>8</sup> trifles, 5
 As I have done a thousand more. For my humour,

Give me a good free fellow, that sticks to me,
 A jovial fair companion; there 's a beauty!

For women, I can have too many of them;
 Good women too, as the age reckons 'em, 10
 More than I have employment for.

Pin. You are happy.

Mir. My only fear is, that I must be forced,
 Against my nature, to conceal myself:

Health and an able body are two jewels.

Pin. If either of these two women were offered to me now, 15

I would think otherwise, and do accordingly;
 Yes, and recant my heresies; I would,<sup>9</sup> sir;

And be more tender of opinion,
 And put a little of my travell'd liberty

Out of the way, and look upon 'em seriously. 20
 Methinks, this grave-carried wench —

Bel. Methinks, the other,
 The home-spoken gentlewoman, that desires to be fruitful,

That treats of the full manage of the matter,
 (For there lies all my aim,) that wench, methinks, 25

If I were but well set on, for she is affable,
 If I were but hounded right, and one to teach
 me —

She speaks to th' matter, and comes home to th' point —

<sup>4</sup> I. e. with great precision.

Now do I know I have such a body to please
her

As all the kingdom cannot fit her with, I am sure on 't,

If I could but talk myself into her favour.

Mir. That's easily done.

Bel. That's easily said; would 't were done!
You should see then how I would lay about me.
If I were virtuous, it would never grieve me,
Or any thing that might justify my modesty; <sup>35</sup>
But when my nature is prone to do a charity,
And my calf's tongue will not help me —

Mir. Will ye go to 'em?
They cannot but take it courteously.

Pin. I'll do my part,
Though I am sure 't will be the hardest I e'er
play'd yet

A way I never tried too, which will stagger me;
And, if it do not shame me, I am happy.

Mir. Win 'em, and wear 'em; I give up my interest.

Pin. What say you, Monsieur Belleur?

Bel. Would I could say,
Or sing, or any thing that were but handsome!
I would be with her presently!

Pin. Yours is no venture; <sup>45</sup>
A merry ready wench.

Bel. A vengeance squibber; <sup>1</sup>
She'll flee me out of faith too.

Mir. I'll be near thee;
Pluck up thy heart; I'll second thee at all brunts.<sup>2</sup>

Be angry, if she abuse thee, and beat her a little;

Some women are won that way.

Bel. Pray, be quiet, <sup>50</sup>
And let me think: I am resolv'd to go on;
But how I shall get off again —

Mir. I am persuaded Thou wilt so please her, she will go near to ravish thee.

Bel. I would 't were come to that once! Let me pray a little.

Mir. Now, for thine honour, Pinac, board me this modesty; <sup>55</sup>

Warm but this frozen snow-ball, 't will be a conquest

(Although I know thou art a fortunate wench, And hast done rarely in thy days) above all thy ventures.

Bel. You will be ever near?

Mir. At all necessities; <sup>60</sup>
And take thee off, and set thee on again, boy,
And cherish thee, and stroke thee.

Bel. Help me out too;
For I know I shall stick i' th' mire. If you see us close once,

Be gone, and leave me to my fortune, suddenly,
For I am then determin'd to do wonders.
Farewell, and fling an old shoe. How my heart throbs! <sup>65</sup>

Would I were drunk! Farewell, Pinac; Heaven
send us

A joyful and a merry meeting, man!

Pin. Farewell,

And cheer thy heart up; and remember, Belleur,

They are but women.

Bel. I had rather they were lions.

Mir. About it; I'll be with you instantly. —
Exeunt (BELLEUR and PINAC).

Enter ORIANA.

Shall I ne'er be at rest? No peace of conscience? <sup>71</sup>

No quiet for these creatures? Am I ordain'd
To be devour'd quick <sup>3</sup> by these she-cannibals?
Here's another they call handsome; I care not
for her,

I ne'er look after her. When I am half-tiptled,
It may be I should turn her, and peruse her; <sup>75</sup>
Or, in my want of women, I might call for her;
But to be haunted when I have no fancy,
No maw to th' matter — [Aside.] Now, why do you follow me? <sup>79</sup>

Ori. I hope, sir, 't is no blemish to my virtue;
Nor need you, out of scruple, ask that question,
If you remember ye, before your travel,
The contract you tied to me. 'T is my love, sir,
That makes me seek ye, to confirm your memory;

And, that being fair and good, I cannot suffer.
I come to give ye thanks too.

Mir. For what, prithee? <sup>85</sup>

Ori. For that fair piece of honesty you show'd
sir,

That constant nobleness.

Mir. How? for I am short-headed.

Ori. I'll tell you then; for refusing that free offer

Of Monsieur Nantole't's, those handsome beauties, <sup>90</sup>
Those two prime ladies, that might well have press'd ye

If not to have broken, yet to have bow'd your promise.

I know it was for my sake, for your faith-sake,
You slipt 'em off; your honesty compell'd ye;
And let me tell ye, sir, it show'd most hand-somenely. <sup>95</sup>

Mir. And let me tell thee, there was no such
matter;

Nothing intended that way, of that nature.
I have more to do with my honesty than to fool it,
Or venture it in such leak barks as women.

I put 'em off because I lov'd 'em not, <sup>100</sup>
Because they are too queasy <sup>4</sup> for my temper,
And not for thy sake, nor the contract-sake,
Nor vows, nor oaths; I have made a thousand of 'em;

They are things indifferent, whether kept or broken;

Mere venial slips, that grow not near the conscience; <sup>105</sup>

Nothing concerns those tender parts; they are trifles;

For, as I think, there was never man yet hop'd
for

Either constancy or secrecy from a woman,
Unless it were an ass ordain'd for sufferance;

<sup>4</sup> Fastidious.

Nor to contract with such can be a tie-all. 110
So let them know again; for 't is a justice
And a main point of civil policy,
Whate'er we say or swear, they being repro-bates,

Out of the state of faith, we are clear of all sides,

And 't is a curious blindness to believe us. 115

Ori. You do not mean this, sure?

Mir. Yes, sure, and certain;

And hold it positively, as a principle,
As ye are strange things, and made of strange fires and fluxes,

So we are allow'd as strange ways to obtain ye,
But not to hold; we are all created errant. 120

Ori. You told me other tales.

Mir. I not deny it;

I have tales of all sorts for all sorts of women,
And protestations likewise of all sizes,

As they have vanities to make us coxcombs.

If I obtain a good turn, so it is, 125

I am thankful for it; if I be made an ass,

The 'mends are in mine own hands, or the surgeon's,

And there's an end on 't.

Ori. Do not you love me, then?

Mir. As I love others; heartily I love thee;

When I am high and lusty, I love thee cruelly.

After I have made a plenteous meal, and satisfac-
fied 131

My senses with all delicates, come to me,

And thou shalt see how I love thee.

Ori. Will not you marry me?

Mir. No, certain, no, for any thing I know yet.

I must not lose my liberty, dear lady, 135

And, like a wanton slave, cry for more shackles.

What should I marry for? Do I want any thing?

Am I an inch the farther from my pleasure?

Why should I be at charge to keep a wife of mine own, 140

When other honest married men will ease me,

And thank me too, and be beholding to me?

Thou think'st I am mad for a maidenhead;

thou art cozen'd;

Or, if I were addicted to that diet,

Can you tell me where I should have one? Thou art eighteen now, 145

And, if thou hast thy maidenhead yet extant,

Sure, 't is as big as cods-head; and those grave
dishes

I never love to deal withal. Dost thou see this book here? [Shows a book.]

Look over all these ranks; all these are women, Maids, and pretenders to maidenheads; these are my conquests; 150

All these I swore to marry, as I swore to thee,
With the same reservation, and most righteously;

Which I need not have done neither; for, alas,
they made no scruple,

And I enjoy'd 'em at my will, and left 'em.

Some of 'em are married since, and were as pure maids again, 155

Nay, o' my conscience, better than they were bred for;

The rest, fine sober women.

Ori. Are ye not ashamed, sir?

Mir. No, by my troth, sir; <sup>1</sup> there's no shame belongs to it;

I hold it as commendable to be wealthy in pleasure;

As others do in rotten sheep and pasture. 160

Enter DE GARD.

Ori. Are all my hopes come to this? Is there no faith,

No troth, nor modesty, in men? [Weeps.]

De Gard. How now, sister?

Why weeping thus? Did I not prophesy?

Come, tell me why—

Ori. I am not well; pray ye pardon me.

De Gard. Now, Monsieur Mirabel, what ails
my sister? 165

You have been playing the wag with her.

Mir. As I take it,

She is crying for a cod-piece. Is she gone?

Lord, what an age is this! I was calling for ye;

For, as I live, I thought she would have ravish'd
me.

De Gard. Ye are merry, sir. 170

Mir. Thou know'st this book, De Gard, this inventory?

De Gard. The debt-book of your mistresses;

I remember it.

Mir. Why, this was it that anger'd her; she was stark mad

She found not her name here; and cried downright

Because I would not pity her immediately, 175

And put her in my list.

De Gard. Sure, she had more modesty.

Mir. Their modesty is anger to be overdone;

They'll quarrel sooner for precedence here,

And take it in more dudgeon to be slighted,

Than they will in public meetings; 't is their natures: 180

And, alas, I have so many to despatch yet,

And to provide myself for my affairs too,

That, in good faith—

De Gard. Be not too glorious <sup>2</sup> foolish;

Sum not your travels up with vanities;

It ill becomes your expectation. <sup>3</sup> 185

Temper your speech, sir: whether your loose
story

Be true or false, (for you are so free, I fear it,)

Name not my sister in 't; I must not hear it.

Upon your danger, name her not! I hold her

A gentlewoman of those happy parts and carriage, 190

A good man's tongue may be right proud to speak her.

Mir. Your sister, sir! D' ye blench at that?

D' ye cavil?

Do you hold her such a piece she may not be play'd withal?

I have had an hundred handsomer and nobler

Have su'd to me, too, for such a courtesy; 195

Your sister comes i' the rear. Since ye are so angry,

<sup>2</sup> Boastful.

<sup>3</sup> The expectation formed of you.

And hold your sister such a strong recusant,
I tell ye, I may do it; and, it may be, will too;
It may be, have too; there's my free confession;
Work upon that now!

De Gard. If I thought ye had, I would work,
And work such stubborn work should make your heart ache: 201

But I believe ye, as I ever knew ye,
A glorious talker, and a legend-maker
Of idle tales and trifles; a depraver 204
Of your own truth: their honours fly about<sup>1</sup> ye!
And so, I take my leave; but with this caution,
Your sword be surer than your tongue; you'll smart else.

Mir. I laugh at thee, so little I respect thee;
And I'll talk louder, and despise thy sister; 209
Set up a chamber-maid that shall outshine her,
And carry her in my coach too, and that will kill her.

Go, get thy rents up, go!

De Gard. Ye are a fine gentleman! Exit.

Mir. Now, have at my two youths! I'll see how they do;
How they behave themselves; and then I'll
study

What wench shall love me next, and when I'll loose<sup>2</sup> her. Exit. 215

SCENE II.<sup>3</sup>

Enter PINAC and SERVANT.

Pin. Art thou her servant, sayest thou?
Serv. Her poor creature;
But servant to her horse, sir.

Pin. Canst thou show me
The way to her chamber, or where I may conveniently

See her, or come to talk to her?
Serv. That I can, sir;
But the question is, whether I will or no.

Pin. Why, I'll content thee. 5
Serv. Why, I'll content thee, then; now ye come to me.

Pin. There's for your diligence. [Gives money.]

Serv. There's her chamber, sir,
And this way she comes out; stand ye but here, sir,

You have her at your prospect or your pleasure,
Pin. Is she not very angry?

Serv. You'll find that quickly.
May be she'll call ye saucy, scurvy fellow, 11
Or some such familiar name; may be she knows

ye
And will fling a piss-pot at ye, or a pantofle,<sup>4</sup> According as ye are in acquaintance. If she like ye,

May be she'll look upon ye; may be no; 15
And two months hence call for ye.

Pin. This is fine.
She is monstrous proud, then?

Serv. She is a little haughty;
Of a small body, she has a mind well mounted.
Can you speak Greek?

<sup>3</sup> A hall in the house of Nantolet.    <sup>4</sup> Slipper.

Pin. No, certain.
Serv. Get ye gone, then! —
And talk of stars, and firmaments, and firedrakes? 20

Do you remember who was Adam's schoolmas-
ter,
And who taught Eve to spin? She knows all
these,

And will run ye over the beginning o' th' world
As familiar as a fiddler.

Can you sit seven hours together, and say nothing? 25

Which she will do, and, when she speaks, speak
oracles,

Speak things that no man understands, nor herself neither.

Pin. Thou mak'st me wonder.
Serv. Can ye smile?

Pin. Yes, willingly;
For naturally I bear a mirth about me.

Serv. She'll ne'er endure ye, then; she is never merry; 30

If she see one laugh, she'll swoond past aqua
vitae.

Never come near her, sir; if ye chance to venture,

And talk not like a doctor, you are damn'd too.
I have told ye enough for your crown, and so,
good speed you! Exit.

Pin. I have a pretty task, if she be thus curious, 35

As, sure, it seems she is! If I fall off now,
I shall be laugh'd at fearfully; if I go forward,

I can but be abus'd, and that I look for;
And yet I may hit right, but 't is unlikely.

Stay: in what mood and figure shall I attempt
her? 40

A careless way? No, no, that will not waken
her:

Besides, her gravity will give me line still,
And let me lose myself: yet this way often

Has hit, and handsomely. A wanton method?
Ay, if she give it leave to sink into her consideration: 45

But there's the doubt: if it but stir her blood
once,

And creep into the crannies of her fancy,
Set her a-gog; — but, if she chance to slight

it,
And by the power of her modesty fling it back,
I shall appear the arrant'st rascal to her, 50

The most licentious knave, for I shall talk lewdly.

To bear myself austerely? Rate my words?
And fling a general gravity about me,

As if I meant to give laws? But this I cannot do.

This is a way above my understanding; 55
Or, if I could, 'tis odds she'll think I mock

her;
For serious and sad things are ever still suspicious.

Well, I'll say something:
But learning I have none, and less good manners,

Especially for ladies. Well I'll set my best
face. 60

Enter LILLIA BIANCA and PETELLA.

I hear some coming. This is the first woman
I ever fear'd yet, the first face that shakes me.

[Retires.]

Lil. Give me my hat, Petella; take this veil off,
This sullen cloud; it darkens my delights.

Come, wench, be free, and let the music war-
ble:—

Play me some lusty measure.

[Music within, to which presently
LILLIA dances.]

Pin. [Aside.] This is she, sure,
The very same I saw, the very woman,
The gravity I wonder'd at. Stay, stay;
Let me be sure. Ne'er trust me, but she danceth!

Summer is in her face now, and she skippeth!

I'll go a little nearer.

Lil. Quicker time, fellows!

Enter MIRABEL [and remains at the side of the stage].

I cannot find my legs yet—Now Petella!

Pin. [Aside.] I am amaz'd; I am founder'd in my fancy!

Mir. [Aside.] Ha! say you so? Is this your gravity?

This the austerity you put upon you?

I'll see more o' this sport.

Lil. A song now!

Call in for a merry and a light song;

And sing it with a liberal spirit.

Enter a Man.

Man. Yes, madam.

Lil. And be not amaz'd, sirrah, but take us for your own company.—

[A song by the Man who then exits.]

Let's walk ourselves; come, wench. Would we had a man or two!

Pin. [Aside.] Sure, she has spi'd me, and will abuse me dreadfully.

She has put on this for the purpose: yet I will try her.—

[Advances.]

Madam, I would be loth my rude intrusion,

Which I must crave a pardon for—

Lil. Oh, ye are welcome,
Ye are very welcome, sir! We want such a
one.

Strike up again!—I dare presume ye dance
well:

Quick, quick, sir, quick! the time steals on.

Pin. I would talk with you.

Lil. Talk as you dance. [They dance.]

Mir. [Aside.] She'll beat him off his legs
first.

This is the finest masque!

Lil. Now, how do ye, sir?

Pin. You have given me a shrewd heat.

Lil. I'll give you a hundred.

Come, sing now, sing: for I know ye sing well;
I see ye have a singing face.

Pin. [Aside.] A fine modesty!

If I could, she'd never give me breath.—
Madam, would

I might sit and recover!

Lil. Sit here, and sing now;

Let's do things quickly, sir, and handsomely.—
Sit close, wench, close.—Begin, begin.

Pin. I am lesson'd. A song [by PINAC].

Lil. 'Tis very pretty, i' faith. Give me some wine now.

Pin. I would fain speak to you.

Lil. You shall drink first, believe me.

Here's to you a lusty health. [They drink.]

Pin. I thank you, lady.—

[Aside.] Would I were off again! I smell my misery;

I was never put to this rack: I shall be drunk
too.

Mir. [Aside.] If thou be'st not a right one, I have lost mine aim much:

I thank Heaven that I have scaped thee. To her, Pinac!

For thou art as sure to have her, and to groan
for her.—

I'll see how my other youth does; this speeds trimly.

A fine grave gentlewoman, and worth much
honour!

Lil. Now, how do ye like me, sir?

Pin. I like ye rarely.

Lil. Ye see, sir, though sometimes we are grave and silent,

And put on sadder dispositions,

Yet we are compounded of free parts, and sometimes too

Our lighter, airy, and our fiery metties

Break out, and show themselves: and what think you of that, sir?

Pin. Good lady, sit (for I am very weary),

And then I'll tell ye.

Lil. Fie! a young man idle!

Up, and walk; be still in action;

The motions of the body are fair beauties;

Besides, 'tis cold. 'Ods me, sir, let's walk faster!

What think ye now of the Lady Felicia?

And Bellafrente, the duke's fair daughter? ha!

Are they not handsome things? There is Duarta,

And brown Olivia—

Pin. I know none of 'em.

Lil. But brown must not be cast away, sir.

If young Lelia

Had kept herself till this day from a husband,

Why, what a beauty, sir! You know Ismena,

The fair gem of Saint-Germains?

Pin. By my troth, I do not.

Lil. And, then, I know, you must hear of Brisac,

How unlike a gentleman—

Pin. As I live, I have heard nothing.

Lil. Strike me another galliard!

Pin. By this light, I cannot!

In troth, I have sprain'd my leg, madam.

Lil. Now sit ye down, sir,

And tell me why ye came hither? Why ye chose me out?

What is your business? Your errand? Despatch, despatch.

Maybe, you are some gentleman's man, and I mistook ye.

1 A lively dance.

That have brought me a letter, or a haunch of venison,

Sent me from some friend of mine.

Pin. Do I look like a carrier?
You might allow me, what I am, a gentleman.

Lil. Cry ye mercy, sir! I saw ye yesterday;
You are new-come out of travel; I mistook
ye. <sup>140</sup>

And how do all our impudent friends in Italy?
Pin. Madam, I came with duty, and fair courtesy,

Service, and honour to ye.

Lil. Ye came to jeer me.
Ye see I am merry, sir; I have chang'd my copy;

None of the sages now: and, pray ye, proclaim
it. <sup>145</sup>

Fling on me what aspersion you shall please,
sir,

Of wantonness or wildness; I look for it;
And tell the world I am an hypocrite,
Mask in a fore'd and borrow'd shape; I expect
it;

But not to have you believ'd: for, mark ye,
sir, <sup>150</sup>

I have won a nobler estimation,
A stronger tie, by my discretion,
Upon opinion (howe'r you think I fore'd it)
Than either tongue or art of yours can slubber;
And, when I please, I will be what I please,
sir, <sup>155</sup>

So I exceed not mean; <sup>1</sup> and none shall brand it, Either with scorn or shame, but shall be sighted.

Pin. Lady, I come to love ye.

Lil. Love yourself, sir;
And, when I want observers, <sup>2</sup> I'll send for ye.
Heigh-ho! my fit's almost off; for we do all by fits, sir. <sup>160</sup>

If ye be weary, sit till I come again to ye.

Pin. This is a wench of a dainty spirit; but Hang me, if I know yet either what to think
Or make of her. She had her will of me,
And baited me abundantly, I thank her; <sup>165</sup>
And, I confess, I never was so blurled, <sup>3</sup> Nor never so abus'd. I must bear mine own sins.

Ye talk of travels; here's a curious country!
Yet I will find her out, or forswear my faculty.

Exit.

SCENE III. <sup>4</sup>

Enter ROSALURA and ORIANA.

Ros. Ne'er vex yourself, nor grieve; ye are a fool, then.

Ori. I am sure I am made so: yet, before I
suffer
Thus like a girl, and give him leave to triumph—

Ros. You say right; for, as long as he perceives ye

<sup>2</sup> Admirers.

<sup>4</sup> A garden belonging to the house of Nantolet, with a summer-house in the back-ground.

Sink under his proud scorings, he'll laugh at
ye. <sup>5</sup>

For me, secure yourself; and, for my sister,
I partly know her mind too: howsoever,
To obey my father, we have made a tender
Of our poor beauties to the travell'd monsieur;
Yet two words to a bargain. He slights us <sup>10</sup>
As skittish things, and we shun him as curious. <sup>5</sup>
May be, my free behaviour turns his stomach,
And makes him seem to doubt a loose opinion. <sup>6</sup>
I must be so sometimes, though all the world saw it.

Ori. Why should not ye? Are our minds only measur'd? <sup>15</sup>

As long as here ye stand secure—

Ros. Ye say true;
As long as mine own conscience makes no question,

What care I for report? That woman's miserable,

That's good or bad for their tongues' sake.
Come, let's retire,

And get my veil, wench. By my troth, your sorrow, <sup>20</sup>

And the consideration of men's humorous mad-dings,

Have put me into a serious contemplation.

Enter MIRABEL and BELLEUR.

Ori. Come, faith, let's sit and think.

Ros. That's all my business.

[They go into the summer-house, and sit down, ROSALURA having taken her veil from a table, and put it on.]<sup>7</sup>

Mir. Why stand'st thou peeping here? Thou great slug, forward!

Bel. She is there; peace!

Mir. Why stand'st thou here, then, <sup>25</sup> Sneaking and peeking <sup>8</sup> as thou wouldst steal linen?

Hast thou not place and time?

Bel. I had a rare speech
Studied, and almost ready; and your violence
Has beat it out of my brains.

Mir. Hang your rare speeches!
Go me on like a man.

Bel. Let me set my beard up. <sup>30</sup>
How has Pinac performed?

Mir. He has won already;
He stands not thrumming <sup>9</sup> of caps thus.

Bel. Lord, what should I ail!
What a cold I have over my stomach! Would
I had some hum! <sup>10</sup>

Certain I have a great mind to be at her,
A mighty mind.

Mir. On, fool!

Bel. Good words, I beseech ye; <sup>35</sup>
For I will not be abus'd by both.

Mir. Adieu, then
(I will not trouble you; I see you are valiant);
And work your own way.

Bel. Hist, hist! I will be rul'd;
I will, i' faith; I will go presently.

Will ye forsake me now, and leave me i' th' suds?<sup>40</sup>

You know I am false-hearted this way. I be-seech ye,

Good sweet Mirabel—I'll cut your throat, if ye leave me,

Indeed I will—sweet-heart—

Mir. I will be ready, Still at thine elbow. Take a man's heart to thee,

And speak thy mind; the plainer still the better.<sup>46</sup>

She is a woman of that free behaviour, Indeed, that common courtesy, she cannot deny thee.

Go bravely on.

Bel. Madam—keep close about me, Still at my back—Madam, sweet madam—

Ros. Ha! What noise is that? What saucy sound to trouble me?<sup>50</sup>

Mir. What said she?

Bel. I am saucy. [ROSALURA and ORIANA rise and come forward.]

Mir. 'T is the better.

Bel. She comes; must I be saucy still?

Mir. More saucy.

Ros. Still troubled with these vanities? Heaven bless us!

What are we born to?—Would you speak with any of my people?

Go in, sir; I am busy.

Bel. This is not she, sure:<sup>55</sup> Is this two children at a birth? I'll be hang'd, then:

Mine was a merry gentlewoman, talk'd daintily, Talked of those matters that befitted women;

This is a parcel prayer-book.<sup>1</sup> I'm serv'd sweetly!

And now I am to look to; I was prepar'd for th' other way.<sup>60</sup>

Ros. Do you know that man?

Ori. Sure, I have seen him, lady.

Ros. Methinks 't is pity such a lusty fellow Should wander up and down, and want employment.

Bel. She takes me for a rogue!—You may do well, madam,

To stay this wanderer, and set him a-work, forsooth;<sup>65</sup>

He can do something that may please your ladyship.

I have heard of women that desire good breedings,

Two at a birth, or so.

Ros. The fellow's impudent.

Ori. Sure, he is craz'd.

Ros. I have heard of men too that have had good manners.<sup>70</sup>

Sure, this is want of grace: indeed, 't is great pity

The young man has been bred so ill; but this lewd age

Is full of such examples.

<sup>1</sup> Partly a prayer-book.

Bel. I am founder'd, And some shall rue the setting of me on.

Mir. Ha! so bookish, lady? Is it possible? Turn'd holy at the heart too? I'll be hang'd then:<sup>70</sup>

Why, this is such a feat, such an activity, Such fast and loose! A veil too for your knavery?

O Dio, Dio!

Ros. What do you take me for, sir?

Mir. An hypocrite, a wanton, a dissembler, Howe'er ye seem; and thus ye are to be handled!<sup>81</sup>

Mark me, Belleur;—and this you love, I know it. [Attempts to remove the veil.]

Ros. Stand off, bold sir!

Mir. You wear good clothes to this end, Jewels; love feasts and masques.

Ros. Ye are monstrous saucy.

Mir. All this to draw on fools: and thus, thus, lady, [Attempts to remove the veil.]

You are to be lull'd.

Bel. Let her alone, I'll swinge ye else,<sup>86</sup> I will, i' faith! for, though I cannot skill o' this matter

Myself, I will not see another do it before me, And do it worse.

Ros. Away! ye are a vain thing.

You have travell'd far, sir, to return again<sup>90</sup> A windy and poor bladder. You talk of women, That are not worth the favour of a common one,

The grace of her grew in an hospital! Against a thousand such blown fooleries

I am able to maintain good women's honours, Their freedoms, and their fames, and I will do it.—<sup>95</sup>

Mir. She has almost struck me dumb too.

Ros. And declaim Against your base malicious tongues, your noises,

For they are nothing else. You teach behaviours!

Or touch us for our freedoms! Teach yourselves manners,<sup>100</sup>

Truth and sobriety, and live so clearly That our lives may shine in ye; and then task<sup>2</sup> us.

It seems ye are hot; the suburbs<sup>3</sup> will supply ye:

Good women scorn such gamesters.<sup>4</sup> So, I'll leave ye.

I am sorry to see this: faith, sir, live fairly.<sup>105</sup>

Erit [with ORIANA].

Mir. This woman, if she hold on, may be virtuous;

'T is almost possible: we'll have a new day.

Bel. Ye brought me on, ye forc'd me to this foolery.

I am sham'd, I am scorn'd, I am flurtd;<sup>5</sup> yes, I am so:

Though I cannot talk to a woman like your worship,<sup>110</sup>

And use my phrases and my learn'd figures,
Yet I can fight with any man.

Mir. Bel. Fie! I can, sir;

And I will fight.

Mir. With whom?

Bel. With you; with any man;

For all men now will laugh at me.

Mir. Prithee, be moderate.

Bel. And I'll beat all men. Come.

Mir. I love thee dearly. <sup>116</sup>

Bel. I [will] beat all that love; love has undone me.

Never tell me; I will not be a history.

Mir. Thou art not.

Bel. 'Sfoot, I will not! Give me room,

And let me see the proudest of ye jeer me;

And I'll begin with you first.

Mir. Prithee, Belleur — <sup>120</sup>

If I do not satisfy thee —

Bel. Well, look ye do.

But, now I think on 't better, 't is impossible;

I must beat somebody. I am maul'd myself.

And I ought in justice —

Mir. No, no, no; you are cozen'd:

But walk, and let me talk to thee,

Bel. Talk wisely, <sup>125</sup>

And see that no man laugh, upon no occasion;

For I shall think then 't is at me.

Mir. I warrant thee.

Bel. Nor no more talk of this.

Mir. Dost think I am maddish?

Bel. I must needs fight yet; for I find it concerns me:

A pox on 't: I must fight.

Mir. I' faith, thou shalt not. <sup>130</sup>

Exeunt.

ACT III

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter DE GARD and LUGIER.

De Gard. I know ye are a scholar, and can do wonders.

Lug. There 's no great scholarship belongs to this, sir;

What I am, I am. I pity your poor sister,

And heartily I hate these travellers,

These gim-cracks, made of mops <sup>2</sup> and motions. <sup>3</sup>

There 's nothing in their houses here but hummings;

A bee has more brains. I grieve and vex too

The insolent licentious carriage

Of this out-facing fellow Mirabel;

And I am mad to see him prick his plumes up.

De Gard. His wrongs you partly know.

Lug. Do not you stir, sir; <sup>11</sup>

Since he has begun with wit, let wit revenge it:

Keep your sword close; we 'll cut his throat a new way.

I am asham'd the gentlewoman should suffer

Such base lewd wrongs.

De Gard. I will be rul'd; he shall live, <sup>16</sup>

Lug.

Ay, ay, I'll fit him.

He makes a common scorn of handsome women; Modesty and good manners are his May-games; He takes up maidenheads with a new commission, —

The church-warrant 's out of date. Follow my counsel, <sup>20</sup>

For I am zealous in the cause.

De Gard. I will, sir,

And will be still directed; for the truth is,

My sword will make my sister seem more monstrous.

Besides, there is no honour won on reprobates.

Lug. You are i' th' right. The slight he has show'd my pupils <sup>25</sup>

Sets me a-fire too. Go; I'll prepare your sister.

And as I told ye —

De Gard. Yes; all shall be fit, sir.

Lug. And seriously, and handsomely.

De Gard. I warrant ye,

Lug. A little counsel more. [Whispers.]

De Gard. 'T is well.

Lug. Most stately;

See that observ'd; and then —

De Gard. I have ye every way. <sup>30</sup>

Lug. A way, then, and be ready.

De Gard. With all speed, sir. Exit.

Enter LILLIA BIANCA, ROSALURA, and ORIANA.

Lug. We 'll learn to travel too, may be, beyond him. —

Good day, fair beauties!

Lil. You have beautified us,

We thank ye, sir; ye have set us off most gallantly

With your grave precepts.

Ros. We expected husbands <sup>35</sup>

Out of your documents <sup>1</sup> and taught behaviours,

Excellent husbands; thought men would run

stark mad on us,

Men of all ages and all states; we expected

An inundation of desires and offers,

A torrent of trim suitors; all we did, <sup>40</sup>

Or said, or purpos'd, to be spells about us,

Spells to provoke.

Lil. Ye have provok'd us finely!

We follow'd your directions, we did rarely,

We were stately, coy, demure, careless, light,

giddy,

And play'd at all points: this, you swore,

would carry. <sup>46</sup>

Ros. We made love, and contemn'd love;

now seem'd holy,

With such a reverent put-on reservation

Which could not miss, according to your principles;

Now gave more hope again; now close, <sup>2</sup> now

public,

Still up and down we beat it like a billow; <sup>50</sup>

And ever those behaviours you read to us,

Subtle and new: but all this will not help us.

Lil. They help to hinder us of all acquaintance,

They have frighted off all friends. What am I

<sup>2</sup> Private.

For all my learning, if I love a dunce, 65
A handsome dunce? To what use serves my reading?

You should have taught me what belongs to horses,

Dogs, dice, hawks, banquets, masques, free and fair meetings,

To have studied gowns and dressings.

Lug. Ye are not mad, sure!

Ros. We shall be, if we follow your encouragements. 60

I'll take mine own way now.

Lil. And I my fortune;
We may live maids else till the moon drop millstones.

I see, your modest women are taken for monsters;

A dowry of good breeding is worth nothing.

Lug. Since ye take it so to th' heart, pray ye, give me leave yet. 65

And ye shall see how I'll convert this heretic.
Mark how this Mirabel —

Lil. Name him no more;
For, though I long for a husband, I hate him,

And would be married sooner to a monkey,
Or to a Jack of Straw, than such a juggler. 70

Ros. I am of that mind too. He is too nimble,
And plays at fast and loose too learnedly,

For a plain-meaning woman; that's the truth on 't.

Here's one too, that we love well, would be angry;

And reason why. — No, no, we will not trouble ye. 75

Nor him at this time: may he make you happy!
We'll turn ourselves loose now to our fair fortunes;

And the downright way —

Lil. The winning way we'll follow;
We'll bait that men may bite fair, and not be frightened.

Yet we'll not be carried so cheap neither; we'll have some sport, 80

Some mad-morris or other for our money, tutor.

Lug. 'T is like enough: prosper your own devices!

Ye are old enough to choose. But, for this gentlewoman,

So please her give me leave —

Ori. I shall be glad, sir.
To find a friend whose pity may direct me. 85

Lug. I'll do my best, and faithfully deal for ye;

But then ye must be rul'd.

Ori. In all, I vow to ye.
Ros. Do, do: he has a lucky hand sometimes,

I'll assure ye,
And hunts the recovery of a lost lover deadly.

Lug. You must away straight.

Ori. Yes.

Lug. And I'll instruct ye: 90
Here ye can know no more.

Ori. By your leave, sweet ladies;
And all our fortunes arrive at our own wishes!

Lil. Amen, amen!

Lug. I must borrow your man.

Lil. Pray, take him;

He is within. To do her good, take any thing.
Take us and all.

Lug. No doubt, ye may find takers; 95
And so, we'll leave ye to your own disposes.

Exeunt [LUGIER and ORLIANA].

Lil. Now, which way, wench?

Ros. We'll go a brave way, fear not;
A safe and sure way too; and yet a by-way.

I must confess I have a great mind to be married,

Lil. So have I too a grudging<sup>1</sup> of good-will that way, 100

And would as fain be despatch'd. But this Monsieur Quicksilver —

Ros. No, no; we'll bar him, bye and main.<sup>2</sup>
Let him trample;

There is no safety in his surquedry.<sup>3</sup>

An army-royal of women are too few for him;
He keeps a journal of his gentleness, 105

And will go near to print his fair despatches,
And call it his "Triumph over time and women."

Let him pass out of memory! What think you
Of his two companions?

Lil. Pinac, methinks, is reasonable;
A little modesty he has brought home with him, 110

And might be taught, in time, some handsome duty.

Ros. They say, he is a wencher too.

Lil. I like him better;
A free light touch or two becomes a gentleman.

And sets him seemly off: so he exceed not,
But keep his compass<sup>4</sup> clear, he may be lookt at. 116

I would not marry a man that must be taught,
And conjur'd up with kisses; the best game

Is play'd still by the best gamesters.

Ros. Fie upon thee!
What talk hast thou!

Lil. Are not we alone, and merry?
Why should we be ashamed to speak what we think? Thy gentleman, 120

The tall fat fellow, he that came to see thee —

Ros. Is 't not a goodly man?

Lil. A wondrous goodly!
H'as weight enough, I warrant thee. Mercy upon me,

What a serpent wilt thou seem under such a St. George!

Ros. Thou art a fool! Give me a man brings mettle, 125

Brings substance with him, needs no broths to lare<sup>6</sup> him.

These little fellows shew like fleas in boxes,
Hop up and down, and keep a stir to vex us.

Give me the puissant pike; take you the small shot. 130

Lil. Of a great thing, I have not seen a duller;
Therefore, methinks, sweet sister —

Ros. Peace, he's modest;
A bashfulness; which is a point of grace, wench:

But, when these fellows come to moulding,
sister,
 To heat, and handling — As I live, I like him ;

Enter MIRABEL.

And, methinks, I could form him.

Lil. Peace; the fire-drake. 135

Mir. Bless ye, sweet beauties, sweet incomparable ladies,

Sweet wits, sweet humours ! Bless you, learned lady !

And you, most holy nun, bless your devotions !

Lil. And bless your brains, sir, your most pregnant brains, sir !

They are in travail ; may they be delivered 140
 Of a most hopeful wild-geese !

Ros. Bless your manhood !

They say ye are a gentleman of action,

A fair accomplish'd man, and a rare engineer.

You have a trick to blow up maidenheads,

A subtle trick, they say abroad.

Mir. I have, lady. 145

Ros. And often glory in their ruins.

Mir. Yes, forsooth ;

I have a speedy trick, please you to try it ;

My engine will despatch you instantly.

Ros. I would I were a woman, sir, fit for you !

As there be such, no doubt, may engine you too ; 150

May, with a counter-mine, blow up your valour :

But, in good faith, sir, we are both too honest ;

And, the plague is, we cannot be persuaded ;

For, look you, if we thought it were a glory

To be the last of all your lovely ladies — 155

Mir. Come, come, leave prating : this has spoil'd your market !

This pride and puffed-up heart will make ye fast, ladies,

Fast when ye are hungry too.

Ros. The more our pain, sir.

Lil. The more our health, I hope too.

Mir. Your behaviours

Have made men stand amaz'd ; those men that lov'd ye, 160

Men of fair states<sup>1</sup> and parts. Your strange conversions<sup>2</sup>

Into I know not what, nor how, nor wherefore ;

Your scorns of those that came to visit ye ;

Your studied whim-whams and your fine set faces —

What have these got ye ? Proud and harsh opinions. 165

A travell'd monsieur was the strangest creature,

The wildest monster to be wond'ring at ;

His person made a public scoff, his knowledge

(As if he had been bred 'mongst bears or band-dogs)<sup>3</sup>

Shunn'd and avoided ; his conversation snuff'd at ;<sup>4</sup> 170

What harvest brings all this ?

Ros. I pray you, proceed, sir.

Mir. Now ye shall see in what esteem a traveller,

An understanding gentleman, and a monsieur,
 Is to be held ; and, to your griefs, confess it,
 Both to your griefs and galls,

Lil. In what, I pray ye, sir ? 175
 We would be glad to understand your excellence.

Mir. Go on, sweet ladies ; it becomes ye rarely !

For me, I have blest me from ye ; scoff on seriously,

And note the man ye mock'd. You, Lady Learning, 179

Note the poor traveller that came to visit you,
 That flat unfurnish'd fellow ; note him thoroughly ;

 You may chance to see him anon.

Lil. 'Tis very likely.

Mir. And see him courted by a travell'd lady,
 Held dear and honour'd by a virtuous virgin ;

May be, a beauty not far short of yours neither ;
 It may be, clearer.

Lil. Not unlikely.

Mir. Younger : 185

As killing eyes as yours, a wit as poignant ;
 May be, a state, too, that may top<sup>5</sup> your fortune.

Inquire how she thinks of him, how she holds him ; 189

His good parts, in what precious price already ;
 Being a stranger to him, how she courts him ;

A stranger to his nation too, how she dotes on him.

Inquire of this ; be sick to know : curse, lady,
 And keep your chamber ; cry, and curse : a sweet one,

 A thousand in yearly land, well bred, well

friended, 195

Travell'd, and highly followed for her fashions.
Lil. Bless his good fortune, sir !

Mir. This scurvey fellow,
 I think they call his name Pinac, this serving-

man
 That brought ye venison, as I take it, madam,

Note but this scab : 'tis strange that this coarse creature, 200

That has no more set-off but his jugglings,
 His travell'd tricks —

Lil. Good sir, I grieve not at him,
 Nor envy not his fortune : yet I wonder.

He's handsome ; yet I see no such perfection.

Mir. Would I had his fortune ! For 'tis a woman 205

Of that sweet-temper'd nature, and that judgment,

Besides her state, that care, clear understanding,

And such a wife to bless him —

Ros. Pray you, whence is she ?

Mir. Of England, and a most accomplish'd lady ; 209

So modest that men's eyes are frighted at her,
 And such a noble carriage —

Enter a Boy.

How now, sirrah ?

Boy. Sir, the great English lady —

Mir. What of her, sir ?

<sup>4</sup> Treated contemptuously.

Boy. Has newly left her coach, and coming this way,
Where you may see her plain : Monsieur Pinac
The only man that leads her.

Enter PINAC, MARIANA, and Attendants.

Mir. He is much honoured ; <sup>215</sup>
Would I had such a favour ! [Exit Boy.]
Now vex, ladies,

Envy, and vex, and rail !

Ros. You are short of us, sir.

Mir. Bless your fair fortune, sir !

Pin. I nobly thank ye.

Mir. Is she married, friend ?

Pin. No, no.

Mir. A goodly lady ;

A sweet and delicate aspect ! — Mark, mark, and wonder ! — <sup>220</sup>

Hast thou any hope of her ?

Pin. A little.

Mir. Follow close, then ;
Lose not that hope.

Pin. To you, sir.

[MARIANA courtesies to MIRABEL.]

Mir. Gentle lady !

Ros. She is fair, indeed.

Lil. I have seen a fairer ; yet

She is well.

Ros. Her clothes sit handsome too.

Lil. She dresses prettily.

Ros. And, by my faith, she is rich ; she looks still sweeter. <sup>225</sup>

A well-bred woman, I warrant her.

Lil. Do you hear, sir ?

May I crave this gentlewoman's name ?

Pin. Mariana, lady.

Lil. I will not say I owe ye a quarrel, monsieur,

For making me your stale : <sup>1</sup> a noble gentleman
Would have had more courtesy, at least more faith, <sup>230</sup>

Than to turn off his mistress at first trial.

You know not what respect I might have show'd ye ;

I find ye have worth.

Pin. I cannot stay to answer ye ;

Ye see my charge. I am beholding to ye

For all your merry tricks ye put upon me, <sup>235</sup>

Your bobs, <sup>2</sup> and base accounts. I came to love
ye,

To woo ye, and to serve ye ; I am much indebted to ye

For dancing me off my legs, and then for walking me ;

For telling me strange tales I never heard of,
More to abuse me ; for mistaking me, <sup>240</sup>

When you both knew I was a gentleman,

And one deserv'd as rich a match as you are.

Lil. Be not so bitter, sir.

Pin. You see this lady :
She is young enough and fair enough to please
me ;

A woman of a loving mind, a quiet, <sup>245</sup>

And one that weighs the worth of him that loves her :

I am content with this, and bless my fortune.

Your curious wits, and beauties —

Lil. Faith, see me once more.

Pin. I dare not trouble ye.

Lil. May I speak to your lady ?

Pin. I pray ye, content yourself. I know ye are bitter, <sup>250</sup>

And, in your bitterness, ye may abuse her ;
Which if she comes to know (for she understands ye not),

It may breed such a quarrel to your kindred,
And such an indiscretion fling on you too

(For she is nobly friended) —

Lil. [Aside.] I could eat her. <sup>255</sup>

Pin. Rest as ye are, a modest noble gentle-
woman,

And afford your honest neighbours some of your prayers.

Exeunt [PINAC, MARIANA, and Attendants].

Mir. What think you now ?

Lil. Faith, she 's a pretty whiting ; <sup>3</sup>
She has got a pretty catch too.

Mir. You are angry,
Monstrous angry now, grievously angry ; <sup>260</sup>
And the pretty heart does swell now.

Lil. No, in troth, sir.

Mir. And it will cry anon, " A pox upon it !"
And it will curse itself, and eat no meat, lady ;

And it will sigh. <sup>4</sup>

Lil. Indeed, you are mistaken ;

It will be very merry.

Ros. Why, sir, do you think <sup>265</sup>

There are no more men living, nor no handsomer,

Than he or you ? By this light, there be ten thousand,

Ten thousand thousand ! Comfort yourself,
dear monsieur ;

Faces, and bodies, wits, and all abilitments <sup>5</sup> —
There are so many we regard 'em not. <sup>270</sup>

Enter BELLEUR and two Gentlemen.

Mir. That such a noble lady — I could burst
now ! —

So far above such trifles —

Bel. You did laugh at me ;
And I know why ye laughed.

1 Gent. I pray ye, be satisfied :
If we did laugh, we had some private reason,

And not at you.

2 Gent. Alas, we know you not, sir ! <sup>275</sup>

Bel. I 'll make you know me. Set your faces soberly ;

Stand this way, and look sad ; I 'll be no May-game ;

Sadder, demurer yet.

Ros. What is the matter ?

What ails this gentleman ?

Bel. Go off now backward, that I may behold ye ; <sup>280</sup>

And not a simpler, on your lives !

[Exeunt Gentlemen, walking backwards.]

Lil. He 's mad, sure.

Bel. Do you observe me too ?
Mir. I may look on ye.
Bel. Why do you grin ? I know your mind.
Mir. You do not.
 You are strangely humorous. Is there no mirth nor pleasure
 But you must be the object ? 285
Bel. Mark, and observe me. Wherever I am nam'd,
 The very word shall raise a general sadness,
 For the disgrace this scurvy woman did me,
 This proud pert thing. Take heed ye laugh not at me,
 Provoke me not ; take heed.
Ros. I would fain please ye ; 290
 Do any thing to keep ye quiet.
Bel. Hear me.
 Till I receive a satisfaction
 Equal to the disgrace and scorn ye gave me,
 Ye are a wretched woman ; till thou woo'st me,
 And I scorn thee as much, as seriously 295
 Jeer and abuse thee ; ask what gill<sup>1</sup> thou art,
 Or any baser name ; I will proclaim thee,
 I will so sing thy virtue, so be-paint thee —
Ros. Nay, good sir, be more modest.
Bel. Do you laugh again ? —
 Because ye are a woman, ye are lawless, 300
 And out of compass of an honest anger.
Ros. Good sir, have a better belief of me.
Lil. Away, dear sister !
Exit [with ROSALURA].
Mir. Is not this better now, this seeming madness,
 Than falling out with your friends ?
Bel. Have I not frighted her ?
Mir. Into her right wits, I warrant thee.
 Follow this humour, 305
 And thou shalt see how prosperously 't will guide thee.
Bel. I am glad I have found a way to woo
 yet ; I was afraid once
 I never should have made a civil suitor.
 Well, I 'll about it still. Exit.
Mir. Do, do, and prosper.
 What sport do I make with these fools ! What pleasure 310
 Feeds me, and fats my sides at their poor innocence !
Enter LUGIER, [disguised.]
 Wooing and wiving — hang it ! Give me mirth, Witty and dainty mirth ! I shall grow in love,
 sure,
 With mine own happy head.
 Who's this ? — To me, sir ? —
 [Aside.] What youth is this ?
Lug. Yes, sir, I would speak with you, 315
 If your name be Monsieur Mirabel.
Mir. You have hit it :
 Your business, I beseech you ?
Lug. This it is, sir ;
 There is a gentlewoman hath long time affected
 you,
 And lov'd you dearly.
Mir. Turn over, and end that story ;

<sup>1</sup> Wanton wench.

'T is long enough : I have no faith in women,
 sir. 320
Lug. It seems so, sir. I do not come to woo
 for her,
 Or sing her praises, though she well deserve
 'em ;
 I come to tell ye, ye have been cruel to her,
 Unkind and cruel, fals'er of faith, and careless,
 Taking more pleasure in abusing her, 325
 Wrestling her honour to your wild disposes,
 Than noble in requiting her affection :
 Which, as you are a man, I must desire ye (A gentleman of rank) not to persist in,
 No more to load her fair name with your injuries. 330
Mir. Why, I beseech you, sir ?
Lug. Good sir, I 'll tell ye.
 And I 'll be short ; I 'll tell ye because I love
 ye,
 Because I would have you shun the shame may follow.
 There is a nobleman, new come to town, sir,
 A noble and a great man, that affects her, 335
 (A countryman of mine, a brave Savoyan, Nephew to th' duke) and so much honours her,
 That 't will be dangerous to pursue your old
 way,
 To touch at any thing concerns her honour,
 Believe, most dangerous. Her name is Oriana,
 And this great man will marry her. Take heed,
 sir ; 341
 For howso'er her brother, a staid gentleman,
 Lets things pass upon better hopes, this lord, sir,
 Is of that fiery and that poignant metal,
 (Especially provok'd on by affection) 345
 That 't will be hard — but you are wise.
Mir. A lord, sir ?
Lug. Yes, and a noble lord.
Mir. Send her good fortune !
 This will not stir her lord. A baroness !
 Say ye so ? Say ye so ? By 'r lady, a brave title !
 Top and top-gallant now ! Save her great lady-
 ship ! 350
 I was a poor servant of hers, I must confess, sir,
 And in those days I thought I might be jovy,<sup>2</sup>
 And make a little bold to call in to her ;
 But, basta ;<sup>3</sup> now I know my rules and distance ;
 Yet, if she want an usher, such an implement,
 One that is thoroughly pac'd, a clean-made
 gentleman, 355
 Can hold a hanging up with approbation,
 Plant his hat formally, and wait with patience,
 I do beseech you, sir —
Lug. Sir, leave your scoffing,
 And, as ye are a gentleman, deal fairly. 360
 I have given ye a friend's counsel ; so, I 'll leave
 ye.
Mir. But, hark ye, hark ye, sir ; is 't possible
 I may believe what you say ?
Lug. You may choose, sir.
Mir. No baits, no fish-hooks, sir ? No gins ?
 no nooses ?
 No pitfalls to catch puppies ?
Lug. I tell ye certain : 365

<sup>3</sup> Ital. "enough."

You may believe; if not, stand to the danger!

Exit.

Mir. A lord of Savoy, says he? The duke's nephew?

A man so mighty? By lady, a fair marriage!
By my faith, a handsome fortune! I must leave prating:

For, to confess the truth, I have abus'd her, <sup>370</sup>
For which I should be sorry, but that will seem scurvy.

I must confess she was, ever since I knew her,
As modest as she was fair; I am sure she lov'd me;

Her means good, and her breeding excellent;
And for my sake she has refus'd fair matches.
I may play the fool finely. — Stay: who are these? <sup>378</sup>

Re-enter DE GARD with ORIANA, [both of them disguised, and in rich dresses;] and Attendants.

[Aside.] 'T is she, I am sure; and that the lord, it should seem.

He carries a fair port, is a handsome man too.
I do begin to feel I am a coxcomb.<sup>1</sup>

Ori. Good my lord, choose a nobler; for I know <sup>380</sup>

I am so far below your rank and honour,
That what ye can say this way I must credit
But spoken to beget yourself sport. Alas, sir,
I am so far off from deserving you,

My beauty so unfit for your affection, <sup>385</sup>
That I am grown the scorn of common railers,
Of such injurious things that, when they cannot Reach at my person, lie with my reputation!
I am poor, besides.

De Gard. Ye are all wealth and goodness;
And none but such as are the scum of men, <sup>390</sup>
The ulcers of an honest state, spite-weavers,
That live on poison only, like swoln spiders,
Dare once profane such excellence, such sweetness.

Mir. This man speaks loud indeed.

De Gard. Name but the men, lady:
Let me but know these poor and base depravers,
Lay but to my revenge their persons open, <sup>395</sup>
And you shall see how suddenly, how fully,
For your most beautiful sake, how direfully,
I'll handle their despites. Is this thing one?
Be what he will —

Mir. Sir? <sup>400</sup>

De Gard. Dare your malicious tongue, sir —

Mir. I know you not, nor what ye mean.

Ori. Good my lord —

De Gard. If he, or any he —

Ori. I beseech your honour —

This gentleman's a stranger to my knowledge;
And, no doubt, sir, a worthy man.

De Gard. Your mercy! — <sup>405</sup>

But, had he been a taint of your honour,
A blaster of those beauties reign within ye —

But we shall find a fitter time. Dear lady,
As soon as I have freed ye from your guardian,
And done some honour'd offices unto ye, <sup>410</sup>

I'll take ye with those faults the world flings
on ye,

<sup>1</sup> Fool.

And dearer than the whole world I'll esteem ye! Exit [with ORIANA and Attendants].

Mir. This is a thund'ring lord: I am glad I scap'd him.

How lovingly the wench disclaim'd my villany!
I am vex'd now heartily that he shall have her; <sup>415</sup>

Not that I care to marry, or to lose her,
But that this bilbo-lord<sup>2</sup> shall reap that maidenhead

That was my due; that he shall rig and top
her:

I'd give a thousand crowns now, he might miss
her.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Nay, if I bear your blows, and keep your counsel, <sup>420</sup>

You have good luck, sir: I teach ye to strike lighter.

Mir. Come hither, honest fellow: canst thou
tell me

Where this great lord lies, this Savoy lord?
Thou mett'st him;

He now went by thee, certain.

Serv. Yes, he did, sir;
I know him, and I know you are fool'd.

Mir. Come hither: <sup>425</sup>
Here's all this, give me truth. [Gives money.]

Serv. Not for your money,
(And yet that may do much) but I have been beaten,

And by the worshipful contrivers beaten, and I'll tell ye:

This is no lord, no Savoy lord.

Mir. Go forward.

Serv. This is a trick, and put upon you grossly <sup>430</sup>

By one Lugier. The lord is Monsieur De Gard,
sir,

An honest gentleman, and a neighbour here;
Their ends you understand better than I, sure.

Mir. Now I know him; know him now plain.

Serv. I have discharg'd my colours,<sup>3</sup> so God
b'y ye, sir! Exit.

Mir. What a purblind puppy was I. Now I remember him; <sup>435</sup>

All the whole cast on 's face, though it were umber'd,<sup>4</sup>

And mask'd with patches. What a dunderwhelp,<sup>5</sup>

To let him domineer thus! How he strutted,
And what a load of lord he clapt upon him! <sup>440</sup>

Would I had him here again! I would so bounce him,

I would so thank his lordship for his lewd<sup>6</sup> plot!

Do they think to carry it away, with a great band made of bird-pots,<sup>7</sup>

And a pair of pin-buttock'd breeches? — Ha!
't is he again;

He comes, he comes, he comes! have at him! <sup>445</sup>

Re-enter DE GARD, ORIANA, [both disguised as before and Attendants.]

[MIRABEL sings.]

My Savoy lord, why dost thou frown on me ?
And will that favour never sweeter be ?
Wilt thou, I say, for ever play the fool ?
De Gard, be wise, and, Savoy, go to school !
My lord De Gard, I thank you for your antic ; 450
My lady bright, that will be sometimes frantic ;
You worthy train, that wait upon this pair,
Send you more wit, and them a bouncing bair ? 2

And so I take my humble leave of your honours !

Exit.
De Gard. We are discover'd ; there's no 455 remedy.

Lillia Bianca's man, upon my life,
In stubbornness, because Lugier corrected
him —

A shameless slave ! Plague on him for a rascal !
Ori. I was in a perfect hope. The bane on 't is now,

He will make mirth on mirth, to persecute us.
De Gard. We must be patient ; I am vex'd to the proof too. 461

I'll try once more ; then, if I fail, here's one speaks. [Puts his hand on his sword.]

Ori. Let me be lost and scorn'd first !

De Gard. Well, we'll consider.
Away, and let me shift ; I shall be hooted else. 462
Exeunt.

ACT IV

SCENE I.<sup>3</sup>

Enter LUGIER, LILLIA BIANCA, and Servant
[carrying a willow garland].

Lug. Faint not, but do as I direct ye : trust
me ;

Believe me too ; for what I have told ye, lady,
As true as you are Lillia, is authentic ;
I know it, I have found it : 't is a poor courage
Flies off for one repulse. These travellers 465 Shall find, before we have done, a home-spun wit,

A plain French understanding, may cope with
'em.

They have had the better yet, thank your sweet squire here !

And let 'em brag. You would be reveng'd ?

Lil. Yes, surely.

Lug. And married too ?

Lil. I think so.

Lug. Then be counsell'd ; 470

You know how to proceed. I have other irons
Heating as well as yours, and I will strike Three blows with one stone home. Be rul'd, and happy ;

And so, I leave ye. Now is the time.

Lil. I am ready.

If he do come to dor<sup>4</sup> me. [Exit LUGIER.]

Serv. Will ye stand here, 475

And let the people think ye are God knows what, mistress ?

Let boys and prentices presume upon ye ?

Lil. Prithee, hold thy peace.

Serv. Stand at his door that hates ye ?

Lil. Prithee, leave prating.

Serv. Pray ye, go to the tavern : I'll give ye a pint of wine there.

If any of the mad-cap gentlemen should come
by, 480

That take up women upon special warrant,
You were in a wise case now.

Enter MIRABEL, PINAC, MARIANA, Priest,
and Attendants.

Lil. Give me the garland ;
And wait you here.

[Takes the garland from Servant,
who retires.]

Mir. She is here to seek thee, sirrah.
I told thee what would follow ; she is mad for
thee.

Show, and advance. — So early stirring,
lady ? 485

It shows a busy mind, a fancy troubled.

A willow garland too ? Is 't possible ?

'T is pity so much beauty should lie musty ;

But 't is not to be help'd now.

Lil. The more 's my misery. —

Good fortune to ye, lady ! you deserve it ; 490

To me, too-late repentance ! I have sought it.

I do not envy, though I grieve a little,

You are mistress of that happiness, those joys,

That might have been, had I been wise — but
fortune —

Pin. She understands ye not ; pray ye, do not trouble her : 495

And do not cross me like a hare thus ; 't is as ominous.

Lil. I come not to upbraid your levity (Though ye made show of love, and though I lik'd ye),

To claim an interest (we are yet both strangers ;
But what we might have been, had you per-sever'd, sir !)

To be an eye-sore to your loving lady : 498

This garland shows I give myself forsaken (Yet, she must pardon me, 't is most unwill-ingly) ;

And all the power and interest I had in ye (As, I persuade myself, somewhat ye lov'd
me) 500

Thus patiently I render up, I offer
To her that must enjoy ye, and so bless ye ;

Only, I heartily desire this courtesy,
And would not be deni'd, to wait upon ye

This day, to see ye tied, then no more trouble
ye. 505

Pin. It needs not, lady.

Lil. Good sir, grant me so much.

Pin. 'T is private, and we make no invitation.

Lil. My presence, sir, shall not proclaim it
public.

Pin. May be, 't is not in town.

Lil. I have a coach, sir,
And a most ready will to do you service. 510

<sup>4</sup> Mock. So Sympson. Ft. do.

Mir. [Aside to PINAC.] Strike now or never ;
make it sure : I tell thee,
She will hang herself, if she have thee not.

Pin. Pray ye, sir, Entertain my noble mistress : only a word or
two
With this importunate woman, and I'll relieve
ye. —

Now ye see what your flings are, and your fancies,
Your states, and your wild stubbornness ; now ye find

What 't is to gird<sup>1</sup> and kick at men's fair services,
To raise your pride to such a pitch and glory
That goodness shows like gnats, scorn'd under
ye.

'T is ugly, naught ; a self-will in a woman,
Chain'd to an overweening thought, is pestilent,
Murders fair fortune first, then fair opinion.<sup>2</sup>
There stands a pattern, a true patient pattern,
Humble and sweet.

Lil. I can but grieve my ignorance. <sup>70</sup>
Repentance, some say too, is the best sacrifice ;
For, sure, sir, if my chance had been so happy
(As I confess I was mine own destroyer)
As to have arriv'd at you, I will not prophesy,
But certain, as I think, I should have pleas'd
ye ;

Have made ye as much wonder at my courtesy,
My love, and duty, as I have dishearten'd ye.
Some hours we have of youth, and some of
folly ;

And being free-born maids, we take a liberty,
And, to maintain that, sometimes we strain highly.

Pin. Now you talk reason.
Lil. But, being yok'd and govern'd, Married, and those light vanities purg'd from
us,

How fair we grow, how gentle, and how tender !
We twine about those loves that shoot up with
us !

A sullen woman fear, that talks not to ye ;
She has a sad and darken'd soul, loves dully.

A merry and a free wench, give her liberty, Believe her, in the lightest form she appears to
ye,

Believe her excellent, though she despise ye ;
Let but these fits and flashes pass, she will show to ye

As jewels rubb'd from dust, or gold new burnish'd :

Such had I been, had you believ'd.

Pin. Is 't possible ?
Lil. And to your happiness, I dare assure ye,
If true love be accounted so : your pleasure,
Your will, and your command, had tied my motions :

But that hope's gone. I know you are young and giddy,

And, till you have a wife can govern with ye,
You sail upon this world's sea light and empty,
Your bark in danger daily. 'T is not the name neither

Of wife can steer you, but the noble nature, <sup>100</sup>
The diligence, the care, the love, the patience :
She makes the pilot, and preserves the husband,

That knows and reckons every rib he is built
on.

But this I tell ye, to my shame.
Pin. I admire ye ;
And now am sorry that I aim beyond ye. <sup>105</sup>

Mir. [Aside.] So, so, so : fair and softly ! She is thine own, boy ;
She comes now without lure.

Pin. But that it must needs
Be reckon'd to me as a wantonness,
Or worse, a madness, to forsake a blessing,
A blessing of that hope —

Lil. I dare not urge ye ; <sup>110</sup>
And yet, dear sir —

Pin. 'T is most certain, I had rather,
If 't were in mine own choice — for you are my country-woman,

A neighbour here, born by me ; she a stranger,
And who knows how her friends —

Lil. Do as you please, sir ;
If ye be fast, not all the world — I love ye. <sup>115</sup>
It is most true, and clear I would persuade ye ;
And I shall love ye still.

Pin. Go, get before me —
So much ye have won upon me — do it presently.

Here 's a priest ready — I'll have you.
Lil. Not now, sir ; <sup>120</sup>

No, you shall pardon me. Advance your lady ;
I dare not hinder your most high preferment :
'T is honour enough for me I have unmask'd
you.

Pin. How 's that ?
Lil. I have caught ye, sir. Alas, I am no stateswoman,

Nor no great traveller, yet I have found ye ; <sup>125</sup>
I have found your lady too, your beauteous
lady ;

I have found her birth and breeding too, her discipline,

Who brought her over, and who kept your
lady,

And, when he laid her by, what virtuous nunnery

Receiv'd her in : I have found all these. Are ye blank now ? <sup>130</sup>

Methinks, such travell'd wisdoms should not fool thus, —
Such excellent indiscretions !

Mir. How could she know this ?
Lil. 'T is true she 's English-born ; but most part French now,

And so I hope you 'll find her to your comfort.
Alas, I am ignorant of what she cost ye ! <sup>135</sup>
The price of these hired clothes I do not know,
gentlemen !

Those jewels are the broker's, how ye stand bound for 'em !

Pin. Will you make this good ?
Lil. Yes, yes ; and to her face, sir,

That she is an English whore, a kind of flingdust, <sup>139</sup>

One of your London light-o'-loves, a right one ;

<sup>2</sup> Reputation.

Came over in thin pumps and half a petticoat,
One faith, and one smock, with a broken haberdasher —

I know all this without a conjurer.

Her name is Jumping Joan, an ancient sin-weaver;

She was first a lady's chambermaid, there slipp'd,

And broke her leg above the knee; departed,
And set up shop herself; stood the fierce conflicts

Of many a furious term; <sup>145</sup> there lost her colours,

And last slipp'd over hither.

Mir. We are betray'd!

Lil. Do you come to fright me with this mystery? <sup>160</sup>

To stir me with a stink none can endure, sir?

I pray ye, proceed; the wedding will become ye:

Who gives the lady? You? An excellent father!

A careful man, and one that knows a beauty!

Send ye fair shipping, sir! and so, I'll leave ye. <sup>165</sup>

Be wise and manly; then I may chance to love ye!

Exit [with Servant].

Mir. As I live, I am asham'd this wench has reach'd me,

Monstrous asham'd; but there's no remedy.
This skew'd-ey'd carrion —

Pin. This I suspected ever. —

Come, come, uncase; we have no more use of ye; <sup>160</sup>

Your clothes must back again.

Mari. Sir, you shall pardon me; 'T is not our English use to be degraded.

If you will visit me, and take your venture,
You shall have pleasure for your properties.

And so, sweetheart — [Exit.] <sup>165</sup>

Mir. Let her go, and the devil go with her!
We have never better luck with these pre-ludiums.

Come, be not daunted; think she is but a woman,

And, let her have the devil's wit, we'll reach her!

Exit.

SCENE II.<sup>2</sup>

Enter ROSALURA and LUGIER.

Ros. You have now redeem'd my good opinion, tutor,

And ye stand fair again.

Lug. I can but labour,

And sweat in your affairs. I am sure Belleur
Will be here instantly, and use his anger,
His wonted harshness.

Ros. I hope he will not beat me. <sup>5</sup>

Lug. No, sure, he has more manners. Be you ready.

Ros. Yes, yes, I am; and am resolv'd to fit him,

With patience to outdo all he can offer.

But how does Oriana?

<sup>2</sup> A public walk.

Lug. Worse and worse still;
There is a sad house for her; she is now, <sup>10</sup>
Poor lady, utterly distracted.

Ros. Pity,
Infinite pity! 't is a handsome lady:

That Mirabel's a beast, worse than a monster,
If this affliction work not.

Enter LILLIA BIANCA.

Lil. Are you ready?
Belleur is coming on here, hard behind me: <sup>15</sup>

I have no leisure to relate my fortune;

Only I wish you may come off as handsomely.
Upon the sign, you know what.

Ros. Well, well; leave me.
Exeunt [LILLIA BIANCA and LUGIER].

Enter BELLEUR.

Bel. How now?

Ros. Ye are welcome, sir.
Bel. 'T is well ye have manners.

That court'sy again, and hold your countenance
staidly. <sup>20</sup>

That look's too light; take heed: so; sit ye down now;

And, to confirm me that your gall is gone,
Your bitterness dispers'd (for so I'll have it),

Look on me stedfastly, and, whatsoever I say to ye,

Move not, nor alter in your face; ye are gone,
then; <sup>25</sup>

For, if you do express the least distaste,
Or show an angry wrinkle, (mark me, woman!

We are now alone,) I will so conjure thee,
The third part of my execution

Cannot be spoke.

Ros. I am at your dispose, sir. <sup>30</sup>

Bel. Now rise, and woo me a little; let me hear that faculty:

But touch me not; nor do not lie, I charge
ye.

Begin now.

Ros. If so mean and poor a beauty
May ever hope the grace —

Bel. Ye cog,<sup>3</sup> ye flatter;
Like a lewd<sup>4</sup> thing, ye lie: "May hope that grace!" <sup>35</sup>

Why, what grace canst thou hope for? Answer
not;

For, if thou dost, and liest again, I'll swinge
thee.

Do not I know thee for a pestilent woman?
A proud at both ends? Be not angry,

Nor stir not, o' your life.

Ros. I am counsell'd, sir. <sup>40</sup>

Bel. Art thou not now (confess, for I'll have the truth out)

As much unworthy of a man of merit,
Or any of ye all, nay, of mere man,

Though he were crooked, cold, all wants upon
him,

Nay, of any dishonest thing that bears that figure, <sup>45</sup>

As devils are of mercy?

Ros. We are unworthy.

Bel. Stick to that truth, and it may chance to save thee.
And is it not our bounty that we take ye?
That we are troubled, vex'd, or tortur'd with ye,
Our mere and special bounty?

Ros. Yes.
Bel. Our pity, so
That for your wickedness we swinge ye soundly;
Your stubbornness and stout hearts, we belabour ye?
Answer to that!

Ros. I do confess your pity.
Bel. And dost not thou deserve in thine own person,
Thou impudent, thou pert—Do not change countenance.

Ros. I dare not, sir.
Bel. For, if you do—
Ros. I am settled.
Bel. Thou wagtail, peacock, puppy, look on me:

I am a gentleman.
Ros. It seems no less, sir,
Bel. And dar'st thou in thy surquedry! —
Ros. I beseech you! —
It was my weakness, sir, I did not view ye,
I took not notice of your noble parts,
Nor call'd your person nor your fashion proper.<sup>2</sup>

Bel. This is some amends yet.
Ros. I shall mend, sir, daily,
And study to deserve.
Bel. Come a little nearer:
Canst thou repent thy villany?

Ros. Most seriously.<sup>65</sup>
Bel. And be asham'd?
Ros. I am asham'd.
Bel. Cry.
Ros. It will be hard to do, sir.
Bel. Cry now instantly;

Cry monstrously, that all the town may hear thee;
Cry seriously, as if thou hadst lost thy monkey;
And, as I like thy tears—

Enter LILLIA BIANCA, and four Women, laughing.

Ros. Now! [To those within.]
Bel. How! how! Do ye jeer me?<sup>70</sup>
Have ye broke your bounds again, dame?
Ros. Yes, and laugh at ye,
And laugh most heartily.

Bel. What are these? whirlwinds?
Is hell broke loose, and all the Furies flutter'd?
Am I greas'd<sup>3</sup> once again?
Ros. Yes, indeed are ye;
And once again ye shall be, if ye quarrel:<sup>75</sup>
Do you come to vent your fury on a virgin?
Is this your manhood, sir?

1 Wom. Let him do his best;
Let's see the utmost of his indignation;
I long to see him angry.—Come, proceed, sir.—
[The women display knives.]

Hang him, he dares not stir; a man of timber!
2 Wom. Come hither to fright maids with thy bull-faces!<sup>81</sup>

To threaten gentlewomen! Thou a man! A Mappole,
A great dry pudding.

[3 Wom. Come, come, do your worst, sir;
Be angry, if thou dar'st.

Bel. The Lord deliver me!
4 Wom. Do but look scurvily upon this lady,
Or give us one foul word!—We are all mistaken;
This is some mighty dairy-maid in man's clothes.

Lil. I am of that mind too.
Bel. [Aside.] What will they do to me?
Lil. And hired to come and abuse us.—A man has manners;

A gentleman, civility and breeding:—<sup>90</sup>
Some tinker's trull, with a beard glu'd on.
1 Wom. Let's search him,
And, as we find him—
Bel. Let me but depart from ye,
Sweet Christian women!

Lil. Hear the thing speak, neighbours.
Bel. 'Tis but a small request: if e'er I trouble ye,
If e'er I talk again of beating women,<sup>95</sup>
Or beating any thing that can but turn to me;
Of ever thinking of a handsome lady
But virtuously and well; of ever speaking
But to her honour,—this I'll promise ye,
I will take rhubarb, and purge cholera<sup>4</sup> mainly,<sup>5</sup>
Abundantly I'll purge.

Lil. I'll send ye broths, sir.<sup>100</sup>
Bel. I will be laugh'd at, and endure it patiently;
I will do any thing.
Ros. I'll be your bail, then.
When ye come next to woo, pray ye come not boisterously,
And furnish'd like a bear-ward.<sup>6</sup>

Bel. No, in truth, forsooth.<sup>105</sup>
Ros. I scented ye long since.
Bel. I was to blame, sure:
I will appear a gentleman.
Ros. 'Tis the best for ye,
For a true noble gentleman's a brave thing.
Upon that hope, we quit ye. You fear seriously?

Bel. Yes, truly do I; I confess I fear ye,<sup>110</sup>
And honour ye, and any thing.
Ros. Farewell, then.
Wom. And, when ye come to woo next, bring more mercy.

Exeunt [all except BELLEUR].
Enter two Gentlemen.
Bel. A dairy-maid! A tinker's trull! Heaven bless me!
Sure, if I had provok'd 'em, they had quarter'd me.
I am a most ridiculous ass, now I perceive it;
A coward, and a knave too.

1 Gent. 'Tis the mad gentleman; <sup>115</sup>
Let's set our faces right.

<sup>4</sup> Bile, the supposed cause of anger.
<sup>5</sup> Thoroughly.    <sup>6</sup> Bear-keeper.

Bel. No, no; laugh at me,
And laugh aloud.

2 Gent. We are better manner'd, sir.

Bel. I do deserve it; call me patch<sup>1</sup> and puppy,
And beat me, if you please.

1 Gent. No, indeed; we know ye. <sup>120</sup>

Bel. 'Death, do as I would have ye!

2 Gent. Ye are an ass, then,
A colcomb, and a calf!

Bel. I am a great calf.
Kick me a little now. Why, when! [They kick him.] Sufficient.

Now laugh aloud, and scorn me. So good b' ye!
And ever, when ye meet me, laugh.

Gentlemen. We will, sir. <sup>125</sup>

Exeunt [on one side, the two Gentlemen; on the other, BELLEUR].

SCENE III.<sup>2</sup>

Enter NANTOLET, LA CASTRE, DE GARD, LUGIER, and MIRABEL.

Mir. Your patience, gentlemen; why do ye bait me?

Nant. Is't not a shame you are so stubborn-hearted,

So stony and so dull, to such a lady,
Of her perfections and her misery?

Lug. Does she not love ye? Does not her distraction

For your sake only, her most pitied lunacy
Of all but you, show ye? Does it not compel ye?

Mir. Soft and fair, gentlemen; pray ye, proceed temperately.

Lug. If ye have any feeling, any sense in ye,
The least touch of a noble heart — <sup>10</sup>

La Cast. Let him alone:

It is his glory that he can kill beauty. —
Ye bear my stamp, but not my tenderness;

Your wild unsavoury courses let<sup>3</sup> that in ye!
For shame, be sorry, though ye cannot cure her;

Show something of a man, of a fair nature. <sup>16</sup>

Mir. Ye make me mad!

De Gard. Let me pronounce this to ye:

You take a strange felicity in slighting
And wronging women, which my poor sister feels now;

Heaven's hand be gentle on her! Mark me, sir;
That very hour she dies (there's small hope otherwise),

That minute, you and I must grapple for it;
Either your life or mine.

Mir. Be not so hot, sir;

I am not to be wrought on by these policies, <sup>25</sup>
In truth, I am not; nor do I fear the tricks,
Or the high-sounding threats, of a Savoyan.

I glory not in cruelty, (ye wrong me.)
Nor grow up water'd with the tears of women.

This let me tell ye, howsoever I show to ye, <sup>30</sup>
Wild, as you please to call it, or self-will'd,
When I see cause, I can both do and suffer,

Freely and feelingly, as a true gentleman.

<sup>2</sup> A hall in the house of La Castre.

Enter ROSALURA and LILLIA BIANCA.

Ros. Oh, pity, pity! thousand, thousand pities!

Lil. Alas, poor soul, she will die! She is grown senseless; <sup>35</sup>

She will not know nor speak now.

Ros. Die for love!
And love of such a youth! I would die for a dog

first:
He that kills me, I'll give him leave to eat me;
I'll know men better, ere I sigh for any of 'em.

Lil. You have done a worthy act, sir, a most famous; <sup>40</sup>

Ye have kill'd a maid the wrong way; ye are a conqueror.

Ros. A conqueror? A cobbler! Hang him, sowter! <sup>42</sup> —

Go hide thyself, for shame! Go lose thy memory!
Live not 'mongst men; thou art a beast, a monster,

A blatant beast!

Lil. If ye have yet any honesty, <sup>46</sup>
Or ever heard of any, take my counsel:

Off with your garters, and seek out a bough, —
A handsome bough, for I would have ye hang like a gentleman;

And write some doleful matter to the world,
A warning to hard-hearted men.

Mir. Out, kitlings! <sup>50</sup>
What caterwauling 's here! What gibbing! <sup>51</sup>
Do you think my heart is soft'ned with a black santis? <sup>52</sup>

Show me some reason.

Enter ORIANA on a bed.

Ros. Here then, here is a reason.
Nant. Now, if ye be a man, let this sight shake ye!

La Cast. Alas, poor gentlewoman! — Do ye know me, lady? <sup>55</sup>

Lug. How she looks up, and stares!

Ori. I know ye very well;
You are my godfather: and that's the monsieur.

De Gard. And who am I?

Ori. You are Amadis de Gaul, sir. —
Oh, oh, my heart! — Were you never in love, sweet lady?

And do you never dream of flowers and gar- dens? <sup>60</sup>

I dream of walking fires: take heed; it comes now.

Who's that? Pray, stand away. I have seen that face, sure. —

How light my head is!

Ros. Take some rest.

Ori. I cannot;
For I must be up to-morrow to go to church,
And I must dress me, put my new gown on,
And be as fine to meet my love! Heigh-ho! <sup>65</sup>

Will you not tell me where my love lies buried?

Mir. He is not dead. — [Aside.] Beshrew my heart, she stirs me!

<sup>6</sup> I. e. black-sanctus, a burlesque hymn accompanied by discordant noises.

Ori. He is dead to me.
Mir. [Aside.] Is 't possible my nature
 Should be so damnable to let her suffer? — 70
 Give me your hand.

Ori. How soft ye feel, how gentle!
 I'll tell you your fortune, friend.

Mir. How she stares on me!

Ori. You have a flattering face, but 'tis a fine one;

I warrant you may have a hundred sweethearts.
 Will ye pray for me? I shall die to-morrow; 75
 And will ye ring the bells?

Mir. I am most unworthy,
 I do confess, unhappy. Do you know me?

Ori. I would I did!

Mir. Oh, fair tears, how ye take me!

Ori. Do you weep too? You have not lost your lover?

You mock me: I'll go home and pray.

Mir. Pray ye, pardon me; 80
 Or, if it please ye to consider justly,

Scorn me, for I deserve it; scorn and shame
 me,

Sweet Oriana!

Lil. Let her alone; she trembles:
 Her fits will grow more strong, if ye provoke
 her.

La Cast. Certain she knows ye not, yet loves to see ye. 85

How she smiles now!

Enter BELLEUR.

Bel. Where are ye? Oh, why do not ye laugh? Come, laugh at me:

Why a devil art thou sad, and such a subject,
 Such a ridiculous subject, as I am,
 Before thy face?

Mir. Prithee, put off this lightness; 90
 This is no time for mirth, nor place; I have us'd too much on 't.

I have undone myself and a sweet lady
 By being too indulgent to my foolery,
 Which truly I repent. Look here.

Bel. What ails she?

Mir. Alas, she's mad!

Bel. Mad!

Mir. Yes, too sure; for me too. 95
Bel. Dost thou wonder at that? By this good light, they are all so;

They are coz'ning-mad, they are brawling-mad,
 they are proud-mad;

They are all, all mad. I came from a world of mad women,

Mad as March hares. Get 'em in chains, then deal with 'em.

There's one that's mad; she seems well, but she is dog-mad. 100

Is she dead, dost think?

Mir. Dead! Heaven forbid!

Bel. Heaven further it!
 For, till they be key-cold dead, there's no trusting of 'em:

Whate'er they seem, or howsoe'er they carry
 it,

Till they be chap-fallen, and their tongues at peace,

! Cast a spell on me.

Nail'd in their coffins sure, I'll ne'er believe
 'em. 105

Shall I talk with her?

Mir. No, dear friend, be quiet,
 And be at peace a while.

Bel. I'll walk aside,
 And come again anon. But take heed to her:
 You say she is a woman?

Mir. Yes.

Bel. Take great heed;
 For, if she do not cozen thee, then hang me: 110
 Let her be mad, or what she will, she'll cheat
 thee! Exit.

Mir. Away, wild fool! — How wild this shows in him now! —

Now take my faith, (before ye all I speak it.)

And with it my repentant love.

La Cast. This seems well.

Mir. Were but this lady clear again, whose sorrows 115

My very heart melts for, were she but perfect,
 (For thus to marry her would be two miseries,)
 Before the richest and the noblest beauty, France or the world could show me, I would take her.

As she is now, my tears and prayers shall wed
 her. 120

De Gard. This makes some small amends.

Ros. She beckons to ye;

To us, too, to go off.

Nant. Let's draw aside all.

[*Exeunt all except ORIANA and MR.
 RABEL.*]

Ori. Oh, my best friend! I would fain —

Mir. [Aside.] What, she speaks well,
 And with another voice.

Ori. But I am fearful,
 And shame a little stops my tongue —

Mir. Speak boldly. 125

Ori. Tell ye, I am well. I am perfect well (pray ye, mock not);

And that I did this to provoke your nature;

Out of my infinite and restless love,

To win your pity. Pardon me!

Mir. Go forward:

Who set ye on?

Ori. None, as I live, no creature; 130
 Not any knew or ever dream'd what I meant.

Will ye be mine?

Mir. 'Tis true, I pity ye;

But, when I marry ye, ye must be wiser.

Nothing but tricks? devices?

Ori. Will ye shame me?

Mir. Yes, marry, will I. — Come near, come near! a miracle! 135

The woman's well; she was only mad for marriage,

Stark mad to be ston'd to death: give her good counsel.

Will this world never mend? — Are ye caught,
 damsel?

*Enter BELLEUR, NANTOLET, LA CASTRE, DE
 GARD, LUGIER, ROSALURA, and LILLIA BI-ANCA.*

Bel. How goes it now?

Mir. Thou art a kind of prophet;

The woman's well again, and would have gull'd me;

Well, excellent well, and not a taint upon her.

Bel. Did not I tell ye? Let 'em be what can be, Saints, devils, any thing, they will abuse us:

Thou wert an ass to believe her so long, a coxcomb:

Give 'em a minute, they 'll abuse whole millions.

Mir. And am not I a rare physician, gentlemen,

That can cure desperate mad minds?

De Gard. Be not insolent.

Mir. Well, go thy ways: from this hour I disclaim thee,

Unless thou hast a trick above this; then I 'll love thee.

Ye owe me for your cure. — Pray, have a care of her,

For fear she fall into relapse. — Come, Belleur; We 'll set up bills to cure diseased virgins.

Bel. Shall we be merry?

Mir. Yes.

Bel. But I 'll no more projects: If we could make 'em mad, it were some mastery.

Exeunt [MIRABEL and BELLEUR].

Lil. I am glad she is well again.

Ros. So am I, certain. —

Be not ashamed.

Ori. I shall never see a man more.

De Gard. Come, ye are a fool: had ye but told me this trick,

He should not have gloried thus.

Lug. He shall not long, neither.

La Cast. Be rul'd, and be at peace. Ye have my consent,

And what power I can work with.

Nant. Come, leave blushing;

We are your friends: an honest way compell'd ye:

Heaven will not see so true a love unrecompens'd.

Come in, and slight him too.

Lug. The next shall hit him. Exeunt.

ACT V

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter DE GARD and LUGIER.

De Gard. 'T will be discover'd.

Lug. That's the worst can happen: If there be any way to reach, and work upon him,

Upon his nature suddenly, and catch him—That he loves,

Though he dissemble it, and would show contrary,

And will at length relent, I 'll lay my fortune; Nay, more, my life.

De Gard. Is she won?

Lug. Yes, and ready,

And my designments set.

De Gard. They are now for travel; All for that game again; they have forgot wooing.

Lug. Let 'em; we 'll travel with 'em.

De Gard. Where 's his father?

Lug. Within; he knows my mind too, and allows<sup>2</sup> it,

Pities your sister's fortune most sincerely, And has appointed, for our more assistance, Some of his secret friends.

De Gard. Speed the plough!

Lug. Well said!

And be ye serious too.

De Gard. I shall be diligent.

Lug. Let's break the ice for one, the rest will drink too (Believe me, sir) of the same cup. My young gentlewomen

Wait but who sets the game a-foot. Though they seem stubborn, Reserv'd, and proud now, yet I know their hearts,

Their pulses how they beat, and for what cause, sir,

And how they long to venture their abilities In a true quarrel. Husbands they must and will have,

Or nunneries and thin collations

To cool their bloods. Let 's all about our business,

And, if this fail, let nature work.

De Gard. Ye have arm'd me. Exeunt.

SCENE II.<sup>3</sup>

Enter MIRABEL, NANTOLET, and LA CASTRE.

La Cast. Will ye be wilful, then?

Mir. Pray, sir, your pardon;

For I must travel. Lie lazy here, Bound to a wife! Chain'd to her subtleties,

Her humours, and her wills, which are mere fetters!

To have her to-day pleas'd, to-morrow peevish, The third day mad, the fourth rebellious!

Ye see before they are married, what moriscoes,<sup>4</sup>

What masques and mummeries they put upon us:

To be tied here, and suffer their lavoltas!<sup>5</sup> Nant. 'T is your own seeking.

Mir. Yes, to get my freedom.

Were they as I could wish 'em —

La Cast. Fools and meacoeks,<sup>6</sup>

To endure what you think fit to put upon 'em. Come, change your mind.

Mir. Not before I have chang'd air, father. When I know women worthy of my company,

I will return again, and wait upon 'em;

Till then, dear sir, I 'll amble all the world over, And run all hazards, misery, and poverty,

Enter PINAC and BELLEUR.

So I escape the dangerous bay of matrimony.

Pin. Are ye resolv'd?

Mir. Yes, certain ; I will out again.
Pin. We are for ye, sir ; we are your servants
 once more ;

Once more we'll seek our fortune in strange countries ;

Ours is too scornful for us.

Bel. Is there ne'er a land
 That you have read or heard of (for I care not how far it be,

Nor under what pestiferous star it lies),<sup>24</sup>
 A happy kingdom, where there are no women,
 Nor have been ever, nor no mention
 Of any such lewd things with lewder qualities,
 (For thither would I travel) where 't is felony
 To confess he had a mother ; a mistress, treason ?

La Cast. Are you for travel too ?

Bel. For any thing,<sup>30</sup>
 For living in the moon, and stopping hedges,<sup>1</sup>
 Ere I stay here to be abus'd and baffl'd.<sup>2</sup>

Nant. Why did ye not break your minds to me ? They are my daughters ;
 And, sure, I think I should have that command
 over 'em,

To see 'em well bestow'd. I know ye are gentlemen,<sup>35</sup>

Men of fair parts and states ; I know your parents :

And, had ye told me of your fair affections —
 Make but one trial more, and let me second ye.

Bel. No ; I'll make hob-nails first, and mend old kettles.

Can ye lend me an armour of high proof, to appear in,<sup>40</sup>

And two or three field-pieces to defend me ?

The king's guard are mere pigmies.

Nant. They will not eat ye.

Bel. Yes, and you too, and twenty fatter
 monsieurs,

If their high stomachs hold. They came with chopping-knives,

To cut me into rands<sup>3</sup> and sirloins, and so powder me. —<sup>45</sup>

Come, shall we go ?

Nant. You cannot be so discourteous,
 If ye intend to go, as not to visit 'em,

And take your leaves.

Mir. That we dare do, and civilly,
 And thank 'em too.

Pin. Yes, sir, we know that honesty.<sup>4</sup>

Bel. I'll come i' the rear, forty foot off, I'll assure ye,<sup>50</sup>

With a good gun in my hand. I'll no more Amazons,

I mean, no more of their frights. I'll make my three legs,<sup>5</sup>

Kiss my hand twice, and, if I smell no danger,
 If the interview be clear, may be I'll speak to
 her ;

I'll wear a privy coat<sup>6</sup> too, and behind me,<sup>55</sup>
 To make those parts secure, a bandog.

La Cast. You are a merry gentleman.

Bel. A wary gentleman, I do assure you.

I have been warn'd ; and must be arm'd.

La Cast.

Well, son,

These are your hasty thoughts ; when I see you are bent to it,<sup>60</sup>

Then I'll believe, and join with ye : so, we'll leave ye. —

[Aside.] There 's a trick will make ye stay.

Nant. [Aside.] I hope so.

Exeunt [LA CASTRE and NANTOLET].

Mir. We have won immortal fame now, if we leave 'em.

Pin. You have ; but we have lost.

Mir. Pinac, thou art cozen'd.

I know they love ye ; and to gain ye handsomely,<sup>65</sup>

Not to be thought to yield, they would give millions.

Their father's willingness, that must needs show ye.

Pin. If I thought so —

Mir. Ye shall be hang'd, you recreant !

Would ye turn renegado now ?

Bel. No ; let 's away, boys,<sup>70</sup>
 Out of the air and tumult of their villanies.

Though I were married to that grasshopper,
 And had her fast by the legs, I should think she would cozen me.

Enter a Young [Man, disguised as a] Factor.

Y. Man. Monsieur Mirabel, I take it ?

Mir. Y' are i' th' right, sir.

Y. Man. I am come to seek ye, sir. I have been at your father's,<sup>75</sup>

And, understanding you were here —

Mir. Ye are welcome.

May I crave your name ?

Y. Man. Fosse, sir, and your servant.

That you may know me better, I am factor
 To your old merchant, Leverdure.

Mir. How does he ?

Y. Man. Well, sir, I hope ; he is now at Orleans,<sup>80</sup>

About some business.

Mir. You are once more welcome.

Your master 's a right honest man, and one
 I am much beholding to, and must very shortly Trouble his love again.

Y. Man. You may be bold, sir.

Mir. Your business, if you please now ?

Y. Man. This, it is sir.<sup>85</sup>

I know ye well remember in your travel
 A Genoa merchant —

Mir. I remember many.

Y. Man. But this man, sir, particularly ;
 your own benefit

Must needs imprint him in ye ; one Alberto,
 A gentleman you sav'd from being murder'd<sup>90</sup>

A little from Bologna :

I was then myself in Italy, and supplied ye ;
 Though haply you have forgot me now.

Mir. No, I remember ye,

And that Alberto too ; a noble gentleman ;
 More to remember were to thank myself, sir.<sup>95</sup>

What of that gentleman ?

Y. Man. He is dead.

Mir. I am sorry.

Y. Man. But on his death-bed, leaving to his sister

All that he had, beside some certain jewels,
Which, with a ceremony, he bequeath'd to
you 100

In grateful memory, he commanded strictly
His sister, as she lov'd him and his peace,
To see those jewels safe and true deliver'd,
And, with them, his last love. She, as tender
To observe his will, not trusting friend nor servant 105

With such a weight, is come herself to Paris
And at my master's house.

Mir. You tell me a wonder.

Y. Man. I tell ye a truth, sir. She is young and handsome,

And well attended; of much state and riches;
So loving and obedient to her brother, 110
That, on my conscience, if he had given her also,
She would most willingly have made her tender.

Mir. May not I see her?

Y. Man. She desires it heartily.

Mir. And presently?

Y. Man. She is now about some business, Passing accounts of some few debts here
owing, 115

And buying jewels of a merchant.

Mir. Is she wealthy?

Y. Man. I would ye had her, sir, at all adventure!

Her brother had a main state.<sup>1</sup>

Mir. And fair too?

Y. Man. The prime of all those parts of Italy, 120

For beauty and for courtesy.

Mir. I must needs see her.

Y. Man. 'T is all her business, sir. Ye may now see her;

But to-morrow will be fitter for your visitation,
For she is not yet prepared.

Mir. Only her sight, sir;
And, when you shall think fit, for further visit. 125

Y. Man. Sir, ye may see her, and I'll wait your coming.

Mir. And I'll be with ye instantly; I know
the house; —

Meantime, my love and thanks, sir.

Y. Man. Your poor servant. Exit.

Pin. Thou hast the strangest luck! What was that Alberto?

Mir. An honest noble merchant 't was my chance 130

To rescue from some rogues had almost slain
him;

And he in kindness to remember this!

Bel. Now we shall have you

For all your protestations and your forwardness,
Find out strange fortunes in this lady's eyes, 135
And new enticements to put off your journey;
And who shall have honour then?

Mir. No, no, never fear it:
I must needs see her to receive my legacy.

Bel. If it be tied up in her smock, Heaven
help thee!

May not we see too?

Mir. Yes, afore we go: 140

<sup>1</sup> Large fortune.

I must be known myself, ere I be able To make thee welcome. Wouldst thou see more women?

I thought you had been out of love with all.
Bel. I may be

(I find that), with the least encouragement;
Yet I desire to see whether all countries 145

Are naturally possess'd with the same spirits,
For, if they be, I'll take a monastery,

And never travel: for I had rather be a friar,
And live mew'd<sup>2</sup> up, than be a fool, and flouted.

Mir. Well, well, I'll meet ye anon, then tell you more, boys; 150

However, stand prepared, prest<sup>3</sup> for our journey;

For certain we shall go, I think, when I have seen her,

And view'd her well.

Pin. Go, go, and we'll wait for ye;
Your fortune directs ours.

Bel. You shall find us i' th' tavern,
Lamenting in sack and sugar for our losses. 155

If she be right Italian, and want servants,<sup>4</sup>
You may prefer the properest man. How I could

Worry a woman now!

Pin. Come, come, leave prating:
Ye may have enough to do, without this boast-
ing.

Exeunt [on one side, PINAC and
BELLEUR; on the other MIRABELL].

SCENE III.<sup>5</sup>

Enter LUGIER, DE GARD, ROSALURA, and
LILLIA BIANCA.

Lug. This is the last adventure.

De Gard. And the happiest,
As we hope, too.

Ros. We should be glad to find it.

Lil. Who shall conduct us thither?

Lug. Your man is ready,
For I must not be seen; no, nor this gentleman;

That may beget suspicion; all the rest 5
Are people of no doubt. I would have ye, ladies,
Keep your old liberties, and as we instruct ye.

Come, look not pale; you shall not lose your
wishes,

Nor beg 'em neither; but be yourselves and happy.

Ros. I tell you true, I cannot hold off longer,
Nor give no more hard language.

De Gard. You shall not need. 11

Ros. I love the gentleman, and must now show it:

Shall I beat a proper man out of heart?

Lug. There's none advises ye.

Lil. Faith, I repent me too.

Lug. Repent and spoil all;
Tell what ye know, ye had best!

Lil. I'll tell what I think; 15
For, if he ask me now if I can love him,
I'll tell him, yes, I can. The man's a kind man,
And out of his true honesty affects me.

<sup>5</sup> A room in the house of Nantolet.

Although he play'd the fool, which I requited,
Must I still hold him at the staff's end?

Lug. You are two strange women. <sup>20</sup>

Ros. We may be, if we fool still.

Lug. Dare ye believe me?

Follow but this advice I have set you in now,
And if ye lose — Would ye yield now so basely?
Give up without your honours say'd?

De Gard. Fie, ladies!

Preserve your freedom still.

Lil. Well, well, for this time. <sup>25</sup>

Lug. And carry that full state —

Ros. That's as the wind stands;
If it begin to chop about, and scant us,
Hang me, but I know what I'll do! Come,
direct us;

I make no doubt we shall do handsomely.

De Gard. Some part o' th' way we'll wait upon ye, ladies; <sup>30</sup>

The rest your man supplies.

Lug. Do well, I'll honour ye. Exeunt.

SCENE IV.<sup>1</sup>

ORIANA [disguised as an Italian lady,] and two [persons disguised as] Merchants, [discovered above.] Enter, [below, the Young Man disguised as a] Factor, and MIRABEL.

Y. Man. Look ye, sir, there she is; you see how busy.

Methinks you are infinitely bound to her for her journey.

Mir. How gloriously she shows! She is a tall
woman.

Y. Man. Of a fair size, sir. My master not being at home,

I have been so out of my wits to get her company! <sup>5</sup>

I mean, sir, of her own fair sex and fashion —

Mir. Afar off, she is most fair too.

Y. Man. Near, most excellent. —

At length, I have entreated two fair ladies (And happily you know 'em), the young daughters

Of Monsieur Nantolet.

Mir. I know 'em well, sir. <sup>10</sup>

What are those? Jewels?

Y. Man. All.

Mir. They make a rich show.

Y. Man. There is a matter of ten thousand pounds, too,

Was owing here. You see those merchants with
her;

They have brought it in now.

Mir. How handsomely her shape shows!

Y. Man. Those are still neat; your Italians are most curious. <sup>15</sup>

Now she looks this way.

Mir. She has a goodly presence;

How full of courtesy! — Well, sir, I'll leave ye;
And, if I may be bold to bring a friend or two,
Good noble gentlemen —

Y. Man. No doubt, ye may, sir;

For you have most command.

Mir. I have seen a wonder! Exit. <sup>20</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A room in a neighboring house, with a gallery.

Ori. Is he gone?

Y. Man. Yes.

Ori. How?

Y. Man. Taken to the utmost:
A wonder dwells about him.

Ori. He did not guess at me?

Y. Man. No, be secure; ye show another woman.

He is gone to fetch his friends.

Ori. Where are the gentlewomen?

Y. Man. Here, here: now they are come, <sup>25</sup>
Sit still, and let them see ye.

Enter [below] ROSALURA, LILLIA BIANCA, and Servant.

Ros. Pray you, where's my friend, sir?

Y. Man. She is within, ladies; but here's another gentleman,

A stranger to this town: so please you visit her,
'T will be well taken.

Lil. Where is she?

Y. Man. There, above, ladies.

Serv. Bless me, what thing is this? Two pinnacles <sup>31</sup>

Upon her pate! Is't not a glode <sup>2</sup> to catch wood-cocks?

Ros. Peace, you rude knave!

Serv. What a bouncing bum she has too!
There's sail enough for a carrack. <sup>3</sup>

Ros. What is this lady?

For, as I live, she is a goodly woman. <sup>35</sup>

Y. Man. Guess, guess.

Lil. I have not seen a nobler presence.

Serv. 'Tis a lusty wench: now could I spend my forty-pence,

With all my heart, to have but one fling at her,
To give her but a [s]washing blow.

Lil. Ye rascal!

Serv. Ay, that's all a man has for 's good will.

'T will be long enough <sup>40</sup>
Before ye cry, "Come, Anthony, and kiss me."

Lil. I'll have ye whipt.

Ros. Has my friend seen this lady?

Y. Man. Yes, yes, and is well known to her.

Ros. I much admire her presence.

Lil. So do I too;

For, I protest, she is the handsomest, <sup>45</sup>

The rarest, and the newest to mine eye,

That ever I saw yet.

Ros. I long to know her;

My friend shall do that kindness.

Ori. So she shall, ladies:

Come, pray ye, come up.

Ros. Oh me!

Lil. Hang me, if I knew her! —

Were I a man myself, I should now love ye;

Nay, I should dote.

Ros. I dare not trust mine eyes; <sup>50</sup>
For, as I live, ye are the strangest alter'd!

I must come up to know the truth.

Serv. So must I, lady:

For I'm a kind of unbeliever too.

Lil. Get ye gone, sirrah;

<sup>2</sup> Glade. The space between the pinnacles is compared to the opening in a wood, where nets were spread to snare woodcocks.

<sup>3</sup> A large ship of burden.

And what ye have seen be secret in; you are paid else!

No more of your long tongue.

Y. Man. Will ye go in, ladies, And talk with her? These venturers will come straight.

Away with this fellow.

Lil. There, sirrah; go, disport you.

Serv. I would the trunk-hos'd woman would go with me.

Exeunt, [on one side, ROSALURA, LILLIA BIANCA, and the Young Man disguised as a Factor; on the other, Servant.]

SCENE V.<sup>1</sup>

Enter MIRABEL, PINAC, and BELLEUR.

Pin. Is she so glorious handsome?

Mir. You would wonder; Our women look like gipsies, like gills<sup>2</sup> to her; Their clothes and fashions beggarly and bankrupt,

Base, old, and scurvy.

Bel. How looks her face?

Mir. Most heavenly; And the becoming motion of her body So sets her off!

Bel. Why then, we shall stay.

Mir. Pardon me, That's more than I know. If she be that woman

She appears to be —

Bel. As 't is impossible.

Mir. I shall then tell ye more.

Pin. Did ye speak to her? <sup>10</sup>

Mir. No, no, I only saw her; she was busy. Now I go for that end; and mark her, gentlemen, If she appear not to ye one of the sweetest, The handsomest, the fairest in behaviour! We shall meet the two wenches there too; they come to visit her, <sup>15</sup>

To wonder, as we do.

Pin. Then we shall meet 'em.

Bel. I had rather meet two bears.

Mir. There you may take your leaves, despatch that business, And, as ye find their humours —

Pin. Is your love there too?

Mir. No, certain; she has no great heart to set out again. <sup>20</sup>

This is the house; I'll usher ye.

Bel. I'll bless me,

And take a good-heart, if I can.

Mir. Come, nobly. Exeunt [into the house].

SCENE VI.<sup>3</sup>

Enter [the Young Man disguised as a] Factor, ROSALURA, LILLIA BIANCA, and ORIANA [disguised as before].

Y. Man. They are come in. Sit you two off, as strangers. —

There, lady. — Where 's the boy?

<sup>1</sup> The street, before the same house.

<sup>2</sup> Sluts. <sup>3</sup> A room in the same house.

[Enter Boy.]

Be ready, sirrah, And clear your pipes. — The music now; they enter. Music.

Enter MIRABEL, PINAC, and BELLEUR.

Pin. What a state she keeps! How far off they sit from her!

How rich she is! Ay, marry, this shows bravely! <sup>6</sup>

Bel. She is a lusty wench, and may allure a good man;

But, if she have a tongue, I'll not give twopence for her.

There sits my Fury; how I shake to see her!

Y. Man. Madam, this is the gentleman.

Mir. How sweet she kisses!

[MIRABEL salutes ORIANA.]

She has a spring dwells on her lips, a paradise! <sup>10</sup>

This is the legacy?

Song [by the Boy, while he presents a casket to MIRABEL].

From the honour'd dead I bring

Thus his love and last offering.

Take it nobly, 't is your due,

From a friendship ever true;

From a faith, &c. <sup>15</sup>

Ori. Most noble sir,

This from my now-dead brother, as his love, And grateful memory of your great benefit; From me my thanks, my wishes, and my service. <sup>20</sup>

Till I am more acquainted, I am silent;

Only I dare say this, — you are truly noble.

Mir. What should I think?

Pin. Think you have a handsome fortune: Would I had such another!

Ros. Ye are all well met, gentlemen;

We hear ye are for travel.

Pin. You hear true, lady; <sup>25</sup>

And come to take our leaves.

Lil. We'll along with ye:

We see you are grown so witty by your journey, We cannot choose but step out too. This lady

We mean to wait upon as far as Italy.

Bel. I'll travel into Wales, amongst the mountains, <sup>30</sup>

In hope they cannot find me.

Ros. If you go further,

So good and free society we hold ye,

We'll jog along too.

Pin. Are you so valiant, lady?

Lil. And we'll be merry, sir, and laugh.

Pin. It may be

We'll go by sea.

Lil. Why, 't is the only voyage! <sup>35</sup>

I love a sea-voyage, and a blust'ring tempest;

And let all split!

Pin. This is a dainty damosel! —

I think 't will tame ye. Can ye ride post?

Lil. Oh, excellently! I am never weary that way:

A hundred mile a day is nothing with me. <sup>40</sup>

Bel. I'll travel under ground. Do you hear, sweet lady?

I find it will be dangerous for a woman.

Ros. No danger, sir, I warrant; I love to be under.

Bel. I see she will abuse me all the world over. —

But say we pass through Germany, and drink hard?

Ros. We'll learn to drink, and swagger too.

Bel. She'll beat me! —
Lady, I'll live at home.

Ros. And I'll live with thee; And we'll keep house together.

Bel. I'll keep hounds first: And those I hate right heartily.

Pin. I go for Turkey; And so, it may be, up into Persia.

Lil. We cannot know too much; I'll travel with ye.

Pin. And you'll abuse me?

Lil. Like enough.
Pin. 'Tis dainty!

Bel. I will live in a bawdy-house.
Ros. I dare come to you.

Bel. Say I am dispos'd to hang myself?
Ros. There I'll leave you.

Bel. I am glad I know how to avoid you.
Mir. May I speak yet?

Y. Man. She beckons to ye.
Mir. Lady, I could wish I knew to recompense,

Even with the service of my life, those pains,

And those high favours you have thrown upon me:

Till I be more desertful in your eye,
And till my duty shall make known I honour

ye,
Noblest of women, do me but this favour,
To accept this back again as a poor testimony.

[Offering the casket.]
Ori. I must have you too with 'em; else the

will,
That says they must rest with ye, is infring'd,

sir;

Which, pardon me, I dare not do.
Mir. Take me then,

And take me with the truest love.
Ori. 'T is certain

My brother lov'd ye dearly, and I ought
As dearly to preserve that love: but, sir,

Though I were willing, these are but your ceremonies.

Mir. As I have life, I speak my soul!
Ori. I like ye:

But how you can like me, without having testimony,

A stranger to ye —
Mir. I'll marry ye immediately;

A fair state<sup>1</sup> I dare promise ye.
Bel. Yet she'll cozen thee.

Ori. Would some fair gentleman durst promise for ye!

Mir. By all that's good —

Enter LA CASTRE, NANTOLET, LUGIER, and DE GARD.

La Cast., Nant., &c. And we'll make up the rest, lady.

Ori. Then Oriana takes ye! Nay, she has caught ye;

If ye start now, let all the world cry shame on ye! I have out-travell'd ye.

Bel. Did not I say she would cheat thee?
Mir. I thank ye: I am pleas'd ye have deceiv'd me,

And willingly I swallow it, and joy in 't;
And yet, perhaps, I knew<sup>2</sup> ye. Whose plot was this?

Lug. He is not asham'd that cast<sup>3</sup> it; he that executed, Follow'd your father's will.

Mir. What a world's this! Nothing but craft and cozenage!

Ori. Who begun, sir?
Mir. Well; I do take thee upon mere compassion;

And I do think I shall love thee. As a testimony, I'll burn my book, and turn a new leaf over.

But these fine clothes you shall wear still.
Ori. I obey you, sir, in all.

Nant. And how, how, daughters? What say you to these gentlemen? —

What say ye, gentlemen, to the girls?
Pin. By my troth — if she can love me —

Lil. How long?
Pin. Nay, if once ye love —

Lil. Then take me,
And take your chance.

Pin. Most willingly: ye are mine, lady; And, if I use ye not that ye may love me —

Lil. A match, i' faith.
Pin. Why, now ye travel with me.

Ros. How that thing stands!
Bel. It will, if ye urge it:

Bless your five wits!
Ros. Nay, prithee, stay; I'll have thee.

Bel. You must ask me leave first.
Ros. Wilt thou use me kindly,

And beat me but once a week?
Bel. If you deserve no more.

Ros. And wilt thou get me with child?
Bel. Dost thou ask me seriously?

Ros. Yes, indeed, do I.
Bel. Yes, I will get thee with child. Come, presently,

An't be but in revenge, I'll do thee that courtesy.

Well, if thou wilt fear God and me, have at thee!
Ros. I'll love ye, and I'll honour ye.

Bel. I am pleas'd, then.
Mir. This Wild-Goose Chase is done; we have won o' both sides.

Brother, your love: and now to church of all

hands;
Let's lose no time.

Pin. Our travelling lay by.
Bel. No more for Italy; for the Low Countries, [L.]

Exeunt.

<sup>1</sup> Estate.

<sup>2</sup> Fl. know.

ACT I

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

[Enter] ANTONIO and DELIO.

Delio. You are welcome to your country, dear Antonio;

You have been long in France, and you return
A very formal Frenchman in your habit.
How do you like the French court?

Ant. I admire it.
In seeking to reduce both state and people
To a fix'd order, their judicious king
Begins at home; quits first his royal palace
Of flatt'ring sycophants, of dissolute
And infamous persons, — which he sweetly
terms

His master's master-piece, the work of heaven;
Considering duly that a prince's court
Is like a common fountain, whence should flow
Pure silver drops in general, but if 't chance
Some curs'd example poison 't near the head,
Death and diseases through the whole land spread.

And what is 't makes this blessed government
But a most provident council, who dare freely
Inform him the corruption of the times?

Though some o' th' court hold it presumption
To instruct princes what they ought to do,
It is a noble duty to inform them
What they ought to forsee.<sup>2</sup> — Here comes Bo-sola,

The only court-gall; yet I observe his railing
Is not for simple love of piety:
Indeed, he rails at those things which he wants;

<sup>1</sup> Amalfi. The presence-chamber in the palace of the Duchess.

<sup>2</sup> Prevent.

Would be as lecherous, covetous, or proud,
Bloody, or envious, as any man,
If he had means to be so. — Here 's the cardinal.

[Enter] CARDINAL and BOSOLA.]

Bos. I do haunt you still.

Card. So.

Bos. I have done you better service than to be slighted thus. Miserable age, where only the reward of doing well is the doing of it!

Card. You enforce your merit too much.

Bos. I fell into the galleys in your service; where, for two years together, I wore two towels instead of a shirt, with a knot on the shoulder, after the fashion of a Roman mantle.
Slighted thus! I will thrive some way. Blackbirds fatten best in hard weather; why not
I in these dog-days?

Card. Would you could become honest!

Bos. With all your divinity do but direct me the way to it. I have known many travel far for it, and yet return as arrant knaves as they went forth, because they carried themselves always along with them. [Exit] CARDINAL.] Are you gone? Some fellows, they say, are possessed with the devil, but this great fellow were able to possess the greatest devil, and make him
worse.

Ant. He hath denied thee some suit?

Bos. He and his brother are like plum-trees that grow crooked over standing-pools; they are rich and o'erladen with fruit, but none but crows, pies, and caterpillars feed on them.
Could I be one of their flatt'ring panders, I would hang on their ears like a horseleech, till
I were full, and then drop off. I pray, leave me.
Who would rely upon these miserable dependencies. in expectation to be advanc'd tomorrow? What creature ever fed worse than hoping Tantalus? Nor ever died any man more fearfully than he that hop'd for a pardon. There are rewards for hawks and dogs when <sup>65</sup> they have done us service; but for a soldier that hazards his limbs in a battle, nothing but a kind of geometry is his last supportation.

Delio. Geometry?

Bos. Ay, to hang in a fair pair of slings, take his latter swing in the world upon an honourable pair of crutches, from hospital to hospital. Fare ye well, sir: and yet do not you scorn us; for places in the court are but like beds in the hospital, where this man's head lies at that man's foot, and so lower and lower. [Exit.] <sup>70</sup>

Del. I knew this fellow seven years in the galleys

For a notorious murder; and 't was thought The cardinal suborn'd it: he was releas'd By the French general, Gaston de Foix, <sup>80</sup> When he recover'd Naples.

Ant. 'Tis great pity He should be thus neglected: I have heard He's very valiant. This foul melancholy Will poison all his goodness; for, I'll tell you, If too immoderate sleep be truly said <sup>85</sup> To be an inward rust unto the soul, It then doth follow want of action Breeds all black malcontents; and their close rearing, Like moths in cloth, do hurt for want of wearing.

SCENE II. 1

ANTONIO, DELIO. [Enter] SILVIO, CASTRUCCIO, JULIA, RODERIGO, and GRISOLAN.

Delio. The presence 'gins to fill: you promis'd me

To make me the partaker of the natures Of some of your great courtiers.

Ant. The lord cardinal's And other strangers' that are now in court? I shall. — Here comes the great Calabrian duke.

[Enter FERDINAND and Attendants.]

Ferd. Who took the ring off 'nest? <sup>2</sup> <sup>6</sup>

Sil. Antonio Bologna, my lord.

Ferd. Our sister duchess' great master of her household? Give him the jewel. — When shall we leave this sportive action, and fall to action indeed? <sup>11</sup>

Cast. Methinks, my lord, you should not desire to go to war in person.

Ferd. Now for some gravity. — Why, my lord? <sup>15</sup>

Cast. It is fitting a soldier arise to be a prince, but not necessary a prince descend to be a captain.

Ferd. No?

Cast. No, my lord; he were far better do it by a deputy. <sup>21</sup>

Ferd. Why should he not as well sleep or eat by a deputy? This might take idle, offensive, and base office from him, whereas the other deprives him of honour. <sup>25</sup>

Cast. Believe my experience, that realm is never long in quiet where the ruler is a soldier.

Ferd. Thou told'st me thy wife could not endure fighting.

Cast. True, my lord. <sup>30</sup>

Ferd. And of a jest she broke of a captain she met full of wounds: I have forgot it.

Cast. She told him, my lord, he was a pitiful fellow, to lie, like the children of Ismael, all in tents. <sup>35</sup>

Ferd. Why, there's a wit were able to undo all the chirurgeons o' the city; for although gallants should quarrel, and had drawn their weapons, and were ready to go to it, yet her persuasions would make them put up. <sup>40</sup>

Cast. That she would, my lord. — How do you like my Spanish gennet? <sup>6</sup>

Rod. He is all fire.

Ferd. I am of Pliny's opinion, I think he was begot by the wind; he runs as if he were ballas'd <sup>7</sup> with quicksilver. <sup>45</sup>

Sil. True, my lord, he reels from the tilt often.

Rod. Gris. Ha, ha, ha!

Ferd. Why do you laugh? Methinks you that are courtiers should be my touch-wood, <sup>51</sup> take fire when I give fire; that is, laugh when I laugh, were the subject never so witty.

Cast. True, my lord: I myself have heard a very good jest, and have scorn'd to seem to have so silly a wit as to understand it. <sup>55</sup>

Ferd. But I can laugh at your fool, my lord.

Cast. He cannot speak, you know, but he makes faces; my lady cannot abide him.

Ferd. No? <sup>60</sup>

Cast. Nor endure to be in merry company; for she says too full laughing, and too much company, fills her too much of the wrinkle.

Ferd. I would, then, have a mathematical instrument made for her face, that she might not laugh out of compass. — I shall shortly visit <sup>65</sup> you at Milan, Lord Silvio.

Sil. Your grace shall arrive most welcome.

Ferd. You are a good horseman, Antonio: you have excellent riders in France; what do you think of good horsemanship? <sup>71</sup>

Ant. Nobly, my lord: as out of the Grecian horse issued many famous princes, so out of brave horsemanship arise the first sparks of growing resolution, that raise the mind to noble action. <sup>75</sup>

Ferd. You have bespoke it worthily.

Sil. Your brother, the lord cardinal, and sister duchess.

[Enter CARDINAL, with DUCHESS, and CARYOLA.]

Card. Are the galleys come about?

Gris. They are, my lord. <sup>80</sup>

Ferd. Here's the Lord Silvio is come to take his leave.

Delio. Now, sir, your promise: what's that cardinal?

I mean his temper. They say he's a brave fellow,

Will play his five thousand crowns at tennis, dance,

Court ladies, and one that bath fought single combats. <sup>85</sup>

Ant. Some such flashes superficially hang on him for form; but observe his inward character: he is a melancholy churchman. The spring in his face is nothing but the engend'ring of toads; where he is jealous of any man, he lays worse plots for them than ever was impos'd on Hercules, for he strews in his way flatterers, panders, intelligencers, atheists, and a thousand such political monsters. He should have been Pope; but instead of coming to it by the primitive decency of the church, he did <sup>90</sup> bestow bribes so largely and so impudently as if he would have carried it away without heaven's knowledge. Some good he hath done—

Delio. You have given too much of him.

What's his brother? <sup>100</sup>

Ant. The duke there? A most perverse and turbulent nature.

What appears in him mirth is merely outside; if he laugh heartily, it is to laugh
All honesty out of fashion.

Delio. Twins?

Ant. In quality.

He speaks with others' tongues, and hears men's suits <sup>105</sup>

With others' ears; will seem to sleep o' th' bench

Only to entrap offenders in their answers; Dooms men to death by information; Rewards by hearsay.

Delio. Then the law to him
Is like a foul, black cobweb to a spider, — <sup>110</sup>
He makes it his dwelling and a prison
To entangle those shall feed him.

Ant. Most true:
He never pays debts unless they be shrewd turns,

And those he will confess that he doth owe. <sup>115</sup>

Last, for his brother there, the cardinal,

They that do flatter him most say oracles

Hang at his lips; and verily I believe them,

For the devil speaks in them.

But for their sister, the right noble duchess,

You never fix'd your eye on three fair medals

Cast in one figure, of so different temper. <sup>121</sup>

For her discourse, it is so full of rapture,

You only will begin then to be sorry

When she doth end her speech, and wish, in wonder,

She held it less vain-glory to talk much, <sup>125</sup>

Than your penance to hear her. Whilst she speaks,

She throws upon a man so sweet a look

That it were able to raise one to a galliard <sup>1</sup>

That lay in a dead palsy, and to dote

On that sweet countenance; but in that look <sup>130</sup>

There speaketh so divine a continence

<sup>1</sup> A lively dance.

As cuts off all lascivious and vain hope.

Her days are practis'd in such noble virtue,
That sure her nights, nay, more, her very sleeps,

Are more in heaven than other ladies' shrifts.
Let all sweet ladies break their flatt'ring

glasses, <sup>135</sup>
And dress themselves in her.

Delio. Fie, Antonio.
You play the wire-drawer with her commendations.

Ant. I'll case the picture up: only thus much;

All her particular worth grows to this sum, —
She stains <sup>2</sup> the time past, lights the time to come. <sup>141</sup>

Car. You must attend my lady in the gallery,
Some half an hour hence.

Ant. I shall. [Exeunt ANTONIO and DELIO.]

Ferd. Sister, I have a suit to you.

Duch. To me, sir?

Ferd. A gentlemen here, Daniel de Bosola,

One that was in the galleys —

Duch. Yes, I know him. <sup>146</sup>

Ferd. A worthy fellow he's: pray, let me entreat for

The provisorship of your horse.

Duch. Your knowledge of him

Commends him and prefers him.

Ferd. Call him hither. [Exit Attendants.]

We [are] now upon <sup>3</sup> parting. Good Lord Silvio,

Do us commend to all our noble friends <sup>151</sup>

At the leaguer.

Sil. Sir, I shall.

[Duch.] You are for Milan?

Sil. I am.

Duch. Bring the caroches. <sup>4</sup> — We'll bring you down

To the haven.

[Exeunt DUCHESS, SILVIO, CAS-TRUCCIO, RODERIGO, GRISOLAN, CARIOLA, JULIA, and Attendants.]

Card. Be sure you entertain that Bosola <sup>155</sup>

For your intelligence. <sup>5</sup> I would not be seen 't;

And therefore many times I have slighted him

When he did court our furtherance, as this morning.

Ferd. Antonio, the great master of her household,

Had been far fitter.

Card. You are deceiv'd in him. <sup>160</sup>

His nature is too honest for such business. —

He comes: I'll leave you. [Exit.]

[Re-enter BOSOLA.]

Bos. I was lur'd to you.

Ferd. My brother, here, the cardinal could never

Abide you.

Bos. Never since he was in my debt.

Ferd. May be some oblique character in your face

Made him suspect you.

<sup>2</sup> Throws into the shade.

<sup>5</sup> Spy.

Bos. Doth he study physiognomy? 155
There's no more credit to be given to th' face
Than to a sick man's urine, which some call
The physician's whore, because she cozens<sup>1</sup>
him.

He did suspect me wrongfully.

Ferd. For that You must give great men leave to take their
times. 170

Distrust doth cause us seldom be deceiv'd.
You see the oft shaking of the cedar-tree
Fastens it more at root.

Bos. Yet take heed;
For to suspect a friend unworthily
Instructs him the next way to suspect you, 175
And prompts him to deceive you.

Ferd. There's gold.
Bos. So:
What follows? — [Aside.] Never rain'd such showers as these

Without thunderbolts i' th' tail of them. —
Whose throat must I cut?

Ferd. Your inclination to shed blood rides
post

Before my occasion to use you. I give you that
To live i' th' court here, and observe the
duchess; 181

To note all the particulars of her behaviour,
What suitors do solicit her for marriage,
And whom she best affects.<sup>2</sup> She's a young widow:

I would not have her marry again.

Bos. No, sir? 185
Ferd. Do not you ask the reason; but be satisfied.

I say I would not.

Bos. It seems you would create me
One of your familiars.

Ferd. Familiar! What's that?
Bos. Why, a very quaint invisible devil in flesh, —

An intelligencer.<sup>3</sup>

Ferd. Such a kind of thriving thing 190
I would wish thee; and ere long thou mayst arrive

At a higher place by 't.

Bos. Take your devils,
Which hell calls angels! These curs'd gifts would make

You a corrupter, me an impudent traitor;
And should I take these, they'd take me [to]
hell. 195

Ferd. Sir, I'll take nothing from you that I have given.

There is a place that I procur'd for you
This morning, the provisorship o' th' horse;
Have you heard on 't?

Bos. No.
Ferd. 'Tis yours; is't not worth thanks?

Bos. I would have you curse yourself now, that your bounty 200
(Which makes men truly noble) e'er should make me

A villain. O, that to avoid ingratitude
For the good deed you have done me, I must do

<sup>1</sup> Cheats.    <sup>2</sup> Likes.    <sup>3</sup> Spy.

All the ill man can invent! Thus the devil Candies all sins o'er: and what heaven terms
vile, 205

That names he complimentary.

Ferd. Be yourself;
Keep your old garb of melancholy; 't will express

You envy those that stand above your reach,
Yet strive not to come near 'em. This will gain

Access to private lodgings, where yourself 210
May, like a politic dormouse —

Bos. As I have seen some Feed in a lord's dish, half asleep, not seeming
To listen to any talk; and yet these rogues Have cut his throat in a dream. What's my place?

The provisorship o' th' horse? Say, then, my corruption 215

Grew out of horse-dung: I am your creature.

Ferd. Away! [Exit.]

Bos. Let good men, for good deeds, covet good fame,

Since place and riches oft are bribes of shame.
Sometimes the devil doth preach. Exit.

[SCENE III.]<sup>4</sup>

[Enter FERDINAND, DUCHESS, CARDINAL, and CARIOLA.]

Card. We are to part from you; and your own discretion

Must now be your director.

Ferd. You are a widow:
You know already what man is; and therefore Let not youth, high promotion, eloquence —

Card. No, 5
Nor anything without the addition, honour,
Sway your high blood.

Ferd. Marry! They are most luxurious<sup>5</sup>
Will wed twice.

Card. O, fie!

Ferd. Their livers are more spotted
Than Laban's sheep.<sup>6</sup>

Duch. Diamonds are of most value,
They say, that have past through most jewellers' hands. 10

Ferd. Whores by that rule are precious.

Duch. Will you hear me?

I'll never marry.

Card. So most widows say;
But commonly that motion<sup>7</sup> lasts no longer
Than the turning of an hour-glass: the funeral sermon

And it end both together.

Ferd. Now hear me: 15

You live in a rank pasture, here, i' th' court;
There is a kind of honey-dew that's deadly;
'T will poison your fame; look to 't. Be not cunning;

For they whose faces do belie their hearts
Are witches ere they arrive at twenty years, 20
Ay, and give the devil suck.

Duch. This is terrible good counsel.

Ferd. Hypocrisy is woven of a fine small thread,
Subtler than Vulcan's engine: <sup>1</sup> yet, believe 't,
Your darkest actions, nay, your privatst thoughts, <sup>25</sup>

Will come to light.

Card. You may flatter yourself,
And take your own choice; privately be married

Under the eaves of night—

Ferd. Think 't the best voyage
That e'er you made; like the irregular crab,
Which, though 't goes backward, thinks that it goes right <sup>30</sup>

Because it goes its own way: but observe,
Such weddings may more properly be said
To be executed than celebrated.

Card. The marriage night
Is the entrance into some prison.

Ferd. And those joys,
Those lustful pleasures, are like heavy sleeps <sup>35</sup>
Which do fore-run man's mischief.

Card. Fare you well.
Wisdom begins at the end: remember it.

[Exit.]

Duch. I think this speech between you both was studied,

It came so roundly off.

Ferd. You are my sister;
This was my father's poniard, do you see? <sup>40</sup>
I'd be loth to see 't look rusty, 'cause 't was his.

I would have you give o'er these chargeable revels:

A visor and a mask are whispering-rooms
That were nev'r built for goodness,—fare ye
well—

And women like that part which, like the lamprey, <sup>45</sup>

Hath nev'r a bone in 't.

Duch. Fie, sir!

Ferd. Nay,
I mean the tongue; variety of courtship.
What cannot a neat knave with a smooth tale
Make a woman believe? Farewell, lusty widow.

[Exit.]

Duch. Shall this move me? If all my royal kindred <sup>50</sup>

Lay in my way unto this marriage, I'd make them my low footsteps. And even
now,

Even in this hate, as men in some great battles,
By apprehending danger, have achiev'd Almost impossible actions (I have heard soldiers say so), <sup>55</sup>

So I through frights and threat'nings will assay
This dangerous venture. Let old wives report
I wink'd and chose a husband. — Cariola,
To thy known secrecy I have given up
More than my life,—my fame.

Cari. Both shall be safe; <sup>60</sup>

For I'll conceal this secret from the world
As warily as those that trade in poison
Keep poison from their children.

Duch. Thy protestation

Is ingenious and hearty; I believe it.

Is Antonio come?

Cari. He attends you.

Duch. Good dear soul, <sup>65</sup>
Leave me; but place thyself behind the arras,
Where thou mayest overhear us. Wish me good
speed;

For I am going into a wilderness,
Where I shall find nor path nor friendly clue
To be my guide.

[CARIOLA goes behind the arras.]

[Enter ANTONIO.]

I sent for you: sit down; <sup>70</sup>
Take pen and ink, and write: are you ready?

Ant. Yes.

Duch. What did I say?

Ant. That I should write somewhat.

Duch. O, I remember.

After these triumphs and this large expense

It's fit, like thrifty husbands, <sup>75</sup> we inquire

What's laid up for to-morrow.

Ant. So please your beauteous excellence.

Duch. Beauteous!

Indeed, I thank you. I look young for your sake;

You have ta'en my cares upon you.

Ant. I'll fetch your grace

The particulars of your revenue and expense. <sup>80</sup>

Duch. O, you are

An upright treasurer, but you mistook;

For when I said I meant to make inquiry

What's laid up for to-morrow, I did mean

What's laid up yonder for me.

Ant. Where?

Duch. In heaven. <sup>85</sup>

I am making my will (as 'tis fit princes should,

In perfect memory), and, I pray, sir, tell me,

Were not one better make it smiling, thus,

Than in deep groans and terrible ghastly looks,

As if the gifts we parted with procur'd? <sup>90</sup>

That violent distraction?

Ant. O, much better.

Duch. If I had a husband now, this care were quit:

But I intend to make you overseer.

What good deed shall we first remember? Say.

Ant. Begin with that first good deed began

i' th' world <sup>95</sup>

After man's creation, the sacrament of marriage.

I'd have you first provide for a good husband;

Give him all.

Duch. All!

Ant. Yes, your excellent self.

Duch. In a winding-sheet?

Ant. In a couple.

Duch. Saint Winifred, that were a strange
will!

* Ant. 'T were stranger <sup>100</sup> if there were no will in you

To marry again.

Duch. What do you think of marriage?

Ant. I take 't, as those that deny purgatory,

<sup>4</sup> Qq. read strange.

It locally contains or heaven or hell ;

There's no third place in 't.

Duch. How do you affect it ? 108

Ant. My banishment, feeding my melancholy, Would often reason thus : —

Duch. Pray, let 's hear it.

Ant. Say a man never marry, nor have children,

What takes that from him ? Only the bare name

Of being a father, or the weak delight 110

To see the little wanton ride a-cock-horse

Upon a painted stick, or hear him chatter

Like a taught starling.

Duch. Fie, fie, what 's all this ?

One of your eyes is blood-shot ; use my ring to 't.

They say 't is very sovereign. 'T was my wedding-ring. 115

And I did vow never to part with it

But to my second husband.

Ant. You have parted with it now.

Duch. Yes, to help your eye-sight.

Ant. You have made me stark blind.

Duch. How ? 120

Ant. There is a saucy and ambitious devil

Is dancing in this circle.

Duch. Remove him.

Ant. How ?

Duch. There needs small conjuration, when your finger

May do it : thus. Is it fit ?

[She puts the ring upon his finger] :
he kneels.

Ant. What said you ?

Duch. Sir,

This goodly roof of yours is too low built ; 125

I cannot stand upright in 't nor discourse,

Without I raise it higher. Raise yourself ;

Or, if you please, my hand to help you : so.

[Raises him.]

Ant. Ambition, madam, is a great man's madness,

That is not kept in chains and close-pent rooms,

But in fair lightsome lodgings, and is girt 131

With the wild noise of prattling visitants,

Which makes it lunatic beyond all cure.

Conceive not I am so stupid but I aim <sup>1</sup>

Whereto your favours tend : but he 's a fool 135

That, being a-cold, would thrust his hands i' th' fire

To warm them.

Duch. So, now the ground 's broke,

You may discover what a wealthy mine

I make you lord of.

Ant. O my unworthiness !

Duch. You were ill to sell yourself : 140

This dark'ning of your worth is not like that

Which tradesmen use i' th' city ; their false lights

Are to rid bad wares off : and I must tell you,

If you will know where breathes a complete man

(I speak it without flattery), turn your eyes, 145

And progress through yourself.

<sup>1</sup> Guess.

Ant. Were there nor heaven nor hell, I should be honest : I have long serv'd virtue, And nev'r ta'en wages of her.

Duch. Now she pays it. The misery of us that are born great ! 150

We are forc'd to woo, because none dare woo us ;

And as a tyrant doubles with his words

And fearfully equivocates, so we

Are forc'd to express our violent passions

In riddles and in dreams, and leave the path 155

Of simple virtue, which was never made

To seem the thing it is not. Go, go brag

You have left me heartless ; mine is in your bosom :

I hope 't will multiply love there. You do tremble :

Make not your heart so dead a piece of flesh, 160

To fear more than to love me. Sir, be confident :

What is 't distracts you ? This is flesh and blood, sir ;

'T is not the figure cut in alabaster

Kneels at my husband's tomb. Awake, awake, man !

I do here put off all vain ceremony, 165

And only do appear to you a young widow

That claims you for her husband, and, like a widow,

I use but half a blush in 't.

Ant. Truth speak for me ;

I will remain the constant sanctuary

Of your good name.

Duch. I thank you, gentle love : 170

And 'cause you shall not come to me in debt,

Being now my steward, here upon your lips

I sign your Quietus est.<sup>2</sup> This you should have begg'd now.

I have seen children oft eat sweetmeats thus,

As fearful to devour them too soon. 175

Ant. But for your brothers ?

Duch. Do not think of them :

All discord without this circumference

Is only to be pitied, and not fear'd :

Yet, should they know it, time will easily

Scatter the tempest.

Ant. These words should be mine, 180

And all the parts you have spoke, if some part of it

Would not have savour'd flattery.

Duch. Kneel.

[CARLOLA comes from behind the arras.]

Ant. Ha !

Duch. Be not amaz'd : this woman 's of my counsel.

I have heard lawyers say, a contract in a chamber

Per verba [de] presenti<sup>3</sup> is absolute marriage. 185

[She and ANTONIO kneel.]

Bless, heaven, this sacred gordian,<sup>4</sup> which let violence

Never untwine.

<sup>2</sup> The phrase used to indicate that accounts had been examined and found correct.

<sup>3</sup> Using words of present time : i. e. "I take," not "I will take."

Ant. And may our sweet affections, like the spheres,

Be still in motion!

Duch. Quick'ning, and make

The like soft music! <sup>190</sup>

Ant. That we may imitate the loving palms,

Best emblem of a peaceful marriage,

That nev'r bore fruit, dividèd!

Duch. What can the church force more?

Ant. That fortune may not know an accident, <sup>195</sup>

Either of joy or sorrow, to divide

Our fixed wishes!

Duch. How can the church build faster? <sup>1</sup>

We now are man and wife, and 't is the church

That must but echo this. — Maid, stand apart:

I now am blind.

Ant. What's your conceit in this? <sup>200</sup>

Duch. I would have you lead your fortune by the hand

Unto your marriage-bed:

(You speak in me this, for we now are one.)

We'll only lie and talk together, and plot

T' appease my humorous <sup>2</sup> kindred; and if you please, <sup>206</sup>

Like the old tale in Alexander and Lodowick,

Lay a naked sword between us, keep us chaste.

O, let me shrowd my blushes in your bosom,

Since 't is the treasury of all my secrets!

[Exeunt DUCHESS and ANTONIO.]

Cari. Whether the spirit of greatness or of woman <sup>210</sup>

Reign most in her, I know not; but it shows

A fearful madness. I owe her much of pity.

Exit.

ACT II

SCENE I.<sup>3</sup>

[Enter] BOSOLA and CASTRUCCIO.

Bos. You say you would fain be taken for an eminent courtier?

Cast. 'T is the very main <sup>4</sup> of my ambition.

Bos. Let me see: you have a reasonable good face for 't already, and your night-cap expresses your ears sufficient largely. I would have you <sup>5</sup> learn to twirl the strings of your band with a good grace, and in a set speech, at th' end of every sentence, to hum three or four times, or blow your nose till it smart again, to recover your memory. When you come to be a presi- <sup>10</sup>

dent in criminal causes, if you smile upon a prisoner, hang him; but if you frown upon him and threaten him, let him be sure to scape the gallows.

Cast. I would be a very merry president. <sup>15</sup>

Bos. Do not sup o' nights; 't will beget you an admirable wit.

Cast. Rather it would make me have a good stomach to quarrel; for they say, your roaring boys eat meat seldom, and that makes them so valiant. But how shall I know whether the <sup>20</sup> people take me for an eminent fellow?

Bos. I will teach a trick to know it: give out you lie a-dying, and if you hear the common people curse you, be sure you are taken for one of the prime night-caps. <sup>25</sup>

[Enter an Old Lady.]

You come from painting now.

Old Lady. From what?

Bos. Why, from your scurvy face-physic. To behold thee not painted inclines somewhat near a miracle. These in thy face here were deep ruts and foul sloughs the last progress. <sup>6</sup> There was <sup>31</sup>

a lady in France that, having had the small-pox, flayed the skin off her face to make it more level;

and whereas before she looked like a nutmeg-grater,

after she resembled an abortive hedge-hog. <sup>35</sup>

Old Lady. Do you call this painting?

Bos. No, no, but you call [it] careening <sup>7</sup> of an old morphew'd <sup>8</sup> lady, to make her disembody <sup>9</sup> again: there's rough-cast phrase to your plastic. <sup>10</sup>

Old Lady. It seems you are well acquainted <sup>40</sup> with my closet.

Bos. One would suspect it for a shop of witchcraft, to find in it the fat of serpents, spawn of snakes,

Jews' spittle, and their young children's ordure;

and all these for the face. I would <sup>45</sup> sooner eat a dead pigeon taken from the soles of the feet of one sick of the plague, than kiss one of you fasting. Here are two of you, whose sin of your youth is the very patrimony of the physician; makes him renew his foot-cloth <sup>50</sup> with the spring, and change his high-pric'd courtesan with the fall of the leaf. I do wonder you do not loathe yourselves. Observe my meditation now.

What thing is in this outward form of man <sup>55</sup>

To be belov'd? We account it ominous, If nature do produce a colt, or lamb,

A fawn, or goat, in any limb resembling A man, and fly from 't as a prodigy.

Man stands amaz'd to see his deformity <sup>60</sup>

In any other creature but himself. But in our own flesh though we bear diseases

Which have their true names only ta'en from beasts, —

As the most ulcerous wolf <sup>11</sup> and swinish measles, <sup>12</sup> —

Though we are eaten up of lice and worms, <sup>65</sup>

And though continually we bear about us A rotten and dead body, we delight

To hide it in rich tissue: all our fear, Nay, all our terror, is, lest our physician <sup>69</sup>

Should put us in the ground to be made sweet. — Your wife's gone to Rome: you two couple, and get you to the wells at Lucca to recover your aches. I have other work on foot.

[Exeunt CASTRUCCIO and Old Lady.]

I observe our duchess <sup>74</sup>

Is sick a-days, she pukés, her stomach seethes,

The fins of her eye-lids look most teeming blue,<sup>1</sup>

She wanes i' th' cheek, and waxes fat i' th' flank,

And, contrary to our Italian fashion,
Wears a loose-bodied gown: there 's somewhat in 't.

I have a trick may chance discover it,<sup>80</sup>
A pretty one; I have bought some apricocks,
The first our spring yields.

[Enter ANTONIO and DELIO, talking together apart.]

Delio. And so long since married?
You amaze me.

Ant. Let me seal your lips for ever:
For, did I think that anything but th' air
Could carry these words from you, I should wish<sup>85</sup>

You had no breath at all. — Now, sir, in your contemplation?

You are studying to become a great wise fellow.

Bos. O, sir, the opinion of wisdom is a foul tetter<sup>2</sup> that runs all over a man's body: if simplicity direct us to have no evil, it directs us<sup>90</sup> to a happy being; for the subtlest folly proceeds from the subtlest wisdom. Let me be simply honest.

Ant. I do understand your inside.

Bos. Do you so?

Ant. Because you would not seem to appear to th' world<sup>95</sup>

Puff'd up with your preferment, you continue
This out-of-fashion melancholy: leave it, leave it.

Bos. Give me leave to be honest in any phrase, in any compliment whatsoever. Shall I confess myself to you? I look no higher than<sup>100</sup> I can reach: they are the gods that must ride on winged horses. A lawyer's mule of a slow pace will both suit my disposition and business; for, mark me, when a man's mind rides faster than his horse can gallop, they quickly both<sup>105</sup> tire.

Ant. You would look up to heaven, but I think

The devil, that rules i' th' air, stands in your light.

Bos. O, sir, you are lord of the ascendant,<sup>3</sup> chief man with the duchess: a duke was your<sup>110</sup> cousin-german remov'd. Say you were lineally descended from King Pepin, or he himself, what of this? Search the heads of the greatest rivers in the world, you shall find them but bubbles of water. Some would think the souls of princes<sup>115</sup> were brought forth by some more weighty cause than those of meaner persons: they are deceiv'd, there 's the same hand to them; the like passions sway them; the same reason that makes a vicar go to law for a tithe-pig, and<sup>120</sup> undo his neighbours, makes them spoil a whole province, and batter down goodly cities with the cannon.

[Enter DUCHESS and Ladies.]

Duch. Your arm, Antonio: do I not grow fat? I am exceeding short-winded. — Bosola,<sup>125</sup>
I would have you, sir, provide for me a litter; Such a one as the Duchess of Florence rode in.

Bos. The duchess us'd one when she was great with child.

Duch. I think she did. — Come hither, mend my ruff:<sup>129</sup>

Here, when? thou art such a tedious lady; and Thy breath smells of lemon-pills: wouldst thou hadst done!

Shall I swoon under thy fingers? I am So troubled with the mother!<sup>4</sup>

Bos. [Aside.] I fear, too much.

Duch. I have heard you say that the French courtiers

Wear their hats on 'fore the king.<sup>135</sup>

Ant. I have seen it.

Duch. In the presence?

Ant. Yes.

Duch. Why should not we bring up that fashion?

'T is ceremony more than duty that consists In the removing of a piece of felt.

Be you the example to the rest o' th' court; <sup>140</sup> Put on your hat first.

Ant. You must pardon me:

I have seen, in colder countries than in France, Nobles stand bare to th' prince; and the distinction

Methought show'd reverently.

Bos. I have a present for your grace.

Duch. For me, sir? <sup>145</sup>

Bos. Apricocks, madam.

Duch. O, sir, where are they?

I have heard of none to-year.<sup>5</sup>

Bos. [Aside.] Good; her colour rises.

Duch. Indeed, I thank you: they are wondrous fair ones.

What an unskilful fellow is our gardener!

We shall have none this month. <sup>150</sup>

Bos. Will not your grace pare them?

Duch. No: they taste of musk, methinks; indeed they do.

Bos. I know not: yet I wish your grace had par'd 'em.

Duch. Why?

Bos. I forgot to tell you, the knave gardener, Only to raise his profit by them the sooner, <sup>155</sup>

Did ripen them in horse-dung.

Duch. O, you jest. —

You shall judge: pray, taste one.

Ant. Indeed, madam,

I do not love the fruit.

Duch. Sir, you are loth To rob us of our dainties. 'T is a delicate fruit; They say they are restorative.

Bos. 'T is a pretty art, <sup>160</sup>

This grafting.

Duch. 'T is so; a bett'ring of nature.

Bos. To make a pippin grow upon a crab, A damson on a black-thorn. — [Aside.] How greedily she eats them!

A whirlwind strike off these bawd farthingales !
For, but for that and the loose-bodied gown, <sup>105</sup>
I should have discover'd apparently <sup>1</sup>
The young springal<sup>2</sup> cutting a caper in her belly.

Duch. I thank you, Bosola: they were right good ones,

If they do not make me sick.

Ant. How, now, madam ! <sup>170</sup>

Duch. This green fruit and my stomach are not friends:

How they swell me !

Bos. [Aside.] Nay, you are too much swell'd already.

Duch. O, I am in an extreme cold sweat !

Bos. I am very sorry. [Exit.]

Duch. Lights to my chamber !—O good Antonio, <sup>176</sup>

I fear I am undone !

Delio. Lights there, lights !

Exeunt DUCHESS [and Ladies.]

Ant. O my most trusty Delio, we are lost !
I fear she 's fall'n in labour; and there 's left
No time for her remove.

Delio. Have you prepar'd

Those ladies to attend her; and procur'd <sup>180</sup>

That politic safe conveyance for the midwife
Your duchess plotted ?

Ant. I have.

Delio. Make use, then, of this forc'd occasion.

Give out that Bosola hath poison'd her
With these apricocks; that will give some colour <sup>185</sup>

For her keeping close.

Ant. Fie, fie, the physicians

Will then flock to her.

Delio. For that you may pretend

She 'll use some prepar'd antidote of her own,
Lest the physicians should re-poison her. <sup>190</sup>

Ant. I am lost in amazement: I know not what to think on 't. Exeunt.

SCENE II.<sup>3</sup>

[Enter] BOSOLA and Old Lady.

Bos. So, so, there 's no question but her technical<sup>4</sup> and most vulturous eating of the apricocks are apparent signs of breeding.—Now ?

Old Lady. I am in haste, sir.

Bos. There was a young waiting-woman had a monstrous desire to see the glass-house — <sup>6</sup>

Old Lady. Nay, pray, let me go.

Bos. And it was only to know what strange instrument it was should swell up a glass to the fashion of a woman's belly. <sup>12</sup>

Old Lady. I will hear no more of the glasshouse. You are still <sup>6</sup> abusing women !

Bos. Who ? I ? No; only, by the way now and then, mention your frailties. The orange-tree bears ripe and green fruit and blossoms all <sup>15</sup> together; and some of you give entertainment for pure love, but more for more precious reward. The lusty spring smells well; but droop-

ing autumn tastes well. If we have the same golden showers that rained in the time of <sup>20</sup>
Jupiter the thunderer, you have the same Danæes still, to hold up their laps to receive them. Didst thou never study the mathematics ?

Old Lady. What 's that, sir ? <sup>25</sup>

Bos. Why, to know the trick how to make a many lines meet in one centre. Go, go, give your foster-daughters good counsel: tell them, that the devil takes delight to hang at a woman's girdle, like a false rusty watch, that <sup>30</sup>
she cannot discern how the time passes.

[Exit Old Lady.]

[Enter ANTONIO, RODERIGO, and GRISOLAN.]

Ant. Shut up the court-gates.

Rod. Why, sir ? What 's the danger ?

Ant. Shut up the posterns presently, and call

All the officers o' th' court.

Gris. I shall instantly. [Exit.]

Ant. Who keeps the key o' th' park-gate ?

Rod. Forobosco. <sup>35</sup>

Ant. Let him bring 't presently.

[Re-enter GRISOLAN with Servants.]

1 Serv. O, gentleman o' th' court, the foulest
treason !

Bos. [Aside.] If that these apricocks should be poison'd now,

Without my knowledge ?

1 Serv. There was even now a Switzer in the duchess' bed-chamber — <sup>40</sup>

2 Serv. A Switzer !

1 Serv. With a pistol in his great codpiece.

Bos. Ha, ha, ha !

1 Serv. The codpiece was the case for 't.

2 Serv. There was a cunning traitor. Who would have search'd his codpiece ? <sup>46</sup>

1 Serv. True; if he had kept out of the ladies' chambers. And all the moulds of his buttons were leaden bullets.

2 Serv. O wicked cannibal ! A fire-lock in 's codpiece ! <sup>50</sup>

1 Serv. 'T was a French plot, upon my life.

2 Serv. To see what the devil can do !

Ant. [Are] all the officers here ?

Servants. We are.

Ant. Gentlemen, <sup>55</sup>

We have lost much plate you know; and but this evening

Jewels, to the value of four thousand ducats,

Are missing in the duchess' cabinet.

Are the gates shut ?

Serv. Yes.

Ant. 'T is the duchess' pleasure

Each officer be lock'd into his chamber <sup>60</sup>

Till the sun-rising; and to send the keys

Of all their chests and of their outward doors

Into her bed-chamber. She is very sick.

Rod. At her pleasure.

Ant. She entreats you take 't not ill: the innocent <sup>65</sup>

Shall be the more approv'd by it.

Bos. Gentlemen o' th' wood-yard, where 's your Switzer now ?

1 Serv. By this hand, 'twas credibly reported by one o' th' black guard.<sup>1</sup> 70

[Exeunt all except ANTONIO and DELIO.]

Delio. How fares it with the duchess?

Ant. She's expos'd
Unto the worst of torture, pain and fear.

Delio. Speak to her all happy comfort.

Ant. How I do play the fool with mine own danger!

You are this night, dear friend, to post to Rome: 75

My life lies in your service.

Delio. Do not doubt me.

Ant. O, 'tis far from me: and yet fear presents me

Somewhat that looks like danger.

Delio. Believe it,
'Tis but the shadow of your fear, no more.

How superstitiously we mind our evils! 80

The throwing down salt, or crossing of a hare,

Bleeding at nose, the stumbling of a horse,

Or singing of a cricket, are of power

To daunt whole man in us. Sir, fare you well:

I wish you all the joys of a bless'd father; 85

And, for my faith, lay this unto your breast, —

Old friends, like old swords, still are trusted best. [Exit.]

[Enter CARIOLA.]

Cari. Sir, you are the happy father of a son:
Your wife commends him to you.

Ant. Blessed comfort! —

For heaven's sake, tend her well: I'll presently<sup>2</sup>

Go set a figure for 's nativity.<sup>3</sup> [Exeunt. 91

SCENE III.<sup>4</sup>

[Enter BOSOLA, with a dark lantern.]

Bos. Sure I did hear a woman shriek: list,
ha!

And the sound came, if I receiv'd it right,
From the duchess' lodgings. There's some stratagem

In the confining all our courtiers

To their several wards: I must have part of it;

My intelligence will freeze else. List, again! 6

It may be 't was the melancholy bird,

Best friend of silence and of solitariness,

The owl, that scream'd so. — Ha! Antonio!

[Enter ANTONIO with a candle, his sword drawn.]

Ant. I heard some noise. — Who's there?
What art thou? Speak. 10

Bos. Antonio, put not your face nor body
To such a forc'd expression of fear;

I am Bosola, your friend.

Ant. Bosola! —

[Aside.] This mole does undermine me. —

Heard you not

A noise even now?

Bos. From whence?

Ant. From the duchess' lodging. 15

Bos. Not I: did you?

<sup>4</sup> The court of the same palace.

Ant. I did, or else I dream'd.

Bos. Let 's walk towards it.

Ant. No: it may be 't was

But the rising of the wind.

Bos. Very likely.

Methinks 't is very cold, and yet you sweat:

You look wildly.

Ant. I have been setting a figure<sup>5</sup> 20

For the duchess' jewels.

Bos. Ah, and how falls your question?

Do you find it radical?<sup>6</sup>

Ant. What's that to you?

'T is rather to be question'd what design,

When all men were commanded to their lodgings,

Makes you a night-walker.

Bos. In sooth, I'll tell you: 25

Now all the court 's asleep, I thought the devil

Had least to do here; I came to say my prayers;

And 't do offend you I do so,

You are a fine courtier.

Ant. [Aside.] This fellow will undo me, —

You gave the duchess apiece to-day: 30

Pray heaven they were not poison'd!

Bos. Poison'd! a Spanish fig

For the imputation!

Ant. Traitors are ever confident

Till they are discover'd. There were jewels

stol'n too: 35

In my conceit, none are to be suspected

More than yourself.

Bos. You are a false steward.

Ant. Sancy slave, I'll pull thee up by the roots.

Bos. May be the ruin will crush you to pieces.

Ant. You are an impudent snake indeed, sir:

Are you scarce warm, and do you show your sting? 40

You libel<sup>7</sup> well, sir?

Bos. No, sir: copy it out,

And I will set my hand to 't.

Ant. [Aside.] My nose bleeds.

One that were superstitious would count

This ominous, when it merely comes by chance.

Two letters, that are wrought here for my name,<sup>8</sup> 46

Are drown'd in blood!

Mere accident. — For you, sir, I'll take order

I' th' morn you shall be safe. — [Aside.] 'T is that must colour

Her lying-in. — Sir, this door you pass not:

I do not hold it fit that you come near 50

The duchess' lodgings, till you have quit yourself. —

[Aside.] The great are like the base, nay, they are the same,

When they seek shameful ways to avoid shame.

Exit.

Bos. Antonio hereabout did drop a paper: —

Some of your help, false friend.<sup>9</sup> — O, here it is.

What's here? a child's nativity calculated! 55

[Reads.]

'The duchess was deliver'd of a son, 'tween the

hours twelve and one in the night, Anno Dom. 1504.' — that's this year — 'decimo nono Decembris,' — that's this night — 'taken accord-<sup>60</sup> ing to the meridian of Malfi,' — that's our duchess: happy discovery! — 'The lord of the first house being embust in the ascendant signifies short life; and Mars being in a human sign, joined to the tail of the Dragon, in the eighth<sup>65</sup> house, doth threaten a violent death. Cætera non scrutantur.'<sup>1</sup>

Why, now 'tis most apparent; this precise fellow

Is the duchess' bawd: — I have it to my wish! This is a parcel of intelligency<sup>2</sup>

Our courtiers were eas'd up for: it needs must follow

That I must be committed on pretence Of poisoning her; which I'll endure, and laugh at.

If one could find the father now! but that Time will discover. Old Castruccio<sup>75</sup>

I' th' morning posts to Rome: by him I'll send A letter that shall make her brothers' galls

O'erflow their livers. This was a thrifty<sup>3</sup> way! Though Lust do mask in ne'er so strange disguise,

She's oft found witty, but is never wise.<sup>80</sup>

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.<sup>4</sup>

[Enter] CARDINAL and JULIA.

Card. Sit: thou art my best of wishes. Pri-thee, tell me

What trick didst thou invent to come to Rome
Without thy husband?

Julia. Why, my lord, I told him
I came to visit an old anchorite<sup>5</sup>
Here for devotion.

Card. Thou art a witty false one, —
I mean, to him.

Julia. You have prevail'd with me
Beyond my strongest thoughts; I would not
now

Find you inconstant.

Card. Do not put thyself
To such a voluntary torture, which proceeds
Out of your own guilt.

Julia. How, my lord!

Card. You fear<sup>10</sup>
My constancy, because you have approv'd<sup>6</sup>
Those giddy and wild turnings in yourself.

Julia. Did you e'er find them?

Card. Sooth, generally for women,
A man might strive to make glass malleable,
Ere he should make them fixed.

Julia. So, my lord.<sup>15</sup>

Card. We had need go borrow that fantastic glass

Invented by Galileo the Florentine
To view another spacious world i' th' moon,
And look to find a constant woman there.

Julia. This is very well, my lord.

Card. Why do you weep?<sup>20</sup>

Are tears your justification? The self-same
tears

Will fall into your husband's bosom, lady,
With a loud protestation that you love him
Above the world. Come, I'll love you wisely,
That's jealously; since I am very certain<sup>25</sup>
You cannot make me cuckold.

Julia. I'll go home
To my husband.

Card. You may thank me, lady,
I have taken you off your melancholy perch,
Bore you upon my fist, and show'd you game,
And let you fly at it. — I pray thee, kiss<sup>30</sup>
me. —

When thou wast with thy husband, thou wast
watch'd

Like a tame elephant: — still you are to thank
me: —

Thou hadst only kisses from him and high feeding;

But what delight was that? 'T was just like
one

That hath a little fing'ring on the lute,<sup>35</sup>
Yet cannot tune it: — still you are to thank
me.

Julia. You told me of a piteous wound i' th'
heart,

And a sick liver, when you woo'd me first,
And spake like one in physic.<sup>7</sup>

Card. Who's that? —

[Enter Servant.]

Rest firm for my affection to thee,<sup>40</sup>
Lightning moves slow to 't.

Serv. Madam, a gentleman
That's come post from Malfi, desires to see
you.

Card. Let him enter: I'll withdraw. Exit.
Serv. He says

Your husband, old Castruccio, is come to Rome,

Most pitifully tir'd with riding post. [Exit.]<sup>45</sup>

[Enter DELIO.]

Julia. [Aside.] Signior Delio! 'tis one of my old suitors.

Delio. I was bold to come and see you.
Julia. Sir, you are welcome.

Delio. Do you lie here?
Julia. Sure, your own experience

Will satisfy you no: our Roman prelates
Do not keep lodging for ladies.

Delio. Very well:<sup>50</sup>
I have brought you no commendations from your husband,

For I know none by him.
Julia. I hear he's come to Rome.

Delio. I never knew man and beast, of a horse and a knight,

So weary of each other. If he had had a good
back,

He would have undertook to have borne his horse,<sup>55</sup>

His breech was so pitifully sore.

Julia. Your laughter
Is my pity.

<sup>7</sup> Sick.

Delio. Lady, I know not whether You want money, but I have brought you some.

Julia. From my husband?

Delio. No, from mine own allowance. 60

Julia. I must hear the condition, ere I be bound to take it.

Delio. Look on 't, 'tis gold; hath it not a fine colour?

Julia. I have a bird more beautiful.

Delio. Try the sound on 't.

It hath no smell, like cassia or civet; 65

Nor is it physical,<sup>1</sup> though some fond doctors
Persuade us see the 't in cullises.<sup>2</sup> I'll tell you,

This is a creature bred by —

[Re-enter Servant.]

Serv. Your husband's come,
Hath deliver'd a letter to the Duke of Calabria

That, to my thinking, hath put him out of his wits. Exit. 70

Julia. Sir, you hear:

Pray, let me know your business and your suit
As briefly as can be.

Delio. With good speed: I would wish you,
At such time as you are non-resident 75

With your husband, my mistress.

Julia. Sir, I'll go ask my husband if I shall,
And straight return your answer. Exit.

Delio. Very fine!
Is this her wit, or honesty, that speaks thus?

I heard one say the duke was highly mov'd 80

With a letter sent from Malfi. I do fear Antonio is betray'd. How fearfully

Shows his ambition now! Unfortunate fortune!

They pass through whirl-pools, and deep woes
do shun,

Who the event weigh ere the action's done. 85

SCENE V.<sup>3</sup>

[Enter] CARDINAL and FERDINAND with a letter.

Ferd. I have this night digg'd up a mandrake.<sup>4</sup>

Card. Say you?

Ferd. And I am grown mad with 't.

Card. What's the prodigy?

Ferd. Read there,— a sister damn'd; she's loose i' th' hilts;<sup>5</sup>

Grown a notorious strumpet.

Card. Speak lower.

Ferd. Lower!

Rogues do not whisper 't now, but seek to publish 't 5

(As servants do the bounty of their lords)
Aloud; and with a covetous searching eye,

To mark who note them. O, confusion seize
her!

She hath had most cunning bawds to serve her
turn,

And more secure conveyances for lust 10
Than towns of garrison for service.

Card. Is 't possible?

Can this be certain?

Ferd. Rhubarb, O, for rhubarb
To purge this choler! Here's the cursed day

To prompt my memory; and here 't shall stick
Till of her bleeding heart I make a sponge 15

To wipe it out.

Card. Why do you make yourself
So wild a tempest?

Ferd. Would I could be one,
That I might toss her palace 'bout her ears,

Root up her goodly forests, blast her meads,
And lay her general territory as waste 20

As she hath done her honours.

Card. Shall our blood,
The royal blood of Arragon and Castile,

Be thus attainted?

Ferd. Apply desperate physic:
We must not now use balsamum, but fire,

The smarting cupping-glass, for that's the mean 25

To purge infected blood, such blood as hers.
There is a kind of pity in mine eye,—

I'll give it to my handkercher; and now 'tis
here,

I'll bequeath this to her bastard.

Card. What to do?

Ferd. Why, to make soft lint for his mother's wounds, 30

When I have hew'd her to pieces.

Card. Curs'd creature!
Unequal nature, to place women's hearts

So far upon the left side! 6

Ferd. Foolish men,
That e'er will trust their honour in a bark

Made of so slight weak bulrush as is woman, 35

Apt every minute to sink it!

Card. Thus ignorance, when it hath purchas'd honour,

It cannot wield it.

Ferd. Methinks I see her laughing,— Excellent hyena! Talk to me somewhat quickly,

Or my imagination will carry me 40

To see her in the shameful act of sin.

Card. With whom? [burgheman,]

Ferd. Happily with some strong-thigh'd Or one o' th' wood-yard that can quoit the sledge 7

Or toss the bar, or else some lovely squire
That carries coals up to her privy lodgings. 45

Card. You fly beyond your reason.

Ferd. Go to, mistress!
'Tis not your whore's milk that shall quench
my wild-fire,

But your whore's blood.

Card. How idly shows this rage, which carries you,
As men convey'd by witches through the air, 50
On violent whirlwinds! This intemperate noise
Fity resembles deaf men's shrill discourse,

<sup>4</sup> The mandrake was supposed to give forth shrieks when uprooted, which drove the hearer mad.

<sup>7</sup> Throw the hammer.

Who talk aloud, thinking all other men
To have their imperfection.

Ferd. Have not you
My palsy?

Card. Yes, [but] I can be angry 55
Without this rupture. There is not in nature
A thing that makes man so deform'd, so beastly,
As doth intemperate anger. Chide yourself.
You have divers men who never yet express'd
Their strong desire of rest but by unrest, 60
By vexing of themselves. Come, put yourself
In tune.

Ferd. So I will only study to seem
The thing I am not. I could kill her now,
In you, or in myself; for I do think
It is some sin in us heaven doth revenge 65
By her.

Card. Are you stark mad?

Ferd. I would have their bodies
Burnt in a coal-pit with the ventage stopp'd,
That their curs'd smoke might not ascend to
heaven;

Or dip the sheets they lie in in pitch or sulphur, 70
Wrap them in 't, and then light them like a match;

Or else to-boil<sup>1</sup> their bastard to a cullis,
And give 't his lecherous father to renew
The sin of his back.

Card. I'll leave you.

Ferd. Nay, I have done.
I am confident, had I been damn'd in hell, 75
And should have heard of this, it would have put me

Into a cold sweat. In, in; I'll go sleep.
Till I know who leaps my sister, I'll not stir:
That known, I'll find scorpions to string my whips,
And fix her in a general eclipse. Exeunt. 80

ACT III

SCENE I.<sup>2</sup>

[Enter] ANTONIO and DELIO.

Ant. Our noble friend, my most beloved Delio!
O, you have been a stranger long at court:
Came you along with the Lord Ferdinand?

Delio. I did, sir: and how fares your noble
duchess?

Ant. Right fortunately well: she's an excellent 5

Feeder of pedigrees; since you last saw her,
She hath had two children more, a son and
daughter.

Delio. Methinks 'twas yesterday. Let me
but wink,

And not behold your face, which to mine eye
Is somewhat leaner, verily I should dream 10
It were within this half hour.

Ant. You have not been in law, friend Delio,
Nor in prison, nor a suitor at the court,
Nor begg'd the reversion of some great man's
place,

Nor troubled with an old wife, which doth
make 15
Your time so insensibly hasten.

Delio. Pray, sir, tell me,
Hath not this news arriv'd yet to the ear
Of the lord cardinal?

Ant. I fear it hath:
The Lord Ferdinand, that's newly come to
court,

Doth bear himself right dangerously.
Delio. Pray, why? 20

Ant. He is so quiet that he seems to sleep
The tempest out, as dormice do in winter.
Those houses that are haunted are most still
Till the devil be up.

Delio. What say the common people?
Ant. The common rabble do directly say 25
She is a strumpet.

Delio. And your graver heads
Which would be politic, what censure they?
Ant. They do observe I grow to infinite purchase,<sup>3</sup>

The left hand way; and all suppose the duchess
Would amend it, if she could; for, say they, 30
Great princes, though they grudge their officers
Should have such large and unconfined means
To get wealth under them, will not complain,
Lest thereby they should make them odious
Unto the people. For other obligation 35
Of love or marriage between her and me
They never dream of.

Delio. The Lord Ferdinand
Is going to bed.

[Enter DUCHESS, FERDINAND, and Attendants.]

Ferd. I'll instantly to bed,
For I am weary.—I am to bespeak
A husband for you.

Duch. For me, sir! Pray, who is 't? 40
Ferd. The great Count Malatesti.

Duch. Fie upon him!
A count! He's a mere stick of sugar-candy;
You may look quite through him. When I choose

A husband, I will marry for your honour.
Ferd. You shall do well in 't.—How is 't, worthy Antonio? 45

Duch. But, sir, I am to have private conference with you

About a scandalous report is spread
Touching mine honour.

Ferd. Let me be ever deaf to 't:
One of Pasquil's paper-bullets,<sup>4</sup> court-calumny,
A pestilent air, which princes' palaces 50
Are seldom purg'd of. Yet, say that it were true,
I pour it in your bosom, my fix'd love
Would strongly excuse, extenuate, nay, deny Faults, were they apparent in you. Go, be safe
In your own innocence.

Duch. [Aside.] O bless'd comfort! 55
This deadly air is purg'd.

Exeunt [DUCHESS, ANTONIO,
DELIO, and Attendants.]

Ferd. Her guilt treads on Hot-burning coulthers.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>5</sup> Ploughshares.

[Enter BOSOLA.]

Now, Bosola,
How thrives our intelligence?<sup>1</sup>

Bos. Sir, uncertainly:
'T is rumour'd she hath had three bastards, but
By whom we may go read i' th' stars.

Ferd. Why, some do
Hold opinion all things are written there.

Bos. Yes, if we could find spectacles to read them.

I do suspect there hath been some sorcery
Us'd on the duchess.

Ferd. Sorcery! to what purpose?

Bos. To make her dote on some desertless fellow
She shames to acknowledge.

Ferd. Can your faith give way
To think there's power in potions or in charms,
To make us love whether we will or no?

Bos. Most certainly.

Ferd. Away! these are mere gulleries,<sup>2</sup> horrid things,

Invented by some cheating mountebanks
To abuse us. Do you think that herbs or charms Can force the will? Some trials have been made

In this foolish practice, but the ingredients
Were lenitive<sup>3</sup> poisons, such as are of force
To make the patient mad; and straight the witch
Swears by equivocation they are in love.

The witch-craft lies in her rank blood. This night

I will force confession from her. You told me
You had got, within these two days, a false key
Into her bed-chamber.

Bos. I have.

Ferd. As I would wish.

Bos. What do you intend to do?

Ferd. Can you guess?

Bos. No.

Ferd. Do not ask, then:

He that can compass me, and know my drifts,
May say he hath put a girdle 'bout the world,
And sounded all her quick-sands.

Bos. I do not Think so.

Ferd. What do you think, then, pray?

Bos. That you
Are your own chronicle too much, and grossly Flatter yourself.

Ferd. Give me thy hand; I thank thee:
I never gave pension but to flatterers,
Till I entertained thee. Farewell.

That friend a great man's ruin strongly checks,
Who rails into his belief all his defects.

Exeunt.

SCENE II.<sup>4</sup>

Enter DUCHESS, ANTONIO, and CARIOLA.

Duch. Bring me the casket hither, and the glass.—

You get no lodging here to-night, my lord.

Ant. Indeed, I must persuade one.

Duch. Very good:
I hope in time 't will grow into a custom,
That noblemen shall come with cap and knee
To purchase a night's lodging of their wives.

Ant. I must lie here.

Duch. Must! You are a lord of mis-rule.

Ant. Indeed, my rule is only in the night.

Duch. To what use will you put me?

Ant. We'll sleep together.

Duch. Alas, what pleasure can two lovers find in sleep?

Cari. My lord, I lie with her often, and I
know

She'll much disquiet you.

Ant. See, you are complain'd of.

Cari. For she's the sprawling'st bedfellow.

Ant. I shall like her the better for that.

Cari. Sir, shall I ask you a question?

Ant. I pray thee, Cariola.

Cari. Wherefore still when you lie with my lady

Do you rise so early?

Ant. Labouring men

Count the clock off 'nest, Cariola,
Are glad when their task 's ended.

Duch. I'll stop your mouth. [Kisses him.]

Ant. Nay, that's but one; Venus had two soft doves

To draw her chariot; I must have another.—
[She kisses him again.]

When wilt thou marry, Cariola?

Cari. Never, my lord.

Ant. O, fie upon this single life! forgo it.

We read how Daphne, for her peevish [flight],<sup>5</sup>
Became a fruitless bay-tree; Syrinx turn'd

To the pale empty reed; Anaxarete
Was frozen into marble: whereas those

Which married, or prov'd kind unto their
friends,

Were by a gracious influence trans-shap'd
Into the olive, pomegranate, mulberry,

Became flowers, precious stones, or eminent stars.

Cari. This is a vain poetry: but I pray you,
tell me,

If there were propos'd me, wisdom, riches, and
beauty,

In three several young men, which should I
choose?

Ant. 'T is a hard question. This was Paris'
case,

And he was blind in 't, and there was a great
cause;

For how was 't possible he could judge right,
Having three amorous goddesses in view,

And they stark naked? 'T was a motion
Were able to benight the apprehension

Of the severest counsellor of Europe.

Now I look on both your faces so well form'd,
It puts me in mind of a question I would ask.

Cari. What is 't?

Ant. I do wonder why hard-favour'd ladies,
For the most part, keep worse-favour'd waiting-
women

To attend them, and cannot endure fair ones.

<sup>5</sup> Qq. read slight.

Duch. O, that's soon answer'd.
 Did you ever in your life know an ill painter Desire to have his dwelling next door to the shop
 Of an excellent picture-maker? 'T would dis-<sup>60</sup>
 grace
 His face-making, and undo him. I prithee,
 When were we so merry? My hair tangles.
Ant. Pray thee, Cariola, let's steal forth the
 room,
 And let her talk to herself: I have divers times
 Serv'd her the like, when she hath chaf'd ex-<sup>66</sup> tremely.
 I love to see her angry. Softly, Cariola.

Exeunt [ANTONIO and CARIOLA].
Duch. Doth not the colour of my hair 'gin to change?
 When I wax gray, I shall have all the court
 Powder their hair with arras,<sup>1</sup> to be like me.<sup>69</sup>
 You have cause to love me; I ent'red you into my heart

[Enter FERDINAND unseem.]

Before you would vouchsafe to call for the keys.
 We shall one day have my brothers take you napping.
 Methinks his presence, being now in court,
 Should make you keep your own bed; but you'll
 say
 Love mixt with fear is sweetest. I'll assure you,
 You shall get no more children till my brothers Consent to be your gossips. Have you lost your tongue?
 'T is welcome:<sup>69</sup>
 For know, whether I am doom'd to live or die,
 I can do both like a prince.

Ferd. Die, then, quickly.
Giving her a poniard.
 Virtue, where art thou hid? What hideous
 thing
 Is it that doth eclipse thee?
Duch. Pray, sir, hear me.
Ferd. Or is it true thou art but a bare name,
 And no essential thing?

Duch. Sir —
Ferd. Do not speak.<sup>76</sup>
Duch. No, sir:
 I will plant my soul in mine ears, to hear you.
Ferd. O most imperfect light of human
 reason,
 That mak'st [us] so unhappy to foresee
 What we can least prevent! Pursue thy wishes,
 And glory in them: there's in shame no com-<sup>81</sup>
 fort
 But to be past all bounds and sense of shame.

Duch. I pray, sir, hear me: I am married.
Ferd. So!
Duch. Happily, not to your liking: but for
 that,
 Alas, your shears do come untimely now<sup>85</sup>
 To clip the bird's wings that's already flown!
 Will you see my husband?
Ferd. Yes, if I could change
 Eyes with a basilisk.

<sup>1</sup> Powder of orris-root.

Duch. Sure, you came hither
 By his confederacy.
Ferd. The howling of a wolf<sup>89</sup>
 Is music to thee, screech-owl: prithee, peace.—
 Whate'er thou art that hast enjoy'd my sister,
 For I am sure thou hear'st me, for thine own
 sake

Let me not know thee. I came hither prepar'd
 To work thy discovery; yet am now persuaded
 It would beget such violent effects<sup>95</sup>
 As would damn us both. I would not for ten millions

I had beheld thee: therefore use all means
 I never may have knowledge of thy name;
 Enjoy thy lust still, and a wretched life,
 On that condition. — And for thee, wild woman,
 If thou do wish thy lecher may grow old<sup>101</sup>
 In thy embracements, I would have thee build
 Such a room for him as our anchorites
 To holier use inhabit. Let not the sun Shine on him till he's dead; let dogs and mon-<sup>105</sup>
 keys

Only converse with him, and such dumb things
 To whom nature denies use to sound his name;
 Do not keep a paraquito, lest she learn it;
 If thou do love him, cut out thine own tongue,
 Lest it bewray him.

Duch. Why might not I marry? <sup>110</sup>
 I have not gone about in this to create
 Any new world or custom.

Ferd. Thou art undone;
 And thou hast ta'en that massy sheet of lead
 That hid thy husband's bones, and folded it
 About my heart.

Duch. Mine bleeds for 't.
Ferd. Thine! thy heart! <sup>115</sup>
 What should I name 't, unless a hollow bullet
 Fill'd with unquenchable wild-fire?

Duch. You are in this Too strict; and were you not my princely
 brother,
 I would say, too wilful: my reputation
 Is safe.

Ferd. Dost thou know what reputation is?
 I'll tell thee, — to small purpose, since th' in-<sup>121</sup>
 struction

Comes now too late.
 Upon a time Reputation, Love, and Death,
 Would travel o'er the world; and it was concluded

That they should part, and take three several ways.<sup>125</sup>
 Death told them, they should find him in great battles,

Or cities plagu'd with plagues; Love gives them counsel
 To inquire for him 'mongst unambitious shepherds,

Where dowries were not talk'd of and sometimes
 'Mongst quiet kindred that had nothing left<sup>130</sup>
 By their dead parents: 'Stay,' quoth Reputation,

'Do not forsake me; for it is my nature,
 If once I part from any man I meet,
 I am never found again.' And so for you:
 You have shook hands with Reputation,<sup>135</sup>

And made him invisible. So, fare you well:
I will never see you more.

Duch. Why should only I,
Of all the other princes of the world,
Be cas'd up, like a holy relie? I have youth
And a little beauty.

Ferd. So you have some virgins 140
That are witches. I will never see thee more.

Exit.

Re-enter ANTONIO with a pistol, [and CARIOLA.]

Duch. You saw this apparition?

Ant. Yes: we are Betray'd. How came he hither? I should turn
This to thee, for that.

Cari. Pray, sir, do; and when
That you have cleft my heart, you shall read
there 145
Mine innocence.

Duch. That gallery gave him entrance.

Ant. I would this terrible thing would come
again,
That, standing on my guard, I might relate
My warrantable love. —

(She shows the poniard.)

Ha! what means this?

Duch. He left this with me,

Ant. And it seems did wish 150
You would use it on yourself.

Duch. His action seem'd
To intend so much.

Ant. This hath a handle to 't,
As well as a point: turn it towards him, and
So fasten the keen edge in his rank gall,

[Knocking within.]

How now! who knocks? More earthquakes? 155

Duch. I stand
As if a mine beneath my feet were ready
To be blown up.

Cari. 'T is Bosola.

Duch. Away!
O misery! methinks unjust actions
Should wear these masks and curtains, and not we.

You must instantly part hence: I have fashion'd it already. Exit ANTONIO. 160

[Enter BOSOLA.]

Bos. The duke your brother is ta'en up in a whirlwind;
Hath took horse, and 's rid post to Rome.

Duch. So late?
Bos. He told me, as he mounted into th'
saddle,

You were undone.
Duch. Indeed, I am very near it.

Bos. What's the matter? 165

Duch. Antonio, the master of our household,
Hath dealt so falsely with me in 's accounts.
My brother stood engag'd with me for money
Ta'en up of certain Neapolitan Jews,
And Antonio lets the bonds be forfeit. 170

Bos. Strange! — [Aside.] This is cunning.

Duch. And hereupon
My brother's bills at Naples are protested
Against. — Call up our officers.

Bos. I shall. Exit.

[Re-enter ANTONIO.]

Duch. The place that you must fly to is Ancona:
Hire a house there; I'll send after you 175
My treasure and my jewels. Our weak safety
Runs upon ingenious wheels: <sup>1</sup> short syllables
Must stand for periods. I must now accuse you
Of such a feigned crime as Tasso calls
Magnanima menzogna, a noble lie, 180
<sup>2</sup> Cause it must shield our honours. — Hark! they are coming.

[Re-enter BOSOLA and Officers.]

Ant. Will your grace hear me?

Duch. I have got well by you; you have yielded me
A million of loss: I am like to inherit
The people's curses for your stewardship. 185

You had the trick in audit-time to be sick,
Till I had sign'd your quietus; <sup>2</sup> and that cur'd
you
Without help of a doctor. — Gentlemen,
I would have this man be an example to you
all;

So shall you hold my favour; I pray, let him;
For h'as done that, alas, you would not think
of, 191

And, because I intend to be rid of him,
I mean not to publish. — Use your fortune elsewhere.

Ant. I am strongly arm'd to brook my overthrow,
As commonly men bear with a hard year. 196
I will not blame the cause on 't; but do think
The necessity of my malevolent star Procures this, not her humour. O, the inconstant

And rotten ground of service! You may see,
'T is even like him, that in a winter night, 200
Takes a long slumber o'er a dying fire,
A-loth to part from 't; yet parts thence as cold
As when he first sat down.

Duch. We do confiscate,
Towards the satisfying of your accounts,
All that you have.

Ant. I am all yours; and 't is very fit 205
All mine should be so.

Duch. So, sir, you have your pass.
Ant. You may see, gentlemen, what 't is to serve

A prince with body and soul. Exit.
Bos. Here's an example for extortion: what moisture is drawn out of the sea, when foul 210 weather comes, pours down, and runs into the sea again.

Duch. I would know what are your opinions
Of this Antonio. 215

2 Off. He could not abide to see a pig's head gaping: I thought your grace would find him a Jew.

3 Off. I would you had been his officer, for your own sake.

4 Off. You would have had more money. 220

<sup>1</sup> Wheels of craft.

<sup>2</sup> Certificate that the books were found correct.

1 Off. He stopp'd his ears with black wool, and to those came to him for money said he was thick of hearing.

2 Off. Some said he was an hermaphrodite, for he could not abide a woman. 225

4 Off. How scurvy proud he would look when the treasury was full! Well, let him go.

1 Off. Yes, and the chippings of the buttery fly after him, to scour his gold chain.<sup>1</sup> 229

Duch. Leave us. — Exeunt [Officers].
What do you think of these?

Bos. That these are rogues that in 's prosperity,
But to have waited on his fortune, could have wish'd

His dirty stirrup riveted through their noses,
And follow'd after 's mule, like a bear in a ring; 235

Would have prostituted their daughters to his lust;

Made their first-born intelligencers; <sup>2</sup> thought none happy

But such as were born under his blest planet,
And wore his livery; and do these lice drop off
now?

Well, never look to have the like again: 240
He hath left a sort<sup>3</sup> of flatt'ring rogues behind
him;

Their doom must follow. Princes pay flatterers in their own money; flatterers dissemble their
vices,

And they dissemble their lies; that 's justice.
Alas, poor gentleman! 245

Duch. Poor! he hath amply fill'd his coffers.
Bos. Sure, he was too honest. Pluto,<sup>4</sup> the god of riches,

When he 's sent by Jupiter to any man,
He goes limping, to signify that wealth
That comes on God's name comes slowly; but when he 's sent 250

On the devil's errand, he rides post and comes in by scuttles.<sup>5</sup>

Let me show you what a most unvalu'd jewel
You have in a wanton humour thrown away,
To bless the man shall find him. He was an excellent

Courtier and most faithful; a soldier that thought it 255

As beastly to know his own value too little
As devilish to acknowledge it too much.

Both his virtue and form deserv'd a far better
fortune:

His discourse rather delighted to judge itself
than show itself:

His breast was fill'd with all perfection, 260
And yet it seem'd a private whisp'ring-room,
It made so little noise of 't.

Duch. But he was basely descended.
Bos. Will you make yourself a mercenary herald,

Rather to examine men's pedigrees than virtues? 265

You shall want<sup>6</sup> him:
For know an honest statesman to a prince

<sup>1</sup> The badge of a steward.

<sup>6</sup> Miss.

Is like a cedar planted by a spring;
The spring bathes the tree's root, the grateful tree

Rewards it with his shadow: you have not done
so. 270

I would sooner swim to the Bermoothes on
Two politicians' rotten bladders, tied

Together with an intelligencer's heart-string,
Than depend on so changeable a prince's favour.
Fare thee well, Antonio! Since the malice of the world 275

Would needs down with thee, it cannot be said
yet

That any ill happen'd unto thee, considering thy fall

Was accompanied with virtue.
Duch. O, you render me excellent music!

Bos. — Say you?
Duch. This good one that you speak of is my husband. 280

Bos. Do I not dream? Can this ambitious age

Have so much goodness in 't as to prefer
A man merely for worth, without these shadows

Of wealth and painted honours? Possible?
Duch. I have had three children by him.

Bos. — Fortunate lady! 285

For you have made your private nuptial bed
The humble and fair seminary of peace,

No question but: many an unbenefic'd scholar
Shall pray for you for this deed, and rejoice

That some preferment in the world can yet 290
Arise from merit. The virgins of your land
That have no dowries shall hope your example

Will raise them to rich husbands. Should you want

Soldiers, 'twould make the very Turks and Moors

Turn Christians, and serve you for this act. 295

Last, the neglected poets of your time,
In honour of this trophy of a man,

Rais'd by that curious engine, your white
hand,

Shall thank you in your grave for 't, and make
that

More reverent than all the cabinets 300
Of living princes. For Antonio,

His fame shall likewise flow from many a pen,
When heralds shall want coats to sell to men.

Duch. As I taste comfort in this friendly
speech,

So would I find concealment. 305
Bos. O, the secret of my prince,

Which I will wear on th' inside of my heart!
Duch. You shall take charge of all my coin and jewels,

And follow him; for he retires himself
To Ancona.

Bos. — So. Whither, within few days, 310
Duch. I mean to follow thee.

Bos. — Let me think:

I would wish your grace to feign a pilgrimage
To our Lady of Loretto, scarce seven leagues

From fair Ancona; so may you depart
Your country with more honour, and your flight

Will seem a princely progress, retaining 319
Your usual train about you.

Duch. Sir, your direction
Shall lead me by the hand.

Curi. In my opinion,
She were better progress to the baths at Lucca,
Or go visit the Spa 320

In Germany; for, if you will believe me,
I do not like this jesting with religion,
✓ This feigned pilgrimage.

Duch. Thou art a superstitious fool:
Prepare us instantly for our departure. 325
Past sorrows, let us moderately lament them,
For those to come, seek wisely to prevent them.

[Exeunt DUCHESS and CARIOLA.]
Bos. A politician is the devil's quilted anvil;
He fashions all sins on him, and the blows
Are never heard: he may work in a lady's chamber, 330

As here for proof. What rests<sup>1</sup> but I reveal
All to my lord? O, this base quality<sup>2</sup>
Of intelligencer! Why, every quality i' th'
world

Prefers but gain or commendation:
Now, for this act I am certain to be rais'd, 335
And men that paint weeds to the life are prais'd. Exit.

SCENE III.<sup>3</sup>

[Enter] CARDINAL, FERDINAND, MALATESTI,
PESCARA, DELIO, and SILVIO.

Card. Must we turn soldier, then?
Mal. The emperor,

Hearing your worth that way, ere you attain'd
This reverend garment, joins you in commission

With the right fortunate soldier the Marquis of Pescara,
And the famous Lannoy.

Card. He that had the honour
Of taking the French king prisoner?

Mal. The same.
Here's a plot drawn for a new fortification
At Naples.

Ferd. This great Count Malatesti, I perceive,
Hath got employment?

Delio. No employment, my lord;
A marginal note in the muster-book that he
is 10

A voluntary lord.
Ferd. He's no soldier?

Delio. He has worn gun-powder in 's hollow tooth for the tooth-ache.

Sil. He comes to the leaguer with a full intent

To eat fresh beef and garlic, means to stay Till the scent be gone, and straight return to
court. 15

Delio. He hath read all the late service
As the City Chronicle relates it;
And keeps two pewterers going, only to express
Battles in model.

Sil. Then he'll fight by the book.
Delio. By the almanac, I think, 20

To choose good days and shun the critical;
That 's his mistress' scarf.

Sil. Yes, he protests
He would do much for that taffeta.

Delio. I think he would run away from a battle,

To save it from taking prisoner.
Sil. He is horribly afraid 25

Gun-powder will spoil the perfume on 't.
Delio. I saw a Dutchman break his pate
once

For calling him a pot-gun; he made his head
Have a bore in 't like a musket.

Sil. I would he had made a touch-hole to 't. 30
He is indeed a guarded sumpter-cloth,<sup>4</sup>
Only for the remove of the court.

[Enter BOSOLA.]

Pes. Bosola arriv'd! What should be the business?

Some falling-out amongst the cardinals.
These factions amongst great men, they are like 35

Foxes, when their heads are divided,
They carry fire in their tails, and all the country
About them goes to wrack for 't.

Sil. What 's that Bosola?
Delio. I knew him in Padua, — a fantastical scholar, like such who study to know how many knots was in Hercules' club, of what colour [<sup>41</sup> Achilles' beard was, or whether Hector were not troubled with the tooth-ache. He hath studied himself half blear-ey'd to know the true symmetry of Caesar's nose by a shoeing-<sup>45</sup> horn; and this he did to gain the name of a speculative man.

Pes. Mark Prince Ferdinand:
A very salamander lives in 's eye,
To mock the eager violence of fire. 50

Sil. That cardinal hath made more bad faces with his oppression than ever Michael Angelo made good ones. He lifts up 's nose, like a foul porpoise before a storm.

Pes. The Lord Ferdinand laughs.
Delio. Like a deadly cannon 55

That lightens ere it smokes.
Pes. These are your true pangs of death,
The pangs of life, that struggle with great statesmen.

Delio. In such a deformed silence witches whisper their charms.

Card. Doth she make religion her riding-
hood 60

To keep her from the sun and tempest?
Ferd. That, that damns her. Methinks her fault and beauty,

Blended together, show like leprosy,
The whiter the fouler. I make it a question Whether her beggarly brats were ever christ'ned. 65

Card. I will instantly solicit the state of Ancona

To have them banish'd.
Ferd. You are for Loretto:

4 A decorated horse-cloth, used only when the court is traveling.

<sup>3</sup> An apartment in the Cardinal's palace at Rome.

I shall not be at your ceremony, fare you well—
Write to the Duke of Malfi, my young nephew,
She had by her first husband, and acquaint
him 70

With 's mother's honesty.

Bos.

Ferd.

I will.

Antonio!

A slave that only smell'd of ink and counters,
And nev'r in 's life look'd like a gentleman,
But in the audit-time.—Go, go presently,
Draw me out an hundred and fifty of our horse, 75
And meet me at the foot-bridge. Exeunt.

SCENE IV.

[Enter] Two Pilgrims to the Shrine of our Lady of Loretto.

1 Pil. I have not seen a goodlier shrine than
this;

Yet I have visited many.

2 Pil. The Cardinal of Arragon
Is this day to resign his cardinal's hat;
His sister duchess likewise is arriv'd
To pay her vow of pilgrimage. I expect 5
A noble ceremony.

1 Pil.

No question.—They come.

[Here the ceremony of the Cardinal's instalment in the habit of a soldier perform'd in delivering up his cross, hat, robes and ring at the shrine, and investing him with sword, helmet, shield, and spurs.
Then ANTONIO, the DUCHESS and their children, having presented themselves at the shrine, are, by a form of banishment in dumb-show expressed towards them by the CARDINAL and the state of Ancona, banished: during all which ceremony, this ditty is sung, to very solemn music, by divers church-men; and then exeunt [all except the Two Pilgrims].

Arms and honours deck thy story,<sup>1</sup>

To thy fame's eternal glory!

Adverse fortune ever fly thee;

No disastrous fate come nigh thee!

I alone will sing thy praises,

Whom to honour virtue raises,

And thy study, that divine is,

Bent to martial discipline is,

Lay aside all those robes lie by thee;

Crown thy arts with arms, they 'll beautify thee. 10

O worthy of worthiest name, adorn'd in this manner,

Lead bravely thy forces on under war's warlike banner!

O, mayst thou prove fortunate in all martial courses!

Guide thou still by skill in arts and forces!

Victory attend thee nigh, whilst fame sings loud thy 20

powers;

Triumphant conquest crown thy head, and blessings

pour down showers!

1 Pil. Here 's a strange turn of state! who would have thought

So great a lady would have match'd herself

<sup>1</sup> The first quarto has in the margin: "The author disclaims this ditty to be his."

Unto so mean a person? Yet the cardinal 25
Bears himself much too cruel.

2 Pil.

They are banish'd.

1 Pil. But I would ask what power hath this state

Of Ancona to determine of a free prince?

2 Pil. They are a free state, sir, and her brother show'd

How that the Pope, fore-hearing of her loose-
ness, 30

Hath seiz'd into th' protection of the church

The dukedom which she held as dowager.

1 Pil. But by what justice?

2 Pil. Sure, I think by none,

Only her brother's instigation.

1 Pil. What was it with such violence he took 35

Off from her finger?

2 Pil.

'T was her wedding-ring;
Which he vow'd shortly he would sacrifice
To his revenge.

1 Pil. Alas, Antonio!

If that a man be thrust into a well, 38

No matter who sets hand to 't, his own weight

Will bring him sooner to th' bottom. Come, let's hence.

Fortune makes this conclusion general,

All things do help th' unhappy man to fall.

Exeunt.

SCENE V.<sup>2</sup>

[Enter] DUCHESS, ANTONIO, Children, CARI-
OLA, and Servants.

Duch. Banish'd Ancona!

Ant. Yes, you see what power
Lightens in great men's breath.

Duch. Is all our train
Shrunk to this poor remainder?

Ant.

These poor men,
Which have got little in your service, vow
To take your fortune: but your wiser bunttings,<sup>3</sup> 5

Now they are fledg'd, are gone.

Duch.

They have done wisely.
This puts me in mind of death: physicians

thus,

With their hands full of money, use to give o'er
Their patients.

Ant.

Right the fashion of the world: 's
From decay'd fortunes every flatterer shrinks;
Men cease to build where the foundation sinks.

Duch. I had a very strange dream to-night.

Ant.

What was 't?
Duch. Methought I wore my coronet of
state,

And on a sudden all the diamonds

Were chang'd to pearls.

Ant.

My interpretation 15
Is, you 'll weep shortly; for 's me the pearls
Do signify your tears.

Duch.

The birds, that live i' th' field
On the wild benefit of nature, live Happier than we: for they may choose their mates,

And carol their sweet pleasures to the spring. 20

<sup>3</sup> Small birds.

[Enter BOSOLA with a letter.]

Bos. You are happily o'erta'en.

Duch. From my brother?

Bos. Yes, from the Lord Ferdinand your brother

All love and safety.

Duch. Thou dost blanch mischief, Would'st make it white. See, see, like to calm weather

At sea before a tempest, false hearts speak fair

To those they intend most mischief. [Reads.] "Send Antonio to me; I want his head in a business."

A politic equivocation!

He doth not want your counsel, but your head; That is, he cannot sleep till you be dead.

And here's another pitfall that's strew'd o'er With roses; mark it, 't is a cunning one:

[Reads.] "I stand engaged for your husband for several debts at Naples: let not that trouble him; I had rather have his heart than his money." — And I believe so too.

Bos. What do you believe?

Duch. That he so much distrusts my husband's love,

He will by no means believe his heart is with him Until he see it: the devil is not cunning enough To circumvent us in riddles.

Bos. Will you reject that noble and free league

Of amity and love which I present you?

Duch. Their league is like that of some politic kings,

Only to make themselves of strength and power

To be our after-ruin: tell them so.

Bos. And what from you?

Ant. Thus tell him; I will not come.

Bos. And what of this?

Ant. My brothers have dispers'd Bloodhounds abroad; which till I hear are muzzl'd,

No truce, though hatch'd with ne'er such politic skill,

Is safe, that hangs upon our enemies' will.

I'll not come at them.

Bos. This proclaims your breeding.

Every small thing draws a base mind to fear As the adamant draws iron. Fare you well, sir;

You shall shortly hear from 's. Exit.

Duch. I suspect some ambush;

Therefore by all my love I do conjure you

To take your eldest son, and fly towards Milan,

Let us not venture all this poor remainder

In one unlucky bottom.

Ant. You counsel safely.

Best of my life, farewell. Since we must part,

Heaven hath a hand in 't; but no otherwise

Than as some curious artist takes in sunder

A clock or watch, when it is out of frame,

To bring 't in better order.

Duch. I know not which is best,

To see you dead, or part with you. Farewell,

boy:

Thou art happy that thou hast not understand-
ing

To know thy misery; for all our wit And reading brings us to a truer sense Of sorrow. — In the eternal church, sir, I do hope we shall not part thus.

Ant. O, be of comfort!

Make patience a noble fortitude, And think not how unkindly we are us'd;

Man, like to cassia, is prov'd best, being bruis'd.

Duch. Must I, like to a slave-born Russian, Account it praise to suffer tyranny?

And yet, O heaven, thy heavy hand is in 't!

I have seen my little boy oft scourge his top,

And compar'd myself to 't: naught made me

Go right but heaven's scourge-stick.

Ant. Do not weep:

Heaven fashion'd us of nothing; and we strive

To bring ourselves to nothing. — Farewell,

Cariola,

And thy sweet armful. — If I do never see thee

Be a good mother to your little ones,

And save them from the tiger: fare you well.

Duch. Let me look upon you once more, for that speech

Came from a dying father. Your kiss is colder

Than that I have seen an holy anchorite

Give to a dead man's skull.

Ant. My heart is turn'd to a heavy lump of lead,

With which I sound my danger: fare you well.

Ereunt [ANTONIO and his son].

Duch. My laurel is all withered.

Carl. Look, madam, what a troop of armed

men

Make toward us!

Re-enter BOSOLA [visarded,] with a Guard.

Duch. O, they are very welcome:

When Fortune's wheel is over-charge'd with princes,

The weight makes it move swift: I would have my ruin

Be sudden. — I am your adventure, am I not?

Bos. You are: you must see your husband no

more.

Duch. What devil art thou that counterfeit'st heaven's thunder?

Bos. Is that terrible? I would have you tell me whether

Is that note worse that frights the silly birds

Out of the corn, or that which doth allure them

To the nets? You have heark'ned to the last too much.

Duch. O misery! like to a rusty o'ercharg'd cannon,

Shall I never fly in pieces? Come, to what prison?

Bos. To none.

Duch. Whither, then?

Bos. To your palace.

Duch. I have heard

That Charon's boat serves to convey all o'er

The dismal lake, but brings none back again.

Bos. Your brothers mean you safety and pity.

Duch. Pity!
With such a pity men preserve alive
Pheasants and quails, when they are not fat
enough 110

To be eaten.
Bos. These are your children?
Duch. Yes.
Bos. Can they prattle?
Duch. No:

But I intend, since they were born accurs'd,
Curses shall be their first language.

Bos. Fie, madam!
Forget this base, low fellow —

Duch. Were I a man, 115
I'd beat that counterfeit face<sup>1</sup> into thy other.
Bos. One of no birth.

Duch. Say that he was born mean,
Man is most happy when 's own actions
Be arguments and examples of his virtue.

Bos. A barren, beggarly virtue. 120
Duch. I prithee, who is greatest? Can you tell?

Sad tales befit my woe: I'll tell you one.
A salmon, as she swam unto the sea,
Met with a dog-fish, who encounters her
With this rough language; 'Why art thou so bold 125

To mix thyself with our high state of floods,
Being no eminent courtier, but one
That for the calmest and fresh time o' th' year

Dost live in shallow rivers, rank'st thyself
With silly smelts and shrimps? And darest
thou 130

Pass by our dog-ship without reverence?'
'O,' quoth the salmon, 'sister, be at peace:
Thank Jupiter we both have pass'd the net!
Our value never can be truly known,
Till in the fisher's basket we be shown: 135
I th' market then my price may be the higher,
Even when I am nearest to the cook and fire.'

So to great men the moral may be stretched;
Men oft are valu'd high, when they're most wretched. —

But come, whither you please. I am arm'd
'gainst misery; 140

Bent to all sways of the oppressor's will.
There's no deep valley but near some great hill. Exeunt.

ACT IV

SCENE I.<sup>2</sup>

[Enter] FERDINAND and BOSOLA.

Ferd. How doth our sister duchess bear herself
In her imprisonment?

Bos. Nobly: I'll describe her.
She's sad as one long us'd to't, and she seems Rather to welcome the end of misery
Than shun it; a behaviour so noble 5
As gives a majesty to adversity:

You may discern the shape of loveliness
More perfect in her tears than in her smiles:
She will muse four hours together; and her silence,

Methinks, expreseth more than if she spake. 10
Ferd. Her melancholy seems to be fortified
With a strange disdain.

Bos. 'T is so; and this restraint,
Like English mastives that grow fierce with ty-
ing,

Makes her too passionately apprehend
Those pleasures she is kept from.

Ferd. Curse upon her! 15
I will no longer study in the book
Of another's heart. Inform her what I told
you. Exit.

[Enter DUCHESS and Attendants.]

Bos. All comfort to your grace!

Duch. I will have none.
Pray thee, why dost thou wrap thy poison'd
pills

In gold and sugar? 20
Bos. Your elder brother, the Lord Ferdinand,

Is come to visit you, and sends you word,
'Cause once he rashly made a solemn vow
Never to see you more, he comes i' th' night;
And prays you gently neither torch nor taper 25
Shine in your chamber. He will kiss your hand,
And reconcile himself; but for his vow
He dares not see you.

Duch. At his pleasure. —
Take hence the lights. — He's come.
[Reunt Attendants with lights.]

[Enter FERDINAND.]

Ferd. Where are you?

Duch. Here, sir.

Ferd. This darkness suits you well.

Duch. I would ask you pardon. 30

Ferd. You have it;
For I account it the honorabl'st revenge,
Where I may kill, to pardon. — Where are your cubs?

Duch. Whom?

Ferd. Call them your children;
For though our national law distinguish bastards 35

From true legitimate issue, compassionate nature
Makes them all equal.

Duch. Do you visit me for this?
You violate a sacrament o' th' church
Shall make you howl in hell for't.

Ferd. It had been well 39
Could you have liv'd thus always; for, indeed,
You were too much i' th' light: — but no more;
I come to seal my peace with you. Here's a hand Gives her a dead man's hand.
To which you have vow'd much love; the ring
upon't

You gave.
Duch. I affectionately kiss it.

Ferd. Pray, do, and bury the print of it in your heart. 45
I will leave this ring with you for a love-token;

And the hand as sure as the ring ; and do not doubt

But you shall have the heart too. When you need a friend,

Send it to him that ow'd it ; you shall see Whether he can aid you.

Duch. You are very cold : so I fear you are not well after your travel. — Ha ! lights ! — O, horrible !

Ferd. Let her have lights enough. Exit.
Duch. What witchcraft doth he practise, that he hath left

A dead man's hand here ?

Here is discover'd, behind a traverse,<sup>1</sup> the artificial figures of ANTONIO and his children, appearing as if they were dead.

Bos. Look you, here 's the piece from which 't was ta'en. <sup>55</sup>

He doth present you this sad spectacle, That, now you know directly they are dead, Hereafter you may wisely cease to grieve For that which cannot be recovered.

Duch. There is not between heaven and earth one wish <sup>60</sup>

I stay for after this. It wastes me more Than were 't my picture, fashion'd out of wax, Stuck with a magical needle, and then buried In some foul dung hill ; and yon's an excellent property

For a tyrant, which I would account mercy.

Bos. What 's that ? <sup>65</sup>

Duch. If they would bind me to that lifeless trunk,

And let me freeze to death.

Bos. Come, you must live.

Duch. That 's the greatest torture souls feel in hell,

In hell, that they must live, and cannot die.

Portia,<sup>2</sup> I 'll new kindle thy coals again, <sup>70</sup>
And revive the rare and almost dead example Of a loving wife.

Bos. O, fie ! despair ? Remember You are a Christian.

Duch. The church enjoins fasting : I 'll starve myself to death.

Bos. Leave this vain sorrow. Things being at the worst begin to mend : the <sup>75</sup>

bee
When he hath shot his sting into your hand, May then play with your eye-lid.

Duch. Good comfortable fellow, Persuade a wretch that 's broke upon the wheel To have all his bones new set ; entreat him live To be executed again. Who must despatch me ? I account this world a tedious theatre. <sup>81</sup>

For I do play a part in 't 'gainst my will.

Bos. Come, be of comfort ; I will save your life.

Duch. Indeed, I have not leisure to tend so small a business.

Bos. Now, by my life, I pity you.

Duch. Thou art a fool, then, <sup>85</sup>
To waste thy pity on a thing so wretched

As cannot pity itself. I am full of daggers. Puff, let me blow these vipers from me.

[Enter Servant.]

What are you ?

Serv. One that wishes you long life.

Duch. I would thou wert hang'd for the horrible curse <sup>90</sup>

Thou hast given me : I shall shortly grow one Of the miracles of pity. I 'll go pray ; —

[Exit Serv.]

No, I 'll go curse.

Bos. O, fie !

Duch. I could curse the stars —

Bos. O, fearful !

Duch. And those three smiling seasons of the year

Into a Russian winter ; nay, the world <sup>95</sup>
To its first chaos.

Bos. Look you, the stars shine still.

Duch. O, but you must Remember, my curse hath a great way to go. — Plagues, that make lanes through largest families,

Consume them ! —

Bos. Fie, lady !

Duch. Let them, like tyrants, <sup>100</sup>

Never be remembered but for the ill they have done ;

Let all the zealous prayers of mortified

Churchmen forget them ! —

Bos. O, uncharitable !

Duch. Let heaven a little while cease crowning martyrs,

To punish them ! — <sup>105</sup>

Go, howl them this, and say, I long to bleed : It is some mercy when men kill with speed.

Exit.

[Re-enter FERDINAND.]

Ferd. Excellent, as I would wish ; she 's plagu'd in art.<sup>3</sup>

These presentations are but fram'd in wax By the curious master in that quality, <sup>110</sup>

Vincenzio Lauriola, and she takes them

For true substantial bodies.

Bos. Why do you do this ?

Ferd. To bring her to despair.

Bos. Faith, end here,

And go no farther in your cruelty :

Send her a penitential garment to put on <sup>115</sup>

Next to her delicate skin, and furnish her

With beads and prayer-books.

Ferd. Damn her ! that body of hers, While that my blood ran pure in 't, was more

worth

Than that which thou wouldst comfort, call'd a soul. <sup>119</sup>

I will send her masques of common courtesans,

Have her meat serv'd up by bawds and ruffians.

And, 'cause she 'll needs be mad, I am resolv'd

To move forth the common hospital

All the mad-folk, and place them near her lodging ;

There let them practise together, sing and dance,<sup>125</sup>

And act their gambols to the full o' th' moon :
If she can sleep the better for it, let her.
Your work is almost ended.

Bos. Must I see her again ?

Ferd. Yes.

Bos. Never.

Ferd. You must.

Bos. Never in mine own shape;
That 's forfeited by my intelligence<sup>1</sup> 130
And this last cruel lie : when you send me next,
The business shall be comfort.

Ferd. Very likely,
Thy pity is nothing of kin to thee. Antonio
Lurks about Milan : thou shalt shortly thither,
To feed a fire as great as my revenge,<sup>135</sup>
Which nev'r will slack till it hath spent his fuel :

Intemperate agues make physicians cruel.

Ezeuni.

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter DUCHESS and CARIOLA.

Duch. What hideous noise was that ?

Cari. 'Tis the wild consort<sup>3</sup>
Of madmen, lady, which your tyrant brother
Hath plac'd about your lodging. This tyranny,
I think, was never practis'd till this hour.

Duch. Indeed, I thank him. Nothing but noise and folly<sup>5</sup>

Can keep me in my right wits ; whereas reason
And silence make me stark mad. Sit down ;
Discourse to me some dismal tragedy.

Cari. O, 't will increase your melancholy !

Duch. Thou art deceiv'd :
To hear of greater grief would lessen mine. 10
This is a prison ?

Cari. Yes, but you shall live
To shake this durance off.

Duch. Thou art a fool :
The robin-red-breast and the nightingale
Never live long in cages.

Cari. Pray, dry your eyes.
What think you of, madam ?

Duch. Of nothing ; 15
When I muse thus, I sleep.

Cari. Like a madman, with your eyes open ?

Duch. Dost thou think we shall know one another
In th' other world ?

Cari. Yes, out of question.

Duch. O, that it were possible we might 20
But hold some two days' conference with the
dead !

From them I should learn somewhat, I am sure,
I never shall know here. I'll tell thee a miracle :

I am not mad yet, to my cause of sorrow :
Th' heaven o'er my head seems made of molten
brass, 25

The earth of flaming sulphur, yet I am not
mad.

I am acquainted with sad misery

<sup>3</sup> Band.

As the tann'd galley-slave is with his oar ;
Necessity makes me suffer constantly,
And custom makes it easy. Who do I look like
now ? 30

Cari. Like to your picture in the gallery,
A deal of life in show, but none in practice ;
Or rather like some reverend monument
Whose ruins are even pitied.

Duch. Very proper ;
And Fortune seems only to have her eye-sight
'To behold my tragedy.— How now ! 35
What noise is that ?

[Enter Servant.]

Serv. I am come to tell you
Your brother hath intended you some sport.
A great physician, when the Pope was sick
Of a deep melancholy, presented him 40
With several sorts<sup>4</sup> of madmen, which wild object

Being full of change and sport, forc'd him to laugh,

And so th' imposthume<sup>5</sup> broke : the self-same
cure

The duke intends on you.

Duch. Let them come in.

Serv. There's a mad lawyer ; and a secular priest ; 45

A doctor that hath forfeited his wits
By jealousy ; an astrologian

That in his works said such a day o' th' month
Should be the day of doom, and, failing of 't,

Ran mad ; an English tailor craz'd i' th' brain
With the study of new fashions ; a gentleman-usher 51

Quite beside himself with care to keep in mind
The number of his lady's salutations,

Or 'How do you,' she employ'd him in each morning ;

A farmer, too, an excellent knave in grain,<sup>6</sup> 55
Mad 'cause he was hind' red transportation :<sup>7</sup>

And let one broker that 's mad loose to these,
You'd think the devil were among them.

Duch. Sit, Cariola.— Let them loose when you please,

For I am chain'd to endure all your tyranny. 60

[Enter Madman.]

Here by a Madman this song is sung to a dismal kind of music.

O, let us howl some heavy note,
Some deadly dogged howl,

Sounding as from the threat'ning throat
Of beasts and fatal fowl !

As ravens, screech-owls, bulls, and bears, 65

We'll bell, and bawl our parts,

Till irksome noise have cloy'd your ears
And corrosiv'd your hearts.

At last, when as our choir wants breath,
Our bodies being blest, 70

We'll sing, like swans, to welcome death,
And die in love and rest.

1 Madman. Doom's-day not come yet ! I'll draw it nearer by a perspective,<sup>8</sup> or make a [74

glass that shall set all the world on fire upon an instant. I cannot sleep; my pillow is stuff with a litter of porcupines.

<sup>2</sup> Madman. Hell is a mere glass-house, where the devils are continually blowing up women's souls on hollow irons, and the fire never goes out.

<sup>3</sup> Madman. I will lie with every woman in my parish the tenth night. I will tithe them over like hay-cocks. <sup>84</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Madman. Shall my 'pothecary out-go me, because I am a cuckold? I have found out his roguery: he makes alum of his wife's urine, and sells it to Puritans that have sore throats with over-straining.

<sup>3</sup> Madman. You do give for your crest a wood-cock's head with the brains pickt out on't; you are a very ancient gentleman. <sup>94</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Madman. Greek is turn'd Turk: we are only to be sav'd by the Helvetian translation.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Madman. O, rather lay a corrosive: the law will eat to the bone. <sup>100</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Madman. If I had my glass here, I would show a sight should make all the women here call me mad doctor. <sup>106</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Madman. All the college may throw their caps at me: I have made a soap-boiler cos- [120 tive; it was my masterpiece.

Here the dance, consisting of Eight Madmen, with music answerable thereunto; after which, BOSOLA, like an old man, enters.

Duch. Is he mad too?

Serv. Pray, question him. I'll leave you. [Exeunt Servant and Madmen.]

Bos. I am come to make thy tomb.

Duch. Ha! my tomb! Thou speak'st as if I lay upon my death-bed, Gasping for breath. Dost thou perceive me sick? <sup>125</sup>

Bos. Yes, and the more dangerously, since thy sickness is insensible.

Duch. Thou art not mad, sure: dost know me?

Bos. Yes.

<sup>4</sup> A warm drink containing milk, wine, etc.

Duch. Who am I?

Bos. Thou art a box of worm-seed, at best but a salvatory<sup>5</sup> of green mummy.<sup>6</sup> What's this flesh? A little crudded<sup>7</sup> milk, fantastical puff-paste. Our bodies are weaker than those paper-prisons boys use to keep flies in; more contemptible, since ours is to preserve earth-worms. Didst thou ever see a lark in [135 a cage? Such is the soul in the body: this world is like her little turf of grass, and the heaven o'er our heads, like her looking-glass, only gives us a miserable knowledge of the small compass of our prison. <sup>140</sup>

Duch. Am I not thy duchess?

Bos. Thou art some great woman, sure, for riot begins to sit on thy forehead (clad in gray hairs) twenty years sooner than on a merry milk-maid's. Thou sleep'st worse than if a [145 mouse should be forc'd to take up her lodging in a cat's ear: a little infant that breeds its teeth, should it lie with thee, would cry out, as if thou wert the more unquiet bedfellow.

Duch. I am Duchess of Malfi still. <sup>150</sup>

Bos. That makes thy sleep so broken: Glories, like glow-worms, afar off shine bright, But, look'd to near, have neither heat nor light.

Duch. Thou art very plain.

Bos. My trade is to flatter the dead, not [155 the living; I am a tomb-maker.

Duch. And thou com'st to make my tomb?

Bos. Yes.

Duch. Let me be a little merry:—of what stuff wilt thou make it? <sup>160</sup>

Bos. Nay, resolve me first, of what fashion?

Duch. Why, do we grow fantastical on our deathbed?

Do we affect fashion in the grave?

Bos. Most ambitiously. Princes' images on their tombs do not lie, as they were wont, [165 seeming to pray up to heaven; but with their hands under their cheeks, as if they died of the tooth-ache. They are not carved with their eyes fix'd upon the stars, but as their minds were wholly bent upon the world, the self- [170 same way they seem to turn their faces.<sup>8</sup>

Duch. Let me know fully therefore the effect Of this thy dismal preparation, This talk fit for a charnel.

Bos. Now I shall:—

[Enter Executioners, with] a coffin, cords, and a bell.

Here is a present from your princely brothers; And may it arrive welcome, for it brings [175 Last benefit, last sorrow.

Duch. Let me see it:

I have so much obedience in my blood, I wish it in their veins to do them good.

Bos. This is your last presence-chamber. <sup>180</sup>

Carl. O my sweet lady!

Duch. Peace; it affrights not me.

Bos. I am the common bellman

<sup>8</sup> Printed as verse in Qq.

That usually is sent to condemn'd persons
The night before they suffer.

Duch. Even now thou said'st
Thou wast a tomb-maker.
Bos. 'T was to bring you
By degrees to mortification. Listen.

Hark, now everything is still,
The screech-owl and the whistler shrill
Call upon our dame aloud,
And bid her quickly don her shroud! 190
Much you had of land and rent;
Your length in clay 's now competent;
A long war disturb'd your mind;
Here your perfect peace is sign'd.
Of what is 't fools make such vain keeping? 195
Sin their conception, their birth weeping,
Their life a general mist of error,
Their death a hideous storm of terror.
Strew your hair with powders sweet,
Don clean linen, bathe your feet, 200
And (the foul fiend more to check)
A crucifix let bless your neck.
'T is now full tide 'tween night and day;
End your groan, and come away.

Cari. Hence, villains, tyrants, murderers!
Alas! 205

What will you do with my lady? — Call for help!

Duch. To whom? To our next neighbours?
They are mad-folks.

Bos. Remove that noise.

Duch. Farewell, Cariola.

In my last will I have not much to give:
A many hungry guests have fed upon me; 210
This will be a poor reversion.

Cari. I will die with her.

Duch. I pray thee, look thou giv'st my little boy

Some syrup for his cold, and let the girl
Say her prayers ere she sleep.

[CARIOLA is forced out by the Executioners.]

Now what you please:

What death?

Bos. Strangling; here are your executioners.

Duch. I forgive them: 215

The apoplexy, catarrh, or cough o' th' lungs,
Would do as much as they do.

Bos. Doth not death fright you?

Duch. Who would be afraid on 't,

Knowing to meet such excellent company 220

In th' other world?

Bos. Yet, methinks,

The manner of your death should much afflict
you:

This cord should terrify you.

Duch. Not a whit:

What would it pleasure me to have my throat
cut 225

With diamonds? or to be smothered

With cassia? or to be shot to death with pearls?

I know death hath ten thousand several doors

For men to take their exits; and 't is found

They go on such strange geometrical hinges, 230

You may open them both ways: any way, for heaven-sake,

So I were out of your whispering. Tell my brothers

That I perceive death, now I am well awake,

Best gift is they can give or I can take.
I would fain put off my last woman's-fault, 235
I'd not be tedious to you.

1 Execut.

We are ready.

Duch. Dispose my breath how please you;
but my body

Bestow upon my women, will you?

1 Execut.

Yes.

Duch. Pull, and pull strongly, for your able strength

Must pull down heaven upon me: — 240

Yet stay; heaven-gates are not so highly arch'd

As princes' palaces; they that enter there

Must go upon their knees [kneels]. — Come, violent death,

Serve for mandragora to make me sleep! —

Go tell my brothers, when I am laid out, 245

They then may feed in quiet. They strangle her.

Bos. Where's the waiting-woman?

Fetch her: some other strangle the children.

[Enter CARIOLA.]

Look you, there sleeps your mistress.

Cari. O, you are damn'd

Perpetually for this! My turn is next; 250

Is 't not so ordered?

Bos. Yes, and I am glad

You are so well prepar'd for 't.

Cari. You are deceiv'd, sir,

I am not prepar'd for 't, I will not die;

I will first come to my answer,<sup>1</sup> and know

How I have offended.

Bos. Come, despatch her. — 255

You kept her counsel; now you shall keep ours.

Cari. I will not die, I must not; I am contracted

To a young gentleman.

1 Execut. Here's your wedding-ring.

Cari. Let me but speak with the duke. I'll discover

Treason to his person.

Bos. Delays: — throttle her. 260

1 Execut. She bites and scratches.

Cari. If you kill me now,

I am damn'd; I have not been at confession

This two years.

Bos. [To Executioners.] When!<sup>2</sup>

Cari. I am quick with child.

Bos. Why, then,

Your credit's saved.

[Executioners strangle CARIOLA.]

Bear her into th' next room; 265

Let these lie still.

[Execunt Executioners with body of CARIOLA.]

[Enter FERDINAND.]

Ferd. Is she dead?

Bos. She is what

You'd have her. But here begin your pity:

Shows the Children strangled.

Alas, how have these offended?

Ferd.

The death

Of young wolves is never to be pitied.

<sup>2</sup> An exclamation of impatience.

Bos. Fix your eye here.
Ferd. Constantly.
Bos. Do you not weep? 270
 Other sins only speak; murder shrieks out.
 The element of water moistens the earth,
 But blood flies upwards and bedews the heavens.
Ferd. Cover her face; mine eyes dazzle: she died young.
Bos. I think not so; her infelicity 275
 Seem'd to have years too many.
Ferd. She and I were twins;
 And should I die this instant, I had liv'd
 Her time to a minute.
Bos. It seems she was born first:
 You have bloodily approv'd the ancient truth,
 That kindred commonly do worse agree 281
 Than remote strangers.
Ferd. Let me see her face
 Again. Why didst thou not pity her? What An excellent honest man mightst thou have
 been,
 If thou hadst borne her to some sanctuary! 285
 Or, bold in a good cause, — oppos'd thyself,
 With thy advanced sword above thy head,
 Between her innocence and my revenge!
 I bade thee, when I was distracted of my wits,
 Go kill my dearest friend, and thou hast done 't.
 For let me but examine well the cause: 291
 What was the meanness of her match to me?
 Only I must confess I had a hope,
 Had she continu'd widow, to have gain'd
 An infinite mass of treasure by her death: 296
 And that was the main cause, — her marriage,
 That drew a stream of gall quite through my
 heart.
 For thee, as we observe in tragedies
 That a good actor many times is curs'd
 For playing a villain's part, I hate thee for 't.
 And, for my sake, say, thou hast done much ill well. 301
Bos. Let me quicken your memory, for I perceive
 You are falling into ingratitude: I challenge
 The reward due to my service.
Ferd. I'll tell thee
 What I'll give thee.
Bos. Do.
Ferd. I'll give thee a pardon 305
 For this murder.
Bos. Ha! Yes, and 'tis
Ferd. The largest bounty I can study to do thee.
 By what authority didst thou execute
 This bloody sentence?
Bos. By yours.
Ferd. Mine! Was I her judge? 310
 Did any ceremonial form of law
 Doom her to not-being? Did a complete jury
 Deliver her conviction up i' th' court?
 Where shalt thou find this judgment register'd,
 Unless in hell? See, like a bloody fool, 315
 Thou 'st forfeited thy life, and thou shalt die
 for 't.
Bos. The office of justice is perverted quite When one thief hangs another. Who shall dare
 To reveal this?
Ferd. O, I'll tell thee;

The wolf shall find her grave, and scrape it up,
 Not to devour the corpse, but to discover 321
 The horrid murder.
Bos. You, not I, shall quake for 't.
Ferd. Leave me.
Bos. I will first receive my pension.
Ferd. You are a villain.
Bos. When your ingratitude
 Is judge, I am so.
Ferd. O horror, 325
 That not the fear of him which binds the devils
 Can prescribe man obedience! —
 Never look upon me more.
Bos. Why, fare thee well.
 Your brother and yourself are worthy men!
 You have a pair of hearts are hollow graves, 330
 Rotten, and rotting others; and your vengeance,
 Like two chain'd-bullets, still goes arm in arm:
 You may be brothers; for treason, like the plague;
 Doth take much in a blood. I stand like one
 That long hath ta'en a sweet and golden 335
 dream:
 I am angry with myself now, that I wake.
Ferd. Get thee into some unknown part o'
 the world,
 That I may never see thee.
Bos. Let me know
 Wherefore I should be thus neglected. Sir,
 I serv'd your tyranny, and rather strove 340
 To satisfy yourself than all the world:
 And though I loath'd the evil, yet I lov'd
 You that did counsel it; and rather sought
 To appear a true servant than an honest man.
Ferd. I'll go hunt the badger by owl-light: 345
 'T is a deed of darkness. Exit.
Bos. He's much distracted. Off, my painted honour!
 While with vain hopes our faculties we tire,
 We seem to sweat in ice and freeze in fire. 350
 What would I do, were this to do again?
 I would not change my peace of conscience
 For all the wealth of Europe. — She stirs; here's life: —
 Return, fair soul, from darkness, and lead
 mine
 Out of this sensible hell! — she's warm, she breathes: —
 Upon thy pale lips I will melt my heart, 355
 To store them with fresh colour. — Who's
 there?
 Some cordial drink! — Alas! I dare not call:
 So pity would destroy pity. — Her eye opens,
 And heaven in it seems to ope, that late was shut,
 To take me up to mercy. 360
Duch. Antonio!
Bos. Yes, madam, he is living;
 The dead bodies you saw were but feign'd statues.
 He's reconcil'd to your brothers; the Pope hath wrought
 The atonement.
Duch. Mercy!
Bos. O, she's gone again! there the cords of 365
 life broke.
 O sacred innocence, that sweetly sleeps

On turtles' feathers, whilst a guilty conscience
Is a black register wherein is writ
All our good deeds and bad, a perspective
That shows us hell! That we cannot be suffer'd
To do good when we have a mind to it! 371
This is manly sorrow;
These tears, I am very certain, never grew
In my mother's milk. My estate is sunk
Below the degree of fear: where were 375
These penitent fountains while she was living?
O, they were frozen up! Here is a sight
As dreadful to my soul as is the sword
Unto a wretch hath slain his father.
Come, I'll bear thee hence, 380
And execute thy last will; that's deliver Thy body to the reverend dispose
Of some good women: that the cruel tyrant
Shall not deny me. Then I'll post to Milan,
Where somewhat I will speedily enact 385
Worth my dejection. Exit [with the body].

ACT V

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

[Enter] ANTONIO and DELIO.

Ant. What think you of my hope of reconcil-
ment
To the Arragonian brethren?
Delio. I misdoubt it;
For though they have sent their letters of safe-conduct
For your repair to Milan, they appear
But nets to entrap you. The Marquis of Pescara, 5
Under whom you hold certain land in cheat,<sup>2</sup>
Much 'gainst his noble nature hath been mov'd
To seize those lands; and some of his dependants
Are at this instant making it their suit
To be invested in your revenues. 10
I cannot think they mean well to your life
That do deprive you of your means of life,
Your living.
Ant. You are still an heretic<sup>3</sup>
To any safety I can shape myself.
Delio. Here comes the marquis: I will make myself 15
Petitioner for some part of your land,
To know whither it is flying.

Ant. I pray, do. [Withdraws.]

[Enter] PESCARA.]

Delio. Sir, I have a suit to you.
Pes. To me?
Delio. An easy one:
There is the Citadel of Saint Bennet,
With some demesnes, of late in the possession
Of Antonio Bologna,— please you bestow them on me. 21
Pes. You are my friend; but this is such a suit,
Nor fit for me to give, nor you to take.
Delio. No, sir?

Pes. I will give you ample reason for 't
Soon in private:— here 's the cardinal's mistress. 25

[Enter] JULIA.]

Julia. My lord, I am grown your poor petitioner,
And should be an ill beggar, had I not
A great man's letter here, the cardinal's,
To court you in my favour. [Gives a letter.]
Pes. He entreats for you
The Citadel of Saint Bennet, that belong'd 30
To the banish'd Bologna.
Julia. Yes.
Pes. I could not have thought of a friend I could rather
Pleasure with it: 't is yours.
Julia. Sir, I thank you;
And he shall know how doubly I am engag'd
Both in your gift, and speediness of giving, 35
Which makes your grant the greater. Exit.
Ant. How they fortify
Themselves with my ruin!

Delio. Sir, I am
Little bound to you.
Pes. Why?
Delio. Because you deni'd this suit to me, and gave 't
To such a creature.
Pes. Do you know what it was?
It was Antonio's land; not forfeited 41
By course of law, but ravish'd from his throat
By the cardinal's entreaty. It were not fit
I should bestow so main a piece of wrong
Upon my friend; 't is a gratification 45
Only due to a strumpet, for it is injustice.
Shall I sprinkle the pure blood of innocents
To make those followers I call my friends
Look ruddier upon me? I am glad
This land, ta'en from the owner by such wrong,
Returns again unto so foul an use 51
As salary for his lust. Learn, good Delio,
To ask noble things of me, and you shall find
I'll be a noble giver.

Delio. You'll instruct me well.
Ant. [Aside.] Why, here 's a man now would fright impudence 55
From sauciest beggars.
Pes. Prince Ferdinand 's come to Milan,
Sick, as they give out, of an apoplexy;
But some say 't is a frenzy: I am going
To visit him. Exit.
Ant. 'T is a noble old fellow.
Delio. What course do you mean to take,
Antonio? 60
Ant. This night I mean to venture all my
fortune,

Which is no more than a poor ling'ring life,
To the cardinal's worst of malice. I have got Private access to his chamber; and intend
To visit him about the mid of night, 65
As once his brother did our noble duchess.
It may be that the sudden apprehension
Of danger,— for I'll go in mine own shape,—
When he shall see it fraught<sup>4</sup> with love and duty,

May draw the poison out of him, and work
A friendly reconciliation. If it fail,
Yet it shall rid me of this infamous calling;
For better fall once than be ever falling.

Delio. I'll second you in all danger; and,
how'er,
My life keeps rank with yours.

Ant. You are still my lov'd and best friend.
Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

[Enter] PESCARA and DOCTOR.

Pes. Now, doctor, may I visit your patient?

Doc. If 't please your lordship; but he 's instantly

To take the air here in the gallery
By my direction.

Pes. Pray thee, what 's his disease?

Doc. A very pestilent disease, my lord,
They call lycanthropia.

Pes. What 's that?

I need a dictionary to 't.

Doc. I'll tell you.

In those that are possess'd with 't there o'er-flows

Such melancholy humour they imagine Themselves to be transformed into wolves; 10
Steal forth to church-yards in the dead of night,
And dig dead bodies up: as two nights since
One met the duke 'bout midnight in a lane
Behind Saint Mark's church, with the leg of a
man

Upon his shoulder; and he howl'd fearfully; 15
Said he was a wolf, only the difference
Was, a wolf's skin was hairy on the outside,
His on the inside; bade them take their swords,
Rip up his flesh, and try. Straight I was sent for,
And, having minister'd to him, found his grace
Very well recovered. 21

Pes. I am glad on 't.

Doc. Yet not without some fear
Of a relapse. If he grow to his fit again,
I'll go a nearer way to work with him
Than ever Paracelsus dream'd of; if 25
They 'll give me leave, I'll buffet his madness out of him.
Stand aside; he comes.

[Enter FERDINAND, CARDINAL, MALATESTI, and BOSOLA.]

Ferd. Leave me.

Mal. Why doth your lordship love this solitaryness?

Ferd. Eagles commonly fly alone: they are 30 crows, daws, and starlings that flock together.
Look, what 's that follows me?

Mal. Nothing, my lord.

Ferd. Yes.

Mal. 'T is your shadow. 35

Ferd. Stay it; let it not haunt me.

Mal. Impossible, if you move, and the sun shine.

Ferd. I will throttle it.

[Throws himself down on his shadow.]

Mal. O, my lord, you are angry with nothing.
Ferd. You are a fool: how is 't possible I 40 should catch my shadow, unless I fall upon 't?
When I go to hell, I mean to carry a bribe; for, look you, good gifts evermore make way for the worst persons.

Pes. Rise, good my lord. 45

Ferd. I am studying the art of patience.

Pes. 'T is a noble virtue.

Ferd. To drive six snails before me from this town to Moscow; neither use goad nor whip to them, but let them take their own time; — 50 the patient'st man i' th' world match me for an experiment: — an I'll crawl after like a sheep-biter.<sup>2</sup>

Card. Force him up. [They raise him.]

Ferd. Use me well, you were best. What I 55 have done, I have done: I'll confess nothing.

Doc. Now let me come to him. — Are you mad, my lord?

Are you out of your princely wits?

Ferd.

What 's he?

Pes. Your doctor.

Ferd. Let me have his beard saw'd off, and his eye-brows fil'd more civil. 60

Doc. I must do mad tricks with him, for that
's the only way on 't. — I have brought your grace a salamander's skin to keep you from sun-burning.

Ferd. I have cruel sore eyes. 65

Doc. The white of a cockatrix's<sup>3</sup> egg is present remedy.

Ferd. Let it be a new-laid one, you were best.
Hide me from him: physicians are like kings, —
They brook no contradiction. 70

Doc. Now he begins to fear me: now let me alone with him.

Card. How now! put off your gown!

Doc. Let me have some forty urinals filled with rose-water: he and I'll go pelt one 75
another with them. — Now he begins to fear me.
— Can you fetch a frisk,<sup>4</sup> sir? — Let him go, let him go, upon my peril: I find by his eye he stands in awe of me; I'll make him as tame as a dormouse. 80

Ferd. Can you fetch your frisks, sir! — I will stamp him into a cullis,<sup>5</sup> flay off his skin to cover one of the anatomies<sup>6</sup> this rogue hath set i' th' cold yonder in Barber-Chirurgeon's-hall. — Hence, hence! you are all of you like 85 beasts for sacrifice. [Throws the Doctor down and beats him.] There 's nothing left of you but tongue and belly, flattery and lechery. [Exit.]

Pes. Doctor, he did not fear you thoroughly.

Doc. True; I was somewhat too forward. 90

Bos. Mercy upon me, what a fatal judgment
Hath fall'n upon this Ferdinand!

Pes. Knows your grace

What accident hath brought unto the prince

This strange distraction?

Card. [Aside.] I must feign somewhat. — 95

Thus they say it grew.
You have heard it rumour'd, for these many

<sup>1</sup> A dog which worries sheep.

dinand.

None of our family dies but there is seen
The shape of an old woman, which is given
By tradition to us to have been murder'd 90
By her nephews for her riches. Such a figure
One night, as the prince sat up late at 's book,
Appear'd to him; when crying out for help,
The gentleman of 's chamber found his grace
All on a cold sweat, alter'd much in face
And language: since which apparition, 105
He hath grown worse and worse, and I much
fear
He cannot live.

Bos. Sir, I would speak with you.

Pes. We 'll leave your grace,
Wishing to the sick prince, our noble lord,
All health of mind and body.

Card. You are most welcome.

[Exeunt PESCARA, MALATESTI, and DOCTOR.]

Are you come? so. — [Aside.] This fellow must not know 111

By any means I had intelligence
In our duchess' death; for, though I counsell'd
it,

The full of all th' engagement seem'd to grow
From Ferdinand. — Now, sir, how fares our
sister? 116

I do not think but sorrow makes her look
Like to an off-dy'd garment: she shall now Take comfort from me. Why do you look so wildly?

O, the fortune of your master here, the prince,
Dejects you; but be you of happy comfort: 120
If you 'll do one thing for me I 'll entreat,
Though he had a cold tomb-stone o'er his bones,
I'd make you what you would be.

Bos. Any thing;
Give it me in a breath, and let me fly to 't.
They that think long small expedition win, 125
For musing much o' th' end cannot begin.

[Enter JULIA.]

Julia. Sir, will you come in to supper?

Card. I am busy; leave me.

Julia. [Aside.] What an excellent shape hath that fellow! Exit.

Card. 'T is thus. Antonio lurks here in Milan:
Inquire him out, and kill him. While he lives,
Our sister cannot marry; and I have thought
Of an excellent match for her. Do this, and style me 132

Thy advancement.

Bos. But by what means shall I find him
out?

Card. There is a gentleman call'd Delio 135
Here in the camp, that hath been long approv'd
His loyal friend. Set eye upon that fellow;
Follow him to mass; may be Antonio,
Although he do account religion

But a school-name, for fashion of the world 140
May accompany him; or else go inquire out
Delio's confessor, and see if you can bribe
Him to reveal it. There are a thousand ways
A man might find to trace him; as to know
What fellows haunt the Jews for taking up 145
Great sums of money, for sure he 's in want;
Or else to go to th' picture-makers, and learn

Who bought<sup>1</sup> her picture lately: some of these Happily may take.

Bos. Well, I 'll not freeze i' th' business:
I would see that wretched thing, Antonio, 150
Above all sights i' th' world.

Card. Do, and be happy. Exit.

Bos. This fellow doth breed basilisks in 's
eyes,

He 's nothing else but murder; yet he seems
Not to have notice of the duchess' death.

'T is his cunning: I must follow his example;
There cannot be a surer way to trace 155
Than that of an old fox.

[Re-enter JULIA, with a pistol.]

Julia. So, sir, you are well met.

Bos. How now!

Julia. Nay, the doors are fast enough:
Now, sir, I will make you confess your treach-ery, 160

Bos. Treachery!

Julia. Yes, confess to me
Which of my women 't was you hir'd to put Love-powder into my drink?

Bos. Love powder!

Julia. Yes, when I was at Malfi.
Why should I fall in love with such a face else?
I have already suffer'd for thee so much pain.
The only remedy to do me good 167
Is to kill my longing.

Bos. Sure, your pistol holds
Nothing but perfumes or kissing-comfits.<sup>2</sup>
Excellent lady! 170

You have a pretty way on 't to discover
Your longing. Come, come, I 'll disarm you,
And arm you thus: yet this is wondrous
strange.

Julia. Compare thy form and my eyes together,

You 'll find my love no such great miracle. 175
Now you 'll say

I am wanton: this nice modesty in ladies
Is but a troublesome familiar
That haunts them.

Bos. Know you me, I am a blunt soldier.

Julia. The better:
Sure, there wants fire where there are no lively sparks 181

Of roughness.

Bos. And I want compliment.

Julia. Why, ignorance
In courtship cannot make you do amiss,
If you have a heart to do well.

Bos. You are very fair.

Julia. Nay, if you lay beauty to my charge,
I must plead unguilty.

Bos. Your bright eyes 185
Carry a quiver of darts in them, sharper
Than sun-beams. [tion,

Julia. You will mar me with commenda-
Put yourself to the charge of courting me,
Whereas now I woo you. 190

Bos. [Aside.] I have it, I will work upon this creature, —

<sup>1</sup> So Dyce. Qq. brought.

<sup>2</sup> Perfumed sweetmeats for the breath.

Let us grow most amorously familiar:
If the great cardinal now should see me thus,
Would he not count me a villain?

Julia. No; he might count me a wanton, 195
Not lay a scruple of offence on you;
For if I see and steal a diamond,
The fault is not i' th' stone, but in me the thief
That purloins it. I am sudden with you.
We that are great women of pleasure use to cut off 200

These uncertain wishes and unquiet longings,
And in an instant join the sweet delight
And the pretty excuse together. Had you been i' th' street,

Under my chamber-window, even there
I should have courted you. 205

Bos. O, you are an excellent lady!
Julia. Bid me do somewhat for you presently
To express I love you.

Bos. I will; and if you love me,
Fail not to effect it.
The cardinal is grown wondrous melancholy;
Demand the cause, let him not put you off 211
With feign'd excuse; discover the main ground
on 't.

Julia. Why would you know this?
Bos. I have depended on him,
And I hear that he is fall'n in some disgrace
With the emperor: if he be, like the mice 215
That forsake falling houses, I would shift
To other dependance.

Julia. You shall not need
Follow the wars: I'll be your maintenance.

Bos. And I your loyal servant: but I cannot Leave my calling.

Julia. Not leave an ungrateful 220
General for the love of a sweet lady!
You are like some cannot sleep in feather-beds,
But must have blocks for their pillows.

Bos. Will you do this?
Julia. Cunningly.

Bos. To-morrow I'll expect th' intelligence.
Julia. To-morrow! Get you into my cabinet; 225

You shall have it with you. Do not delay me,
No more than I do you: I am like one
That is condemn'd; I have my pardon prom-is'd,

But I would see it seal'd. Go, get you in: 230
You shall see me wind my tongue about his
heart

Like a skein of silk. [Exit BOSOLA.]

[Re-enter CARDINAL.]

Card. Where are you?

[Enter Servants.]

Servants. Here.

Card. Let none, upon your lives, have conference
With the Prince Ferdinand, unless I know
it.—

[Aside.] In this distraction he may reveal 235
The murder. [Exeunt Servants.]

Yond's my lingering consumption:
I am weary of her, and by any means
Would be quit of.

Julia. How now, my lord! what ails you?

Card. Nothing.

Julia. O, you are much alter'd:
Come, I must be your secretary, and remove This lead from off your bosom: what's the
matter? 241

Card. I may not tell you.

Julia. Are you so far in love with sorrow
You cannot part with part of it? Or think
you

I cannot love your grace when you are sad 245
As well as merry? Or do you suspect
I, that have been a secret to your heart
These many winters, cannot be the same
Unto your tongue?

Card. Satisfy thy longing, —
The only way to make thee keep my counsel
Is, not to tell thee.

Julia. Tell your echo this, 251
Or flatterers, that like echoes still report
What they hear, though most imperfect, and not me;

For if that you be true unto yourself,
I'll know.

Card. Will you rack me?

Julia. No, judgment shall Draw it from you: it is an equal fault, 255
To tell one's secrets unto all or none.

Card. The first argues folly.

Julia. But the last tyranny.

Card. Very well: why, imagine I have committed 260

Some secret deed which I desire the world
May never hear of.

Julia. Therefore may not I know it?
You have conceal'd for me as great a sin
As adultery. Sir, never was occasion
For perfect trial of my constancy 265
Till now; sir, I beseech you —

Card. Now, sir, I beseech you — You'll repent it.

Julia. Never.

Card. It hurries thee to ruin: I'll not tell
thee.

Be well advis'd, and think what danger 'tis
To receive a prince's secrets. They that do, 270
Had need have their breasts hoop'd with adamant

To contain them. I pray thee, yet be satisf'd;
Examine thine own frailty; 'tis more easy
To tie knots than unloose them. 'T is a secret
That, like a ling'ring poison, may chance lie Spread in thy veins, and kill thee seven year
hence. 275

Julia. Now you dally with me.

Card. No more; thou shalt know it.
By my appointment, the great Duchess of Malfi
And two of her young children, four nights
since,

Were strangled.

Julia. O heaven! sir, what have you done!

Card. How now? How settles this? Think you your bosom 281

Will be a grave dark and obscure enough
For such a secret?

Julia. You have undone yourself, sir.

Card. Why?

Julia. It lies not in me to conceal it.

Card. No ?
 Come, I will swear you to 't upon this book.
Julia. Most religiously.
Card. Kiss it. [She kisses the book.] 258
 Now you shall never utter it; thy curiosity Hath undone thee; thou'rt poison'd with that book.
 Because I knew thou couldst not keep my
 counsel,
 I have bound thee to 't by death. 290
 [Re-enter BOSOLA.]
Bos. For pity sake, hold!
Card. Ha, Bosola!
Julia. I forgive you
 This equal piece of justice you have done;
 For I betray'd your counsel to that fellow.
 He over-heard it; that was the cause I said
 It lay not in me to conceal it. 295
Bos. O foolish woman,
 Couldst not thou have poison'd him?
Julia. 'Tis weakness Too much to think what should have been done. I go,
 I know not whither. [Dies.]
Card. Wherefore com'st thou hither?
Bos. That I might find a great man like yourself, 300
 Not out of his wits, as the Lord Ferdinand,
 To remember my service.
Card. I'll have thee hew'd in pieces.
Bos. Make not yourself such a promise of that life
 Which is not yours to dispose of.
Card. Who plac'd thee here?
Bos. Her lust, as she intended.
Card. Very well: 305
 Now you know me for your fellow-murderer.
Bos. And wherefore should you lay fair marble colours
 Upon your rotten purposes to me?
 Unless you imitate some that do plot great treasons, 310
 And when they have done, go hide themselves
 i' th' graves
 Of those were actors in 't?
Card. No more; there is
 A fortune attends thee.
Bos. Shall I go sue to Fortune any longer?
 'Tis the fool's pilgrimage. 315
Card. I have honours in store for thee.
Bos. There are a many ways that conduct to seeming
 Honour, and some of them very dirty ones.
Card. Throw to the devil
 Thy melancholy. The fire burns well; 320
 What need we keep a stirring of 't, and make
 A greater smother? <sup>1</sup> Thou wilt kill Antonio?
Bos. Yes.
Card. Take up that body.
Bos. I think I shall
 Shortly grow the common bier for church-yards.
Card. I will allow thee some dozen of attendants 325
 To aid thee in the murder.

<sup>1</sup> Smoke.

Bos. O, by no means. Physicians that apply horse-leeches to any rank swelling use to cut off their tails, that the blood may run through them the faster: let me have no train when I go [<sup>330</sup> to shed blood, less it make me have a greater when I ride to the gallows.

Card. Come to me after midnight, to help to remove

That body to her own lodging. I'll give out
 She died o' th' plague; 't will breed the less inquiry 335

After her death.

Bos. Where 's Castruccio her husband?

Card. He's rode to Naples, to take possession

Of Antonio's citadel.

Bos. Believe me, you have done a very happy
 turn. 340

Card. Fail not to come. There is the master-key

Of our lodgings; and by that you may conceive
 What trust I plant in you.

Bos. You shall find me ready.

Exit CARDINAL.

O poor Antonio, though nothing be so needful
 To thy estate as pity, yet I find 345

Nothing so dangerous! I must look to my foot-
 ing:

In such slippery ice-pavements men had need
 To be frost-nail'd well, they may break their necks else;

The precedent 's here afore me. How this man Bears up in blood! seems fearless! Why, 't is
 well; 350

Security some men call the suburbs of hell,
 Only a dead wall between. Well, good Antonio,

I'll seek thee out; and all my care shall be
 To put thee into safety from the reach

Of these most cruel biters that have got 355
 Some of thy blood already. It may be,
 I'll join with thee in a most just revenge.

The weakest arm is strong enough that strikes
 With the sword of justice. Still methinks the

duchess
 Haunts me: there, there! — 'Tis nothing but my melancholy. 360

O Penitence, let me truly taste thy cup,
 That throws men down only to raise them up!

Exit.

SCENE III.<sup>2</sup>

[Enter] ANTONIO and DELIO. ECHO (from the DUCHESS'S Grave.)

Delio. Yond 's the cardinal's window. This fortification

Grew from the ruins of an ancient abbey;
 And to yond side o' th' river lies a wall,

Piece of a cloister, which in my opinion
 Gives the best echo that you ever heard, 5

So hollow and so dismal, and withal
 So plain in the distinction of our words,

That many have suppos'd it is a spirit
 That answers.

Ant. I do love these ancient ruins.
 We never tread upon them but we set 10

<sup>2</sup> A fortification.

Our foot upon some reverend history ;
 And, questionless, here in this open court,
 Which now lies naked to the injuries
 Of stormy weather, some men lie interr'd Lov'd the church so well, and gave so largely to 't, <sup>15</sup>
 They thought it should have canopied their bones
 Till dooms-day. But all things have their end ; Churches and cities, which have diseases like to men,
 Must have like death that we have.

Echo. Like death that we have.

Delio. Now the echo hath caught you. <sup>20</sup>

Ant. It groan'd methought, and gave
 A very deadly accent.

Echo. Deadly accent.

Delio. I told you 't was a pretty one. You may make it

A huntsman, or a falconer, a musician,
 Or a thing of sorrow.

Echo. A thing of sorrow. <sup>25</sup>

Ant. Ay, sure, that suits it best.

Echo. That suits it best.

Ant. 'T is very like my wife's voice.

Echo. Ay, wife's voice.

Delio. Come, let us walk further from 't,
 I would not have you go to the cardinal's to-
 night :

Do not. <sup>30</sup>

Echo. Do not.

Delio. Wisdom doth not more moderate wasting sorrow

Than time. Take time for 't ; be mindful of thy safety.

Echo. Be mindful of thy safety.

Ant. Necessity compels me. <sup>35</sup>

Make scrutiny throughout the passages
 Of your own life, you 'll find it impossible
 To fly your fate.

Echo. O, fly your fate !

Delio. Hark ! the dead stones seem to have pity on you,

And give you good counsel. <sup>40</sup>

Ant. Echo, I will not talk with thee,

For thou art a dead thing.

Echo. Thou art a dead thing.

Ant. My duchess is asleep now,
 And her little ones, I hope sweetly. O heaven,
 Shall I never see her more ?

Echo. Never see her more. <sup>45</sup>

Ant. I mark'd not one repetition of the echo
 But that ; and on the sudden a clear light
 Presented me a face folded in sorrow.

Delio. Your fancy merely.

Ant. Come, I 'll be out of this ague.

For to live thus is not indeed to live : <sup>50</sup>

It is a mockery and abuse of life.

I will not henceforth save myself by halves ;

Lose all, or nothing.

Delio. Your own virtue save you !

I 'll fetch your eldest son, and second you.

It may be that the sight of his own blood <sup>55</sup>

Spread in so sweet a figure may beget

The more compassion. However, fare you
 well.

Though in our miseries Fortune have a part,

Yet in our noble suff'rings she hath none.
 Contempt of pain, that we may call our own. <sup>60</sup>
Exeunt.

SCENE IV.<sup>1</sup>

[Enter] CARDINAL, PESCARA, MALATESTI,
 RODERIGO, and GRISOLAN.

Card. You shall not watch to-night by the sick prince ;

His grace is very well recover'd.

Mal. Good my lord, suffer us.

Card. O, by no means ;
 The noise, and change of object in his eye,
 Doth more distract him. I pray, all to bed ; <sup>5</sup>
 And though you hear him in his violent fit,
 Do not rise, I entreat you.

Pes. So, sir ; we shall not.

Card. Nay, I must have you promise
 Upon your honours, for I was enjoin'd to 't
 By himself ; and he seem'd to urge it sensibly.

Pes. Let our honours bind this trifle. <sup>11</sup>

Card. Nor any of your followers.

Mal. Neither.

Card. It may be, to make trial of your promise,

When he's asleep, myself will rise and feign <sup>16</sup>
 Some of his mad tricks, and cry out for help,
 And feign myself in danger.

Mal. If your throat were cutting,
 I 'd not come at you, now I have protested against it.

Card. Why, I thank you.

Gris. 'T was a foul storm to-night. <sup>20</sup>

Rod. The Lord Ferdinand's chamber shook like an osier.

Mal. 'T was nothing but pure kindness in the devil

To rock his own child.

Exeunt [all except the CARDINAL].

Card. The reason why I would not suffer
 these

About my brother, is, because at midnight <sup>25</sup>
 I may with better privacy convey

Julia's body to her own lodging. O, my conscience !

I would pray now ; but the devil takes away
 my heart

For having any confidence in prayer.

About this hour I appointed Bosola <sup>30</sup>

To fetch the body. When he hath serv'd my turn,

He dies. Exit.

Enter [BOSOLA].

Bos. Ha ! 't was the cardinal's voice ; I heard him name Bosola and my death. Listen ; I hear one's footing. <sup>35</sup>

[Enter FERDINAND.]

Ferd. Strangling is a very quiet death.

Bos. [Aside.] Nay, then, I see I must stand upon my guard.

Ferd. What say to that ? Whisper softly : do you agree to 't ? So ; it must be done i' th'

dark ; the cardinal would not for a thousand [40 pounds the doctor should see it. Exit.

Bos. My death is plotted ; here's the consequence of murder.
We value not desert nor Christian breath,
When we know black deeds must be cur'd with death.

[Enter ANTONIO and Servant.]

Serv. Here stay, sir, and be confident, I pray ;
I'll fetch you a dark lantern. Exit. 46

Ant. Could I take him at his prayers,
There were hope of pardon.

Bos. Fall right, my sword ! — [Stabs him.]

I'll not give thee so much leisure as to pray. 50
Ant. O, I am gone ! Thou hast ended a long suit in a minute.

Bos. What art thou ?
Ant. A most wretched thing,
That only have thy benefit in death,
To appear myself.

[Re-enter Servant with a lantern.]

Serv. Where are you, sir ? 55

Ant. Very near my home. — Bosola !

Serv. O, misfortune !

Bos. Smother thy pity, thou art dead else. —
Antonio !

The man I would have sav'd 'bove mine own life !
We are merely the stars' tennis-balls, struck and banded<sup>1</sup> 60

Which way please them. — O good Antonio,
I'll whisper one thing in thy dying ear
Shall make thy heart break quickly ! Thy fair duchess

And two sweet children —

Ant. Their very names
Kindle a little life in me.

Bos. Are murder'd. 65

Ant. Some men have wish'd to die
At the hearing of sad tidings ; I am glad
That I shall do 't in sadness.<sup>2</sup> I would not now Wish my wounds balm'd nor heal'd, for I have no use 69

To put my life to. In all our quest of greatness,
Like wanton boys whose pastime is their care,
We follow after bubbles blown in th' air.
Pleasure of life, what is 't ? Only the good hours
Of an ague ; merely a preparative to rest,
To endure vexation. I do not ask 75
The process of my death ; only commend me
To Delio.

Bos. Break, heart !

Ant. And let my son fly the courts of princes.
[Dies.]

Bos. Thou seem'st to have lov'd Antonio.

Serv. I brought him hither, 80
To have reconcil'd him to the cardinal.

Bos. I do not ask thee that.
Take him up, if thou tender thine own life,
And bear him where the lady Julia
Was wont to lodge. — O, my fate moves swift !
I have this cardinal in the forge already ; 85
Now I'll bring him to th' hammer. O direful misprision !<sup>3</sup>

I will not imitate things glorious,
No more than base ; I'll be mine own example. —
On, on, and look thou represent, for silence, 90
The thing thou bear'st. Exeunt.

SCENE V.<sup>5</sup>

[Enter] CARDINAL, with a book.

Card. I am puzzl'd in a question about hell ;
He says, in hell there's one material fire,
And yet it shall not burn all men alike.
Lay him by. How tedious is a guilty conscience !
When I look into the fish-ponds in my garden,<sup>6</sup>
Methinks I see a thing arm'd with a rake,
That seems to strike at me.

[Enter BOSOLA, and Servant bearing ANTONIO'S body.]

Now, art thou come ?
Thou look'st ghastly ;
There sits in thy face some great determination
Mix'd with some fear.

Bos. Thus it lightens into action : 10
I am come to kill thee.

Card. Ha ! — Help ! our guard !

Bos. Thou art deceiv'd ; they are out of thy howling.

Card. Hold ; and I will faithfully divide
Revenues with thee.

Bos. Thy prayers and proffers
Are both unseasonable.

Card. Raise the watch ! 15
We are betray'd !

Bos. I have confin'd your flight :
I'll suffer your retreat to Julia's chamber,
But no further.

Card. Help ! we are betray'd !

[Enter, above, PESCARA, MALATESTI, RODERIGO, and GRISOLAN.]

Mal. Listen.

Card. My dukedom for rescue ! 20

Rod. Fie upon his counterfeiting !

Mal. Why, 't is not the cardinal.

Rod. Yes, yes, 't is he :

But, I'll see him hang'd ere I'll go down to him.

Card. Here's a plot upon me ; I am assaulted ! I am lost, 25

Unless some rescue !

Gris. He doth this pretty well ;
But it will not serve to laugh me out of mine
honour.

Card. The sword's at my throat !

Rod. You would not bawl so loud then.

Mal. Come, come, let's go to bed : he told us
this much aforehand, 30

Pes. He wish'd you should not come at him ;
but, believe 't,

The accent of the voice sounds not in jest.
I'll owe to him, howsoever, and with engines
Force open the doors. [Exit above.]

Rod. Let's follow him aloof,
And note how the cardinal will laugh at him.

[*Exeunt, above, MALATESTI, ROD-
ERIGO, and GRISOLAN.*]

Bos. There's for you first, 58
'Cause you shall not unbarricade the door
To let in rescue. Kills the Servant.

Card. What cause hast thou to pursue my life?

Bos. Look there.

Card. Antonio!

Bos. Slain by my hand unwittingly.
Pray, and be sudden. When thou kill'd'st thy
sister, 40
Thou took'st from Justice her most equal balance,

And left her naught but her sword.

Card. O, mercy!

Bos. Now it seems thy greatness was only outward;

For thou fall'st faster of thyself than calamity
Can drive thee. I'll not waste longer time;
there! [Stabs him.]

Card. Thou hast hurt me.

Bos. Again!

Card. Shall I die like a leveret, 46
Without any resistance? — Help, help, help!
I am slain!

[Enter FERDINAND.]

Ferd. Th' alarm! Give me a fresh horse;
Rally the vaunt-guard, or the day is lost,
Yield, yield! I give you the honour of arms 50
Shake my sword over you; will you yield?

Card. Help me; I am your brother!

Ferd. The devil!
My brother fight upon the adverse party!

He wounds the CARDINAL, and, in the scuffle, gives BOSOLA his death-wound.

There flies your ransom.

Card. O justice! 55

I suffer now for what hath former bin:
Sorrow is held the eldest child of sin.

Ferd. Now you're brave fellows. Caesar's fortune was harder than Pompey's; Caesar died in the arms of prosperity, Pompey at the 60 feet of disgrace. You both died in the field.
The pain's nothing; pain many times is taken away with the apprehension of greater, as the tooth-ache with the sight of a barber that comes to pull it out. There's philosophy for you. 65

Bos. Now my revenge is perfect. — Sink, thou main cause Kills FERDINAND.
Of my undoing! — The last part of my life
Hath done me best service.

Ferd. Give me some wet hay; I am brokenwinded.

I do account this world but a dog-kennel: 70
I will vault credit and affect high pleasures
Beyond death.

Bos. He seems to come to himself,
Now he's so near the bottom.

Ferd. My sister, O my sister! there's the cause on't.

Whether we fall by ambition, blood, or lust, 75
Like diamonds, we are cut with our own dust.

[Dies.]

Card. Thou hast thy payment too.

Bos. Yes, I hold my weary soul in my teeth;

'Tis ready to part from me. I do glory 70
That thou, which stood'st like a hugh pyramid
Begun upon a large and ample base,
Shalt end in a little point, a kind of nothing.

[Enter, below, PESCARA, MALATESTI, RODERIGO, and GRISOLAN.]

Pes. How now, my lord!

Mal. O sad disaster!

Rod. How comes this?

Bos. Revenge for the Duchess of Malfi murdered

By th' Arragonian brethren; for Antonio 85
Slain by this hand; for lustful Julia

Poison'd by this man; and lastly for myself,
That was an actor in the main of all

Much 'gainst mine own good nature, yet i' th' end Neglected.

Pes. How now, my lord!

Card. Look to my brother:
He gave us these large wounds, as we were struggling 91

Here i' th' rushes. And now, I pray, let me
Be laid by and never thought of. [Dies.]

Pes. How fatally, it seems, he did withstand
His own rescue!

Mal. Thou wretched thing of blood, 95
How came Antonio by his death?

Bos. In a mist; I know not how;
Such a mistake as I have often seen
In a play. O, I am gone! 99

We are only like dead walls or vaulted graves,
That, ruin'd, yields no echo. Fare you well!
It may be pain, but no harm, to me to die
In so good a quarrel. O, this gloomy world!

In what a shadow, or deep pit of darkness,
Doth womanish and fearful mankind live! 105
Let worthy minds ne'er stagger in distrust
To suffer death or shame for what is just:
Mine is another voyage. [Dies.]

Pes. The noble Delio, as I came to th' palace, Told me of Antonio's being here, and show'd
me 110

A pretty gentleman, his son and heir.

[Enter DELIO, and ANTONIO'S Son.]

Mal. O sir, you come too late!

Delio. I heard so, and Was arm'd for 't, ere I came. Let us make noble use

Of this great ruin; and join all our force
To establish this young hopeful gentleman 115
In 's mother's right. These wretched eminent things

Leave no more fame behind 'em, than should
one

Fall in a frost, and leave his print in snow;
As soon as the sun shines, it ever melts,
Both form and matter. I have ever thought 120
Nature doth nothing so great for great men
As when she's pleas'd to make them lords of trnth:

Integrity of life is fame's best friend,
Which nobly, beyond death, shall crown the end. Exeunt.

[ACT I

SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter WITGOOD, a gentleman, solus.

Wit. All's gone! still thou'rt a gentleman, that's all; but a poor one, that's nothing. What milk brings thy meadows forth now? Where are thy goodly uplands, and thy downlands? All sunk into that little pit, lechery. [5] Why should a gallant pay but two shillings for his ordinary that nourishes him, and twenty times two for his brothel that consumes him? But where's Longacre?<sup>2</sup> In my uncle's conscience, which is three years' voyage about: [10] he that sets out upon his conscience ne'er finds the way home again; he is either swallowed in the quicksands of law-quillets, or splits upon the piles of a praemunire;<sup>3</sup> yet these old fox-brain'd and ox-brow'd uncles have still de- [15] fences for their avarice, and apologies for their practices, and will thus greet our follies:

He that doth his youth expose
 To brothel, drink, and danger,
 Let him that is his nearest kin
 Cheat him before a stranger: 20 and that's his uncle; 't is a principle in usury. I dare not visit the city: there I should be too soon visited by that horrible plague, my debts; and by that means I lose a virgin's love, her [25] portion, and her virtues. Well, how should a man live now that has no living? Hum, — why, are there not a million of men in the world that only sojourn upon their brain, and make their wits their mereers; and am I but one amongst that million, and cannot thrive upon 't? Any [30] trick, out of the compass of law, now would come happily to me.

Enter Courtesan.

Cour. My love!

Wit. My loathing! has thou been the secret consumption of my purse, and now com'st to undo my last means, my wits? Wilt leave no virtue in me, and yet thou ne'er the better? Hence, courtesan, round-webb'd tarantula, That dry'st the roses in the cheeks of youth! 40

Cour. I've been true unto your pleasure; and all your lands

Thrice rackt<sup>4</sup> was never worth the jewel which I prodigally gave you, my virginity.

Lands mortrag'd may return, and more esteem'd,

But honesty<sup>5</sup> once pawn'd, is ne'er redeem'd. 45

Wit. Forgive; I do thee wrong

To make thee sin, and then to chide thee for 't.

Cour. I know I am your loathing now; farewell.

Wit. Stay, best invention, stay.

Cour. I that "have been the secret consumption of your purse," shall I stay now "to undo your last means, your wits? Hence, courtesan," away! [50]

Wit. I prithee, make me not mad at my own weapon: stay (a thing few women can do, I [55] know that, and therefore they had need wear stays), be not contrary. Dost love me? Fate has so cast<sup>1</sup> it that all my means I must derive from thee.

Cour. From me? be happy then; 60
What lies within the power of my performance
Shall be commanded of thee.

Wit. Spoke like
An honest drab, i' faith. It may prove something;
What trick is not an embryo at first,
Until a perfect shape come over it? 65

Cour. Come, I must help you: whereabouts left you?

I'll proceed:
Though you beget, 't is I must help to breed.
Speak, what is 't? I'd fain conceive it.

Wit. So, so, so: thou shalt presently take 70
the name and form upon thee of a rich country widow, four hundred a-year valiant,<sup>2</sup> in woods, in bullocks, in barns, and in rye-stacks. We'll to London, and to my covetous uncle.

Cour. I begin to applaud thee; our states 75 being both desperate, they are soon resolute.
But how for horses?

Wit. Mass, that's true; the jest will be of some continuance. Let me see; horses now, a bots<sup>3</sup> on 'em! Stay, I have acquaintance with 80 a mad host, never yet bawd to thee. I have rins'd the whoreson's gums in mull-sack<sup>4</sup> many a time and often. Put but a good tale into his ear now, so it come off cleanly, and there's horse and man for us, I dare warrant thee. 85

Cour. Arm your wits then Speedily; there shall want nothing in me,
Either in behaviour, discourse, or fashion,
That shall discredit your intended purpose.
I will so artfully disguise my wants, 90
And set so good a courage on my state,
That I will be believed.

Wit. Why, then, all's furnisht. I shall go nigh to catch that old fox, mine uncle. Though he make but some amends for my un- 95 doing, yet there 's some comfort in 't, he cannot otherwise choose (though it be but in hope to cozen<sup>5</sup> me 'again) but supply any hasty want that I bring to town with me. The device well and cunningly carried, the name of a rich 100 widow, and four hundred a-year in good earth, will so conjure up a kind of usurer's love in him
to me, that he will not only desire my presence,
— which at first shall scarce be granted him,
I'll keep off a' purpose, — but I shall find 105 him so officious to deserve, so ready to supply!
I know the state of an old man's affection so well: if his nephew be poor indeed, why, he let's God alone with him; but if he be once rich, then he'll be the first man that helps him. 110

Cour. 'T is right the world;<sup>6</sup> for, in these days, an old man's love to his kindred is like his kindness to his wife, 't is always done before he comes at it. 114

<sup>6</sup> Precisely the way of the world.

Wit. I owe thee for that jest. Begone:
here's all my wealth; prepare thyself, away.
I'll to mine host with all possible haste; and with the best art, and most profitable form, pour the sweet circumstance into his ear, 115 which shall have the gift to turn all the wax to honey. [Exit Courtesan.] — How now? O, the right worshipful signors of our country!

[Enter ONESIPHORUS HOARD, LIMBER, and KIX.]

[O. Hoard.] 7 Who's that?

[Lim.] O, the common rioter; take no note of
him. 125

Wit. [Aside.] You will not see me now; the comfort is,
Ere it be long you will scarce see yourselves.

[O. Hoard.] I wonder how he breathes; h'as consum'd all 130

Upon that courtesan.
[Lim.] We have heard so much.

[O. Hoard.] You've heard all truth. His uncle and my brother 135
Have been these three years mortal adversaries:

Two old tough spirits, they seldom meet but
fight,

Or quarrel when 't is calmest:
I think their anger be the very fire 140
That keeps their age alive.

[Lim.] What was the quarrel, sir?

[O. Hoard.] Faith, about a purchase, fetching over a young heir. Master Hoard, my brother, having wasted much time in beating the bargain,
what did me old Lucre, but as his con- 145 science mov'd him, knowing the poor gentleman, stept in between 'em and cozened him himself.

[Lim.] And was this all, sir?

[O. Hoard.] This was e'en it, sir; yet for 144 all this, I know no reason but the match might go forward betwixt his wife's son and my niece; what though there be a dissension between the two old men, I see no reason it should put a difference between the two younger; 't is as 149 natural for old folks to fall out, as for young to fall in. A scholar comes a-wooing to my niece; well, he's wise, but he's poor: her son comes a-wooing to my niece; well, he's a fool, but he's rich.

[Lim.] Ay, marry, sir. 155

[O. Hoard.] Pray, now, is not a rich fool better than a poor philosopher?

[Lim.] One would think so, i' faith.

[O. Hoard.] She now remains at London 150 with my brother, her second uncle, to learn fashions, practise music; the voice between her lips, and the viol between her legs, she'll be fit for a consort<sup>8</sup> very speedily: a thousand good pound is her portion; if she marry, we'll ride up and be merry. 155

[Kix.] A match, if it be a match. Exeunt.

<sup>7</sup> In the Qq. O. Hoard, Limber, and Kix appear in the speech tags as 1, 2, and 3.

<sup>8</sup> A pun on the two meanings, "concert" and "consort."

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter at one door, WITGOOD, at the other, Host.

Wit. Mine host!

Host. Young Master Witgood.

Wit. I have been laying<sup>2</sup> all the town for thee.

Host. Why, what's the news, bully Had-land?

Wit. What geldings are in the house, of thine own? Answer me to that first.

Host. Why, man, why?

Wit. Mark me what I say: I'll tell thee such a tale in thine ear, that thou shalt trust me spite of thy teeth, furnish me with some money willy nilly, and ride up with me thyself contra voluntatem et professionem.<sup>3</sup>

Host. How? Let me see this trick, and I'll say thou hast more art than a conjurer.

Wit. Dost thou joy in my advancement?

Host. Do I love sack and ginger?

Wit. Comes my prosperity desiredly to thee?

Host. Come forfeitures to a usurer, fees to an officer, punks to an host, and pigs to a parson desiredly? Why, then, la.

Wit. Will the report of a widow of four hundred a-year, boy, make thee leap, and sing, and dance, and come to thy place again?

Host. Wilt thou command me now? I am thy spirit; conjure me into any shape.

Wit. I ha' brought her from her friends, turn'd back the horses by a slight; not so much as one among her six men, goodly large yeomanly fellows, will she trust with this her purpose: by this light, all unmann'd, regardless of her state, neglectful of vain-glorious ceremony, all for my love. O, 'tis a fine little voluble tongue, mine host, that wins a widow!

Host. No, 'tis a tongue with a great T, my boy, that wins a widow.

Wit. Now, sir, the case stands thus: good mine host, if thou lovest my happiness, assist me.

Host. Command all my beasts i' th' house.

Wit. Nay, that's not all neither: prithee take truce with thy joy, and listen to me. Thou know'st I have a wealthy uncle i' th' city, somewhat the wealthier by my follies. The report of this fortune, well and cunningly carried, might be a means to draw some goodness from the usuring rascal; for I have put her in hope already of some estate that I have either in land or money. Now, if I be found true in neither, what may I expect but a sudden breach of our love, utter dissolution of the match, and confusion of my fortunes for ever?

Host. Wilt thou but trust the managing of thy business with me?

Wit. With thee? Why, will I desire to thrive in my purpose? Will I hug four hundred a-year, I that know the misery of nothing? Will that man wish a rich widow, that has ne'er a hole to put his head in? With thee, mine host? Why, believe it, sooner with thee than with a covey of counsellors.

Host. Thank you for your good report, i' faith, sir; and if I stand you not in stead, why then let an host come off hic et haec hostis, a deadly enemy to dice, drink, and venery. Come, where's this widow?

Wit. Hard at Park-end.

Host. I'll be her serving-man for once.

Wit. Why, there we let off together, keep full time; my thoughts were striking then just the same number.

Host. I knew't: shall we then see our merry days again?

Wit. Our merry nights — [Aside.] which ne'er shall be more seen. Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter at several doors, old LUCRE and old HOARD; [LAMPREY, SPICHOCK, FREEDOM, and MONEYLOVE,] gentlemen coming between them to pacify them.

Lam. Nay, good Master Lucre, and you, Master Hoard, anger is the wind which you're both too much troubled withal.

Ho. Shall my adversary thus daily affront me, ripping up the old wound of our malice, which three summers could not close up? into which wound the very sight of him drops scalding lead instead of balsamum.

Luc. Why, Hoard, Hoard, Hoard, Hoard, Hoard! may I not pass in the state of quietness to mine own house? Answer me to that, before witness, and why? I'll refer the cause to honest, even-minded gentlemen, or require the mere indifferences of the law to decide this matter. I got the purchase, true: was't not any man's case? Yes. Will a wise man stand as a bawd, whilst another wipes his nose of the bargain? No; I answer no in that case.

Lam. Nay, sweet Master Lucre,

Ho. Was it the part of a friend — no, rather of a Jew; — mark what I say — when I had beaten the bush to the last bird, or, as I may term it, the price to a pound, then, like a cunning usurer, to come in the evening of the bargain, and glean all my hopes in a minute to enter, as it were, at the back door of the purchase? for thou ne'er camest the right way by it.

Luc. Hast thou the conscience to tell me so without any impeachment to thyself?

Ho. Thou that canst defeat thy own nephew, Lucre, lap his lands into bonds, and take the extremity of thy kindred's forfeitures, because he's a rioter, a wastethrift, a brothel-master, and so forth, — what may a stranger expect from thee but vulnera dilacerata, as the poet says, dilacerate dealing?

Luc. Upbraidest thou me with nephew? Is all imputation laid upon me? What acquaintance have I with his follies? If he riot, 'tis

he must want it; if he surfeit, 'tis he must feel it; if he drab it, 'tis he must lie by 't: what 's this to me?

Ho. What's all to thee? Nothing, nothing; such is the gulf of thy desire and the wolf of <sup>45</sup> thy conscience: but be assured, old Pecunius Lucre, if ever fortune so bless me that I may be at leisure to vex thee, or any means so favour me that I may have opportunity to mad thee, <sup>1</sup> I will pursue it with that flame of hate, <sup>50</sup> spirit of malice, unrepressed wrath, that I will blast thy comforts.

Luc. Ha, ha, ha!

Lam. Nay, Master Hoard, you're a wise gentleman — <sup>55</sup>

Ho. I will so cross thee —

Luc. And I thee.

Ho. So without mercy fret thee —

Luc. So monstrously oppose thee —

Ho. Dost scoff at my just anger? O, that <sup>60</sup> I had as much power as usury has over thee!

Luc. Then thou wouldst have as much power as the devil has over thee.

Ho. Toad!

Luc. Asp! <sup>65</sup>

Ho. Serpent!

Luc. Viper!

Spi. Nay, gentlemen, then we must divide you perforce.

Lam. When the fire grows too unreason- <sup>70</sup> able hot, there 's no better way than to take off the wood.

Exeunt [LAMPREY and SPICHCOCK, drawing off LUCRE and HOARD different ways].

Free. A word, good signior.

Mon. How now, what's the news?

Free. 'Tis given me to understand that <sup>75</sup> you are a rival of mine in the love of Mistress Joyce, Master Hoard's niece: say me ay, say me no?

Mon. Yes, 'tis so.

Free. Then look to yourself, you cannot <sup>80</sup> live long. I'm practising every morning; a month hence I'll challenge you.

Mon. Give me your hand upon 't; there's my pledge I'll meet you. Strikes him, and exit.

Free. O, O! what reason had you for that, sir, to strike before the month? You knew <sup>85</sup> I was not ready for you, and that made you so crank: <sup>3</sup> I am not such a coward to strike again, I warrant you. My ear has the law of her side, for it burns horribly. I will teach him to strike a naked face, the longest day of his life. <sup>91</sup> 'Slid, it shall cost me some money but I'll bring this box into the chancery. Exit.

[SCENE IV.] <sup>4</sup>

Enter WITGOOD and Host.

Host. Fear you nothing, sir; I have lodg'd her in a house of credit, I warrant you.

Wit. Hast thou the writings?

Host. Firm, sir.

Wit. Prithee, stay, and behold two the <sup>95</sup> most prodigious rascals that ever slipt into the shape of men; Dampit, sirrah, and young Gulf, his fellow-caterpillar.

Host. Dampit? Sure I have heard of that Dampit? <sup>10</sup>

Wit. Heard of him! Why, man, he that has lost both his ears may hear of him; a famous infamous trampler <sup>5</sup> of time; his own phrase. Note him well: that Dampit, sirrah, he in the uneven beard and the serge cloak, is the <sup>15</sup> most notorious, usuring, blasphemous, atheistical, brothel-vomiting rascal, that we have in these latter times now extant; whose first beginning was the stealing of a masty <sup>6</sup> dog from a farmer's house. <sup>20</sup>

Host. He lookt as if he would obey the commandment[s] well, when he began first with stealing.

Wit. True: the next town he came at, he set the dogs together by th' ears. <sup>25</sup>

Host. A sign he should follow the law, by my faith.

Wit. So it followed, indeed; and being destitute of all fortunes, stakt his masty against a noble, <sup>7</sup> and by great fortune his dog had the <sup>30</sup> day. How he made it up ten shillings, I know not, but his own boast is, that he came to town with but ten shillings in his purse, and now is creditably worth ten thousand pound.

Host. How the devil came he by it? <sup>35</sup>

[Enter DAMPIT and GULF.]

Wit. How the devil came he not by it? If you put in the devil once, riches come with a vengeance. Has been a trampler of the law, sir; and the devil has a care of his footmen. The rogue has spied me now; he nibbled me finely <sup>40</sup> once, too:—a pox search you!—O, Master Dampit!—the very loins of thee!—Cry you mercy, Master Gulf; you walk so low, I promise you I saw you not, sir.

Gulf. He that walks low walks safe, the <sup>45</sup> poets tell us.

Wit. [Aside.] And nigher hell by a foot and a half than the rest of his fellows.—But, my old Harry!

Dam. My sweet Theodorus! <sup>50</sup>

Wit. 'T was a merry world when thou camest to town with ten shillings in thy purse.

Dam. And now worth ten thousand pound, my boy. Report it; Harry Dampit, a trampler of time, say, he would be up in a morning, <sup>55</sup> and be here with his serge gown, dasht up to the hams in a cause; have his feet stink about Westminster Hall, and come home again; see the galleons, the galleasses, <sup>8</sup> the great armadas of the law; then there be hoys <sup>9</sup> and petty <sup>60</sup> vessels, oars and scullers of the time; there be picklocks of the time too: then would I be here; I would trample up and down like a mule: now to the judges, <sup>65</sup> May it please your reverend honourable fatherhoods; <sup>7</sup> then to <sup>65</sup> my counsellor, <sup>4</sup> May it please your worshipful patience;” then to the examiner’s office, “May it please your mastership’s gentleness;” then to one of the clerks, “May it please your worshipful lousiness,” — for I find him scrubbing [70 in his codpiece; then to the hall again, then to the chamber again—

Wit. And when to the cellar again?

Dam. E’en when thou wilt again: trampplers of time, motions<sup>1</sup> of Fleet Street, and visions [75 of Holborn; here I have fees of one, there I have fees of another; my clients come about me, the fooliaminy<sup>2</sup> and coxcombry of the country: I still trasht<sup>3</sup> and trotted for other men’s causes. Thus was poor Harry Dampit [80 made rich by others’ laziness, who though they would not follow their own suits, I made ’em follow me with their purses.

Wit. Didst thou so, old Harry?

Dam. Ay, and I sours’d ’em with bills of [85 charges, i’ faith; twenty pound a-year have I brought in for boat-hire, and I ne’er stept into boat in my life.

Wit. Trampplers of time!

Dam. Ay, trampplers of time, rascals of [90 time, bull-beggars!<sup>4</sup>

Wit. Ah, thou’rt a mad old Harry! — Kind Master Gulf, I am hold to renew my acquaintance.

Gulf. I embrace it, sir.

Exeunt. 96

MUSIC

ACT II

[SCENE I.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter LUCRE.

Luc. My adversary evermore twits me with my nephew, forsooth, my nephew: why may not a virtuous uncle have a dissolute nephew? What though he be a brotheller, a wastethrift, a common surfeiter, and, to conclude, a beg- [65 gar, must sin in him call up shame in me? Since we have no part in their follies, why should we have part in their infamies? For my strict hand toward his mortgage, that I deny not: I confess I had an uncle’s pen’worth; [70 let me see, half in half, true. I saw neither hope of his reclaiming, nor comfort in his being; and was it not then better bestow’d upon his uncle than upon one of his aunts? — I need not say bawd, for every one knows what “aunt” stands for in the last translation. 10

[Enter Servant.]

Now, Sir?

Ser. There’s a country serving-man, sir, at- tends to speak with your worship.

Luc. I’m at best leisure now; send him in [20 to me. [Exit Servant.]

Enter Host like a serving-man.

Host. Bless your venerable worship.

Luc. Welcome, good fellow.

Host. [Aside.] He calls me thief<sup>6</sup> at first sight, yet he little thinks I am an host.

Luc. What’s thy business with me? 26

Host. Faith, sir, I am sent from my mistress, to any sufficient gentleman indeed, to ask advice upon a doubtful point: ’t is indifferent, sir, to whom I come, for I know none, nor [30 did my mistress direct me to any particular man, for she’s as mere a stranger here as myself; only I found your worship within, and ’t is a thing I ever lov’d, sir, to be despatcht as soon as I can. 35

Luc. [Aside.] A good, blunt honesty; I like him well.— What is thy mistress?

Host. Faith, a country gentlewoman, and a widow, sir. Yesterday was the first flight of us; but now she intends to stay till a little [40 term business be ended.

Luc. Her name, I prithee?

Host. It runs there in the writings, sir, among her lands; Widow Medler.

Luc. Medler? Mass, have I<sup>7</sup> ne’er heard [45 of that widow?

Host. Yes, I warrant you, have you, sir; not the rich widow in Staffordshire?

Luc. Cuds<sup>8</sup> me, there ’t is indeed; thou hast put me into memory. There’s a widow in- [50 deed; ah, that I were a bachelor again!

Host. No doubt your worship might do much then; but she’s fairly promist to a bachelor already.

Luc. Ah, what is he, I prithee? 55

Host. A country gentleman too; one of whom your worship knows not, I’m sure; h’as spent some few follies in his youth, but marriage, by my faith, begins to call him home. My mistress loves him, sir, and love covers faults, you [60 know: one Master Witgood, if ever you have heard of the gentleman.

Luc. Ha! Witgood, sayst thou?

Host. That’s his name indeed, sir; my mistress is like to bring him to a goodly seat [65 yonder; four hundred a-year, by my faith.

Luc. But, I pray, take me with you.<sup>9</sup>

Host. Ay, sir.

Luc. What countryman might this young Witgood be? 70

Host. A Leicestershire gentleman, sir.

Luc. [Aside.] My nephew, by th’ mass, my nephew! I’ll fetch out more of this, i’ faith: a simple country fellow, I’ll work ’t out of him. — And is that gentleman, sayst thou, presently to marry her? 76

Host. Faith, he brought her up to town, sir; h’as the best card in all the bunch for ’t, her heart; and I know my mistress will be married ere she go down; <sup>10</sup> nay, I’ll swear that, for [80 she’s none of those widows that will go down

<sup>9</sup> Let me understand you.

<sup>10</sup> To the country, with a pun.

first, and be married after; she hates that, I can tell you, sir.

Luc. By my faith, sir, she is like to have a proper gentleman, and a comely; I'll give [165 her that gift.

Host. Why, does your worship know him, sir?

Luc. I know him? Does not all the world know him? Can a man of such exquisite [170 qualities be hid under a bushel?

Host. Then your worship may save me a labour, for I had charge given me to inquire after him.

Luc. Inquire of him? If I might counsel [175 thee, thou shouldst ne'er trouble thyself further; inquire of him no more, but of me; I'll fit thee. I grant he has been youthful; but is he not now reclaim'd? Mark you that, sir: has not your mistress, think you, been wanton [180 in her youth? If men be wags, are there not women wagtails?

Host. No doubt, sir.

Luc. Does not he return wisest that comes home whipt with his own follies? [185

Host. Why, very true, sir.

Luc. The worst report you can hear of him, I can tell you, is that he has been a kind gentleman, a liberal, and a worthy; who but lusty Witgood, thrice-noble Witgood! [190

Host. Since your worship has so much knowledge in him, can you resolve me, sir, what his living might be? My duty binds me, sir, to have a care of my mistress' estate; she has been ever a good mistress to me, though I [195 say it. Many wealthy suitors has she consulted for his sake; yet, though her love be so fixt, a man cannot tell whether his non-performance may help to remove it, sir; he makes us believe he has lands and living. [200

Luc. Who, young Master Witgood? Why, believe it, he has as goodly a fine living out yonder,—what do you call the place?

Host. Nay, I know not, i' faith.

Luc. Hum—see, like a beast, if I have [205 not forgot the name—pooh! and out yonder again, goodly grown woods and fair meadows: pax<sup>1</sup> on 't, I can ne'er hit of that place neither.—He? Why, he's Witgood of Witgood Hall; he an unknown thing! [210

Host. Is he so, sir? To see how rumour will alter! Trust me, sir, we heard once he had no lands, but all lay mortgag'd to an uncle he has in town here.

Luc. Push! 't is a tale, 't is a tale. [215

Host. I can assure you, sir, 't was credibly reported to my mistress.

Luc. Why, do you think, i' faith, he was ever so simple to mortgage his lands to his uncle, or his uncle so unnatural to take the extremity of such a mortgage? [220

Host. That was my saying still, sir.

Luc. Pooh, ne'er think it.

Host. Yet that report goes current.

Luc. Nay, then you urge me: [225 Cannot I tell that best that am his uncle?

Host. How, sir? what have I done!

Luc. Why, how now! In a swoon, man?

Host. Is your worship his uncle, sir?

Luc. Can that be any harm to you, sir? [230

Host. I do beseech you, sir, do me the favour to conceal it. What a beast was I to utter so much! Pray, sir, do me the kindness to keep it in; I shall have my coat pull'd o'er my ears, an' 't should be known; for the truth is, an' 't [235 please your worship, to prevent much rumour and many suitors, they intend to be married very suddenly and privately.

Luc. And dost thou think it stands with my judgment to do them injury? Must I needs [240 say the knowledge of this marriage comes from thee? Am I a fool at fifty-four? Do I lack subtlety now, that have got all my wealth by it? There's a leash of angels<sup>2</sup> for thee: come, let me woo thee speak where lie<sup>3</sup> they? [245

Host. So I might have no anger, sir—

Luc. Passion of me, not a jot: prithee, come.

Host. I would not have it known, sir, it came by my means.

Luc. Why, am I a man of wisdom? [250

Host. I dare trust your worship, sir; but I'm a stranger to your house; and to avoid all intelligencers, I desire your worship's ear.

Luc. [Aside.] This fellow's worth a matter of trust.—Come, sir. [Host whispers to him.] Why, now, thou'rt an honest lad.—Ah, [255 sirrah, nephew!

Host. Please you, sir, now I have begun with your worship, when shall I attend for your advice upon that doubtful point? I must come warily now. [260

Luc. Tut, fear thou nothing; To-morrow's evening shall resolve the doubt.

Host. The time shall cause my attendance.

Exit.

Luc. Fare thee well.—There's more true [265 honesty in such a country serving-man than in a hundred of our cloak companions:<sup>4</sup> I may well call 'em companions,<sup>4</sup> for since blue<sup>5</sup> coats have been turn'd into cloaks, we can scarce know the man from the master.—George! [270

[Enter GEORGE.]

Geo. Anon, sir.

Luc. List hither: [whispers] keep the place secret: commend me to my nephew; I know no cause, tell him, but he might see his uncle.

Geo. I will, sir. [275

Luc. And, do you hear, sir?

Take heed to use him with respect and duty.

Geo. [Aside.] Here's a strange alteration; one day he must be turn'd out like a beggar, and now he must be call'd in like a knight. [280

Exit.

Luc. Ah, sirrah, that rich widow!—four hundred a-year! beside, I hear she lays claim to a title of a hundred more. This falls unhappily that he should bear a grudge to me now, being likely to prove so rich. What [285

is 't, trow, that he makes me a stranger for? Hum,—I hope he has not so much wit to apprehend that I cozened him: he deceives me then. Good Heaven, who would have thought it would ever have come to this pass! yet [210] he's a proper gentleman, i' faith, give him his due,—marry, that's his mortgage; but that I ne'er mean to give him. I'll make him rich enough in words, if that be good: and if it come to a piece of money, I will not greatly stick [215] for 't; there may be hope some of the widow's lands, too, may one day fall upon me, if things be carried wisely.

[Re-enter GEORGE.]

Now, sir, where is he?

Geo. He desires your worship to hold him [220] excus'd; he has such weighty business, it commands him wholly from all men.

Luc. Were those my nephew's words?

Geo. Yes, indeed, sir.

Luc. [Aside.] When men grow rich, they [225] grow proud too, I perceive that. He would not have sent me such an answer once within this twelvemonth: see what 't is when a man comes to his lands! Return to him again, sir; tell him his uncle desires his company for an hour; [230] I'll trouble him but an hour, say; 'tis for his own good, tell him: and, do you hear, sir? put "worship" upon him. Go to, do as I bid you; he's like to be a gentleman of worship very shortly. [235]

Geo. [Aside.] This is good sport, i' faith.

Exit.

Luc. Troth, he uses his uncle discourteously now. Can he tell what I may do for him? Goodness may come from me in a minute, that comes not in seven year again. He knows my hu- [240] mour; I am not so usually good; 't is no small thing that draws kindness from me, he may know that an he will. The chief cause that invites me to do him most good is the sudden astonishing of old Hoard, my adversary. How [245] pale his malice will look at my nephew's advancement! With what a dejected spirit he will behold his fortunes, whom but last day he proclaim'd rioter, penurious makeshift, despised brothel-master! Ha, ha! 't will do me [250] more secret joy than my last purchase, more precious comfort than all these widow's revenues.

[Re-enter GEORGE, showing in] WITGOOD.

Now, sir?

Geo. With much entreaty he's at length [255] come, sir. [Exit.]

Luc. O, nephew, let me salute you, sir! Your're welcome, nephew.

Wit. Uncle, I thank you.

Luc. You've a fault, nephew; you're a [260] stranger here. Well, Heaven give you joy!

Wit. Of what, sir?

Luc. Hah, we can hear!

You might have known your uncle's house, i' faith,

You and your widow: go to, you were to blame;

If I may tell you so without offence. [265]

Wit. How could you hear of that, sir?

Luc. O, pardon me!

'T was your will to have kept it from me, I perceive now.

Wit. Not for any defect of love, I protest, uncle. [270]

Luc. Oh, 't was unkindness, nephew! fie, fie, fie.

Wit. I am sorry you take it in that sense, sir.

Luc. Pooh, you cannot colour it, i' faith, [275] nephew.

Wit. Will you but hear what I can say in my just excuse, sir.

Luc. Yes, faith, will I, and welcome. [280]

Wit. You that know my danger i' th' city, sir, so well, how great my debts are, and how extreme my creditors, could not out of your pure judgment, sir, have wisht us hither.

Luc. Mass, a firm reason indeed.

Wit. Else, my uncle's house! why, 't had [285] been the only make-match.

Luc. Nay, and thy credit.

Wit. My credit? Nay, my countenance. Fish, nay, I know, uncle, you would have wrought it so by your wit, you would have made her believe in time the whole house had been mine. [290]

Luc. Ay, and most of the goods too.

Wit. La, you there! Well, let 'em all prate what they will, there's nothing like the bringing of a widow to one's uncle's house. [295]

Luc. Nay, let nephews be rul'd as they list, they shall find their uncle's house the most natural place when all's done.

Wit. There they may be bold.

Luc. Life, they may do anything there, [300] man, and fear neither beadle nor summoner. An uncle's house! a very Cole-Harbour.<sup>1</sup> Sirrah, I'll touch thee near now: hast thou so much interest in thy widow, that by a token thou couldst presently send for her? [305]

Wit. Troth, I think I can, uncle.

Luc. Go to, let me see that.

Wit. Pray, command one of your men hither, uncle.

Luc. George!

[310]

[Re-enter GEORGE.]

Geo. Here, sir.

Luc. Attend my nephew. [WITGOOD whispers to GEORGE, who then goes out.]—[Aside.] I love a life<sup>2</sup> to prattle with a rich widow; 't is pretty, methinks, when our tongues go together: [315] and then to promise much and perform little. I love that sport a' life, i' faith; yet I am in the mood now to do my nephew some good, if he take me handsomely. What, have you despatcht? [320]

Wit. I ha' sent, sir.

Luc. Yet I must condemn you of unkindness, nephew.

Wit. Heaven forbid, uncle!

Luc. Yes, faith, must I. Say your debts be [325] many, your creditors importunate, yet the kindness of a thing is all, nephew: you might have sent me close<sup>1</sup> word on 't, without the least danger or prejudice to your fortunes. 329

Wit. Troth, I confess it, uncle; I was to blame there; but, indeed, my intent was to have clapt it up suddenly, and so have broke forth like a joy to my friends, and a wonder to the world. Beside, there's a trifle of a forty pound matter toward the setting of me forth; [325 my friends should ne'er have known on 't; I meant to make shift for that myself.

Luc. How, nephew? let me not hear such a word again, I beseech you. Shall I be beholding to you? 330

Wit. To me? Alas, what do you mean, uncle? I charge you, upon my love, you trouble nobody but myself.

Wit. You've no reason for that, uncle.

Luc. Troth, I'll ne'er be friends with you while you live, an you do. 340

Wit. Nay, an you say so, uncle, here's my hand; I will not do 't.

Luc. Why, well said! there's some hope in thee when thou wilt be rul'd. I'll make it [350 up fifty, faith, because I see thee so reclaim'd. Peace; here comes my wife with Sam, her t'other husband's son.

[Enter MISTRESS LUCRE and FREEDOM.]

Wit. Good aunt. 364

Free. Cousin Witgood, I rejoice in my salute; you're most welcome to this noble city, govern'd with the sword in the scabbard.

Wit. [Aside.] And the wit in the pommel. — Good Master Sam Freedom, I return the salute.

Luc. By the mass, she's coming, wife; let [360 me see now how thou wilt entertain her.

Mis. L. I hope I am not to learn, sir, to entertain a widow; 'tis not so long since I was one myself.

[Enter Courtesan.]

Wit. Uncle — 366

Luc. She's come indeed.

Wit. My uncle was desirous to see you, widow, and I presumed to invite you.

Cour. The presumption was nothing, Master Witgood. Is this your uncle, sir? 370

Luc. Marry am I, sweet widow; and his good uncle he shall find me; ay, by this smack that I give thee, thou'rt welcome. — Wife, bid the widow welcome the same way again. 374

Free. [Aside.] I am a gentleman now too by my father's occupation, and I see no reason but I may kiss a widow by my father's copy: <sup>2</sup> truly, I think the charter is not against it; surely these are the words, "The son once a gentleman may revel it, though his father were a dau- [380 ber;" 'tis about the fifteenth page: I'll to her. [Offers to kiss the Courtesan, who repulses him.]

Luc. You're not very busy now; a word with thee, sweet widow. 385

Free. Coads-nigs!<sup>3</sup> I was never so disgrac'd since the hour my mother whipt me.

Luc. Beside, I have no child of mine own to care for; she's my second wife, old, past bearing; clap sure to him, widow; he's like to be my heir, I can tell you. 391

Cour. Is he so, sir?

Luc. He knows it already, and the knave's proud on 't; jolly rich widows have been offer'd him here i' th' city, great merchants' wives; and do you think he will once look upon [398 'em? Forsooth, he'll none. You are beholding to him i' th' country, then, ere we could be; nay, I'll hold a wager, widow, if he were once known to be in town, he would be presently [400 sought after; nay, and happy were they that could catch him first.

Cour. I think so.

Luc. O, there would be such running to and fro, widow! He should not pass the streets for 'em: he'd be took up in one great house or [408 other presently; laugh! they know he has it, and must have it. You see this house here, widow; this house and all comes to him; goodly rooms, ready furnisht, ceil'd with plaster [410 of Paris, and all hung about with cloth of arras.

— Nephew.

Wit. Sir.

Luc. Show the widow your house; carry her into all the rooms, and bid her welcome. — [415 You shall see, widow. — [Aside to WITGOOD.] Nephew, strike all sure above an thou beest a good boy, — ah!

Wit. Alas, sir, I know not how she would take it! 420

Luc. The right way, I warrant t' ee. A pox, art an ass? Would I were in thy stead! get you up, I am asham'd of you. [Exeunt WITGOOD and Courtesan.] So: let 'em agree as they will now: many a match has been struck up in my house a' this fashion: let 'em try all man- [425 ner of ways, still there's nothing like an uncle's house to strike the stroke in. I'll hold my wife in talk a little. — Now Jenny, your son there goes a-wooing to a poor gentlewoman but of [430 a thousand pound portion: see my nephew, a lad of less hope, strikes at four hundred a-year in good rubbish.

Mis. L. Well, we must do as we may, sir.

Luc. I'll have his money ready told for him again<sup>4</sup> he come down. Let me see, too; — by [435 th' mass, I must present the widow with some jewel, a good piece a' plate, or such a device; 't will hearten her on well. I have a very fair standing cup; and a good high standing cup [440 will please a widow above all other pieces.

Exit.

Mis. L. Do you mock us with your nephew? — I have a plot in my head, son; — i' faith, husband, to cross you.

Free. Is it a tragedy plot, or a comedy plot, good mother? 446

Mis. L. 'Tis a plot shall vex him. I charge you, of my blessing, son Sam, that you presently withdraw the action of your love from Master Hoard's niece. 450

Free. How, mother?

Mis. L. Nay, I have a plot in my head, i' faith. Here, take this chain of gold, and this fair diamond: dog me the widow home to her lodging, and at thy best opportunity, fasten 'em 455 both upon her. Nay, I have a reach: <sup>1</sup> I can tell you thou art known what thou art, son, among the right worshipful, all the twelve companies.

Free. Truly, I thank 'em for it. 460

Mis. L. He? he's a scab to thee: and so certify her thou hast two hundred a-year of thyself, besides thy good parts — a proper person and a lovely. If I were a widow, I could find in my heart to have thee myself, son; ay, 465 from 'em all.

Free. Thank you for your good will, mother; but, indeed, I had rather have a stranger: and if I woo her not in that violent fashion, that 470 I will make her be glad to take these gifts ere I leave her, let me never be called the heir of your body.

Mis. L. Nay, I know there's enough in you, son, if you once come to put it forth. 474

Free. I'll quickly make a bolt or a shaft on 't. <sup>2</sup> Exeunt.

[SCENE II.] <sup>3</sup>

Enter HOARD and MONEYLOVE.

Mon. Faith, Master Hoard, I have bestowed many months in the suit of your niece, such was the dear love I ever bore to her virtues: but since she hath so extremely denied me, I am to lay out for my fortunes elsewhere. 5

Hoa. Heaven forbid but you should, sir! I ever told you my niece stood otherwise affected. <sup>4</sup>

Mon. I must confess you did, sir; yet, in regard of my great loss of time, and the zeal with which I sought your niece, shall I desire one 10 favour of your worship?

Hoa. In regard of those two, 't is hard but you shall, sir.

Mon. I shall rest grateful: 't is not full three hours, sir, since the happy rumour of a rich 15 country widow came to my hearing.

Hoa. How? a rich country widow?

Mon. Four hundred a-year landed.

Hoa. Yea?

Mon. Most firm, sir; and I have learnt her 20 lodging. Here my suit begins, sir; if I might but entreat your worship to be a countenance for me, and speak a good word (for your words will pass), I nothing doubt but I might set fair for the widow; nor shall your labour, sir, end 25 altogether in thanks; two hundred angels —

Hoa. So, so: what suitors has she?

Mon. There lies the comfort, sir; the report of her is yet but a whisper; and only solicited

by young riotous Witgood, nephew to your mortal adversary. 31

Hoa. Ha! art certain he's her suitor?

Mon. Most certain, sir; and his uncle very industrious to beguile the widow, and make up the match. 35

Hoa. So: very good.

Mon. Now, sir, you know this young Witgood is a spendthrift, dissolute fellow.

Hoa. A very rascal.

Mon. A midnight surfeiter. 40

Hoa. The spume of a brothel-house.

Mon. True, sir; which being well told in your worship's phrase, may both heave him out of her mind, and drive a fair way for me to the widow's affections. 45

Hoa. Attend me about five.

Mon. With my best care, sir. Exit.

Hoa. Fool, thou hast left thy treasure with a thief,

To trust a widower with a suit in love! Happy revenge, I hug thee! I have not only 50 the means laid before me, extremely to cross my adversary, and confound the last hopes of his nephew, but thereby to enrich my estate, augment my revenues, and build mine own fortunes greater: ha, ha! 55

I'll mar your phrase, o'erturn your flatteries, Undo your windings, policies, and plots, Fall like a secret and despatchful plague On your secured comforts. Why, I am able To buy three of Lucre; thrice outbid him, 60 Let my out-monies be reckoned and all.

Enter three [of WITGOOD'S] Creditors.

1 [Cred.] I am glad of this news.

2 [Cred.] So are we, by my faith.

3 [Cred.] Young Witgood will be a gallant again now. 65

Hoa. Peace. [Listening.]

1 Cred. I promise you, Master Cockpit, she's a mighty rich widow.

2 Cred. Why, have you ever heard of her?

1 Cred. Who? Widow Medler? She lies 70 open to much rumour.

3 Cred. Four hundred a-year, they say, in very good land.

1 Cred. [Nay,] take 't of my word, if you believe that, you believe the least. 75

2 Cred. And to see how close he keeps it!

1 Cred. O, sir, there's policy in that, to prevent better suitors.

3 Cred. He owes me a hundred pound, and I protest I ne'er lookt for a penny. 80

1 Cred. He little dreams of our coming; he'll wonder to see his creditors upon him.

Exeunt [Creditors].

Hoa. Good, his creditors: I'll follow. This makes for me;

All know the widow's wealth; and 't is well known

I can estate her fairly, ay, and will. 85

In this one chance shines a twice happy fate;

I both deject my foe and raise my state. Exit.

MUSIC.

<sup>1</sup> Scheme.

<sup>2</sup> A proverb: I'll make the venture. A bolt was an arrow with a round knob at its head; a shaft, sharp and barbed.

<sup>4</sup> In love with some one else.

ACT III

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

[Enter] WITGOOD with his Creditors.

Wit. Why, alas, my creditors, could you find no other time to undo me but now? Rather your malice appears in this than the justness of the debt.

1 Cred. Master Witgood, I have forborne [<sup>6</sup> my money long.

Wit. I pray, speak low, sir: what do you mean?

2 Cred. We hear you are to be married suddenly to a rich country widow. <sup>10</sup>

Wit. What can be kept so close but you creditors hear on't! Well, 't is a lamentable state, that our chiefest afflictors should first hear of our fortunes. Why, this is no good course, i' faith, sirs: if ever you have hope to be satisfied, why do you seek to confound the means that should work it? There's neither piety, no, nor policy in that. Shine favourably now; why, I may rise and spread again, to your great comforts. <sup>20</sup>

1 Cred. He says true, i' faith.

Wit. Remove me now, and I consume for ever.

2 Cred. Sweet gentleman!

Wit. How can it thrive which from the sun you sever?

3 Cred. It cannot, indeed. <sup>25</sup>

Wit. O, then, show patience! I shall have enough

To satisfy you all.

Cred. Ay, if we could

Be content, a shame take us!

Wit. For, look you;

I am but newly sure<sup>2</sup> yet to the widow, And what a rend might this discredit make! <sup>30</sup> Within these three days will I bind you lands For your securities.

1 Cred. No, good Master Witgood: Would 't were as much as we dare trust you with!

Wit. I know you have been kind; however, now,

Either by wrong report or false incitement, <sup>35</sup>

Your gentleness is injured: in such

A state as this a man cannot want foes.

If on the sudden he begin to rise,

No man that lives can count his enemies.

You had some intelligence, I warrant ye, <sup>40</sup>

From an ill-willer.

2 Cred. Faith, we heard you brought up a rich widow, sir, and were suddenly to marry her. <sup>44</sup>

Wit. Ay, why there it was; I knew 't was so; but since you are so well resolv'd,<sup>3</sup> of my faith toward you, let me be so much favour'd of you, I beseech you all—

All. O, it shall not need, i' faith, sir! — <sup>45</sup>

Wit. As to lie still awhile, and bury my debts in silence, till I be fully possess of the widow; for the truth is— I may tell you as my friends—

All. O, O, O! — <sup>54</sup>

Wit. I am to raise a little money in the city, toward the setting forth of myself, for my own credit and your comfort. Now, if my former debts should be divulg'd, all hope of my proceedings were quite extinguish'd. <sup>59</sup>

1 Cred. Do you hear, sir? I may deserve your custom hereafter; pray, let my money be accepted before a stranger's. Here's forty pound I receiv'd as I came to you; if that may stand you in any stead, make use on't. [Offers him money, which he at first declines.] Nay, pray, sir; 't is at your service. <sup>65</sup>

Wit. You do so ravish me with kindness, that I am constrain'd to play the maid, and take it.

1 Cred. Let none of them see it, I beseech you. <sup>70</sup>

Wit. Fugh!

1 Cred. I hope I shall be first in your remembrance

After the marriage rites.

Wit. Believe it firmly.

1 Cred. So. — What, do you walk, sirs? <sup>74</sup>

2 Cred. I go. — [Aside to WITGOOD.] — Take no care, sir, for money to furnish you; within this hour I send you sufficient. Come, Master Cockpit, we both stay for you.

3 Cred. I ha' lost a ring, i' faith; I'll follow you presently [exunt 1 and 2 Creditors] — but <sup>80</sup> you shall find it, sir. I know your youth and expenses have disfigur'd you of all jewels: there's a ruby of twenty pound price, sir; bestow it upon your widow. [Offers him the ring, which he at first declines.] — What, man! 't <sup>85</sup> will call up her blood to you; beside, if I might so much work with you, I would not have you beholding to those bloodsuckers for any money.

Wit. Not I, believe it.

3 Cred. They're a brace of cut-throats. <sup>90</sup>

Wit. I know 'em.

3 Cred. Send a note of all your wants to my shop, and I'll supply you instantly.

Wit. Say you so? Why, here 's my hand then, no man living shalt do 't but thyself. <sup>95</sup>

3 Cred. Shall I carry it away from 'em both, then?

Wit. I' faith, shalt thou.

3 Cred. Troth, then, I thank you, sir. <sup>99</sup>

Wit. Welcome, good Master Cockpit. Exit [3 Creditor]. — Ha, ha, ha! why, is not this better now than lying a-bed? I perceive there's nothing conjures up wit sooner than poverty, and nothing lays it down sooner than wealth and lechery: this has some savour yet. O that <sup>105</sup> I had the mortgage from mine uncle as sure in possession as these trifles! I would forswear brothel at noonday, and muscadine<sup>4</sup> and eggs, at midnight.

Enter Courtesan.

Cour. Master Witgood, where are you? <sup>110</sup>

Wit. Holla!

Cour. Rich news!

Wit. Would 't were all in plate!

Cour. There's some in chains and jewels. I am so haunted with suitors, Master Witgood, I know not which to despatch first. <sup>116</sup>

Wit. You have the better term,<sup>1</sup> by my faith.

Cour. Among the number One Master Hoard, an ancient gentleman.

Wit. Upon my life, my uncle's adversary. <sup>120</sup>

Cour. It may well hold so, for he rails on you, Speaks shamefully of him.

Wit. As I could wish it.

Cour. I first denied him, but so cunningly, It rather promis'd him assured hopes, Than any loss of labour.

Wit. Excellent! <sup>125</sup>

Cour. I expect him every hour with gentlemen,

With whom he labours to make good his words, To approve you riotous, your state consum'd.

Your uncle—

Wit. Wench, make up thy own fortunes <sup>130</sup> now; do thyself a good turn once in thy days. He's rich in money, movables, and lands; marry him: he's an old doting fool, and that's worth all; marry him. 'Twould be a great comfort to me to see thee do well, i' faith; marry <sup>135</sup> him. 'T would ease my conscience well to see thee well bestow'd; I have a care of thee, i' faith.

Cour. Thanks, sweet Master Witgood.

Wit. I reach at farther happiness: first, I <sup>140</sup> am sure it can be no harm to thee, and there may happen goodness to me by it. Prosecute it well; let's send up for our wits, now we require their best and most pregnant assistance.

Cour. Step in, I think I hear 'em. [Exeunt.]

Enter HOARD and Gentlemen with the Host as serving-man.

Hoar. Art thou the widow's man? By my <sup>145</sup> faith, sh'as a company of proper men then.

Host. I am the worst of six, sir; good enough for blue coats.

Hoar. Hark hither: I hear say thou art in most credit with her. <sup>151</sup>

Host. Not so, sir.

Hoar. Come, come, thou 'rt modest. There's a brace of royals;<sup>2</sup> prithee, help me to th' speech of her. [Gives him money.] <sup>155</sup>

Host. I'll do what I may, sir, always saving myself harmless.

Hoar. Go to, do 't, I say; thou shalt hear better from me.

Host. [Aside.] Is not this a better place <sup>160</sup> than five mark<sup>3</sup> a-year standing wages? Say a man had but three such clients in a day, methinks he might make a poor living on't; beside, I was never brought up with so little honesty to refuse any man's money; never. [<sup>165</sup> What gulls there are a' this side the world! Now know I the widow's mind; none but my young master comes in her clutches: ha, ha, ha!]

Exit.

Hoar. Now, my dear gentlemen, stand firmly to me;

You know his follies and my worth.

1 [Gent.] We do, sir. <sup>170</sup>

2 [Gent.] But, Master Hoard, are you sure he is not i' th' house now?

Hoar. Upon my honesty, I chose this time A' purpose, fit: the spendthrift is abroad. Assist me; here she comes.

Enter Courtesan.

Now, my sweet widow. <sup>175</sup>

Cour. You're welcome, Master Hoard.

Hoar. Despatch, sweet gentlemen, despatch.— I am come, widow, to prove those my words

Neither of envy sprung nor of false tongues, But such as their<sup>4</sup> deserts and actions <sup>180</sup>

Do merit and bring forth; all which these gentlemen,

Well known, and better reputed, will confess.

Cour. I cannot tell

How my affections may dispose of me; But surely if they find him so desertless, <sup>185</sup>

They'll have that reason to withdraw themselves:

And therefore, gentlemen, I do entreat you, As you are fair in reputation

And in appearing form, so shine in truth. I am a widow, and, alas, you know, <sup>190</sup>

Soon overthrown! 'T is a very small thing That we withstand, our weakness is so great:

Be partial unto neither, but deliver, Without affection, your opinion.

Hoar. And that will drive it home. <sup>195</sup>

Cour. Nay, I beseech your silence, Master Hoard;

You are a party.

Hoar. Widow, not a word.

1 Gent. The better first to work you to beliefe,

Know neither of us owe him flattery, Nor t' other malice; but unbribed censure,<sup>5</sup> <sup>200</sup>

So help us our best fortunes!

Cour. It suffices. 1 Gent. That Witgood is a riotous, undone man,

Imperfect both in fame and in estate, His debts wealthier than he, and executions

In wait for his due body, we'll maintain <sup>205</sup> With our best credit and our dearest blood.

Cour. Nor land nor living, say you? Pray, take heed

You do not wrong the gentleman.

1 Gent. What we speak Our lives and means are ready to make good.

Cour. Alas, how soon are we poor souls beguil'd! <sup>210</sup>

2 Gent. And for his uncle—

Hoar. Let that come to me. His uncle, a severe extortioner;

A tyrant at a forfeiture; greedy of others' Miseries; one that would undo his brother,

Nay, swallow up his father, if he can, <sup>215</sup> Within the fathoms of his conscience.

1 Gent. Nay, believe it, widow,

<sup>5</sup> Judgment.

You had not only matcht yourself to wants,
But in an evil and unnatural stock.

Ho. [Aside to Gent.] Follow hard, gentlemen, follow hard.

Cour. Is my love so deceiv'd? Before you all

I do renounce him; on my knees I vow
He ne'er shall marry me.

Wit. [looking in.] Heaven knows he never meant it!

Ho. [Aside to Gent.] There take her at the bound.

1 Gent. Then, with a new and pure affection,
Behold yon gentleman; grave, kind, and rich,
A match worthy yourself: esteeming him,
You do regard your state.

Ho. [Aside to Gent.] I'll make her a jointure, say.

1 Gent. He can join land to land, and will possess you

Of what you can desire.

2 Gent. Come, widow, come.

Cour. The world is so deceitful!

1 Gent. There, 't is deceitful,
Where flattery, want, and imperfection lies;
But none of these in him: push!

Cour. Pray, sir —

1 Gent. Come, you widows are ever most backward when you should do yourselves most good; but were it to marry a chin not worth a hair now, then you would be forward enough. Come, clap hands, a match.

Ho. With all my heart, widow. [HOARD and Courtesan shake hands.] — Thanks, gentlemen:

I will deserve your labour, and [to Courtesan] thy love.

Cour. Alas, you love not widows but for wealth!

I promise you I ha' nothing, sir.

Ho. Well said, widow,
Well said; thy love is all I seek, before
These gentlemen.

Cour. Now I must hope the best.

Ho. My joys are such they want to be expressed.

Cour. But, Master Hoard, one thing I must remember you of, before these gentlemen, your friends: how shall I suddenly avoid the loathed soliciting of that perjurd Witgood, and his tedious, dissembling uncle? who this very day hath appointed a meeting for the same purpose too; where, had not truth come forth, I had been undone, utterly undone!

Ho. What think you of that, gentlemen?

1 Gent. 'T was well devised.

Ho. Hark thee, widow: train<sup>1</sup> out young Witgood single; hasten him thither with thee, somewhat before the hour; where, at the place appointed, these gentlemen and myself will wait the opportunity, when, by some slight removing him from thee, we'll suddenly enter and surprise thee, carry thee away by boat to Cole-Harbour, have a priest ready, and there clap it up instantly. How likest it, widow?

Cour. In that it pleaseth you, it likes me well.

Ho. I'll kiss thee for those words. Come, gentlemen,

Still must I live a suitor to your favours,
Still to your aid beholding.

1 Gent. We're engag'd, sir;

'T is for our credits now to see 't well ended.

Ho. 'T is for your honours, gentlemen; nay, look to 't.

Not only in joy, but I in wealth excel:

No more sweet widow, but, sweet wife, farewell.

Cour. Farewell, sir.

Exeunt [HOARD and Gentlemen.]

Re-enter WITGOOD.

Wit. O for more scope! I could laugh eternally! Give you joy, Mistress Hoard, I promise your fortune was good, forsooth; you've fell upon wealth enough, and there 's young gentlemen enow can help you to the rest. Now, it requires our wits: carry thyself but heedfully now, and we are both —

[Re-enter Host.]

Host. Master Witgood, your uncle.

Wit. Cuds me!<sup>2</sup> remove thyself awhile; I'll serve for him. [Exeunt Courtesan and Host.]

Enter LUCRE.

Luc. Nephew, good morning, nephew.

Wit. The same to you, kind uncle.

Luc. How fares the widow? Does the meeting hold?

Wit. O, no question of that, sir.

Luc. I'll strike the stroke, then, for thee; no more days.<sup>3</sup>

Wit. The sooner the better, uncle. O, she's mightily follow'd!

Luc. And yet so little rumour'd!

Wit. Mightily: here comes one old gentleman, and he'll make her a jointure of three hundred a year, forsooth; another wealthy suitor will estate his son in his lifetime, and make him weigh down the widow; here a merchant's son will possess her with no less than three goodly lordships at once, which were all pawns to his father.

Luc. Peace, nephew, let me hear no more of 'em; it mads me. Thou shalt prevent<sup>4</sup> 'em all. No words to the widow of my coming hither. Let me see — 't is now, upon nine: before twelve, nephew, we will have the bargain struck, we will, faith, boy.

Wit. O, my precious uncle! Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter HOARD and Niece [JOYCE].

Ho. Niece, sweet niece, prithee, have a care to my house; I leave all to thy discretion. Be content to dream awhile; I'll have a husband for thee shortly: put that care upon me, wench,

for in choosing wives and husbands I am only <sup>5</sup> fortunate; I have that gift given me. Exit.
Joy. But 'tis not likely you should choose
for me,

Since nephew to your chiefest enemy
Is he whom I affect: but, O, forgetful!
Why dost thou flatter thy affections so, <sup>10</sup>
With name of him that for a widow's bed
Neglects thy purer love? Can it be so,
Or does report dissemble?

[Enter GEORGE.]

How, now, sir?

Geo. A letter, with which came a private charge.

Joy. Therein I thank your care.

[Exit GEORGE.]

— I know this hand — <sup>15</sup>

[Reads.] Dearer than sight, what the world reports of me, yet believe not; rumour will alter shortly: be thou constant; I am still the same that I was in love, and I hope to be the same in fortunes. <sup>20</sup>

Theodorus Witgood.

I am resolv'd: <sup>1</sup> no more shall fear or doubt
Raise their pale powers to keep affection out.
Exit.

[SCENE III.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter, with a Drawer, HOARD and two Gentle-
men.

Dra. You're very welcome, gentlemen. —
Dick, show those gentlemen the Pomegranate <sup>3</sup>
there.

Hoa. Hist!

Dra. Up those stairs, gentlemen. <sup>5</sup>

Hoa. Hist! drawer!

Dra. Anon, sir.

Hoa. Prithee, ask at the bar if a gentlewoman came not in lately.

Dra. William, at the bar, did you see any <sup>10</sup> gentlewoman come in lately? Speak you ay, speak you no?

Within. No, none came in yet, but Mistress Florence.

Dra. He says none came in yet, sir, but one <sup>15</sup>
Mistress Florence.

Hoa. What is that Florence? A widow?

Dra. Yes, a Dutch widow.

Hoa. How?

Dra. That's an English drab, sir: give your worship good morrow. [Exit.]

Hoa. A merry knave, i' faith! I shall remember a Dutch widow the longest day of my life.

1 Gent. Did not I use most art to win the widow? <sup>25</sup>

2 Gent. You shall pardon me for that, sir;
Master Hoard knows I took her at best vantage.

Hoa. What's that, sweet gentlemen, what's that? <sup>30</sup>

2 Gent. He will needs bear me down, that his art only wrought with the widow most.

Hoa. O, you did both well, gentlemen, you did both well, I thank you.

1 Gent. I was the first that mov'd her. <sup>35</sup>
Hoa. You were, i' faith.

2 Gent. But it was I that took her at the bound.

Hoa. Ay, that was you: faith, gentlemen,
'tis right.

3 Gent. I boasted least, but 't was I join'd their hands.

Hoa. By th' mass, I think he did: you did all well, <sup>40</sup>

Gentlemen, you did all well; contend no more.

1 Gent. Come, you room's fittest.

Hoa. True, 'tis next the door. Exeunt.

Enter WITGOOD, Courtesan, Host [and Drawer].

Dra. You're very welcome: please you to walk up stairs; cloth's laid, sir. <sup>45</sup>

Cour. Up stairs? Troth, I am very weary, Master Witgood.

Wit. Rest yourself here awhile, widow; we'll have a cup of muscadine in this little room.

Dra. A cup of muscadine? You shall have the best, sir. <sup>51</sup>

Wit. But, do you hear, sirrah?

Dra. Do you call? Anon, sir.

Wit. What is there provided for dinner?

Dra. I cannot readily tell you, sir: if you please you may go into the kitchen and see <sup>55</sup> yourself, sir; many gentlemen of worship do use to do it, I assure you, sir. Exit.

Host. A pretty familiar, priggish rascal; he has his part without book. <sup>60</sup>

Wit. Against you are ready to drink to me, widow, I'll be present to pledge you.

Cour. Nay, I commend your care, 't is done well of you. [Exit WITGOOD.] — 'Las, what have I forgot! <sup>65</sup>

Host. What, mistress?

Cour. I slipt my wedding ring off when I washt, and left it at my lodging. Prithee, run;
I shall be sad without it. [Exit Host.] — So, he's gone. Boy! <sup>70</sup>

[Enter Boy.]

Boy. Anon, forsooth.

Cour. Come hither, sirrah: learn secretly if one Master Hoard, an ancient gentleman, be about house.

Boy. I heard such a one nam'd. <sup>75</sup>

Cour. Commend me to him.

Re-enter HOARD and Gentlemen.

Hoa. Ay, boy, do thy commendations.

Cour. O, you come well: away, to boat, be gone.

Hoa. Thus wise men are reveng'd, give two for one. Exeunt.

Re-enter WITGOOD and Vintner.

Wit. I must request <sup>80</sup>

You, sir, to show extraordinary care:
My uncle comes with gentlemen, his friends,
And 't is upon a making.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>2</sup> A tavern.

<sup>3</sup> Rooms in taverns had such individual names.

Win. Is it so?
I'll give a special charge, good Master Wit-
good.

May I be bold to see her?
Win. Who? the widow? 85

With all my heart, i' faith, I'll bring you to her.
Win. If she be a Staffordshire gentlewoman,
't is much if I know her not.

Win. How now? Boy! drawer!

Win. Hie! 90
[Re-enter Boy.]

Boy. Do you call, sir?
Win. Went the gentlewoman up that was
here?

Boy. Up, sir? She went out, sir.
Win. Out, sir? 95

Boy. Out, sir: one Master Hoard, with a guard of gentlemen, carried her out at back door, a pretty while since, sir.

Win. Hoard? Death and darkness! Hoard?

[Re-enter Host.]

Host. The devil of ring I can find. 100

Win. How now? What news? Where's the widow?

Host. My mistress? Is she not here, sir?
Win. More madness yet!

Host. She sent me for a ring. 105

Win. A plot, a plot! — To boat! she's stole away.

Host. What?

Enter LUCRE and Gentlemen.

Win. Follow! Inquire old Hoard, my uncle's adversary. [Exit Host.]

Luc. Nephew, what's that? 110

Win. Thrice-miserable wretch!

Luc. Why, what's the matter?

Win. The widow's borne away, sir.

Luc. Ha? passion of me! — A heavy welcome, gentlemen.

I Gent. The widow gone? 115

Luc. Who durst attempt it?

Win. Who but old Hoard, my uncle's adversary?

Luc. How?

Win. With his confederates.

Luc. Hoard, my deadly enemy? — Gentlemen, stand to me, 120

I will not bear it; 't is in hate of me;
That villain seeks my shame, nay, thirsts my
blood;

He owes me mortal malice.
I'll spend my wealth on this despiteful plot,
Ere he shall cross me and my nephew thus. 125

Win. So maliciously!

Re-enter Host.

Luc. How now, you treacherous rascal?

Host. That's none of my name, sir.

Win. Poor soul, he knew not on 't!

Luc. I'm sorry. I see then 't was a mere plot.

Host. I trac'd 'em nearly —

Luc. Well?

Host. And hear for certain 131

They have took Cole-Harbour.

Luc. The devil's sanctuary!
They shall not rest; I'll pluck her from his arms —

Kind and dear gentlemen,
If ever I had seats within your breasts — 135

I Gent. No more, good sir; it is a wrong to
us

To see you injur'd; in a cause so just We'll spend our lives but we will right our friends.

Luc. Honest and kind! come we've delay'd too long;

Nephew, take comfort; a just cause is strong.

Exeunt [all but WINGOOD]. 140

Win. That's all my comfort, uncle. Ha, ha,
ha!

Now may events fall luckily and well;
He that ne'er strives, says wit, shall ne'er excel. [Exit.]

[SCENE IV.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter DAMPIT, the usurer, drunk.

Dam. When did I say my prayers? In anno 88, when the great armada was coming; and in anno 99, when the great thunder and lightning was, I pray'd heartily then, i' faith, to overthrow Poovies' new buildings; I kneeled by [s my great iron chest, I remember.

[Enter AUDREY.]

Aud. Master Dampit, one may hear you before they see you: you keep sweet hours, Master Dampit; we were all a-bed three hours ago.

Dam. Audrey? 10

Aud. O, you're a fine gentleman!

Dam. So I am i' faith, and a fine scholar. Do you use to go to bed so early, Audrey?

Aud. Call you this early, Master Dampit?

Dam. Why, is 't not one of clock i' th' [15 morning? Is not that early enough? Fetch me a glass of fresh beer.

Aud. Here, I have warm'd your nightcap for you, Master Dampit.

Dam. Draw it on then. I am very weak [20 truly; I have not eaten so much as the bulk of an egg these three days.

Aud. You have drunk the more, Master
Dampit.

Dam. What's that? 25

Aud. You mought,<sup>2</sup> an you would, Master
Dampit.

Dam. I answer you, I cannot. Hold your prating; you prate too much, and understand too little: are you answered? Give me a glass [30 of beer.

Aud. May I ask you how you do, Master
Dampit?

Dam. How do I? I' faith, naught.

Aud. I ne'er knew you do otherwise. 35

Dam. I eat not one pen'orth of bread these two years. Give me a glass of fresh beer. I am not sick, nor I am not well.

Aud. Take this warm napkin about your neck, sir, whilst I help to make you unready.<sup>3</sup>

Dam. How now, Audrey-prater, with your scurvy devices, what say you now? <sup>42</sup>

Aud. What say I, Master Dampit? I say nothing, but that you are very weak.

Dam. Faith, thou hast more cony-catch-<sup>45</sup> ing<sup>1</sup> devices than all London.

Aud. Why, Master Dampit, I never deceiv'd you in all my life.

Dam. Why was that? Because I never did trust thee. <sup>50</sup>

Aud. I care not what you say, Master Dampit.

Dam. Hold thy prating: I answer thee, thou art a beggar, a quean, and a bawd: are you answer'd? <sup>55</sup>

Aud. Fie, Master Dampit! a gentleman, and have such words?

Dam. Why, thou base drudge of infortunity, thou kitchen-stuff-drab of beggary, roguery, and coxcombry, thou cavernessd quean of <sup>60</sup> foolery, knavery, and bawdreaminy, I'll tell thee what, I will not give a louse for thy fortunes.

Aud. No, Master Dampit? and there's a gentleman comes a-wooing to me, and he doubts<sup>2</sup> <sup>65</sup> nothing but that you will get me from him.

Dam. I? If I would either have thee or lie with thee for two thousand pound, would I might be damn'd! Why, thou base, impudent quean of foolery, flattery, and coxcombry, are <sup>70</sup> you answer'd?

Aud. Come, will you rise and go to bed, sir?

Dam. Rise, and go to bed too, Audrey? How does Mistress Proserpine?

Aud. Foh! <sup>75</sup>

Dam. She's as fine a philosopher of a stinkard's wife, as any within the liberties. Faugh, faugh, Audrey!

Aud. How now, Master Dampit?

Dam. Fie upon't, what a choice of stinks <sup>80</sup> here is! What hast thou done, Audrey? Fie upon't, here's a choice of stinks indeed! Give me a glass of fresh beer, and then I will to bed.

Aud. It waits for you above, sir. <sup>85</sup>

Dam. Foh! I think they burn horns in Barnard's Inn. If ever I smelt such an abominable stink, usury forsake me. <sup>[Exit.]</sup>

Aud. They be the stinking nails of his trampling feet, and he talks of burning horns. <sup>[Exit.]</sup>

ACT IV

[SCENE I.]

Enter at Cole-Harbour HOARD, the Widow, [LAMPREX, SPICHOCK,] and Gentlemen, he married now.

1 [Gent.] Join hearts, join hands, In wedlock's bands,

Never to part

Till death cleave your heart.

[To HOARD.] You shall forsake all other women;

[To Courtesan.] You lords, knights, gentlemen, and yeomen.

What my tongue slips

Make up with your lips.

Ho. Give you joy, Mistress Hoard; let the kiss come about. <sup>[Knocking.]</sup>

Who knocks? Convey my little pig-eater<sup>3</sup> out.

Luc. [within.] Hoard! <sup>11</sup>

Ho. Upon my life, my adversary, gentlemen!

Luc. [within.] Hoard, open the door, or we will force it ope:

Give us the widow.

Ho. Gentlemen, keep 'em out.

Lam. He comes upon his death that enters here. <sup>15</sup>

Luc. [within.] My friends, assist me!

Ho. He has assistants, gentlemen.

Lam. Tut, nor him nor them we in this action fear.

Luc. [within.] Shall I, in peace, speak one word with the widow?

Cour. Husband, and gentlemen, hear me but a word.

Ho. Freely, sweet wife.

Cour. Let him in peaceably; <sup>20</sup>

You know we're sure from any act of his.

Ho. Most true.

[Cour.]<sup>4</sup> You may stand by and smile at his old weakness:

Let me alone to answer him.

Ho. Content; <sup>25</sup>

'T will be good mirth, i' faith. How think you, gentlemen?

Lam. Good gullery!

Ho. Upon calm conditions let him in.

Luc. [within.] All spite and malice!

Lam. Hear me, Master Lucre: <sup>30</sup>

So you will vow a peaceful entrance

With those your friends, and only exercise

Calm conference with the widow, without fury,

The passage shall receive you.

Enter LUCRE, [Gentlemen, and Host.]

Luc. I do vow it.

Lam. Then enter and talk freely: here she stands. <sup>35</sup>

Luc. O, Master Hoard, your spite has watcht the hour!

You're excellent at vengeance, Master Hoard.

Ho. Ha, ha, ha!

Luc. I am the fool you laugh at:

You are wise, sir, and know the seasons well.—

Come hither, widow: why is it thus? <sup>41</sup>

O, you have done me infinite disgrace,

And your own credit no small injury!

Suffer mine enemy so despitefully

To hear you from my nephew? O, I had <sup>45</sup>

Rather half my substance had been forfeit

And begg'd by some starv'd rascal!

Cour. Why, what would you wish me do, sir?

I must not overthrow my state for love:

We have too many precedents for that; <sup>50</sup>

From thousands of our wealthy undone widows

One may derive some wit. I do confess

I lov'd your nephew, nay, I did affect him
Against the mind and liking of my friends ;
Believ'd his promises ; lay here in hope 55
Of flatter'd living, and the boast of lands.
Coming to touch his wealth and state indeed,
It appears dress ; I find him not the man ;
Imperfect, mean, scarce furnisht of his needs :
In words, fair lordships ; in performance, hovels :

Can any woman love the thing that is not ? 61

Luc. Broke you for this ?

Cour. Was it not cause too much ?

Send to inquire his state : most part of it
Lay two years mortgag'd in his uncle's hands.

Luc. Why, say it did, you might have known my mind : 66

I could have soon restor'd it.

Cour. Ay, had I but seen any such thing perform'd,

Why, 't would have tied my affection, and contain'd

Me in my first desires. Do you think, i' faith, 70
That I could twine such a dry oak as this,
Had promise in your nephew took effect ?

Luc. Why, and there's no time past ; and rather than

My adversary should thus thwart my hopes,
I would — 76

Cour. Tut, you've been ever full of golden
speech :

If words were lands, your nephew would be rich.

Luc. Widow, believe 't, I vow by my best bliss,
Before these gentlemen, I will give in
The mortgage to my nephew instantly, 80
Before I sleep or eat.

1 Gent. [friend to LUCRE.] We'll pawn our credits,

Widow, what he speaks shall be perform'd
In fulness.

Luc. Nay, more ; I will estate him
In farther blessings ; he shall be my heir ;

I have no son ; 85

I'll bind myself to that condition.

Cour. When I shall hear this done, I shall soon yield

To reasonable terms.

Luc. In the mean season,
Will you protest, before these gentlemen, 90

To keep yourself as you're now at this present ?

Cour. I do protest, before these gentlemen,
I will be as clear then as I am now.

Luc. I do believe you. Here's your own honest
servant,

I'll take him along with me.
Cour. Ay, with all my heart.

Luc. He shall see all perform'd, and bring you word. 95

Cour. That's all I wait for.

Ho. What, have you finish't, Master Lucre ?
Ha, ha, ha, ha !

Luc. So laugh, Hoard, laugh at your poor enemy, do ;

The wind may turn, you may be laught at too ;
Yes, marry may you, sir. — Ha, ha, ha ! 100

Excunt [LUCRE, Gentlemen, and Host].

Ho. Ha, ha, ha ! if every man that swells in malice

Could be reveng'd as happily as I,
He would choose hate, and forswear amity. —

What did he say, wife, prithee ?

Cour. Faith, spoke to ease his mind.
Ho. O, O, O ! 105

Cour. You know now, little to any purpose.
Ho. True, true, true !

Cour. He would do mountains now.
Ho. Ay, ay, ay, ay.

Lam. You've struck him dead, Master Hoard.
Spi. And his nephew desperate.

Ho. I know 't sirs, I.
Never did man so crush his enemy. Excunt. 110

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter LUCRE, Gentlemen, [and Host,] meeting
SAM FREEDOM.

Luc. My son-in-law, Sam Freedom, where's my nephew ?

Free. O man in lamentation,<sup>2</sup> father.

Luc. How !

Free. He thumps his breast like a gallant dicer that has lost his doublet, and stands [s in's shirt to do penance.

Luc. Alas, poor gentleman !

Free. I warrant you may hear him sigh in a still evening to your house at Highgate.

Luc. I prithee send him in. 10

Free. Were it to do a greater matter, I will not stick with you, sir, in regard you married my mother. [Exit.]

Luc. Sweet gentlemen, cheer him up ; I will but fetch the mortgage and return to you [15 instantly. Exit.

1 [Gent.] We'll do our best, sir. — See where he comes,

E'en joyless and regardless of all form.

[Enter WITGOOD.]

2 [Gent.] Why, how now, Master Witgood ?
Fie ! you a firm scholar, and an understand- [20
ing gentleman, and give your best parts to passion ?<sup>3</sup>

1 Gent. Come, fie fie !
Wit. O, gentlemen —

1 Gent. Sorrow of me, what a sigh was there,
sir ! 25

Nine such widows are not worth it.

Wit. To be borne from me by that lecher, Hoard !

1 Gent. That vengeance is your uncle's ; being done

More in despite to him than wrong to you :
But we bring comfort now.

Wit. I beseech you, gentlemen — [30

2 Gent. Cheer thyself, man ; there's hope of her, i' faith.

Wit. Too glad some to be true.

Re-enter LUCRE.

Luc. Nephew, what cheer ?
Alas, poor gentleman, how art thou chang'd !

1 A room in Lucre's house.

2 "O man in desperation" is the name of an old tune mentioned by Nashe and Peele.

3 Grief.

Call thy fresh blood into thy cheeks again:
She comes.

Wit. Nothing afflicts me so much, 35
But that it is your adversary, uncle,
And merely plotted in despite of you.

Luc. Ay, that's it mads me, spites me! I'll spend my wealth ere he shall carry her so, because I know 't is only to spite me. Ay, this 40 is it. Here, nephew [giving a paper], before these kind gentlemen, I deliver in your mortgage, my promise to the widow; see, 't is done.
Be wise, you're once more master of your own.
The widow shall perceive now you are not 45 altogether such a beggar as the world reputes you; you can make shift to bring her to three hundred a-year, sir.

1 Gent. By'rady, and that's no toy, sir.

Luc. A word, nephew. 50

1 Gent. [to Host.] Now you may certify the widow.

Luc. You must conceive it aright, nephew,
now;

To do you good I am content to do this.

Wit. I know it, sir. 55

Luc. But your own conscience can tell I had it

Dearly enough of you.

Wit. Ay, that's most certain.

Luc. Much money laid out, beside many a journey

To fetch the rent; I hope you'll think on 't,
nephew.

Wit. I were worse than a beast else, i' faith.

Luc. Although to blind the widow and the
world, 61

I out of policy do 't, yet there's a conscience,
nephew.

Wit. Heaven forbid else!

Luc. When you are full possess,
'T is nothing to return it.

Wit. Alas, a thing quickly done, uncle! 65

Luc. Well said! you know I give it you but in trust.

Wit. Pray, let me understand you rightly,
uncle:

You give it me but in trust?

Luc. No.

Wit. That is, you trust me with it? 70

Luc. True, true.

Wit. [Aside.] But if ever I trust you with it
again,

Would I might be truss'd up for my labour!

Luc. You can all witness, gentlemen; and you, sir yeoman? 75

Host. My life for yours, sir, now, I know thy mistress's mind too well toward your nephew;
let things be in preparation; and I'll train her hither in most excellent fashion. Exit.

Luc. A good old boy!—Wife! Jenny! 80

Enter Wife.

Mis. L. What's the news, sir?

Luc. The wedding-day's at hand: prithee, sweet wife, express thy housewifery. Thou'rt a fine cook, I know 't; thy first husband married thee out of an alderman's kitchen; go 85 to, he rais'd thee for raising of paste. What!

here's none but friends; most of our beginnings must be winkt at.—Gentlemen, I invite you all to my nephew's wedding against Thursday morning. 90

1 Gent. With all our hearts, and we shall joy to see

Your enemy so mockt.

Luc. He laught at me, gentlemen; ha, ha, ha! Exeunt [all but Witgood].

Wit. He has no conscience, faith, would laugh at them:

They laugh at one another; 95

Who then can be so cruel? Troth, not I;

I rather pity now, than ought envy.

I do conceive such joy in mine own happiness,

I have no leisure yet to laugh at their follies.

Thou soul of my estate, I kiss thee! 100
[To the mortgage.]

I miss life's comfort when I miss thee

O, never will we part again,

Until I leave the site of men!

We'll ne'er trust conscience of our kin,

Since cozenage brings that title in. Exit. 105

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter three Creditors.

1 Cred. I'll wait these seven hours but I'll see him caught.

2 Cred. Faith, so will I.

3 Cred. Hang him, prodigal! He's stript of the widow. 5

1 Cred. A' my troth, she's the wiser; she has made the happier choice; and I wonder of what stuff those widows' hearts are made of,
that will marry unfledg'd boys before comely thrum-chinn'd<sup>2</sup> gentlemen. 10

Enter Boy.

Boy. News, news, news!

1 Cred. What, boy?

Boy. The rioter is caught.

1 Cred. So, so, so, so! it warms me at the
heart;

I love a' life to see dogs upon men. 15

O, here he comes.

Enter Witgood, with Sergeants.

Wit. My last joy was so great, it took away the sense of all future afflictions. What a day is here o'ercast! How soon a black tempest rises!

1 Cred. O, we may speak with you now, 20 sir! What's become of your rich widow? I think you may cast your cap at the widow, may you not, sir?

2 Cred. He a rich widow? Who, a prodigal, a daily rioter, and a nightly vomiter? He a 25 widow of account? He a hole i' th' Counter.<sup>3</sup>

Wit. You do well, my masters, to tyrannise over misery, to afflict the afflicted; 't is a custom you have here amongst you; I would wish you never leave it, and I hope you'll do as I bid
you. 31

<sup>1</sup> A street.

<sup>2</sup> Rough-chinn'd. "Thrum" is the end of the warp in weaving.

1 Cred. Come, come, sir, what say you extempore now to your bill of a hundred pound? A sweet debt for frothing<sup>1</sup> your doublets?

2 Cred. Here's mine of forty. 35

3 Cred. Here's mine of fifty.

Wit. Pray, sirs, — you'll give me breath?

1 Cred. No, sir, we'll keep you out of breath still; then we shall be sure you will not run away from us. 40

Wit. Will you but hear me speak?

2 Cred. You shall pardon us for that, sir; we know you have too fair a tongue of your own; you overcame us too lately, a shame take you! We are like to lose all that for want of wit-<sup>45</sup> nesses; we dealt in policy then: always when we strive to be most politic we prove most coxcombs: non plus ultra I perceive by us, we're not ordain'd to thrive by wisdom, and therefore we must be content to be tradesmen. 50

Wit. Give me but reasonable time, and I protest I'll make you ample satisfaction.

1 Cred. Do you talk of reasonable time to us?

Wit. 'Tis true, beasts know no reasonable time. 55

2 Cred. We must have either money or carcass.

Wit. Alas, what good will my carcass do you? 3 Cred. O, 'tis a secret delight we have <sup>60</sup> amongst us! We that are us'd to keep birds in cages, have the heart to keep men in prison, I warrant you.

Wit. [Aside.] I perceive I must crave a little more aid from my wits: do but make shift for <sup>65</sup> me this once, and I'll forswear ever to trouble you in the like fashion hereafter; I'll have better employment for you, an I live. — You'll give me leave, my masters, to make trial of my friends, and raise all means I can? 70

1 Cred. That's our desires, sir.

Enter Host.

Host. Master Witgood,

Wit. O, art thou come?

Host. May I speak one word with you in private, sir? 75

Wit. No, by my faith, canst thou; I am in hell here, and the devils will not let me come to thee.

1 Cred. Do you call us devils? You shall find us puritans. — Bear him away; let <sup>80</sup> 'em talk as they go: we'll not stand to hear 'em. — Ah, sir, am I a devil? I shall think the better of myself as long as I live: a devil, i' faith! 85
Exeunt.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter HOARD.

Ho. What a sweet blessing hast thou, Master Hoard, above a multitude! Wilt thou never be thankful? How dost thou think to be blest another time? Or dost thou count this the full measure of thy happiness? By my troth, I <sup>85</sup> think thou dost: not only a wife large in possessions, but spacious in content; she's rich, she's young, she's fair, she's wise. When I wake, I think of her lands — that revives me; when I go to bed, I dream of her beauty — and that's <sup>90</sup> enough for me: she's worth four hundred a-year in her very smock, if a man knew how to use it. But the journey will be all, in troth, into the country; to ride to her lands in state and order following; my brother, and other worshipful <sup>95</sup> gentlemen, whose companies I ha' sent down for already, to ride along with us in their goodly decorum beards, their broad velvet cassocks, and chains of gold twice or thrice double; against which time I'll entertain some ten <sup>100</sup> men of mine own into liveries, all of occupations or qualities; I will not keep an idle man about me: the sight of which will so vex my adversary Lucre — for we'll pass by his door a' purpose, make a little stand for [the] nonce, and have <sup>105</sup> our horses curvet before the window — certainly he will never endure it, but run up and hang himself presently.

[Enter Servant.]

How now, sirrah, what news? Any that offer their service to me yet? 110

Ser. Yes, sir, there are some i' th' hall that wait for your worship's liking, and desire to be entertain'd.

Ho. Are they of occupation?

Ser. They are men fit for your worship, sir. <sup>115</sup> Ho. Sayest so? Send 'em all in. [Exit Servant.] — To see ten men ride after me in wachuset<sup>3</sup> liveries, with orange-tawny capes, — 't will cut his comb, i' faith.

Enter All [Tailor, Barber, Perfumer, Falconer, and Huntsman].

How now? Of what occupation are you, sir? <sup>120</sup>

Tai. A tailor, an 't please your worship.

Ho. A tailor? O, very good: you shall serve to make all the liveries. — What are you, sir?

Bar. A barber, sir.

Ho. A barber? very needful: you shall shave all the house, and, if need require, stand for <sup>125</sup> a reaper i' th' summer time. — You, sir?

Per. A perfumer.

Ho. I smelt you before. Perfumers, of all men, had need carry themselves uprightly; <sup>130</sup> for if they were once knaves, they would be smelt out quickly. — To you, sir?

Fal. A falconer, an 't please your worship.

Ho. Sa ho, sa ho, sa ho! <sup>135</sup> — And you, sir?

Hunt. A huntsman, sir. 140

Ho. There, boy, there, boy, there, boy! <sup>145</sup> I am not so old but I have pleasant days to come. I promise, you, my masters, [I take such a good liking to you, that I entertain you all:] I put you already into my countenance, and you <sup>150</sup> shall be shortly in my livery; but especially you two, my jolly falconer and my bonny huntsman; we shall have most need of you at my wife's manor-houses i' th' country; there's goodly parks and champion <sup>6</sup> grounds for you; we <sup>155</sup>

shall have all our sports within ourselves; all the gentlemen a' th' country shall be beholding to us and our pastimes.

Ful. And we'll make your worship admire, sir. <sup>70</sup>

Ho. Sayest thou so? Do but make me admire, and thou shall want for nothing. — My tailor.

Tai. Anon, sir.

Ho. Go presently in hand with the liveries. <sup>75</sup>

Tai. I will, sir.

Ho. My barber.

Bar. Here, sir.

Ho. Make 'em all trim fellows, louse 'em well, — especially my huntsman, — and cut <sup>80</sup> all their beards of the Polonian fashion. — My perfumer.

Per. Under your nose, sir.

Ho. Cast a better savour upon the knives, to take away the scent of my tailor's feet, and my barber's lotium-water. <sup>85</sup>

Per. It shall be carefully perform'd, sir.

Ho. But you, my falconer and huntsman, the welcom'st men alive, i' faith!

Hunt. And we'll show you that, sir, shall <sup>90</sup> deserve your worship's favour.

Ho. I prithee, show me that. — Go, you knives all, and wash your lungs i' th' buttry, go. [Exeunt Tailor, Barber, &c.] — By th' mass, and well rememb'rd! I'll ask my wife <sup>95</sup> that question. — Wife, Mistress Jane Hoard!

Enter Courtesan, alter'd in apparel.

Cour. Sir, would you with me?

Ho. I would but know, sweet wife, which might stand best to thy liking, to have the wedding dinner kept here or i' th' country? <sup>100</sup>

Cour. Hum: — faith, sir, 't would like me better here; here you were married, here let all rites be ended.

Ho. Could a marquesse <sup>1</sup> give a better answer? Hoard, bear thy head aloft, thou 'st a wife will advance it. <sup>105</sup>

Enter Host with a letter.

What haste comes here now? Yea, a letter? Some dreg of my adversary's malice. Come hither; what's the news? <sup>109</sup>

Host. A thing that concerns my mistress, sir.

Giving a letter to Courtesan.

Ho. Why then it concerns me, knave.

Host. Ay, and you, knave, too (cry your worship mercy). You are both like to come into trouble, I promise you, sir; a pre-contract. <sup>2</sup>

Ho. How? a pre-contract, sayest thou? <sup>115</sup>

Host. I fear they have too much proof on 't, sir: old Luere, he runs mad up and down, and will to law as fast as he can; young Witgood laid hold on by his creditors, he exclaims <sup>119</sup> upon you a' t' other side, says you have wrought his undoing by the injurious detaining of his contract.

Ho. Body a' me!

<sup>2</sup> A pre-contract of marriage could not be set aside without the mutual consent of the parties. (Bullen.)

Host. He will have utmost satisfaction: The law shall give him recompense, he says. <sup>125</sup>

Cour. [Aside.] Alas, his creditors so merciless! my state being yet uncertain, I deem it not unconsconable to further him.

Host. True, sir.

Ho. Wife, what says that letter? Let me construe it. <sup>131</sup>

Cour. Curst be my rash and unadvised words! [Tears the letter and stamps on it.]

I'll set my foot upon my tongue, And tread my inconsiderate grant to dust.

Ho. Wife — <sup>135</sup>

Host. [Aside.] A pretty shift, i' faith! I commend a woman when she can make away a letter from her husband handsomely, and this was cleanly done, by my troth.

Cour. I did, sir; <sup>140</sup>

Some foolish words I must confess did pass, Which now litigiously he fastens on.

Ho. Of what force? Let me examine 'em.

Cour. Too strong, I fear: would I were well freed of him! <sup>145</sup>

Ho. Shall I compound?

Cour. No, sir, I'd have it done some nobler way

Of your side; I'd have you come off with honour; Let baseness keep with them. Why, have you not The means, sir? The occasion 's offer'd you. <sup>150</sup>

Ho. Where, how, dear wife?

Cour. He is now caught by his creditors; the slave's needy; his debts petty; he'll rather bind himself to all inconveniences than rot in prison; by this only means you may get a release from him. 'T is not yet come to his uncle's <sup>155</sup> hearing; send speedily for the creditors; by this time he 's desperate; he'll set his hand to anything: take order for his debts, or discharge 'em quite: a pax on him, let's be rid of a rascal! <sup>161</sup>

Ho. Excellent!

Thou dost astonish me. — Go, run, make haste; Bring both the creditors and Witgood hither.

Host. [Aside.] This will be some revenge yet. [Exit.]

Ho. In the mean space I'll have a release drawn. — <sup>165</sup> Within there!

[Enter Servant.]

[Ser.] Sir?

Ho. Sirrah, come take directions; go to my scrivener.

Cour. [Aside, while HOARD gives directions to the Servant.] I'm yet like those whose riches lie in dreams, <sup>170</sup>

If I be wakt, they're false; such is my fate, Who venture deeper than the desperate state. Though I have sinn'd, yet could I become new, For where I once vow, I am ever true.

Ho. Away, despatch, on my displeasure, quickly. [Exit Servant.] <sup>175</sup>

Happy occasion! pray Heaven he be in the right vein now to set his hand to 't, that nothing alter him; grant that all his follies may meet in him at once, to besot him enough! I pray for him, i' faith, and here he comes. <sup>180</sup>

[Enter WITGOOD and Creditors.]

Wit. What would you with me now, my uncle's spiteful adversary?

Hoa. Nay, I am friends.

Wit. Ay, when your mischief's spent.

Hoa. I heard you were arrested.

Wit. Well, what then?

You will pay none of my debts, I am sure. 185

Hoa. A wise man cannot tell;

There may be those conditions' greed upon
May move me to do much.

Wit. Ay, when? —

'Tis thou, perjured woman! (O, no name
Is vile enough to match thy treachery!) 190
That art the cause of my confusion.

Cour. Out, you penurious slave!

Hoa. Nay, wife, you are too froward;
Let him alone; give losers leave to talk.

Wit. Shall I remember thee of another promise
Far stronger than the first?

Cour. I'd fain know that. 195

Wit. 'T would call shame to thy cheeks.

Cour. Shame!

Wit. Hark in your ear. — [They converse apart.]

Will he come off, think'st thou, and pay my debts roundly?

Cour. Doubt nothing; there's a release a-drawing and all, to which you must set your
hand. 201

Wit. Excellent!

Cour. But methinks, i' faith, you might have made some shift to discharge this yourself, having in the mortgage, and never have burd'ned
my conscience with it. 206

Wit. A' my troth, I could not, for my creditors' cruelties extend to the present.

Cour. No more. —

Why, do your worst for that, I defy you. 210

Wit. You're impudent: I'll call up witnesses.

Cour. Call up thy wits, for thou hast been devoted

To follies a long time.

Hoa. Wife, you're too bitter. —

Master Witgood, and you, my masters, you shall hear a mild speech come from me now, and [215 this it is: 't has been my fortune, gentlemen, to have an extraordinary blessing poured upon me a' late, and here she stands; I have wedded her, and bedded her, and yet she is little the worse. Some foolish words she hath past to you in the country, and some peevish<sup>1</sup> debts you [221 owe here in the city; set the hare's head to the goose-giblet,<sup>2</sup> release you her of her words, and I'll release you of your debts, sir.

Wit. Would you so? I thank you for that,
sir; I cannot blame you, i' faith. 225

Hoa. Why, are not debts better than words,
sir?

Wit. Are not words promises, and are not promises debts, sir? 230

Hoa. [Aside.] He plays at back-racket<sup>3</sup> with
me.

1 Cred. Come hither, Master Witgood, come hither; be rul'd by fools once.

2 Cred. We are citizens, and know what belongs to 't. 236

1 Cred. Take hold of his offer: pax on her, let her go. If your debts were once discharg'd,
I would help you to a widow myself worth ten of her. 240

3 Cred. Mass, partner, and now you remember me on 't, there's Master Mulligrub's sister newly fallen a widow.

1 Cred. Cuds me, as pat as can be! There's a widow left for you; ten thousand in money, beside plate, jewels, et cetera: I warrant it a [246 match; we can do all in all with her. Prithee, despatch; we'll carry thee to her presently.

Wit. My uncle will ne'er endure me when he shall hear I set my hand to a release. 250

2 Cred. Hark, I'll tell thee a trick for that.
I have spent five hundred pound in suits in my time, I should be wise. Thou'rt now a prisoner; make a release; take 't of my word, whatsoever a man makes as long as he is in [255
durance, 'tis nothing in law, not thus much.

[Snaps his fingers.]

Wit. Say you so, sir?

3 Cred. I have paid for 't; I know 't.

Wit. Proceed then; I consent.

3 Cred. Why, well said. 260

Hoa. How now, my masters, what have you done with him?

1 Cred. With much ado, sir, we have got him to consent.

Hoa. Ah — a — a! and what come his debts to now? 266

1 Cred. Some eight score odd pounds, sir.

Hoa. Naw, naw, naw, naw, naw! tell me the second time; give me a lighter sum. They are but desperate debts, you know; ne'er call'd [270 in but upon such an accident; a poor, needy knave, he would starve and rot in prison. Come, come, you shall have ten shillings in the pound,
and the sum down roundly.

1 Cred. You must make it a mark, sir. 275

Hoa. Go to then, tell your money in the meantime; you shall find little less there. [Giving them money.] — Come, Master Witgood, you are so unwilling to do yourself good now!

[Enter Scrivener.]

Welcome, honest scrivener. — Now you shall hear the release read. 281

Scri. [reads.] Be it known to all men, by these presents, that I, Theodorus Witgood, gentleman, sole nephew to Pecunius Lucre,
having unjustly made title and claim to one [285
Jane Medler, late widow of Anthony Medler, and now wife to Walkadine Hoard, in consideration of a competent sum of money to discharge my debts, do for ever hereafter disclaim any title, right, estate, or interest in or to [290 the said widow, late in the occupation of the said Anthony Medler, and now in the occupation of Walkadine Hoard; as also neither to lay claim by virtue of any former contract, grant, promise, or demise, to any of her [295
manors, manor-houses, parks, groves, meadowgrounds, arable lands, barns, stacks, stables, dove-holes, and coney-burrows; together with all her cattle, money, plate, jewels, borders, chains, bracelets, furnitures, hangings, <sup>500</sup> moveables or immoveables. In witness whereof, I the said Theodorus Witgood, have interchangeably set to my hand and seal before these presents, the day and date above written.

Wit. What a precious fortune hast thou slipt here, like a beast as thou art! <sup>505</sup>

Hoa. Come, unwilling heart, come.

Wit. Well, Master Hoard, give me the pen; I see

'T is vain to quarrel with our destiny.

[Signs the paper.]

Hoa. O, as vain a thing as can be! you <sup>510</sup> cannot commit a greater absurdity, sir. So, so; give me that hand now; before all these presents, I am friends for ever with thee.

Wit. Troth, and it were pity of my heart now, if I should bear you any grudge, i' faith. <sup>515</sup>

Hoa. Content: I'll send for thy uncle against the wedding dinner; we will be friends once again.

Wit. I hope to bring it to pass myself, sir.

Hoa. How now? Is't right, my masters? <sup>520</sup>

1 Cred. 'T is something wanting, sir; yet it shall be sufficient.

Hoa. Why, well said; a good conscience makes a fine show now-a-days. Come, my masters, you shall all taste of my wine ere you depart. <sup>525</sup>

All. We follow you, sir.

[Exeunt HOARD and Serivener.]

Wit. [Aside.] I'll try these fellows now. — A word, sir: what, will you carry me to that widow now? <sup>530</sup>

1 Cred. Why, do you think we were in earnest, i' faith? Carry you to a rich widow? We should get much credit by that: a noted rioter! a contemptible prodigal! 'T was a trick we have amongst us to get in our money: fare you well, sir. <sup>535</sup>

Wit. Farewell, and be hang'd, you short pig-hair'd, ram-headed rascals! He that believes in you shall ne'er be sav'd, I warrant him. By this new league I shall have some access unto my love. <sup>541</sup>

[JOYCE appears above.]

Joyce. Master Witgood!

Wit. My life!

Joyce. Meet me presently; that note directs you [throws him a letter]: I would not be suspected. Our happiness attends us: farewell. <sup>545</sup>

Wit. A word's enough. [Exeunt severally].

[SCENE V.]<sup>1</sup>

DAMPIT the usurer in his bed; AUDREY spinning by; [Boy.]

[Aud. singing.]

Let the usurer cram him, in interest that excel, There's pits enow to damn him, before he comes to hell;

1 Dampit's bed-chamber.

In Holborn some, in Fleet Street some,
Where'er he come there's some, there's some.

Dam. Trahe, trahito, draw the curtain; give me a sip of sack more. <sup>5</sup>

[While he drinks,] enter Gentlemen, [LAMPREY and SPICHOCK.]

Lam. Look you; did not I tell you he lay like the devil in chains, when he was bound for a thousand year?

Spi. But I think the devil had no steel <sup>10</sup> bedstuffs; he goes beyond him for that.

Lam. Nay, do but mark the conceit of his drinking; one must wipe his mouth for him with a muckinder,<sup>2</sup> do you see, sir?

Spi. Is this the sick trampler? Why, he <sup>15</sup> is only bed-rid with drinking.

Lam. True, sir. He spies us.

Dam. What, Sir Tristram? You come and see a weak man here, a very weak man.

Lam. If you be weak in body, you should <sup>20</sup> be strong in prayer, sir.

Dam. O, I have prayed too much, poor man!

Lam. There's a taste of his soul for you!

Spi. Faugh, loathsome!

Lam. I come to borrow a hundred pound <sup>25</sup> of you, sir.

Dam. Alas, you come at an ill time! I cannot spare it i' faith; I ha' but two thousand i' th' house.

Aud. Ha, ha, ha! <sup>30</sup>

Dam. Out, you gervative<sup>3</sup> quean, the mulli-pood<sup>3</sup> of villany, the spinner of concupiscency!

Enter [SIR LAUNCELOT and] other Gentlemen.

Sir L. Yea, gentlemen, are you here before us? How is he now?

Lam. Faith, the same man still: the taven bitch has bit him i' the head.<sup>4</sup> <sup>35</sup>

Sir L. We shall have the better sport with him: peace. — And how cheers Master Dampit now?

Dam. O, my bosom, Sir Launcelot, how cheer I! Thy presence is restorative. <sup>41</sup>

Sir L. But I hear a great complaint of you, Master Dampit, among gallants.

Dam. I am glad of that, i' faith: prithee, what? <sup>45</sup>

Sir L. They say you are wax'd proud a' late, and if a friend visit you in the afternoon, you'll scarce know him.

Dam. Fie, fie; proud? I cannot remember any such thing: sure I was drunk then. <sup>50</sup>

Sir L. Think you so, sir?

Dam. There 't was, i' faith; nothing but the pride of the sack; and so certify 'em. — Fetch sack, sirrah.

Boy. A vengeance sack you once! <sup>55</sup>

[Exit, and returns presently with sack.]

Aud. Why, Master Dampit, if you hold on as you begin, and lie a little longer, you need not take care how to dispose your wealth ;

<sup>3</sup> As before, Dampit's words must be interpreted by the context.

<sup>4</sup> I. e. he is drunk.

you'll make the vintner your heir. <sup>50</sup>

Dam. Out, you babliaminy, you unfeathered, cremitorious quean, you cullisance of scabiosity !

Aud. Good words, Master Dampit, to speak before a maid and a virgin !

Dam. Hang thy virginity upon the pole of carnality ! <sup>65</sup>

Aud. Sweet terms ! My mistress shall know
'em.

Lam. Note but the misery of this usuring slave : here he lies, like a noisome dunghill, full of the poison of his drunken blasphemies ; <sup>70</sup> and they to whom he bequeaths all, grudge him the very meat that feeds him, the very pillow that eases him. Here may a usurer behold his end. What profits it to be a slave in this world, and a devil i' th' next ? <sup>75</sup>

Dam. Sir Launcelot, let me buss<sup>1</sup> thee, Sir Launcelot ; thou art the only friend that I honour and respect.

Sir L. I thank you for that, Master Dampit.

Dam. Farewell, my bosom Sir Launcelot. <sup>80</sup>

Sir L. Gentlemen, an you love me, let me step behind you, and one of you fall a-talking of me to him.

Lam. Content.—Master Dampit—

Dam. So, sir. <sup>85</sup>

Lam. Here came Sir Launcelot to see you e'en now.

Dam. Hang him, rascal !

Lam. Who ? Sir Launcelot ?

Dam. Pythagorical rascal ! <sup>90</sup>

Lam. Pythagorical ?

Dam. Ay, he changes his cloak when he meets a sergeant.

Sir L. What a rogue's this !

Lam. I wonder you can rail at him, sir ; <sup>95</sup>
he comes in love to see you.

Dam. A louse for his love ! his father was a comb-maker ; I have no need of his crawling love. He comes to have longer day,<sup>2</sup> the superlative rascal ! <sup>100</sup>

Sir L. 'Sfoot, I can no longer endure the rogue !—Master Dampit, I come to take my leave once again, sir.

Dam. Who ? my dear and kind Sir Launcelot, the only gentleman of England ? Let me hug thee ; farewell, and a thousand. <sup>105</sup>

Lam. Compos'd of wrongs and slavish flatteries !

Sir L. Nay, gentlemen, he shall show you more tricks yet ; I'll give you another taste <sup>110</sup> of him.

Lam. Is't possible ?

Sir L. His memory is upon departing.

Dam. Another cup of sack ! <sup>114</sup>

Sir L. Mass, then 't will be quite gone ! Before he drink that, tell him there's a country client come up, and here attends for his learned advice.

Lam. Enough.

Dam. One cup more, and then let the bell <sup>120</sup> toll : I hope I shall be weak enough by that
time.

Lam. Master Dampit—

Dam. Is the sack spouting ?

Lam. 'Tis coming forward, sir. Here a countryman, a client of yours, waits for deep and profound advice, sir.

Dam. A coxcombry, where is he ? Let approach : set me up a peg higher.

Lam. [to SIR LAUN.] You must draw
sir.

Dam. Now, good man fooliaminy, wh
you to me now ?

Sir L. Please your good worship, I am man, sir—

Dam. What make you in my chamber

Sir L. I would entreat your worship vice<sup>3</sup> in a just and honest cause, sir.

Dam. I meddle with no such matters
fer 'em to Master No-man's office.

Sir L. I had but one house left me in world, sir, which was my father's, my father's, my great-grandfather's, and villain has unjustly wrung me out, and possession on 't.

Dam. Has he such feats ? Thy best co to bring thy ejectione firmæ, and in seven thou mayst shove him out by the law.

Sir L. Alas, an 't please your worship, small friends and less money !

Dam. Hoyday ! this gear will fadge
Hast no money ? Why, then, my adv thou must set fire a' th' house, and so go
out.

Lam. That will break strife, indeed.

Sir L. I thank your worship for you counsel, sir.—Altering but my voice a you see he knew me not : you may obser this, that a drunkard's memory holds lo the voice than in the person. But, gent men, shall I show you a sight ? Behold th dive-dapper<sup>5</sup> of damnation, Gulf the u for his time worse than t'other.

Enter HOARD with GULF.

Lam. What's he comes with him ?

Sir L. Why, Hoard, that married late the Widow Medler.

Lam. O, I cry you merey, sir.

Ho. Now, gentlemen visitants, how Master Dampit ?

Sir L. Faith, here he lies, e'en draw sir, good canary as fast as he can, sir ;
weak creature, truly, he is almost past
ory.

Ho. Fie, Master Dampit ! you lie a-bed here, and I come to invite you to wedding-dinner : up, up, up !

Dam. Who's this ? Master Hoard ? hast thou married, in the name of foolery

Ho. A rich widow.

Dam. A Dutch widow ? <sup>6</sup>

Ho. A rich widow ; one Widow Medl

Dam. Medler ? She keeps open house.

Ho. She did, I can tell you, in her husband's days ; open house for all co

horse and man was welcome, and room enough for 'em all.

Dam. There 's too much for thee, then; thou mayst let out some to thy neighbours.

Gulf. What, hung alive in chains? O spectacle! bed-staffs of steel? O monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum! O Dampit, Dampit, here 's a just judgment shown upon usury, extortion, and trampling villany!

Sir L. This is excellent, thief rails upon the thief!

Gulf. Is this the end of cut-throat usury, brothel, and blasphemy? Now mayst thou see what race a usurer runs.

Dam. Why, thou rogue of universality, do not I know thee? Thy sound is like the cuckoo, the Welsh ambassador; thou cowardly slave, that offers to fight with a sick man when his weapon 's down! Rail upon me in my naked bed? Why, thou great Lucifer's little vicar! I am not so weak but I know a knave at first sight. Thou inconscionable rascal! thou that goest upon Middlesex juries, and wilt make haste to give up thy verdict because thou wilt not lose thy dinner! Are you answered?

Gulf. An 't were not for shame —

Draws his dagger.

Dam. Thou wouldst be hang'd then.

Lam. Nay, you must exercise patience, Master Gulf, always in a sick man's chamber.

Sir L. He 'll quarrel with none, I warrant you, but those that are bed-rid.

Dam. Let him come, gentlemen, I am arm'd: reach my close-stool hither.

Sir L. Here will be a sweet fray anon: I 'll leave you, gentlemen.

Lam. Nay, we 'll go along with you. — Master Gulf —

Gulf. Hang him, usuring rascal!

Sir L. Pish, set your strength to his, your wit to his!

Aud. Pray, gentlemen, depart; his hour 's come upon him. — Sleep in my bosom, sleep.

Sir L. Nay, we have enough of him, i' faith; keep him for the house.

Now make your best:
For thrice his wealth I would no have his breast.

Gulf. A little thing would make me beat him now he 's asleep.

Sir L. Mass, then 't will be a pitiful day when he wakes: I would be loath to see that day: come.

Gulf. You overrule me, gentlemen, i' faith.

Exeunt.

ACT V

[SCENE I.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter LUCRE and WITGOOD.

Wit. Nay, uncle, let me prevail with you so much; i' faith, go, now he has invited you.

Luc. I shall have great joy there when he has borne away the widow!

Wit. Why, la, I thought where I should find you presently. Uncle, a' my troth, 't is nothing so.

Luc. What 's nothing so, sir? Is not he married to the widow?

Wit. No, by my troth, is he not, uncle.

Luc. How?

Wit. Will you have the truth on 't? He is married to a whore, i' faith.

Luc. I should laugh at that.

Wit. Uncle, let me perish in your favour if you find it not so; and that 't is I that have married the honest woman.

Luc. Ha! I 'd walk ten mile 'a foot to see that, i' faith.

Wit. And see 't you shall, or I 'll ne'er see you again.

Luc. A 'quean, i' faith? Ha, ha, ha! Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>5</sup>

Enter HOARD, tasting wine, Host following in a livery cloak.

Ho. Pup, pup, pup, pup, I like not this wine: is there never a better tierce in the house?

Host. Yes, sir, there are as good tierces in the house as any are in England.

Ho. Desire your mistress, you knave, to taste 'em all over; she has best skill.

Host. [Aside.] Has she so? The better for her, and the worse for you. Exit.

Ho. Arthur!

[Enter ARTHUR.]

Is the cupboard of plate set out?

Arth. All 's in order, sir.

Ho. I am in love with my liveries every time I think on 'em; they make a gallant show, by my troth. Niece!

[Enter JOYCE.]

Joyce. Do you call, sir?

Ho. Frithee, show a little diligence, and overlook the knaves a little; they 'll filch and steal to-day, and send whole pasties home to their wives; an thou be'st a good niece, do not see me purloin'd.

Joyce. Fear it not, sir — [Aside.] I have cause: though the feast be prepared for you, yet it serves fit for my wedding-dinner too. Exit.

Enter two Gentlemen [LAMPREY and SPIECCOCK].

Ho. Master Lamprey and Master Spieccock, two the most welcome gentlemen alive! Your fathers and mine were all free a' th' fishmongers.

Lam. They were indeed, sir. You see bold guests, sir; soon entreated.

Ho. And that 's best, sir.

<sup>6</sup> Members of the Fishmongers' Company.

[Enter Servant.]

How now, sirrah?

Ser. There's a coach come to th' door, sir.

[Exit.]

Hoa. My Lady Foxtone, a' my life! — Mistress Jane Hoard! wife! — Mass, 't is her lady-ship indeed!

[Enter Lady FOXTONE.]

Madam, you are welcome to an unfurnisht house, dearth of cheer, scarcity of attendance.

L. Fox. You are pleas'd to make the worst, sir.

Hoa. Wife!

[Enter Courtesan.]

L. Fox. Is this your wife?

Hoa. Yes, madam. — Salute my Lady Foxtone.

Cour. Please you, madam, awhile to taste [45 the air in the garden?

L. Fox. 'T will please us well.

Exeunt [L. FOXTONE and Courtesan].

Hoa. Who would not wed? The most delicious life!

No joys are like the comforts of a wife.

Lam. So we bachelors think, that are not troubled with them.

[Re-enter Servant.]

Ser. Your worship's brother, with other ancient gentlemen, are newly alighted, sir. [Exit.]

Hoa. Master Onesiphorus Hoard? Why, now our company begins to come in.

[Enter ONESIPHORUS HOARD, LIMBER, and KIX.]

My dear and kind brother, welcome, i' faith.

O. Hoa. You see we are men at an hour, brother.

Hoa. Ay, I'll say that for you, brother; you keep as good an hour to come to a feast as [50 any gentleman in the shire. — What, old Master Limber and Master Kix! Do we meet, i' faith, jolly gentlemen?

Lim. We hope you lack guests, sir?

Hoa. O, welcome, welcome! We lack still such guests as your worships.

O. Hoa. Ah, sirrah brother, have you catcht up Widow Medler?

Hoa. From 'em all, brother; and I may tell you I had mighty enemies, those that stuck [70 sore; old Lucre is a sore fox, I can tell you, brother.

O. Hoa. Where is she? I'll go seek her out;

I long to have a smack at her lips.

Hoa. And most wishfully, brother, see where she comes.

[Re-enter Courtesan and LADY FOXTONE.]

Give her a smack now we may hear it all the house over. (Courtesan and O. Hoard turn back.)

Cour. O Heaven, I am betray'd! I know that face.

Just on your wish.

Hoa. Ha, ha, ha! why, how now? Are you both asham'd? — Come, gentlemen, we'll look another way.

O. Hoa. Nay, brother, hark you; come, you're dispos'd to be merry.

Hoa. Why do we meet else, man?

O. Hoa. That's another matter: I was ne'er so 'fraid in my life but that you had been in earnest.

Hoa. How mean you, brother?

O. Hoa. You said she was your wife.

Hoa. Did I so? By my troth, and so she is.

O. Hoa. By your troth, brother?

Hoa. What reason have I to dissemble [94 with my friends, brother? If marriage can make her mine, she is mine. Why —

O. Hoa. Troth, I am not well of a sudden. I must crave pardon, brother; I came to see you, but I cannot stay dinner, i' faith.

Hoa. I hope you will not serve me so, brother?

Lim. By your leave, Master Hoard —

Hoa. What now? what now? Pray, gentlemen: — you were wont to show yourselves wise men.

Lim. But you have shown your folly too much here.

Hoa. How?

Kix. Fie, fie! a man of your repute and name!

You'll feast your friends, but cloy 'em first with shame.

Hoa. This grows too deep; pray, let us reach the sense.

Lim. In your old age dote on a courtesan!

Hoa. Ha!

Kix. Marry a strumpet!

Hoa. Gentlemen!

O. Hoa. And Witgood's quean!

Hoa. O! nor lands nor living?

O. Hoa. Living!

Hoa. [to Courtesan.] Speak.

Cour. Alas, you know, at first, sir, I told you I had nothing!

Hoa. Out, out! I am cheated; infinitely cozzened!

Lim. Nay, Master Hoard —

Enter LUCRE, WITGOOD, [and JOYCE.]

Hoa. A Dutch widow! a Dutch widow! a Dutch widow!

Luc. Why, nephew, shall I trace thee still a liar?

Wilt make me mad? Is not yon thing the widow?

Wit. Why, la, you are so hard a' belief, uncle!

By my troth, she's a whore.

Luc. Then thou 'rt a knave.

Wit. Negatur argumentum, uncle.

Luc. Probo tibi, nephew: he that knows a woman to be a quean must needs be a knave; thou sayst thou knowest her to be one; ergo, if she be a quean, thou 'rt a knave.

Wit. Negatur sequela majoris, uncle; he that knows a woman to be a quean must needs be a knave; I deny that.

Hoa. Lucre and Witgood, you're both villains; get you out of my house!

Luc. Why, didst not invite me to thy wedding-dinner? 140

Wit. And are not you and I sworn perpetual friends before witness, sir, and were both drunk upon 't?

Hoa. Daintily abus'd! You've put a junt<sup>1</sup> upon me!

Luc. Ha, ha, ha! 145

Hoa. A common strumpet!

Wit. Nay, now

You wrong her, sir; if I were she, I'd have the law on you for that; I durst depose for her 140

She ne'er had common use nor common thought.

Cour. Despise me, publish me, I am your wife;

What shame can I have now but you'll have part?

If in disgrace you share, I sought not you; You pursued, nay, forc'd me; had I friends would follow it,

Less than your action has been prov'd a rape.

O. Hoa. Brother! 160

Cour. Nor did I ever boast of lands unto you,

Money, or goods; I took a plainer course, And told you true, I'd nothing:

If error were committed, 't was by you; 160

Thank your own folly. Nor has my sin been

So odious, but worse has been forgiven;

Nor am I so deform'd, but I may challenge

The utmost power of any old man's love. 164

She that tastes not sin before, twenty to one but she'll taste it after: most of you old men are content to marry young virgins, and take that which follows; where, marrying one of us, you both save a sinner and are quit from a cuckold for ever: 170

And more, in brief, let this your best thoughts win,

She that knows sin, knows best how to hate sin.

Hoa. Curst be all malice! black are the fruits of spite,

And poison first their owners. O, my friends,

I must embrace shame, to be rid of shame! 175

Conceal'd disgrace prevents a public name.

Ah, Witgood! ah, Theodorus!

Wit. Alas, sir, I was prickt in conscience to see her well bestowed, and where could I bestow her better than upon your pitiful worship? 180
Excepting but myself, I dare swear she's a virgin; and now, by marrying your niece, I have banisht myself for ever from her. She's mine aunt now, by my faith, and there's no meddling with mine aunt, you know: a sin against my nuncle. 185

Cour. Lo, gentlemen, before you all [Kneels.]

In true reclaimed form I fall.

Henceforth for ever I defy<sup>2</sup>

The glances of a sinful eye, 190

Waving of fans (which some suppose Tricks of fancy<sup>3</sup>), treading of toes,

Wringing of fingers, biting the lip,

The wanton gait, th' alluring trip;

All secret friends and private meetings, 195

Close-borne letters and bawds' greetings;

Feigning excuse to women's labours

When we are sent for to th' next neighbour's;

Taking false physic, and ne'er start

To be let blood though sign<sup>4</sup> be at heart; 200

Removing chambers, shifting beds,

To welcome friends in husbands' steads,

Them to enjoy, and you to marry,

They first serv'd, while you must tarry, 205

They to spend, and you to gather,

They to get, and you to father:

These, and thousand, thousand more,

New reclaim'd, I now abhor.

Luc. [to WITGOOD.] Ah, here's a lesson, rioter, for you!

Wit. I must confess my follies; I'll down too: [Kneels.] 210

And here for ever I disclaim

The cause of youth's undoing, game,

Chiefly dice, those true outlanders,

That shake out beggars, thieves, and panders;

Soul-wasting surfeits, sinful riots, 215

Queans' evils, doctors' diets,

'Pothecaries' drugs, surgeons' glisters;

Stabbing of arms<sup>6</sup> for a common mistress;

Riband favours, ribald speeches;

Dear perfum'd jackets, penniless breeches; 220

Dutch flapdragons,<sup>6</sup> healths in urine;

Drabs that keep a man too sure in:

I do defy you all.

Lend me each honest hand, for here I rise

A reclaim'd man, loathing the general vice. 225

Hoa. So, so, all friends! the wedding-dinner

cools:

Who seem most crafty prove ofttimes most 230

fools. [Exeunt.]

ACT I

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter ALSEMERO.

Als. 'T was in the temple where I first beheld her,

And now again the same : what omen yet

Follows of that ? None but imaginary.

Why should my hopes or fate be timorous ?

The place is holy, so is my intent :

I love her beauties to the holy purpose ;

And that, methinks, admits comparison

With man's first creation, the place blessed,<sup>2</sup>

And is his right home back, if he achieve it.

The church hath first begun our interview,<sup>10</sup>

And that 's the place must join us into one ;

So there's beginning and perfection too.

Enter JASPERINO.

Jas. O sir, are you here ? Come, the wind 's fair with you ;

You 're like to have a swift and pleasant passage.

Als. Sure, you 're deceived, friend, 't is contrary,

In my best judgment.

Jas. What, for Malta ?

If you could buy a gale amongst the witches,<sup>3</sup>

They could not serve you such a lucky penny-worth

As comes a' God's name.

Als. Even now I observ'd

The temple's vane to turn full in my face ;<sup>20</sup>

I know it is against me.

Jas. Against you ?

Then you know not where you are.

Als. Not well, indeed.

Jas. Are you not well, sir ?

Als. Yes, Jasperino,

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Macbeth, I. iii.

Unless there be some hidden malady
Within me, that I understand not.

Jas.

And that<sup>25</sup>

I begin to doubt, sir, I never knew

Your inclinations to travels at a pause

With any cause to hinder it, till now.

Ashore you were wont to call your servants up,

And help to trap your horses for the speed ;<sup>30</sup>

At sea I 've seen you weigh the anchor with 'em,

Hoist sails for fear to lose the foremost breath,

Be in continual prayers for fair winds ;

And have you chang'd your orisons ?

Als.

No, friend ;

I keep the same church, same devotion.<sup>35</sup>

Jas. Lover I 'm sure you 're none ; the stoic was Found in you long ago ; your mother nor

Best friends, who have set snares of beauty, ay,

And choice ones too, could never trap you that

way.

What might be the cause ?

Als.

Lord, how violent<sup>40</sup>

Thou art ! I was but meditating of Somewhat I heard within the temple.

Jas.

Is this

Violence ? 'T is but idleness compar'd

With your haste yesterday.

Als.

I 'm all this while

A-going, man.

Enter Servants.

Jas.

Backwards, I think, sir. Look,<sup>45</sup>

Your servants.

1 Ser. The seamen call ; shall we board your trunks ?

Als. No, not to-day.

Jas. 'T is the critical day, it seems, and the sign in Aquarius.<sup>51</sup>

2 Ser. We must not to sea to-day ; this smoke will bring forth fire.

Als. Keep all on shore ; I do not know the end,

Which needs I must do, of an affair in hand 55
Ere I can go to sea.

1 Ser. Well, your pleasure.

2 Ser. Let him e'en take his leisure too; we are safer on land. Exeunt Servants.

Enter BEATRICE, DIAPHANTA, and Servants
[ALSEMERO accosts BEATRICE and then kisses
her].

Jas. [Aside.] How now? The laws of the Medes are chang'd sure; salute a woman! He kisses too; wonderful! Where learnt he [51 this? and does it perfectly too. In my conscience, he ne'er rehearsal it before. Nay, go on;
this will be stranger and better news at Valencia than if he had ransom'd half Greece from the Turk. 60

Beat. You are a scholar, sir?

Als. A weak one, lady.

Beat. Which of the sciences is this love you speak of?

Als. From your tongue I take it to be music.

Beat. You're skilful in it, can sing at first
sight. 70

Als. And I have show'd you all my skill at
once;

I want more words to express me further,

And must be fore'd to repetition;

I love you dearly.

Beat. Be better advis'd, sir:

Our eyes are sentinels unto our judgments, 75

And should give certain judgment what they see;

But they are rash sometimes, and tell us wonders

Of common things, which when our judgments
find,

They can then check the eyes, and call them
blind.

Als. But I am further, lady; yesterday 80

Was mine eyes' employment, and hither now
They brought my judgment, where are both agreed.

Both houses then consenting, 'tis agreed;

Only there wants the confirmation

By the hand royal; that's your part, lady. 85

Beat. Oh, there's one above me, sir. — [Aside.]

For five days past

To be recall'd! Sure mine eyes were mistaken;

This was the man was meant me. That he should come

So near his time, and miss it!

Jas. We might have come by the carriers [90 from Valencia, I see, and sav'd all our sea-provision; we are at farthest sure. Methinks I should do something too;

I meant to be a venturer in this voyage.

Yonder's another vessel, I'll board her; 95

If she be lawful prize, down goes her topsail.
[Accosts DIAPHANTA.]

Enter DE FLORES.

De F. Lady, your father —

Beat. Is in health, I hope.

De F. Your eye shall instantly instruct you,
lady;

He's coming hitherward.

Beat. What needed then
Your duteous preface? I had rather 100
He had come unexpected; you must stall<sup>1</sup>
A good presence with unnecessary blabbing;
And how welcome for your part you are,
I'm sure you know.

De F. [Aside.] Will't never mend, this
scorn,

One side nor other? Must I be enjoin'd 105
To follow still whilst she flies from me? Well, Fates, do your worst, I'll please myself with
sight

Of her at all opportunities.

If but to spite her anger. I know she had Rather see me dead than living; and yet 110
She knows no cause for 't but a peevish will.

Als. You seem'd displeas'd, lady, on the sudden.

Beat. Your pardon, sir, 't is my infirmity;
Nor can I other reason render you

Than his or hers, of<sup>2</sup> some particular thing 115
They must abandon as a deadly poison,

Which to a thousand other tastes were whole-
some;

Such to mine eyes is that same fellow there,
The same that report speaks of the basilisk.<sup>3</sup>

Als. This is a frequent frailty in our nature;
There's scarce a man amongst a thousand 121

found
But hath his imperfection: one distastes

The scent of roses, which to infinites
Most pleasing is and odoriferous;

One oil, the enemy of poison; 125

Another wine, the cheerer of the heart
And lively refresher of the countenance.

Indeed this fault, if so it be, is general;
There's scarce a thing but is both lov'd and 129

loath'd:
Myself, I must confess, have the same frailty.

Beat. And what may be your poison, sir?
I'm bold with you.

Als. What<sup>4</sup> might be your desire, perhaps;
a cherry.

Beat. I am no enemy to any creature
My memory has, but you gentleman.

Als. He does ill to tempt your sight, if he knew it. 135

Beat. He cannot be ignorant of that, sir,
I have not spar'd to tell him so; and I want

To help myself, since he's a gentleman
In good respect with my father, and follows 140

him.
Als. He's out of his place then now. 140

[They talk apart.]

Jas. I am a mad wag, wench.

Di. So methinks; but for your comfort, I can tell you, we have a doctor in the city that undertakes the cure of such.

Jas. Tush, I know what physic is best for the state of mine own body. 145

Di. 'T is scarce a well-govern'd state, I believe.

Jas. I could show thee such a thing with an ingredient that we two would compound to- [150

gether, and if it did not tame the maddest blood i' th' town for two hours after, I'll ne'er profess physic again.

Di. A little poppy, sir, were good to cause you sleep. 155

Jas. Poppy? I'll give thee a pop i' th' lips for that first, and begin there. Poppy is one simple indeed, and cuckoo (what-you-call 't) another. I'll discover no more now; another time I'll show thee all. [Exit.] 160

Enter VERMANDERO and Servants.

Beat. My father, sir.

Ver. O Joanna, I came to meet thee. Your devotion's ended?

Beat. For this time, sir. — 165
[Aside.] I shall change my saint, I fear me; I find

A giddy turning in me. — Sir, this while I am beholding to this gentleman, Who left his own way to keep me company, And in discourse I find him much desirous To see your castle. He hath deserv'd it, sir, If ye please to grant it.

Ver. With all my heart, sir. Yet there's an article between; I must know Your country; we use not to give survey Of our chief strengths to strangers; our citadels Are plac'd conspicuous to outward view, On promontories<sup>1</sup> tops, but within our secrets.

Als. A Valencian, sir.

Ver. A Valencian? 175
That's native, sir. Of what name, I beseech you?

Als. Alsemero, sir.

Ver. Alsemero? Not the son Of John de Alsemero?

Als. The same, sir.

Ver. My best love bids you welcome.

Beat. He was wont To call me so, and then he speaks a most Unfeign'd truth. 180

Ver. O sir, I knew your father; We two were in acquaintance long ago, Before our chins were worth iulan<sup>2</sup> down, And so continued till the stamp of time Had coin'd us into silver. Well, he's gone; 185
A good soldier went with him.

Als. You went together in that, sir.

Ver. No, by Saint Jacques, I came behind him;

Yet I've done somewhat too: an unhappy day Swallowed him at last at Gibraltar, 190
In fight with those rebellious Hollanders. Was it not so?

Als. Whose death I had reveng'd, Or followed him in fate, had not the late league Prevented me.

Ver. Ay, ay, 't was time to breathe. — O Joanna, I should ha' told thee news; 195
I saw Piracquo lately.

Beat. [Aside.] That's ill news.

Ver. He's hot preparing for this day of triumph:

Thou must be a bride within this sevennight.

Als. [Aside.] Ha!

Beat. Nay, good sir, be not so violent; with speed 200

I cannot render satisfaction Unto the dear companion of my soul, Virginity, whom I thus long have liv'd with, And part with it so rude and suddenly. Can such friends divide, never to meet again, Without a solemn farewell?

Ver. Tush, tush! there's a toy.<sup>3</sup> 205
Als. [Aside.] I must now part, and never meet again

With any joy on earth. — Sir, your pardon; My affairs call on me.

Ver. How, sir? By no means: Not chang'd so soon, I hope? You must see my castle, 210

And her best entertainment, e'er we part; I shall think myself unkindly us'd else. Come, come, let's on; I had good hope your stay

Had been a while with us in Alicant; I might have bid you to my daughter's wedding. 215

Als. [Aside.] He means to feast me, and poisons me beforehand. — I should be dearly glad to be there, sir, Did my occasions suit as I could wish.

Beat. I shall be sorry if you be not there When it is done, sir; but not so suddenly. 220

Ver. I tell you, sir, the gentleman's complete, A courtier and a gallant, enrich With many fair and noble ornaments; I would not change him for a son-in-law For any he in Spain, the proudest he, 225
And we have great ones, that you know.

Als. He's much Bound to you, sir.

Ver. He shall be bound to me As fast as this tie can hold him; I'll want My will else.

Beat. [Aside.] I shall want mine, if you do it.

Ver. But come, by the way I'll tell you more of him. 230

Als. [Aside.] How shall I dare to venture in his castle,

When he discharges murderers<sup>4</sup> at the gate? But I must on, for back I cannot go.

Beat. [Aside.] Not this serpent gone yet? [Drops a glove.]

Ver. Look, girl, thy glove's fallen. Stay, stay; De Flores, help a little. 235

[Exit VERMANDERO, ALSE-MERO, and Servants.]

De F. Here, lady. [Offers her the glove.]

Beat. Mischief on your officious forwardness; Who bade you stoop? They touch my hand no more;

There! For t' other's sake I part with this; [Takes off and throws down the other glove.]

Take 'em, and draw thine own skin off with
'em!

Exit [with DIAPHANTA and Servants].<sup>240</sup>

De F. Here's a favour come with a mischief now! I know

She had rather wear my pelt<sup>1</sup> tann'd in a pair
Of dancing pumps, than I should thrust my fingers

Into her sockets here. I know she hates me,
Yet cannot choose but love her. No matter,<sup>245</sup>
If but to vex her, I will haunt her still;
Though I get nothing else, I'll have my will.

Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter ALIBIUS and LOLLIO.

Alib. Lollio, I must trust thee with a secret,
But thou must keep it.

Lol. I was ever close to a secret, sir.

Alib. The diligence that I have found in
thee,

The care and industry already past,<sup>5</sup>
Assures me of thy good continuance.

Lollio, I have a wife.

Lol. Fie, sir, 'tis too late to keep her secret;
she's known to be married all the town and country over.<sup>10</sup>

Alib. Thou goest too fast, my Lollio. That knowledge

I allow no man can be barr'd it;
But there is a knowledge which is nearer,
Deeper, and sweeter, Lollio.

Lol. Well, sir, let us handle that between you and I.<sup>15</sup>

Alib. 'Tis that I go about, man. Lollio,
My wife is young.

Lol. So much the worse to be kept secret, sir.

Alib. Why, now thou meet'st the substance of the point;

I am old, Lollio.<sup>20</sup>

Lol. No, sir, 'tis I am old Lollio.

Alib. Yet why may not this concord and sympathize?

Old trees and young plants often grow together,
Well enough agreeing.<sup>24</sup>

Lol. Ay, sir, but the old trees raise themselves higher and broader than the young plants.

Alib. Shrewd application! There's the fear,
man;

I would wear my ring on my own finger;
Whilst it is borrowed, it is none of mine,<sup>30</sup>
But his that useth it.

Lol. You must keep it on still then, if it but lie by, one or other will be thrusting into 't.

Alib. Thou conceiv'st me, Lollio; here thy watchful eye

Must have employment; I cannot always be<sup>35</sup>
At home.

Lol. I dare swear you cannot.

Alib. I must look out.

Lol. I know 't, you must look out; 'tis every man's case.

Alib. Here, I do say, must thy employment be;<sup>40</sup>

To watch her treadings, and in my absence
Supply my place.

Lol. I'll do my best, sir; yet surely I cannot see who you should have cause to be jealous
of.<sup>45</sup>

Alib. Thy reason for that, Lollio? It is
A comfortable question.

Lol. We have but two sorts of people in the house, and both under the whip, that's fools<sup>3</sup> and madmen; the one has not wit enough to [50 be knaves, and the other not knavery enough to be fools.

Alib. Ay, those are all my patients, Lollio;
I do profess the cure of either sort;

My trade, my living 'tis; I thrive by it;<sup>55</sup>
But here's the care that mixes with my thrift:

The daily visitants, that come to see
My brain-sick patients, I would not have

To see my wife. Gallants I do observe
Of quick enticing eyes, rich in habits,<sup>60</sup>

Of stature and proportion very comely:
These are most shrewd temptations, Lollio.

Lol. They may be easily answered, sir; if they come to see the fools and madmen, you and I may serve the turn, and let my mis- [55
tress alone; she's of neither sort.

Alib. 'Tis a good ward; ' indeed, come they
to see

Our madmen or our fools, let 'em see no more
Than what they come for; by that consequent
They must not see her; I'm sure she's no fool.<sup>70</sup>

Lol. And I'm sure she's no madman.

Alib. Hold that buckler fast; Lollio, my trust

Is on thee, and I account it firm and strong.

What hour is 't, Lollio?

Lol. Towards belly-hour, sir.

Alib. Dinner-time? Thou mean'st twelve o'clock?<sup>75</sup>

Lol. Yes, sir, for every part has his hour: we wake at six and look about us, that's eye hour;
at seven we should pray, that's knee-hour: at eight walk, that's leg-hour; at nine gather flowers and pluck a rose,<sup>6</sup> that's nose-hour; [80 at ten we drink, that's mouth-hour; at eleven lay about us for victuals, that's hand-hour; at twelve go to dinner, that's belly-hour.

Alib. Profoundly, Lollio! It will be long Ere all thy scholars learn this lesson, and<sup>85</sup>

I did look to have a new one ent'red;—stay,
I think my expectation is come home.

Enter PEDRO, and ANTONIO [disguised] like an idiot.

Ped. Save you, sir; my business speaks itself:

This sight takes off the labour of my tongue.

Alib. Ay, sir, it is plain enough, you mean<sup>90</sup>

Him for my patient.

Ped. And if your pains prove but commodious, to give but some little strength to his sick and weak part of nature in him, these are

[gives him money] but patterns to show you <sup>95</sup> of the whole pieces that will follow to you, beside the charge of diet, washing, and other necessaries, fully defrayed.

Alib. Believe it, sir, there shall no care be wanting.

Lol. Sir, an officer in this place may de- <sup>100</sup> serve something. The trouble will pass through my hands.

Ped. 'Tis fit something should come to your hands then, sir. <sup>[Gives him money.]</sup>

Lol. Yes, sir, 'tis I must keep him sweet, <sup>105</sup> and read to him: what is his name?

Ped. His name is Antonio; marry, we use but half to him, only Tony.

Lol. Tony, Tony, 'tis enough, and a very good name for a fool. — What's your name, <sup>110</sup> Tony?

Ant. He, he, he! well, I thank you, cousin; he, he, he!

Lol. Good boy! hold up your head. — He can laugh; I perceive by that he is no beast. <sup>115</sup>

Ped. Well, sir, If you can raise him but to any height, Any degree of wit; might he attain, As I might say, to creep on but all four Towards the chair of wit, or walk on crutches, 'T would add an honour to your worthy pains, <sup>121</sup>

And a great family might pray for you, To which he should be heir, had he discretion To claim and guide his own. Assure you, sir, He is a gentleman. <sup>125</sup>

Lol. Nay, there's nobody doubted that; at first sight I knew him for a gentleman, he looks no other yet.

Ped. Let him have good attendance and sweet lodging.

Lol. As good as my mistress lies in, sir; <sup>130</sup> and as you allow us time and means, we can raise him to the higher degree of discretion.

Ped. Nay, there shall no cost want, sir.

Lol. He will hardly be stretcht up to the wit of a magnifico. <sup>135</sup>

Ped. O no, that's not to be expected; far shorter will be enough.

Lol. I'll warrant you I'll make him fit to bear office in five weeks; I'll undertake to wind him up to the wit of constable. <sup>140</sup>

Ped. If it be lower than that, it might serve turn.

Lol. No, fie; to level him with a headborough,<sup>1</sup> beadle, or watchman, were but little better than he is. Constable I'll able<sup>2</sup> him; <sup>145</sup> if he do come to be a justice afterwards, let him thank the keeper: or I'll go further with you; say I do bring him up to my own pitch, say I make him as wise as myself.

Ped. Why, there I would have it. <sup>150</sup>

Lol. Well, go to; either I'll be as arrant a fool as he, or he shall be as wise as I, and then I think 't will serve his turn.

Ped. Nay, I do like thy wit passing well.

Lol. Yes, you may; yet if I had not been <sup>155</sup> a fool, I had had more wit than I have too. Remember what state<sup>3</sup> you found me in.

Ped. I will, and so leave you. Your best cares, I beseech you. <sup>Exit PEDRO.</sup>

Alib. Take you none with you, leave 'em <sup>160</sup> all with us.

Ant. O, my cousin's gone! cousin, cousin, O!

Lol. Peace, peace, Tony; you must not cry, child, you must be whipt if you do; your cousin is here still; I am your cousin, Tony. <sup>165</sup>

Ant. He, he! then I'll not cry, if thou be'st my cousin; he, he, he!

Lol. I were best try his wit a little, that I may know what form to place him in.

Alib. Ay, do, Lollo, do. <sup>170</sup>

Lol. I must ask him easy questions at first. — Tony, how many true<sup>4</sup> fingers has a tailor on his right hand?

Ant. As many as on his left, cousin.

Lol. Good: and how many on both? <sup>175</sup>

Ant. Two less than a deuce,<sup>5</sup> cousin.

Lol. Very well answered. I come to you again, cousin Tony; how many fools goes to a wise man?

Ant. Forty in a day sometimes, cousin. <sup>180</sup>

Lol. Forty in a day? How prove you that?

Ant. All that fall out amongst themselves, and go to a lawyer to be made friends.

Lol. A parlous fool! he must sit in the fourth form at least. I perceive that. — I come <sup>185</sup> again, Tony; how many knaves make an honest man?

Ant. I know not that, cousin.

Lol. No, the question is too hard for you. I'll tell you, cousin; there's three knaves <sup>190</sup> may make an honest man, — a serjeant, a jailor, and a beadle; the serjeant catches him, the jailor holds him, and the beadle lashes him; and if he be not honest then, the hangman must cure him. <sup>195</sup>

Ant. Ha, ha, ha! that's fine sport, cousin.

Alib. This was too deep a question for the fool, Lollo.

Lol. Yes, this might have serv'd yourself, though I say 't. — Once more and you shall go play, Tony. <sup>201</sup>

Ant. Ay, play at push-pin, cousin; ha, he!

Lol. So thou shalt: say how many fools are here —

Ant. Two, cousin; thou and I. <sup>205</sup>

Lol. Nay, you're too forward there, Tony. Mark my question; how many fools and knaves are here; a fool before a knave, a fool behind a knave, between every two fools a knave; how many fools, how many knaves? <sup>210</sup>

Ant. I never learnt so far, cousin.

Alib. Thou puttest too hard questions to him, Lollo.

Lol. I'll make him understand it easily. — Cousin, stand there. <sup>215</sup>

Ant. Ay, cousin.

Lol. Master, stand you next the fool.

Alib. Well, Lollo.

Lol. Here's my place. Mark now, Tony, there's a fool before a knave. <sup>220</sup>

Ant. That's I, cousin.

Lol. Here's a fool behind a knave, that's I; and between us two fools there is a knave, that's my master, 'tis but we three, that's all.

Ant. We three, we three, cousin. <sup>225</sup>

Madmen within.

1 Mad. [within.] Put 's head i' th' pillory, the bread 's too little.

2 Mad. [within.] Fly, fly, and he catches the swallow.

3 Mad. [within.] Give her more onion, or the devil put the rope about her crag. <sup>231</sup>

Lol. You may hear what time of day it is, the chimes of Bedlam goes.

Alib. Peace, peace, or the wire <sup>2</sup> comes!

3 Mad. [within.] Cat whore, cat whore! her permasant, her permasant! <sup>3</sup> <sup>235</sup>

Alib. Peace, I say!—Their hour's come, they must be fed, Lollo.

Lol. There's no hope of recovery of that Welsh madman; was undone by a mouse that spoil'd him a permasant; lost his wits for 't. <sup>241</sup>

Alib. Go to your charge, Lollo; I'll to mine.

Lol. Go you to your madmen's ward, let me alone with your fools. <sup>245</sup>

Alib. And remember my last charge, Lollo. Exit.

Lol. Of which your patients do you think I am? Come, Tony, you must amongst your school-fellows now; there's pretty scholars <sup>250</sup> amongst 'em, I can tell you; there's some of 'em at stultus, stulta, stultum.

Ant. I would see the madmen, cousin, if they would not bite me.

Lol. No, they shall not bite thee, Tony. <sup>255</sup>

Ant. They bite when they are at dinner, do they not, coz?

Lol. They bite at dinner, indeed, Tony. Well, I hope to get credit by thee; I like thee the best of all the scholars that ever I <sup>260</sup> brought up, and thou shalt prove a wise man, or I'll prove a fool myself. Exeunt.

ACT II

[SCENE I.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter BEATRICE and JASPERINO severally.

Beat. O sir, I'm ready now for that fair service

Which makes the name of friend sit glorious on you!

Good angels and this conduct be your guide!

[Giving a paper.]

Fitness of time and place is there set down, sir.

Jas. The joy I shall return rewards my service. Exit. <sup>v</sup>

Beat. How wise is Alsemero in his friend!

It is a sign he makes his choice with judgment; Then I appear in nothing more approv'd Than making choice of him; for 't is a principle,

He that can choose <sup>10</sup>
That bosom well who of his thoughts partakes,

Proves most discreet in every choice he makes. Methinks I love now with the eyes of judgment,

And see the way to merit, clearly see it. A true deserver like a diamond sparkles; <sup>15</sup>

In darkness you may see him, that's in absence,

Which is the greatest darkness falls on love; Yet is he best discern'd then

With intellectual eyesight. What's Piracquo, My father spends his breath for? And his blessing <sup>20</sup>

Is only mine as I regard his name, Else it goes from me, and turns head against me, Transform'd into a curse. Some speedy way Must be rememb'rd. He's so forward too,

So urgent that way, scarce allows me breath <sup>25</sup> To speak to my new comforts.

Enter DE FLORES.

De F. [Aside.] Yonder's she; Whatever ails me, now a-late especially,

I can as well be hang'd as refrain seeing her; Some twenty times a day, nay, not so little,

Do I force errands, frame ways and excuses, <sup>30</sup> To come into her sight; and I've small reason for 't,

And less encouragement, for she baits me still Every time worse than other; does profess

herself

The cruellest enemy to my face in town; At no hand can abide the sight of me, <sup>35</sup>

As if danger or ill-luck hung in my looks. I must confess my face is bad enough,

But I know far worse has better fortune, And not endur'd alone, but doted on;

And yet such pick-hair'd faces, chins like witches', <sup>40</sup>

Here and there five hairs whispering in a corner,

As if they grew in fear one of another, Wrinkles like troughs, where swine-deformity

swills

The tears of perjury, that lie there like wash Fallen from the slimy and dishonest eye, — <sup>45</sup>

Yet such a one plucks sweets without restraint, And has the grace of beauty to his sweet.

Though my hard fate has thrust me out to servitude,

I tumbled into th' world a gentleman. She turns her blessed eye upon me now, <sup>50</sup>

And I'll endure all storms before I part with 't. Beat. [Aside.] Again?

This ominous ill-fac'd fellow more disturbs me Than all my other passions.

De F. [Aside.] Now 't begins again; <sup>55</sup>

I'll stand this storm of hail, though the stones pelt me.

Beat. Thy business? What's thy business? De F. [Aside.] Soft and fair!

I cannot part so soon now. Beat. [Aside.] The villain's fixt.— Thou standing toad-pool —

De F. [Aside.] The shower falls amain now.
Beat. Who sent thee? What's thy errand?
 Leave my sight!

De F. My lord your father, charg'd me to deliver

A message to you.

Beat. What, another since?
 Do't, and be hang'd then; let me be rid of thee.

De F. True service merits mercy.

Beat. What's thy message?

De F. Let beauty settle but in patience,
 You shall hear all.

Beat. A dallying, trifling torment!

De F. Signor Alonzo de Piraquo, lady,
 Sole brother to Tomaso de Piraquo—

Beat. Slave, when wilt make an end?

De F. Too soon I shall.

Beat. What all this while of him?
De F. The said Alonzo, <sup>70</sup>

With the foresaid Tomaso—
Beat. Yet again?

De F. Is new alighted.

Beat. Vengeance strike the news!
 Thou thing most loath'd, what cause was there
 in this

To bring thee to my sight?

De F. My lord your father
 Charg'd me to seek you out.

Beat. Is there no other <sup>75</sup>
 To send his errand by?

De F. It seems 't is my luck
 To be i' th' way still.

Beat. Get thee from me!

De F. So:—

[Aside.] Why, am not I an ass to devise ways
 Thus to be rail'd at? I must see her still! <sup>80</sup>
 I shall have a mad qualm within this hour
 again,

I know 't; and, like a common Garden <sup>1</sup>-bull,
 I do but take breath to be lugg'd <sup>2</sup> again.

What this may bode I know not; I'll despair
 the less, <sup>84</sup>

Because these 's daily precedents of bad faces
 Below'd beyond all reason. These foul chops
 May come into favour one day 'mongst [their] <sup>3</sup> fellows.

Wrangling has prov'd the mistress of good pastime;

As children cry themselves asleep, I ha' seen
 Women have chid themselves a-bed to men. <sup>90</sup>

Exit.

Beat. I never see this fellow but I think
 Of some harm towards me; danger's in my mind still;

I scarce leave trembling of an hour after.
 The next good mood I find my father in,

I'll get him quite discarded. O, I was <sup>95</sup>
 Lost in this small disturbance, and forgot

Affliction's fiercer torrent that now comes
 To bear down all my comforts!

Enter VERMANDERO, ALONZO, and TOMASO.

Ver. You're both welcome,
 But an especial one belongs to you, sir, <sup>99</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Paris Garden, on the Bankside, where bull-baiting was carried on.

To whose most noble name our love presents
 Th' addition <sup>4</sup> of a son, our son Alonzo.

Alon. The treasury of honour cannot bring forth

A title I should more rejoice in, sir.

Ver. You have improv'd it well.— Daughter, prepare;

The day will steal upon thee suddenly. <sup>105</sup>

Beat. [Aside.] Howe'er, I will be sure to keep the night,

If it should come so near me.

[*BEATRICE and VERMANDERO talk
 apart.*]

Tom. Alonzo.

Alon. Brother?

Tom. In troth I see small welcome in her eye.

Alon. Fie, you are too severe a censurer <sup>6</sup>
 Of love in all points, there's no bringing on
 you. <sup>110</sup>

If lovers should mark everything a fault,
 Affection would be like an ill-set book,
 Whose faults might prove as big as half the volume.

Beat. That's all I do entreat.

Ver. It is but reasonable; <sup>114</sup>

I'll see what my son says to 't.— Son Alonzo,
 Here is a motion made but to relieve

A maidenhead three days longer; the request
 Is not far out of reason, for indeed

The former time is pinching.

Alon. Though my joys

Be set back so much time as I could wish <sup>120</sup>
 They had been forward, yet since she desires
 it,

The time is set as pleasing as before,

I find no gladness wanting.

Ver. May I ever

Meet it in that point still! You're nobly welcome, sirs. Exit with BEATRICE.

Tom. So; did you mark the dulness of her parting now? <sup>125</sup>

Alon. What dulness? Thou art so exceptionous still!

Tom. Why, let it go then; I am but a fool
 To mark your harms so heedfully.

Alon. Where's the oversight?

Tom. Come, your faith's cozened in her,
 strongly cozened.

Unsettle your affection with all speed <sup>130</sup> Wisdom can bring it to; your peace is ruin'd else.

Think what a torment 't is to marry one
 Whose heart is leapt into another's bosom:

If ever pleasure she receive from thee,
 It comes not in thy name, or of thy gift; <sup>135</sup>

She lies but with another in thine arms,
 He the half-father unto all thy children

In the conception; if he get 'em not,
 She helps to get 'em for him; <sup>6</sup> and how dangerous <sup>139</sup>

And shameful her restraint may go in time to,
 It is not to be thought on without sufferings.

Alon. You speak as if she lov'd some other,
 then.

<sup>4</sup> Title.

<sup>6</sup> After him, Q. inserts in his passions.

Tom. Do you apprehend so slowly?

Alon. Nay, an that
Be your fear only, I am safe enough.
Preserve your friendship and your counsel,
brother,

For times of more distress; I should depart
An enemy, a dangerous, deadly one,
To any but thyself, that should but think
She knew the meaning of inconstancy,
Much less the use and practice: yet we're
friends.

Pray, let no more be urg'd; I can endure
Much, till I meet an injury to her,
Then I am not myself. Farewell, sweet brother;
How much we're bound to Heaven to depart lovingly.

Tom. Why, here is love's tame madness;
thus a man
Quickly steals into his vexation.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter DIAPHANTA and ALSEMERO.

Dia. The place is my charge; you have kept your hour,
And the reward of a just meeting bless you!
I hear my lady coming. Complete gentleman,
I dare not be too busy with my praises,
They're dangerous things to deal with.

Als. This goes well; <sup>5</sup>
These women are the ladies' cabinets,
Things of most precious trust are lockt into 'em.

Enter BEATRICE.

Beat. I have within mine eye all my desires.
Requests that holy prayers ascend Heaven for,
And brings 'em down to furnish our defects, <sup>10</sup>
Come not more sweet to our necessities
Than thou unto my wishes.

Als. We're so like
In our expressions, lady, that unless I borrow
The same words, I shall never find their equals.

Beat. How happy were this meeting, this embrace,

If it were free from envy! This poor kiss
It has an enemy, a hateful one,
That wishes poison to 't. How well were I now,
If there were none such name known as Piracquo,
Nor no such tie as the command of parents! <sup>20</sup>
I should be but too much bless'd.

Als. One good service
Would strike off both your fears, and I'll go near 't too,

Since you are so distress. Remove the cause,
The command ceases; so there's two fears blown
out

With one and the same blast.

Beat. Pray, let me find<sup>2</sup> you, sir: <sup>25</sup>
What might that service be, so strangely happy?

Als. The honourablest piece about man, val-
our:

I'll send a challenge to Piracquo instantly.

Beat. How? Call you that extinguishing of
fear,

When 't is the only way to keep it flaming? <sup>30</sup>

Are not you ventured in the action,
That's all my joys and comforts? Pray, no more, sir.

Say you prevail'd, you're danger's and not mine then;

The law would claim you from me, or obscurity
Be made the grave to bury you alive. <sup>35</sup>
I'm glad these thoughts come forth; O, keep not one

Of this condition, sir! Here was a course
Found to bring sorrow on her way to death;
The tears would ne'er ha' dried, till dust had chok'd 'd'em.

Blood-guiltiness becomes a fouler visage; — <sup>40</sup> [Aside.] And now I think on one; I was to blame,

I ha' marr'd so good a market with my scorn;
'T had been done questionless: the ugliest
creature

Creation fram'd for some use: yet to see <sup>44</sup>
I could not mark so much where it should be!

Als. Lady —
Beat. [Aside.] Why, men of art make much of poison,

Keep one to expel another. Where was my art?
Als. Lady, you hear not me.

Beat. I do especially, sir.
The present times are not so sure of our side
As those hereafter may be; we must use 'em
then <sup>50</sup>

As thrifty folks their wealth, sparingly now,
Till the time opens.

Als. You teach wisdom, lady.
Beat. Within there! Diaphanta!

Re-enter DIAPHANTA.

Dia. Do you call, madam?
Beat. Perfect your service, and conduct this
gentleman

The private way you brought him.

Dia. I shall, madam. <sup>55</sup>
Als. My love's as firm as love e'er built upon.

Exit with DIAPHANTA.

Enter DE FLORES.

De F. [Aside.] I've watcht this meeting, and do wonder much

What shall become of t' other; I'm sure both
Cannot be serv'd unless she transgress; haply
Then I'll put in for one; for if a woman <sup>60</sup>
Fly from one point, from him she makes a husband,

She spreads and mounts then like arithmetic;
One, ten, a hundred, a thousand, ten thousand,
Proves in time sutler to an army royal.
Now do I look to be most richly rail'd at, <sup>65</sup>
Yet I must see her.

Beat. [Aside.] Why, put case I loath'd him
As much as youth and beauty hates a sepulchre,

Must I needs show it? Cannot I keep that secret,

And serve my turn upon him? See, he's here. —
De Flores.

De F. [Aside.] Ha, I shall run mad with joy!
She call'd me fairly by my name De Flores, <sup>71</sup>
And neither rogue nor rascal.

Beat. What ha' you done
To your face a' late? You've met with some good physician;
You've prun'd<sup>1</sup> yourself, methinks: you were not wont

To look so amorously.<sup>2</sup>
De F. Not I; —

[Aside.] 'Tis the same physnomy, to a hair and pimple,

Which she called scurvy scarce an hour ago:
How is this?

Beat. Come hither; nearer, man.
De F. [Aside.] I'm up to the chin in Heaven!

Beat. Turn, let me see;
Fough, 't is but the heat of the liver, I perceive 't;

I thought it had been worse.
De F. [Aside.] Her fingers toucht me!

She smells all amber.<sup>3</sup>
Beat. I'll make a water for you shall cleanse
this

Within a fortnight.
De F. With your own hands, lady?

Beat. Yes, mine own, sir; in a work of cure
I'll trust no other.

De F. [Aside.] 'Tis half an act of pleasure
To hear her talk thus to me.

Beat. When we're us'd
To a hard face, it is not so unpleasing;
It mends still in opinion, hourly mends;
I see it by experience.

De F. [Aside.] I was blest
To light upon this minute; I'll make use on't.

Beat. Hardness becomes the visage of a man
well;

It argues service, resolution, manhood,
If cause were of employment.

De F. 'T would be soon seen
If e'er your ladyship had cause to use it;

I would but wish the honour of a service
So happy as that mounts to.

Beat. We shall try you. —
O my De Flores!

De F. [Aside.] How's that? She calls me hers

Already! My De Flores! — You were about
To sigh out somewhat, madam?

Beat. No, was I?

I forgot, — O! —
De F. There 't is again, the very fellow on't.

Beat. You are too quick, sir.
De F. There's no excuse for 't now; I heard it twice, madam;

That sigh would fain have utterance: take pity
on't,

And lend it a free word. 'Las, how it labours
For liberty! I hear the murmur yet

Beat at your bosom.

Beat. Would creation —
De F. Ay, well said, that is it.

Beat. Had form'd me man!
De F. Nay, that's not it.

Beat. O, 't is the soul of freedom!
I should not then be fore'd to marry one

I hate beyond all depths; I should have power
Then to oppose my loathings, nay, remove 'em
For ever from my sight.

De F. [Aside.] O blest occasion! — Without change to your sex you have your wishes;

Claim so much man in me.
Beat. In thee, De Flores?

There is small cause for that.
De F. Put it not from me,

It is a service that I kneel for to you. [Kneels.]
Beat. You are too violent to mean faithfully.

There's horror in my service, blood, and
danger;

Can those be things to sue for?
De F. If you knew

How sweet it were to me to be employed
In any act of yours, you would say then

I fail'd, and us'd not reverence enough
When I receive[d] the charge on 't.

Beat. [Aside.] This is much,
Methinks; belike his wants are greedy; and

To such gold tastes like angel's food. Rise.
De F. I'll have the work first.

Beat. [Aside.] Possible his need Is strong upon him. — There's to encourage
thee;

As thou art forward, and thy service dangerous,
Thy reward shall be precious.

De F. That I've thought on;

I have assur'd myself of that beforehand,
And know it will be precious; the thought ravishes!

Beat. Then take him to thy fury!
De F. I thirst for him.

Beat. Alonzo de Piracquo.
De F. [rising.] His end 's upon him;

He shall be seen no more.
Beat. How lovely now

Dost thou appear to me! Never was man
Dearlier rewarded.

De F. I do think of that.
Beat. Be wondrous careful in the execution.

De F. Why, are not both our lives upon the cast?

Beat. Then I throw all my fears upon thy service.

De F. They ne'er shall rise to hurt you.
Beat. When the deed's done,

I'll furnish thee with all things for thy flight;
Thou may'st live bravely in another country.

De F. Ay, ay;
We'll talk of that hereafter.

Beat. [Aside.] I shall rid myself
Of two inveterate loathings at one time,
Piracquo, and his dog-face.

De F. O my blood!
Methinks I feel her in mine arms already;

Her wanton fingers combing out this beard,
And, being pleased, praising this bad face.

Hunger and pleasure, they'll commend sometimes

Slovenly dishes, and feed heartily on 'em.
Nay, which is stranger, refuse daintier for 'em:

Some women are odd feeders. — I am too loud.
Here comes the man goes supperless to bed,

Yet shall not rise to-morrow to his dinner.

Enter ALONZO.

Alon. De Flores.
 De F. My kind, honourable lord?
 Alon. I'm glad I ha' met with thee.
 De F. Sir?
 Alon. Thou canst show me
 The full strength of the castle?
 De F. That I can, sir.
 Alon. I much desire it.
 De F. And if the ways and straits <sup>100</sup>
 Of some of the passages be not too tedious for
 you,
 I'll assure you, worth your time and sight, my
 lord.
 Alon. Pooh, that shall be no hindrance.
 De F. I'm your servant, then.
 'T is now near dinner-time; 'gainst <sup>1</sup> your lordship's rising
 I'll have the keys about me.
 Alon. Thanks, kind De Flores. <sup>105</sup>
 De F. [Aside.] He's safely thrust upon me beyond hopes. Exeunt [severally].

ACT III

[SCENE I.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter ALONZO and DE FLORES. (In the act-time<sup>3</sup> DE FLORES hides a naked rapier) [behind a door.]

De Flores. Yes, here are all the keys; I was afraid, my lord,
 I'd wanted for the postern, this is it.
 I've all, I've all, my lord: this for the sconce.<sup>4</sup>
 Alon. 'T is a most spacious and impregnable
 fort.
 De F. You'll tell me more, my lord. This descent <sup>5</sup>
 Is somewhat narrow, we shall never pass
 Well with our weapons, they'll but trouble us.
 Alon. Thou sayest true.
 De F. Pray, let me help your lordship.
 Alon. 'T is done: thanks, kind De Flores.
 De F. Here are hooks, my lord,
 To hang such things on purpose. <sup>10</sup> [Hanging up his own sword and that of ALONZO.]
 Alon. Lead, I'll follow thee. Exeunt.<sup>5</sup>

[SCENE II.]<sup>6</sup>

[Enter ALONZO and DE FLORES.]

De F. All this is nothing; you shall see anon
 A place you little dream on.
 Alon. I am glad
 I have this leisure; all your master's house
 Imagine I ha' taken a gondola.
 De F. All but myself, sir, — [aside] which makes up my safety. <sup>5</sup>

My lord, I'll place you at a casement here
 Will show you the full strength of all the castle.
 Look, spend your eye awhile upon that object.
 Alon. Here's rich variety, De Flores.

De F. Yes, sir.
 Alon. Goodly munition.
 De F. Ay, there's ordnance, sir, <sup>10</sup>
 No bastard metal, will ring you a peal like bells
 At great men's funerals. Keep your eye straight, my lord;
 Take special notice of that sconce<sup>4</sup> before you,
 There you may dwell awhile.

[Takes the rapier which he had hid behind the door.]

Alon. I am upon 't.
 De F. And so am I. [Stabs him.]
 Alon. De Flores! O De Flores! <sup>15</sup>
 Whose malice hast thou put on?
 De F. Do you question
 A work of secrecy? I must silence you. [Stabs him.]

Alon. O, O, O!
 De F. I must silence you. [Stabs him.]
 So here's an undertaking well accomplish'd.
 This vault serves to good use now: ha, what's that <sup>20</sup>
 Threw sparkles in my eye? O, 't is a diamond
 He wears upon his finger; 't was well found;
 This will approve the work.<sup>7</sup> What, so fast on?
 Not part in death? I'll take a speedy course
 then.
 Finger and all shall off. [Cuts off the finger.]
 So, now I'll clear <sup>25</sup>
 The passages from all suspect or fear.
Exit with body.

[SCENE III.]<sup>8</sup>

Enter ISABELLA and LOLLIO.

Isa. Why, sirrah, whence have you commission
 To fetter the doors against me?
 If you keep me in a cage, pray, whistle to me,
 Let me be doing something.
 Lol. You shall be doing, if it please you; <sup>5</sup>
 I'll whistle to you, if you'll pipe after.
 Isa. Is it your master's pleasure, or your own,
 To keep me in this pinfold?
 Lol. 'T is for my master's pleasure, lest being taken in another man's corn, you might be <sup>10</sup> pounded in another place.
 Isa. 'T is very well, and he'll prove very wise.
 Lol. He says you have company enough in the house, if you please to be sociable, of all sorts of people. <sup>15</sup> Isa. Of all sorts? Why, here's none but fools
 and madmen.
 Lol. Very well: and where will you find any other, if you should go abroad? There's my master and I to boot too. <sup>20</sup> Isa. Of either sort one, a madman and a fool.

<sup>7</sup> Prove it has been done.

Lol. I would ev'n participate of both then if I were as you; I know you're half mad already, be half foolish too. <sup>25</sup>

Isa. You're a brave saucy rascal! Come on, sir,

Afford me then the pleasure of your bedlam. You were commending once to-day to me Your last-come lunatic; what a proper<sup>1</sup> Body there was without brains to guide it, <sup>30</sup> And what a pitiful delight appear'd In that defect, as if your wisdom had found A mirth in madness; pray, sir, let me partake, If there be such a pleasure.

Lol. If I do not show you the handsomest, [<sup>35</sup> discreetest madman, one that I may call the understanding madman, then say I am a fool.

Isa. Well, a match, I will say so.

Lol. When you have had a taste of the madman, you shall, if you please, see Fool's Col- [<sup>40</sup> lege, o' th' [other] side. I seldom lock there; 'tis but shooting a bolt or two, and you are amongst 'em. Exit. Enter presently.—Come on, sir; let me see how handsomely you'll behave yourself now. <sup>45</sup>

Enter FRANCISCUS.

Fran. How sweetly she looks! O, but there's a wrinkle in her brow as deep as philosophy. Anacreon, drink to my mistress' health, I'll pledge it. Stay, stay, there's a spider in the cup! No, 'tis but a grape-stone; swallow it, [<sup>50</sup> fear nothing, poet; so, so, lift higher.

Isa. Alack, alack, it is too full of pity To be laugh'd at! How fell he mad? Canst thou tell?

Lol. For love, mistress. He was a pretty poet, too, and that set him forwards first; [<sup>55</sup> the muses then forsook him; he ran mad for a chambermaid, yet she was but a dwarf neither.

Fran. Hail, bright Titania!

Why stand'st thou idle on these flow'ry banks? Oberon is dancing with his Dryades; <sup>60</sup> I'll gather daisies, primrose, violets, And bind them in a verse of poesy.

Lol. [holding up a whip.] Not too near! You see your danger.

Fran. O, hold thy hand, great Diomed! <sup>65</sup> Thou feed'st thy horses well, they shall obey thee:

Get up, Bucephalus kneels. [Kneels.]

Lol. You see how I awe my flock; a shepherd has not his dog at more obedience.

Isa. His conscience is unquiet; sure that was <sup>70</sup>

The cause of this: a proper gentleman!

Fran. Come hither, Aesculapius; hide the poison.

Lol. Well, 'tis hid. [Hides the whip.]

Fran. Didst thou ne'er hear of one Tiresias, A famous poet?

Lol. Yes, that kept tame wild geese. <sup>75</sup>

Fran. That's he; I am the man.

Lol. No?

Fran. Yes; but make no words on 't. I was a man

Seven years ago.

<sup>1</sup> Handsome.

Lol. A stripling, I think, you might. <sup>80</sup>

Fran. Now I'm a woman, all feminine.

Lol. I would I might see that!

Fran. Juno struck me blind.

Lol. I'll ne'er believe that; for a woman, they say, has an eye more than a man.

Fran. I say she struck me blind. <sup>85</sup>

Lol. And Luna made you mad: you have two trades to beg with.

Fran. Luna is now big-bellied, and there's room

For both of us to ride with Hecate;

I'll drag thee up into her silver sphere, <sup>90</sup>

And there we'll kick the dog—and beat the bush—

That barks against the witches of the night; The swift lycanthropi<sup>2</sup> that walks the round,

We'll tear their wolfish skins, and save the sheep. [Attempts to seize LOLLIO.]

Lol. Is't come to this? Nay, then, my [<sup>95</sup> poison comes forth again. [Showing the whip.]

Mad slave, indeed, abuse your keeper!

Isa. I prithee, hence with him, now he grows dangerous.

Fran. [sings.]

Sweet love, pity me,
Give me leave to lie with thee. <sup>100</sup>

Lol. No, I'll see you wiser first. To your own kennel!

Fran. No noise, she sleeps; draw all the curtains round,

Let no soft sound molest the pretty soul

But love, and love creeps in at a mouse-hole.

Lol. I would you would get into your hole! [Exit FRANCISCUS.—Now, mistress, I will [<sup>105</sup> bring you another sort; you shall be fool'd another while. [Exit, and brings in ANTONIO.]

Tony, come hither, Tony: look who's yonder, Tony. <sup>110</sup>

Ant. Cousin, is it not my aunt? <sup>3</sup>

Lol. Yes, 'tis one of 'em, Tony.

Ant. He, he! how do you, uncle?

Lol. Fear him not, mistress, 'tis a gentle nidget; <sup>4</sup> you may play with him, as safely with him as with his bauble. <sup>115</sup>

Isa. How long hast thou been a fool?

Ant. Ever since I came hither, cousin.

Isa. Cousin? I'm none of thy cousins, fool.

Lol. O, mistress, fools have always so much wit as to claim their kindred. <sup>120</sup>

Madman. [within.] Bounce, bounce! he falls, he falls!

Isa. Hark you, your scholars in the upper room

Are out of order. <sup>125</sup>

Lol. Must I come amongst you there?—

Keep you the fool, mistress; I'll go up and play left-handed Orlando amongst the madmen. <sup>130</sup>

Exit.

Isa. Well, sir. <sup>135</sup>

Ant. 'Tis opportuneful now, sweet lady! nay, Cast no amazing eye upon this change.

Isa. Ha!

Ant. This shape of folly shrouds your dearest love,

The truest servant to your powerful beauties,
Whose magic had this force thus to transform me. 130

Isa. You're a fine fool indeed!

Ant. O, 't is not strange!
Love has an intellect that runs through all
The scrutinous<sup>1</sup> sciences; and, like a cunning poet,

Catches a quantity of every knowledge, 140
Yet brings all home into one mystery,
Into one secret that he proceeds in.

Isa. You're a parlous fool.

Ant. No danger in me; I bring nought but love
And his soft-wounding shafts to strike you with. 145

Try but one arrow; if it hurt you, I
Will stand you twenty back in recompense.

Isa. A forward fool too!

Ant. This was love's teaching:
A thousand ways he fashion'd out my way,
And this I found the safest and the nearest, 150
To tread the galaxia to my star.

Isa. Profound withal! certain you dream'd of this,
Love never taught it waking.

Ant. Take no acquaintance
Of these outward follies, there 's within
A gentleman that loves you.

Isa. When I see him, 155
I'll speak with him; so, in the meantime, keep
Your habit, it becomes you well enough.
As you're a gentleman, I'll not discover you;
That's all the favour that you must expect. 159
When you are weary, you may leave the school,
For all this while you have but play'd the fool.

Re-enter LOLLIO.

Ant. And must again.—He, he! I thank you, cousin;

I'll be your valentine to-morrow morning.

Lol. How do you like the fool, mistress?

Isa. Passing well, sir. 165

Lol. Is he not witty, pretty well, for a fool?

Isa. If he holds on as he begins, he's like
To come to something.

Lol. Ay, thank a good tutor. You may put him to 't; he begins to answer pretty hard [170 questions.—Tony, how many is five times six?
Ant. Five times six is six times five.

Lol. What arithmetician could have answer'd better? How many is one hundred and seven?

Ant. One hundred and seven is seven hundred and one, cousin. 175

Lol. This is no wit to speak on!—Will you be rid of the fool now?

Isa. By no means; let him stay a little.

Madman. [within.] Catch there, catch the last couple in hell!<sup>2</sup> 181

An allusion to the game of barley-break, the ground for which was divided into three compartments, of which the middle one was termed "hell." (Ellis).

Lol. Again! must I come amongst you?
Would my master were come home! I am not able to govern both these wards together.

Exit.

Ant. Why should a minute of love's hour be lost? 185

Isa. Fie, out again! I had rather you kept
Your other posture; you become not your tongue

When you speak from<sup>3</sup> your clothes.

Ant. How can he freeze 189
Lives near so sweet a warmth? Shall I alone
Walk through the orchard of th' Hesperides,
And, cowardly, not dare to pull an apple?

Enter LOLLIO above.

This with the red cheeks I must venture for.
[Attempts to kiss her.]

Isa. Take heed, there 's giants keep 'em.

Lol. [Aside.] How now, fool, are you good at that? Have you read Lipsius?<sup>4</sup> He's past 195
Ars Amandi; I believe I must put harder questions to him, I perceive that.

Isa. You're bold without fear too.

Ant. What should I fear,
Having all joys about me? Do you smile,
And love shall play the wanton on your lip, 201
Meet and retire, retire and meet again;
Look you but cheerfully, and in your eyes
I shall behold mine own deformity,
And dress myself up fairer. I know this shape Becomes me not, but in those bright mirrors 205

I shall array me handsomely.

[Cries of madmen are heard within,
some as birds others as beasts.]

Lol. Cuckoo, cuckoo! Exit [above].

Ant. What are these?

Isa. Of fear enough to part us;
Yet are they but our schools of lunatics,
That act their fantasies in any shapes, 210
Suiting their present thoughts: if sad, they cry;

If mirth be their conceit, they laugh again;
Sometimes they imitate the beasts and birds,
Singing or howling, braying, barking; all
As their wild fancies prompt 'em.

Enter LOLLIO.

Ant. These are no fears. 215

Isa. But here 's a large one, my man.

Ant. Ha, he! that's fine sport, indeed, cousin.

Lol. I would my master were come home!
'T is too much for one shepherd to govern two of these flocks; nor can I believe that one [221 churchman can instruct two benefices at once;
there will be some incurable mad of the one side, and very fools on the other.—Come,
Tony. 225

Ant. Prithee, cousin, let me stay here still.

Lol. No, you must to your book now; you have play'd sufficiently.

<sup>4</sup> "Is it necessary to notice that the name of this great scholar is introduced merely for the sake of its first syllable?" (Dyce.)

Isa. Your fool has grown wondrous witty.

Lol. Well, I'll say nothing: but I do not think but he will put you down one of these days. <sup>231</sup>

Exit with ANTONIO.

Isa. Here the restrained current might make breach,

Spite of the watchful bankers. Would a woman stray,

She need not gad abroad to seek her sin,
It would be brought home one way or [another]; <sup>235</sup>

The needle's point will to the fixed north;
Such drawing arctics womens' beauties are.

Re-enter LOLLIO.

Lol. How dost thou, sweet rogue?

Isa. How now?

Lol. Come, there are degrees; one fool may be better than another. <sup>241</sup>

Isa. What's the matter?

Lol. Nay, if thou giv'st thy mind to fool's flesh, have at thee!

Isa. You bold slave, you! <sup>245</sup>

Lol. I could follow now as t' other fool did:

"What should I fear,
Having all joys about me? Do you but smile,
And love shall play the wanton on your lip, <sup>250</sup>
Meet and retire, retire and meet again;
Look you but cheerfully, and in your eyes
I shall behold my own deformity,
And dress myself up fairer. I know this shape

Becomes me not —" <sup>255</sup>

And so as it follows: but is not this the most foolish way? Come, sweet rogue; kiss me, my little Lacedaemonian; let me feel how thy pulses beat. Thou hast a thing about thee would do a man pleasure, I'll lay my hand on 't. <sup>261</sup>

Isa. Sirrah, no more! I see you have discovered

This love's knight errant, who hath made adventure

For purchase of <sup>1</sup> my love: be silent, mute,
Mute as a statue, or his injunction <sup>265</sup>

For me enjoying, shall be to cut thy throat;
I'll do it, though for no other purpose; and
Be sure he'll not refuse it.

Lol. My share, that's all;
I'll have my fool's part with you.

Isa. No more! Your master.

Enter ALBIUS.

Alib. Sweet, how dost thou?

Isa. Your bounden servant, sir. <sup>270</sup>

Alib. Fie, fie, sweetheart, no more of that.

Isa. You were best lock me up.

Alib. In my arms and bosom, my sweet Isabella,

I'll lock thee up most nearly. — Lollio,

We have employment, we have task in hand.
At noble Vermandero's, our castle's captain, <sup>275</sup>

There is a nuptial to be solemnis'd —

Beatrice-Joanna, his fair daughter, bride, —

<sup>1</sup> To gain.

For which the gentleman hath bespoke our pains,

A mixture of our madmen and our fools, <sup>280</sup>
To finish, as it were, and make the fag <sup>2</sup>

Of all the revels, the third night from the first;

Only an unexpected passage over,
To make a frightful pleasure, that is all,

But not the all I aim at. Could we so act it,
To teach it in a wild distracted measure, <sup>285</sup>

Though out of form and figure, breaking time's head,

It were no matter, 't would be heal'd again
In one age or other, if not in this:

This, this, Lollio, there's a good reward begun,
And will beget a bounty, be it known. <sup>291</sup>

Lol. This is 'easy, sir, I'll warrant you: you have about you fools and madmen that can dance very well; and 'tis no wonder, your best dancers are not the wisest men; the reason is, with often jumping they jolt their brains <sup>[295]</sup> down into their feet, that their wits lie more in their heels than in their heads.

Alib. Honest Lollio, thou giv'st me a good reason,

And a comfort in it.

Isa. You've a fine trade on 't.
Madmen and fools are a staple commodity. <sup>301</sup>

Alib. O wife, we must eat, wear clothes, and live.

Just at the lawyer's haven we arrive,
By madmen and by fools we both do thrive. <sup>Exit.</sup>

[SCENE IV.] <sup>3</sup>

Enter VERMANDERO, BEATRICE, ALSEMERO, and JASPERINO.

Ver. Valencia speaks so nobly of you, sir,
I wish I had a daughter now for you.

Alis. The fellow of this creature were a partner
For a king's love.

Ver. I had her fellow once, sir,
But Heaven has married her to joys eternal; <sup>5</sup>

'T were sin to wish her in this vale again.
Come, sir, your friend and you shall see the pleasures

Which my health chiefly joys in.

Alis. I hear
The beauty of this seat largely [commended]. <sup>4</sup>

Ver. It falls much short of that.

Exit with ALSEMERO and JASPERINO.

Beat. So, here's one step <sup>10</sup>
Into my father's favour; time will fix him;

I've got him now the liberty of the house.
So wisdom, by degrees, works out her freedom;

And if that eye be dark'ned that offends me, —
I wait but that eclipse, — this gentleman <sup>15</sup>

Shall soon shine glorious in my father's liking,
Through the refulgent virtue of my love.

Enter DE FLORES.

De F. [Aside.] My thoughts are at a banquet; for the deed, <sup>2</sup> End. <sup>2</sup> An apartment in the Castle. * Q. omits.

I feel no weight in 't; 'tis but light and cheap
For the sweet recompense that I set down for 't.

Beat. De Flores ?

De F. Lady ?

Beat. Thy looks promise cheerfully. <sup>21</sup>

De F. All things are answerable, time, circumstance,

Your wishes, and my service.

Beat. Is it done, then ?

De F. Piracquo is no more.

Beat. My joys start at mine eyes ; our sweetst delights <sup>25</sup>

Are evermore born weeping.

De F. I've a token for you.

Beat. For me ?

De F. But it was sent somewhat unwillingly ;

I could not get the ring without the finger.

[Producing the finger and ring.]

Beat. Bless me, what hast thou done ?

De F. Why, is that more <sup>30</sup>
Than killing the whole man ? I cut his heart-
strings ;

A greedy hand thrust in a dish at court,
In a mistake hath had as much as this.

Beat. 'Tis the first token my father made me
send him.

De F. And I [have] made him send it back
again <sup>35</sup>

For his last token. I was loth to leave it,
And I'm sure dead men have no use of jewels ;
He was as loth to part with 't, for it stuck
As if the flesh and it were both one substance.

Beat. At the stag's fall, the keeper has his fees ; <sup>40</sup>

'Tis soon appli'd, all dead men's fees are yours,
sir.

I pray, bury the finger, but the stone

You may make use on shortly ; the true value,
Take 't of my truth, is near three hundred ducats.

De F. 'T will hardly buy a capcase <sup>1</sup> for one's conscience though, <sup>45</sup>

To keep it from the worm, as fine as 't is.

Well, being my fees, I'll take it ;

Great men have taught me that, or else my merit

Would scorn the way on 't.

Beat. It might justly, sir.

Why, thou mistakst, De Flores ; 'tis not given
In state <sup>2</sup> of recompense.

De F. No, I hope so, lady ; <sup>51</sup>

You should soon witness my contempt to 't
then.

Beat. Prithee, — thou lookst as if thou wert offended.

De F. That were strange, lady ; 'tis not possible

My service should draw such a cause from
you. <sup>55</sup>

Offended ! Could you think so ? That were much

For one of my performance, and so warm

Yet in my service.

Beat. 'T were misery in me to give you cause,
sir.

De F. I know so much, it were so ; misery <sup>60</sup>
In her most sharp condition.

Beat. 'T is resolv<sup>d</sup> then ;
Look you, sir, here's three thousand golden florins ;

I have not meanly thought upon thy merit.

De F. What ! salary ? Now you move me.

Beat. How, De Flores ?

De F. Do you place me in the rank of ver-minous fellows, <sup>65</sup>

To destroy things for wages ? Offer gold

For the life-blood of man ? Is anything

Valued too precious for my recompense ?

Beat. I understand thee not.

De F. I could ha' hir<sup>d</sup>

A journeyman in murder at this rate, <sup>70</sup>
And mine own conscience might have [slept at ease]. <sup>3</sup>

And have had the work brought home.

Beat. [Aside.] I'm in a labyrinth ;
What will content him ? I'd fain be rid of him.

I'll double the sum, sir.

De F. You take a course
To double my vexation, that's the good you do.

Beat. [Aside.] Bless me, I'm now in worse plight than I was ; <sup>75</sup>

I know not what will please him. — For my fear's sake,

I prithee, make away with all speed possible ;
And if thou be'st so modest not to name

The sum that will content thee, paper blushes
not, <sup>80</sup>

Send thy demand in writing, it shall follow thee ;
But, prithee, take thy flight.

De F. You must fly too, then.

Beat. I ?

De F. I'll not stir a foot else.

Beat. What's your meaning ?

De F. Why, are not you as guilty ? In, I'm sure,

As deep as I ; and we should stick together. <sup>85</sup> Come, your fears counsel you but ill ; my absence

Would draw suspect upon you instantly ;
There were no rescue for you.

Beat. [Aside.] He speaks home !

De F. Nor is it fit we two, engag<sup>d</sup> so jointly,
Should part and live asunder.

Beat. How now, sir ? <sup>90</sup>

This shows not well.

De F. What makes your lip so strange ?

This must not be 'twixt<sup>4</sup> us.

Beat. The man talks wildly !

De F. Come, kiss me with a zeal now.

Beat. [Aside.] Heaven, I doubt him !

De F. I will not stand so long to beg 'em shortly. <sup>95</sup>

Beat. Take heed, De Flores, of forgetfulness,
'T will soon betray us.

De F. Take you heed first ;
Faith, you're grown much forgetful, you're to blame in 't.

Beat. [Aside.] He's bold, and I am blam<sup>d</sup>
for 't.

De F. I have eas<sup>d</sup> you

Of your trouble, think on it; I am<sup>1</sup> in pain, 100
And must be eas'd of<sup>2</sup> you; 't is a charity,
Justice invites your blood to understand me.

Beat. I dare not.

De F. Quickly!

Beat. O, I never shall!
Speak it yet further off, that I may lose
What has been spoken, and no sound remain on 't;
I would not hear so much offence again 105
For such another deed.

De F. Soft, lady, soft!
The last is not yet paid for. O, this act
Has put me into spirit; I was as greedy on 't
As the parcht earth of moisture, when the clouds weep. 110

Did you not mark, I wrought myself into 't, Nay, su'd and kneel'd for 't? Why was all that pains took?

You see I've thrown contempt upon your gold;
Not that I want it [not],<sup>3</sup> for I do piteously, 114
In order I'll come unto 't, and make use on 't,
But 't was not held so precious to begin with,
For I place wealth after the heels of pleasure;
And were not I resolv'd in my belief
That thy virginity were perfect in thee,
I should but take my recompense with grudg-
ing, 120

As if I had but half my hopes I agreed for.

Beat. Why, 't is impossible thou canst be so wicked,

Or shelter such a cunning cruelty,
To make his death the murderer of my honour!
Thy language is so bold and vicious, 125
I cannot see which way I can forgive it
With any modesty.

De F. Pish! you forget yourself;
A woman dipt in blood, and talk of modesty!

Beat. O misery of sin! would I'd been bound Perpetually unto my living hate 130
In that Piracquo, than to hear these words!
Think but upon the distance that creation
Set 'twixt thy blood and mine, and keep thee
there.

De F. Look but into your conscience, read me there;

'T is a true book, you'll find me there your equal. 135

Pish! fly not to your birth, but settle you
In what the act has made you; you're no more
now.

You must forget your parentage to me;
You're the deed's creature; by that name
You lost your first condition, and I challenge
you, 140

As peace and innocency has turn'd you out,
And made you one with me.

Beat. With thee, foul villain!

De F. Yes, my fair murd'ress. Do you urge
me,
Though thou writ'st maid, thou whore in thy affection?

'T was chang'd from thy first love, and that's a kind 145
Of whoredom in thy heart; and he's chang'd
now

To bring thy second on, thy Alsemero,
Whom, by all sweets that ever darkness tasted,
If I enjoy thee not, thou ne'er enjoy'st!
I'll blast the hopes and joys of marriage, 150
I'll confess all; my life I rate at nothing.

Beat. De Flores!
De F. I shall rest from all love's<sup>4</sup> plagues
I live in pain now; that shooting eye
Will burn my heart to cinders.

Beat. O sir, hear me!
De F. She that in life and love refuses me, 155
In death and shame my partner she shall be.

Beat. [kneeling.] Stay, hear me once for all;
I make thee master

Of all the wealth I have in gold and jewels;
Let me go poor unto my bed with honour,
And I am rich in all things!

De F. Let this silence thee:
The wealth of all Valencia shall not buy 161
My pleasure from me;
Can you weep Fate from its determin'd purpose?
So soon may you weep me.

Beat. Vengeance begins;
Murder, I see, is followed by more sins. 165
Was my creation in the womb so curst,
It must engender with a viper first?

De F. [raising her.] Come, rise and shroud your blushes in my bosom;

Silence is one of pleasure's best receipts: 169
Thy peace is wrought for ever in this yielding.
'Las! how the turtle pants! Thou 'lt love anon
What thou so fear 'st and faint 'st to venture on.
Exeunt.

ACT IV

[DUMB SHOW.]

*Enter Gentlemen, VERMANDERO meeting them with action of wonderment at the flight of PIR-ACQUO. Enter ALSEMERO with JASPERINO and gallants: VERMANDERO points to him,
the gentlemen seeming to applaud the choice.
ALSEMERO, JASPERINO, and Gentlemen;
BEATRICE the bride following in great state, accompanied with DIAPHANTA, ISABELLA,
and other gentlewomen: DE FLORES after all, smiling at the accident: ALONZO's ghost appears to DE FLORES in the midst of his smile, startles him, showing him the hand whose finger he had cut off. They pass over in great solemnity.<sup>5</sup>*

[SCENE I.]<sup>6</sup>Enter BEATRICE.

Beat. This fellow has undone me endlessly;
Never was bride so fearfully distrest.
The more I think upon th' ensuing night,
And whom I am to cope with in embraces,
One [who's]<sup>7</sup> ennobled both in blood and mind,
So clear in understanding, — that's my plague

<sup>3</sup> Q. omits.

Before whose judgment will my fault appear
Like malefactors' crimes before tribunals.
There is no hiding on 't, the more I dive
Into my own distress. How a wise man Stands for<sup>1</sup> a great calamity! There's no ventur-
ing

Into his bed, what course soe'er I light upon, Without my shame, which may grow up to
danger.

He cannot but in justice strangle me
As I lie by him; as a cheater use me;      15
'T is a precious craft to play with a false die
Before a cunning gamester. Here's his closet;
The key left in 't, and he abroad i' th' park!
Sure 't was forgot; I'll be so bold as look in 't.
[Opens closet.]

Bless me! a right physician's closet 't is,      20
Set round with vials; every one her mark too.
Sure he does practise physick for his own use,
Which may be safely call'd your great man's wisdom.

What manuscript lies here? "The Book of Experiment,

Call'd Secrets in Nature." So 't is: 't is so.      25 [Reads.] "How to know whether a woman be with child or no."

I hope I am not yet; if he should try though!
Let me see [reads] "folio forty-five," here 't is,
The leaf tuckt down upon 't, the place suspicious.      29

[Reads.] "If you would know whether a woman be with child or not, give her two spoonfuls of the white water in glass C —"
Where 's that glass C? O yonder, I see 't now — [Reads.] "and if she be with child, she sleeps full twelve hours after; if not, not;"      35

None of that water comes into my belly;
I'll know you from a hundred; I could break
you now,

Or turn you into milk, and so beguile
The master of the mystery; but I'll look to
you.

Ha! that which is next is ten times worse:      40 [Reads.] "How to know whether a woman be a maid or not:"

If that should be appli'd, what would become of me?

Belike he has a strong faith of my purity,
That never yet made proof; but this he calls      45 [Reads.] "A merry slight,<sup>2</sup> but true experiment; the author Antonius Mizaldus. Give the party you suspect the quantity of a spoonful of the water in the glass M, which, upon her that is a maid, makes three several effects; 't will [50 make her incontinently<sup>3</sup> gape, then fall into a sudden sneezing, last into a violent laughing;
else, dull, heavy, and lumpish."

Where had I been?
I fear it, yet 't is seven hours to bed-time.      55

Enter DIAPHANTA.

Dia. Cuds,<sup>4</sup> madam, are you here?

Beat. Seeing that wench now,
A trick comes in my mind; 't is a nice piece

<sup>4</sup> Gods.

Gold cannot purchase. [Aside.] — I come hither,
wench,

To look my lord.

Dia. Would I had such a cause
To look him too! — Why, he's i' th' park,
madam.      60

Beat. There let him be.

Dia. Ay, madam, let him compass
Whole parks and forests, as great rangers do,
At roosting-time a little lodge can hold 'em.
Earth-conquering Alexander, that thought the
world

Too narrow for him, in th' end had but his pit-hole.      65

Beat. I fear thou art not modest, Diaphanta.

Dia. Your thoughts are so unwilling to be known, madam.

'T is ever the bride's fashion, towards bed-time,
To set light by her joys, as if she ow'd 'em
not.

Beat. Her joys? Her fears thou wouldst
say.

Dia. Fear of what?      70

Beat. Art thou a maid, and talk'st so to a maid?

You leave a blushing business behind;
Beshrew your heart for 't!

Dia. Do you mean good sooth, madam?

Beat. Well, if I'd thought upon the fear at
first,

Man should have been unknown.

Dia. Is 't possible?      75

Beat. I'd give a thousand ducats to that
woman

Would try what my fear were, and tell me true
To-morrow, when she gets from 't; as she likes,

I might perhaps be drawn to 't.

Dia. Are you in earnest?

Beat. Do you get the woman, then challenge
me,      80

And see if I'll fly from 't; but I must tell you
This by the way, she must be a true maid.

Else there's no trial, my fears are not her's
else.

Dia. Nay, she that I would put into your hands, madam,

Shall be a maid.

Beat. You know I should be sham'd else,      85
Because she lies for me.

Dia. 'T is a strange humour! <sup>5</sup>
But are you serious still? Would you resign
Your first night's pleasure, and give money
too?

Beat. As willingly as live. — [Aside.] Alas, the gold

Is but a by-bet to wedge in the honour!      90

Dia. I do not know how the world goes abroad

For faith or honesty; there's both requir'd in
this.

Madam, what say you to me, and stray no further?

I've a good mind, in troth, to earn your money.
Beat. You are too quick, I fear, to be a maid.      95

<sup>5</sup> Whim.

Dia. How? Not a maid? Nay, then you urge me, madam;

Your honourable self is not a truer,

With all your fears upon you —
Beat. [Aside.] Bad enough then.

Dia. Than I with all my lightsome joys about me.

Beat. I'm glad to hear 't. Then you dare put your honesty<sup>1</sup> 100

Upon an easy trial.

Dia. Easy? Anything.

Beat. I'll come to you straight.

[Goes to the closet.]

Dia. She will not search me, will she, like the forewoman of a female jury?<sup>2</sup>

Beat. Glass M: ay, this is it. [Brings vial.]

Look, Diaphanta,

You take no worse than I do. [Drinks.]

Dia. And in so doing, 105

I will not question what it is, but take it.

[Drinks.]

Beat. [Aside.] Now if th' experiment be true, 't will praise itself,

And give me noble ease: begins already;

[DIAPHANTA gapes.]

There's the first symptom; and what haste it makes

To fall into the second, there by this time! 110

[DIAPHANTA sneezes.]

Most admirable secret! on the contrary, it stirs not me a whit, which most concerns it.

Dia. Ha, ha, ha!

Beat. [Aside.] Just in all things, and in order

As if 't were circumscrib'd; one accident<sup>3</sup> 115
Gives way unto another.

Dia. Ha, ha, ha!

Beat. How now, wench?

Dia. Ha, ha, ha! I'm so, so light at heart — ha, ha, ha! — so pleasurable!

But one swig more, sweet madam.

Beat. Ay, to-morrow, 120

We shall have time to sit by 't.

Dia. Now I'm sad again.

Beat. [Aside.] It lays itself so gently too! — Come, wench.

Most honest Diaphanta I dare call thee now.

Dia. Pray, tell me, madam, what trick call you this?

Beat. I'll tell thee all hereafter; we must study 125

The carriage of this business.

Dia. I shall carry 't well, because I love the burthen.

Beat. About midnight

You must not fail to steal forth gently,

That I may use the place.

Dia. O, fear not, madam, I shall be cool by that time. The bride's place,

And with a thousand ducats! I'm for a justice now, 131

I bring a portion with me; I scorn small fools. Exeunt.

<sup>1</sup> Chastity.

<sup>2</sup> I suspect that there is an allusion here to the examination by matrons of the notorious Countess of Essex. (Bullen.)

<sup>3</sup> Property, symptom.

[SCENE II.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter VERMANDERO and Servant.

Ver. I tell thee, knave, mine honour is in question,

A thing till now free from suspicion,
Nor ever was there cause. Who of my gentle-

men
Are absent? Tell me, and truly, how many,
and who?

Ser. Antonio, sir, and Franciscus. 5

Ver. When did they leave the castle?

Ser. Some ten days since, sir; the one intending to Briamata, th' other for Valencia.

Ver. The time accuses 'em; a charge of murder

Is brought within my castle-gate, Piracquo's murder; 10

I dare not answer faithfully their absence.

A strict command of apprehension

Shall pursue 'em suddenly, and either wipe

The stain off clear, or openly discover it.

Provide me winged warrants for the purpose. 15
Exit Servant.

See, I am set on again.

Enter TOMASO.

Tom. I claim a brother of you.

Ver. You're too hot; Seek him not here.

Tom. Yes, 'mongst your dearest bloods, if my peace find no fairer satisfaction.

This is the place must yield account for him,
For here I left him; and the hasty tie 21

Of this snatcht marriage gives strong testimony

Of his most certain ruin.

Ver. Certain falsehood!

This is the place indeed; his breach of faith
Has too much marr'd both my abused love, 25

The honourable love I reserv'd for him,

And mockt my daughter's joy; the prepar'd morning

Blusht at his infidelity; he left

Contempt and scorn to throw upon those friends
Whose belief hurt 'em. O, 't was most ignoble

To take his flight so unexpectedly, 31
And throw such public wrongs on those that lov'd him!

Tom. Then this is all your answer?

Ver. 'T is too fair For one of his alliance; and I warn you

That this place no more see you. Exit.

Enter DE FLORES.

Tom. The best is, 35
There is more ground to meet a man's revenge

on. —
Honest De Flores?

De F. That's my name indeed.

Saw you the bride? Good sweet sir, which way took she?

Tom. I've blest mine eyes from seeing such a false one. 40

<sup>4</sup> Another apartment in the Castle.

De F. [Aside.] I'd fain get off, this man's not for my company;
I smell his brother's blood when I come near him.

Tom. Come hither, kind and true one; I remember

My brother lov'd thee well.

Dr F. O, purely, dear sir! —
[Aside.] Methinks I'm now again a-killing on him, <sup>45</sup>

He brings it so fresh to me.

Tom. Thou canst guess, sirrah —
[An]<sup>1</sup> honest friend has an instinct of jealousy —
At some foul guilty person.

De F. Alas! sir,
I am so charitable, I think none
Worse than myself! You did not see the bride then? <sup>50</sup>

Tom. I prithee, name her not: is she not wicked?

De F. No, no; a pretty, easy, round-packt sinner,

As your most ladies are, else you might think I flatter'd her; but, sir, at no hand wicked,
Till they're so old their chins and noses<sup>2</sup> meet,
And they salute witches. I'm call'd, I think, sir. — <sup>55</sup>

[Aside.] His company ev'n overlays my conscience. Exit.

Tom. That De Flores has a wondrous honest heart!

He'll bring it out in time, I'm assur'd on't.
O, here 's the glorious master of the day's joy!
'T<sup>3</sup> will not be long till he and I do reckon. — <sup>61</sup>

Enter ALSEMERO.

Sir.

Als. You're most welcome.
Tom. You may call that word back;
I do not think I am, nor wish to be.

Als. 'Tis strange you found the way to this house, then.

Tom. Would I'd ne'er known the cause! I'm none of those, sir, <sup>65</sup>

That come to give you joy, and swill your wine;
'Tis a more precious liquor that must lay
The fiery thirst I bring.

Als. Your words and you
Appear to me great strangers.

Tom. Time and our swords
May made us more acquainted. This the business: <sup>70</sup>

I should have had a brother in your place;
How treachery and malice have dispos'd of him,

I'm bound to inquire of him which holds his right,

Which never could come fairly.

Als. You must look
To answer for that word, sir.

Tom. Fear you not, <sup>75</sup>
I'll have it ready drawn at our next meeting.

<sup>3</sup> Q. I.

Keep your day solemn;<sup>4</sup> farewell, I disturb it not;

I'll bear the smart with patience for a time. Exit.

Als. 'Tis somewhat ominous this; a quarrel ent'red

Upon this day; my innocence relieves me, <sup>80</sup>

Enter JASPERINO.

I should be wondrous sad else. — Jasperino,
I've news to tell thee, strange news.

Jasp. I ha' some too,
I think as strange as yours. Would I might

keep
Mine, so my faith and friendship might be kept in't!

Faith, sir, dispense a little with my zeal, <sup>85</sup>
And let it cool in this.

Als. This puts me on,
And blames thee for thy slowness.

Jas. All may prove nothing,
Only a friendly fear that leapt from me, sir.

Als. No question, 't may prove nothing; let's partake it though.

Jas. 'T was Diaphanta's chance — for to that wench <sup>90</sup>

I pretend<sup>6</sup> honest love, and she deserves it —
To leave me in a back part of the house,

A place we chose for private conference.
She was no sooner gone, but instantly

I heard your bride's voice in the next room to me; <sup>95</sup>

And lending more attention, found De Flores Louder than she.

Als. De Flores! Thou art out now.
Jas. You'll tell me more anon.

Als. Still I'll prevent<sup>6</sup> thee,
The very sight of him is poison to her.

Jas. That made me stagger too; but Diaphanta <sup>100</sup>

At her return confirm'd it.

Als. Diaphanta!
Jas. Then fell we both to listen, and words past

Like those that challenge interest in a woman.
Als. Peace: quench thy zeal, 'tis dangerous to thy bosom.

Jas. Then truth is full of peril.
Als. Such truths are.

O, were she the sole glory of the earth, <sup>105</sup>
Had eyes that could shoot fire into king's

breasts,
And toucht,<sup>7</sup> she sleeps not here! Yet I have

time,
Though night be near, to be resolv'd hereof;

And, prithee, do not weigh me by my passions.
Jas. I never weigh'd friend so.

Als. Done charitably! <sup>111</sup>
That key will lead thee to a pretty secret,

[Giving key.]

By a Chaldean taught me, and I have My study upon some. Bring from my closet

A glass inscrib'd there with the letter M, <sup>115</sup>
And question not my purpose.

<sup>7</sup> Tainted.

Jas. It shall be done, sir. Exit.

Als. How can this hang together? Not an hour since

Her woman came pleading her lady's fears,
Deliver'd her for the most timorous virgin
That ever shrunk at man's name, and so modest,

She charg'd her weep out her request to me,
That she might come obscurely to my bosom.

Enter BEATRICE.

Beat. [Aside.] All things go well; my woman's preparing yonder
For her sweet voyage, which grieves me to lose;
Necessity compels it; I lose all, else.

Als. [Aside.] Pish! modesty's shrine is set in yonder forehead:

I cannot be too sure though. — My Joanna!

Beat. Sir, I was bold to weep a message to you;

Pardon my modest fears.

Als. The dove's not meeker;
[Aside.] She's abus'd, questionless.

Re-enter JASPERINO [with vial].

O, are you come, sir?

Beat. [Aside.] The glass, upon my life! I see the letter.

Jas. Sir, this is M. [Giving vial.]

Als. 'T is it.

Beat. [Aside.] I am suspected.

Als. How fitly our bride comes to partake with us!

Beat. What is 't, my lord?

Als. No hurt.

Beat. Sir, pardon me,
I seldom taste of any composition.

Als. But this, upon my warrant, you shall venture on.

Beat. I fear 't will make me ill.

Als. Heaven forbid that.

Beat. [Aside.] I'm put now to my canning: th' effects I know,

If I can now but feign 'em handsomely.

Als. It has that secret virtue, it ne'er mist,

sir,

Upon a virgin.

Jas. Treble-qualified?

[BEATRICE gapes and sneezes.]

Als. By all that's virtuous it takes there! proceeds!

Jas. This is the strangest trick to know a maid by.

Beat. Ha, ha, ha!

You have given me joy of heart to drink, my lord.

Als. No, thou hast given me such joy of heart, that never can be blasted.

Beat. What's the matter, sir?

Als. [Aside.] See now 't is settled in a melancholy;

Keeps both the time and method. — My Joanna, Chaste as the breath of Heaven, or morning's womb,

That brings the day forth! thus my love encloses thee.

Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter ISABELLA and LOLLIO.

Isa. O Heaven! is this the [waning]<sup>2</sup> moon?
Does love turn fool, run mad, and all at once?
Sirrah, here's a madman, akin to the fool too,
A lunatic lover.

Lol. No, no, not he I brought the letter from?

Isa. Compare his inside with his out, and tell me.

Lol. The out's mad, I'm sure of that; I had a taste on 't. [Reads letter.] "To the bright Andromeda, chief chambermaid to the Knight of the Sun, at the sign of Scorpio, in the [10 middle region, sent by the bellows-mender of Aeolus. Pay the post." This is stark madness!

Isa. Now mark the inside. [Takes the letter and reads.] "Sweet lady, having now cast off this counterfeit cover of a madman, I appear [15 to your best judgment a true and faithful lover of your beauty."

Lol. He is mad still.

Isa. [reads.] "If any fault you find, chide those perfections in you which have made [20 me imperfect; 't is the same sun that causeth to grow and enforceth to wither——"

Lol. O rogue!

Isa. [reads.] "Shapes and transhapes, destroys and builds again. I come in winter to [25 you, dismantled of my proper ornaments; by the sweet splendour of your cheerful smiles, I spring and live a lover."

Lol. Mad rascal still!

Isa. [reads.] "Tread him not under foot, [30 that shall appear an honour to your bounties. I remain—mad till I speak with you, from whom I expect my cure, yours all, or one beside himself, FRANCISCUS."

Lol. You are like to have a fine time on 't. [35 My master and I may give over our professions; I do not think but you can cure fools and madmen faster than we, with little pains too.

Isa. Very likely.

Lol. One thing I must tell you, mistress: [40 you perceive that I am privy to your skill; if I find you minister once, and set up the trade, I put in for my thirds; I shall be mad or fool else.

Isa. The first place is thine, believe it, Lollio, if I do fall.

Lol. I fall upon you.

Isa. So. [45]

Lol. Well, I stand to my venture.

Isa. But thy counsel now; how shall I deal with 'em?

Lol. [Why,] do you mean to deal with 'em?

Isa. Nay, the fair understanding,<sup>3</sup> how to use 'em. [50]

Lol. Abuse<sup>4</sup> 'em! That's the way to mad the fool, and make a fool of the madman, and then you use 'em kindly.

Isa. 'T is easy, I'll practise; do thou observe it.

The key of thy wardrobe. [55]

Lol. There [gives key]; fit yourself for 'em, and I'll fit 'em both for you.

Isa. Take thou no further notice than the outside. Exit.

Lol. Not an inch; I'll put you to the inside.

Enter ALIBIUS.

Alib. Lollo, art there? Will all be perfect, think'st thou? <sup>60</sup>

To-morrow night, as if to close up the Solemnity, Vermandero expects us.

Lol. I mistrust the madmen most; the fools will do well enough; I have taken pains with them. <sup>66</sup>

Alib. Tush! they cannot miss; the more absurdity, The more commends it, so<sup>1</sup> no rough behaviours Affright the ladies; they're nice<sup>2</sup> things, thou know'st.

Lol. You need not fear, sir; so long as we are there with our commanding pizzlies, they'll be as tame as the ladies themselves. <sup>71</sup>

Alib. I'll see them once more rehearse before they go.

Lol. I was about it, sir: look you to the madmen's morris, and let me alone with the other. There is one or two that I mistrust their<sup>3</sup> fooling; I'll instruct them, and then they shall rehearse the whole measure.

Alib. Do so; I'll see the music prepar'd: but, Lollo,

By the way, how does my wife brook her restraint? <sup>80</sup>

Does she not grudge at it?

Lol. So, so; she takes some pleasure in the house, she would abroad else. You must allow her a little more length, she's kept too short.

Alib. She shall along to Vermandero's with us, <sup>85</sup>

That will serve her for a month's liberty.

Lol. What's that on your face, sir?

Alib. Where, Lollo? I see nothing.

Lol. Cry you mercy,<sup>4</sup> sir, 'tis your nose; it show'd like the trunk of a young elephant. <sup>90</sup>

Alib. Away, rascal! I'll prepare the music, Lollo. Exit.

Lol. Do, sir, and I'll dance the whilst.— Tony, where art thou, Tony?

Enter ANTONIO.

Ant. Here, cousin; where art thou?

Lol. Come, Tony, the footmanship I taught you. <sup>95</sup>

Ant. I had rather ride, cousin.

Lol. Ay, a whip take you! but I'll keep you out; vault in: look you, Tony; fa, la, la, la, la, la. [Dances.]

Ant. Fa, la, la, la, la. [Sings and dances.] <sup>100</sup>

Lol. There, an honour.

Ant. Is this an honour, coz?

Lol. Yes, an it please your worship.

Ant. Does honour bend in the hams, coz?

Lol. Marry does it, as low as worship, [<sup>105</sup> squireship, nay, yeomanry itself sometimes, from whence it first stiffened: there rise, a caper.

Ant. Caper after an honour, coz?

Lol. Very proper, for honour is but a caper, rises as fast and high, has a knee or two, and [110 falls to th' ground again. You can remember your figure, Tony?

Ant. Yes, cousin; when I see thy figure, I can remember mine. Exit LOLLIO.

Re-enter ISABELLA, [dressed as a madwoman.]

Isa. Hey, how he<sup>5</sup> treads the air! Shough, shough, t' other way! he burns his wings else. [115 Here's wax enough below, Icarus, more than will be cancelled these eighteen moons. He's down, he's down! what a terrible fall he had! Stand up, thou son of Cretan Daedalus, And let us tread the lower labyrinth; I'll bring thee to the clue.

Ant. Prithee, coz, let me alone.

Isa. Art thou not drown'd? About thy head I saw a heap of clouds Wrapt like a Turkish turban; on thy back <sup>125</sup> A crookt chameleon-colour'd rainbow hung Like a tiara down unto thy hams. Let me suck out those billows in thy belly; Hark, how they roar and rumble in the straits! <sup>6</sup> Bless thee from the pirates!

Ant. Pox upon you, let me alone!

Isa. Why shouldst thou mount so high as Mercury, Unless thou hadst reversion of his place?

Stay in the moon with me, Endymion, And we will rule these wild rebellious waves, That would have drown'd my love.

Ant. I'll kick thee, if <sup>135</sup> Again thou touch me, thou wild unshapen antic;

I am no fool, you bedlam!

Isa. But you are, as sure as I am, mad. Have I put on this habit of a frantic, <sup>140</sup> With love as full of fury, to beguile The nimble eye of watchful jealousy, And am I thus rewarded?

Ant. Ha! dearest beauty!

Isa. No, I have no beauty now, <sup>144</sup> Nor never had but what was in my garments. You a quick-sighted lover! Come not near me: Keep your carparisons, you're aptly clad; I came a feigner, to return stark mad. Exit.

Ant. Stay, or I shall change condition, And become as you are. <sup>150</sup>

Re-enter LOLLIO.

Lol. Why, Tony, whither now? Why, fool—

Ant. Whose fool, usher of idiots? You coxcomb!

I have fool'd too much.

Lol. You were best be mad another while then.

Ant. So I am, stark mad; I have cause enough;

And I could throw the full effects on thee, And beat thee like a fury.

Lol. Do not, do not; I shall not forbear the

gentleman under the fool, if you do. Alas! I saw through your fox-skin before now! Come, I can give you comfort; my mistress loves [161] you; and there is as arrant a madman i' th' house as you are a fool, your rival, whom she loves not. If after the masque we can rid her of him, you earn her love, she says, and the fool shall ride her. 166

Ant. May I believe thee?

Lol. Yes, or you may choose whether you will or no.

Ant. She's eas'd of him; I've a good quarrel on 't.

Lol. Well, keep your old station yet, and be quiet. 170

Ant. Tell her I will deserve her love.

Lol. And you are like to have your desert. [Exit.]

Enter FRANCISCUS.

Fran. [sings.] "Down, down, down, a-down a-down," — and then with a horse-trick To kick Latona's forehead, and break her bow-string.

Lol. This is t' other counterfeit; I'll put [176] him out of his humour. [Aside. Takes out a letter and reads.] "Sweet lady, having now cast this counterfeit cover of a madman, I appear to your best judgment a true and faithful lover of your beauty." This is pretty well for a madman. 180

Fran. Ha! what's that?

Lol. [reads.] "Chide those perfections in you which have made me imperfect."

Fran. I am discover'd to the fool.

Lol. I hope to discover the fool in you ere [185] I have done with you. [Reads.] "Yours all, or one beside himself, FRANCISCUS." This madman will mend sure.

Fran. What do you read, sirrah?

Lol. Your destiny, sir; you'll be hang'd for this trick, and another that I know. 191

Fran. Art thou of counsel with thy mistress?

Lol. Next her apron-strings.

Fran. Give me thy hand.

Lol. Stay, let me put yours in my pocket first. [Putting letter into his pocket.] Your hand is [196] true, is it not? It will not pick? I partly fear it, because I think it does lie.

Fran. Not in a syllable.

Lol. So if you love my mistress so well as you have handled the matter here, you are like [201] to be cur'd of your madness.

Fran. And none but she can cure it.

Lol. Well, I'll give you over then, and she shall cast your water next. 206

Fran. Take for thy pains past.

[Gives him money.]

Lol. I shall deserve more, sir, I hope. My mistress loves you, but must have some proof of your love to her.

Fran. There I meet my wishes. 210

Lol. That will not serve, you must meet her enemy and yours.

Fran. He's dead already.

Lol. Will you tell me that, and I parted but now with him? 215

1 Honest.

Fran. Show me the man.

Lol. Ay, that's a right course now; see him before you kill him, in any case; and yet it needs not go so far neither. 'Tis but a fool that haunts the house and my mistress in the [220] shape of an idiot; bang but his fool's coat well-favour'dly, and 't is well.

Fran. Soundly, soundly!

Lol. Only reserve him till the masque be past; and if you find him not now in the dance [225] yourself, I'll show you. In, in! my master!

[Dancing.]

Fran. He handles him like a feather. Hey! [Exit.]

Enter ALBIUS.

Alib. Well said: in a readiness, Lollio?

Lol. Yes, sir. 229

Alib. Away then, and guide them in, Lollio: Entreat your mistress to see this sight. Hark, is there not one incurable fool That might be begg'd? I've friends.

Lol. I have him for you, One that shall deserve it too.

Alib. Good boy, Lollio!

The madmen and fools dance.

'T is perfect: well, fit but once these strains, 230
We shall have coin and credit for our pains.

Exeunt.

ACT V

[SCENE I.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter BEATRICE: a clock strikes one.

Beat. One struck, and yet she lies by 't! O my fears!

This strumpet serves her own ends, 't is apparent now,

Devours the pleasure with a greedy appetite, And never minds my honour or my peace, 5

Makes havoc of my right. But she pays dearly for 't;

No trusting of her life with such a secret

That cannot rule her blood to keep her promise;

Beside, I've some suspicion of her faith to me, Because I was suspected of my lord, 10

And it must come from her. [Strikes two.] Hark! by my horrors,

Another clock strikes two!

Enter DE FLORES.

De F. Pist! where are you?

Beat. De Flores?

De F. Ay. Is she not come from him yet?

Beat. As I'm a living soul, not!

De F. Sure the devil Hath sow'd his itch within her. Who would trust 15

A waiting-woman?

Beat. I must trust somebody.

De F. Push! they're termagants; Especially when they fall upon their masters

<sup>2</sup> Whose custody, with the revenues of his estate, might be begged from the king.

And have their ladies' first fruits; they're mad
whelps,
You cannot stave 'em off from game royal:
then

You are so rash<sup>1</sup> and hardy, ask no counsel;
And I could have helpt you to a 'pothecary's
daughter

Would have fall'n off before eleven, and thank[t] you too.

Beat. O me, not yet! this whore forgets herself.

De F. The rascal fares so well: look, you're undone;
The day-star, by this hand! see Phosphorus<sup>2</sup>
plain yonder.

Beat. Advise me now to fall upon some ruin;
There is no counsel safe else.

De F. Peace! I ha' 't now,
For we must force a rising, there's no remedy.

Beat. How? take heed of that.

De F. Tush! be you quiet, or else give over
all.

Beat. Prithce, I ha' done then.

De F. This is my reach: <sup>3</sup> I'll set some part a-fire of Diaphanta's chamber.

Beat. How? Fire, sir? That may endanger the whole house.

De F. You talk of danger when your fame's
on fire?

Beat. That's true; do what thou wilt now.

De F. Push! I aim
At a most rich success strikes all dead sure.
The chimney being a-fire, and some light parcels

Of the least danger in her chamber only,
If Diaphanta should be met by chance then <sup>4</sup>
Far from her lodging, which is now suspicious,
It would be thought her fears and affrights then Drove her to seek for succour; if not seen
Or met at all, as that's the likeliest,
For her own shame she'll hasten towards her lodging;

I will be ready with a piece<sup>4</sup> high-charg'd,
As 't were to cleanse the chimney, there 't is proper now

But she shall be the mark.

Beat. I'm forc'd to love thee now,
'Cause thou provid'st so carefully for my honour.

De F. 'Slid, it concerns the safety of us both,

Our pleasure and continuance.

Beat. One word now,
Prithce; how for the servants?

De F. I'll despatch them,
Some one way, some another in the hurry,
For buckets, hooks, ladders; fear not you,
The deed shall find its time; and I've thought since

Upon a safe conveyance for the body too:
How this fire purifies wit! Watch you your minute.

Beat. Fear keeps my soul upon 't, I cannot stray from 't.

<sup>4</sup> Fire-arm.

Enter ALONZO'S Ghost.

De F. Ha! what art thou that tak'st away
the light
Betwixt that star and me? I dread thee
not. —

'T was but a mist of conscience; all's clear
again. Exit.

Beat. Who's that, De Flores? Bless me, slides by! [Exit Ghost.]

Some ill thing haunts the house; 't has left behind it

A shivering sweat upon me; I'm afraid now.
This night hath been so tedious! O this strumpet!

Had she a thousand lives, he should not leave
her

Till he had destroy'd the last. List! O my terrors! Struck three o'clock.

Three struck by St. Sebastian's!

Within. Fire, fire, fire!

Beat. Already? How rare is that man's speed!

How heartily he serves me! his face loathes
me;

But look upon his care, who would not love
him?

The east is not more beauteous than his service.
Within. Fire, fire, fire!

Re-enter DE FLORES: Servants pass over: bell rings.

De F. Away, despatch! hooks, buckets, ladders! that's well said.<sup>5</sup>

The fire-bell rings; the chimney works, my
charge;

The piece is ready. Exit.

Beat. Here's a man worth loving!

Enter DIAPHANTA.

O you're a jewel!

Dia. Pardon frailty, madam;
In troth, I was so well, I ev'n forgot myself.

Beat. You've made trim work!

Dia. What?

Beat. Hie quickly to your chamber; <sup>6</sup>
Your reward follows you.

Dia. I never made
So sweet a bargain. Exit.

Enter ALSEMERO.

Als. O my dear Joanna,
Alas! art thou risen too? I was coming,
My absolute treasure!

Beat. When I mist you,
I could not choose but follow.

Als. Thou'rt all sweetness: <sup>6</sup>
The fire is not so dangerous.

Beat. Think you so, sir?
Als. I prithce, tremble not; believe me, 't is
not.

Enter VERMANDERO and JASPERINO.

Ver. O bless my house and me!
Als. My lord your father.

<sup>5</sup> Well done.

Re-enter DE FLORES with a gun.

Ver. Knave, whither goes that piece?

De F. To scour the chimney. Exit.

Ver. O, well said, well said!

That fellow 's good on all occasions.

Beat. A wondrous necessary man, my lord.

Ver. He hath a ready wit; he 's worth 'em all, sir;

Dog at a house of fire; I ha' seen him singed ere now. — The piece goes off.

Ha, there he goes!

Beat. 'T is done!

Als. Come, sweet, to bed now; 's Alas! thou wilt get cold.

Beat. Alas! the fear keeps that out! My heart will find no quiet till I hear

How Diaphanta, my poor woman, fares;

It is her chamber, sir, her lodging chamber.

Ver. How should the fire come there? 100

Beat. As good a soul as ever lady countenanc'd, But in her chamber negligent and heavy:

She scapt a mine twice.

Ver. Twice?

Beat. Strangely twice, sir.

Ver. Those sleepy sluts are dangerous in a house,

As they be ne'er so good.

Re-enter DE FLORES.

De F. O poor virginity, 105 Thou hast paid dearly for 't!

Ver. Bless us, what 's that?

De F. A thing you all knew once, Diaphanta 's burnt.

Beat. My woman! O my woman!

De F. Now the flames Are greedy of her; burnt, burnt, burnt to death, sir!

Beat. O my presaging soul!

Als. Not a tear more! 110 I charge you by the last embrace I gave you

In bed, before this rais'd us.

Beat. Now you tie me; Were it my sister, now she gets no more.

Enter Servant.

Ver. How now?

Ser. All danger 's past; you may now take 115 Your rests, my lords; the fire is thoroughly quencht.

Ah, poor gentlewoman, how soon was she stifed!

Beat. De Flores, what is left of her inter, And we as mourners all will follow her.

I will entreat that honour to my servant 120 Ev'n of my lord himself.

Als. Command it, sweetness.

Beat. Which of you spied the fire first?

De F. 'T was I, madam.

Beat. And took such pains in 't too? A double goodness!

'T were well he were rewarded.

Ver. He shall be. —

De Flores, call upon me.

Als. And upon me, sir. 125

Exeunt [all except DE FLORES].

De F. Rewarded? Precious! here 's a trick beyond me.

I see in all bouts, both of sport and wit, Always a woman strives for the last hit.

Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter TOMASO.

Tom. I cannot taste the benefits of life With the same relish I was wont to do. Man I grow weary of, and hold his fellowship A treacherous bloody friendship; and because ' I 'm ignorant in whom my wrath should settle, I must think all men villains, and the next I meet, whos'er he be, the murderer Of my most worthy brother. Ha! what 's he?

De FLORES passes over the stage.

O, the fellow that some call honest De Flores; But methinks honesty was hard bested 10

To come there for a lodging; as if a queen Should make her palace of a pest-house.

I find a contrariety in nature Betwixt that face and me; the least occasion Would give me game upon him; yet he 's so foul 15

One would scarce touch [him] with a sword he lov'd

And made account of; so most deadly venomous,

He would go near to poison any weapon That should draw blood on him; one must resolve Never to use that sword again in fight 20

In way of honest manhood that strikes him; Some river must devour it; 't were not fit

That any man should find it. What, again?

Re-enter DE FLORES.

He walks a' purpose by, sure, to choke me up, T' infect my blood.

De F. My worthy noble lord! 25

Tom. Dost offer to come near and breathe upon me? [Strikes him.]

De F. A blow! [Draws.]

Tom. Yea, are you so prepar'd? I'll rather like a soldier die by th' sword,

Than like a politician by thy poison. [Draws.]

De F. Hold, my lord, as you are honourable!

Tom. All slaves that kill by poison are still cowards. 31

De F. [Aside.] I cannot strike; I see his brother's wounds

Fresh bleeding in his eye, as in a crystal. — I will not question this, I know you 're noble;

I take my injury with thanks given, sir, 35

Like a wise lawyer, and as a favour Will wear it for the worthy hand that gave it. —

[Aside.] Why this from him that yesterday appear'd

So strangely loving to me? O, but instinct is of a subtler strain! 40

Guilt must not walk so near his lodge again; He came near me now. Exit.

Tom. All league with mankind I renounce for ever,

Till I find this murderer; not so much

<sup>1</sup> Another apartment in the Castle.

As common courtesy but I'll lock up; 46
 For in the state of ignorance I live in,
 A brother may salute his brother's murderer,
 And wish good speed to th' villain in a greeting.

Enter VERMANDERO, ALIBIUS, and ISABELLA.

Ver. Noble Piracquo!

Tom. Pray, keep on your way, sir;
 I've nothing to say to you.

Ver. Comforts bless you, sir; 50

Tom. I've forsworn compliment, in troth I have, sir;

As you are merely man, I have not left
 A good wish for you, nor for any here.

Ver. Unless you be so far in love with grief,
 You will not part from 't upon any terms, 65
 We bring that news will make a welcome for us.

Tom. What news can that be?

Ver. Throw no scornful smile

Upon the zeal I bring you, 'tis worth more, sir.
 Two of the chiefest men I kept about; me 59
 I hide not from the law of your just vengeance.

Tom. Ha!

Ver. To give your peace more ample satisfaction,

Thank these discoverers.

Tom. If you bring that calm,
 Name but the manner I shall ask forgiveness in
 For that contemptuous smile [I threw]<sup>1</sup> upon you;
 I'll perfect it with reverence that belongs 66
 Unto a sacred altar. [Kneels.]

Ver. [raising him.] Good sir, rise;

Why, now you overdo as much a' this hand
 As you fell short a' t' other. — Speak, Alibius.

Alib. 'T was my wife's fortune, as she is most lucky 70

At a discovery, to find out lately,
 Within our hospital of fools and madmen,
 Two counterfeiters slipt into these disguises,
 Their names Franciscus and Antonio.

Ver. Both mine, sir, and I ask no favour for
 'em. 75

Alib. Now that which draws suspicion to their habits,

The time of their disguisings agrees justly
 With the day of the murder.

Tom. O blest revelation!

Ver. Nay, more, nay, more, sir — I'll not spare mine own 79

In way of justice — they both feign'd a journey
 To Briamata, and so wrought out<sup>2</sup> their leaves;
 My love was so abus'd<sup>3</sup> in 't.

Tom. Time 's too precious

To run in waste now; you have brought a peace
 The riches of five kingdoms could not purchase.
 Be my most happy conduct; I thirst for 'em: 85
 Like subtle lightning will I wind about 'em,
 And melt their marrow in 'em. Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter ALSEMERO and JASPERINO.

Jas. Your confidence, I'm sure, is now of proof;

The prospect from the garden has show'd
 Enough for deep suspicion.

Als. The black mask

That so continually was worn upon 't
 Condemns the face for ugly ere 't be seen, 5
 Her despite to him, and so seeming bottomless.

Jas. Touch it home then; 'tis not a shallow probe
 Can search this ulcer soundly; I fear you'll find it

Full of corruption. 'T is fit I leave you,
 She meets you opportunely from that walk; 10
 She took the back door at his parting with her.

Exit.

Als. Did my fate wait for this unhappy stroke

At my first sight of woman? She is here.

Enter BEATRICE.

Beat. Alsemero!

Als. How do you?

Beat. How do I?

Alas, sir! how do you? You look not well. 15

Als. You read me well enough; I am not well.

Beat. Not well, sir? Is 't in my power to better you?

Als. Yes.

Beat. Nay, then you're cur'd again.

Als. Pray, resolve<sup>5</sup> me one question, lady. 20

Beat. If I can.

Als. None can so sure: are you honest?

Beat. Ha, ha, ha! that's a broad question,
 my lord.

Als. But that's not a modest answer, my
 lady.

Do you laugh? My doubts are strong upon me.

Beat. 'T is innocence that smiles, and no rough brow 26

Can take away the dimple in her cheek.

Say I should strain a tear to fill the vault,
 Which would you give the better faith to?

Als. 'T were but hypocrisy of a sadder colour,
 But the same stuff; neither your smiles nor
 tears 31

Shall move or flatter me from my belief:

You are a whore!

Beat. What a horrid sound it hath!

It blasts a beauty to deformity;

Upon what face soever that breath falls, 35

It strikes it ugly. O, you have ruin'd

What you can never repair again?

Als. I'll all

Demolish, and seek out truth within you,

If there be any left; let your sweet tongue

Prevent your heart's rifling; there I'll ransack

And tear out my suspicion.

Beat. You may, sir; 41

It is an easy passage; yet, if you please,

Show me the ground whereon you lost your

love;

My spotless virtue may but tread on that

Before I perish.

Als. Unanswerable; 45

A ground you cannot stand on; you fall down

Beneath all grace and goodness when you set

Your ticklish heel on 't. There was a visor
Over that cunning face, and that became you ;
Now Impudence in triumph rides upon 't. 50
How comes this tender reconciliation else
'Twixt you and your despite, your rancorous
loathing,

De Flores? he that your eye was sore at sight of,
He 's now become your arm's supporter, your Lip's saint!

Beat. Is there the cause?

Als. Worse, your lust's devil, 55
Your adultery!

Beat. Would any but yourself say that,
'T would turn him to a villain!

Als. It was witness
By the counsel of your bosom, Diaphanta.

Beat. Is your witness dead then?

Als. 'T is to be fear'd
It was the wages of her knowledge; poor soul,
She liv'd not long after the discovery. 61

Beat. Then hear a story of not much less horror

Than this your false suspicion is beguil'd with;
To your bed's scandal I stand up innocence,
Which even the guilt of one black other deed 65
Will stand for proof of; your love has made me
A cruel murd'ress.

Als. Ha!

Beat. A bloody one;
I have kist poison for it, strokt a serpent;
That thing of hate, worthy in my esteem
Of no better employment, and him most worthy
To be so employ'd, I caus'd to murder 71
That innocent Piracquo, having no Better means than that worst to assure Yourself to me.

Als. O, the place itself e'er since
Has crying been for vengeance! The temple, 75
Where blood and beauty first unlawfully
Fir'd their devotion and quencht the right one;
'T was in my fears at first, 't will have it now:
O, thou art all deform'd!

Beat. Forget not, sir, 79
If for your sake was done. Shall greater dangers
Make the less welcome?

Als. O, thou should'st have gone
A thousand leagues about to have avoided
This dangerous bridge of blood! Here we are lost.

Beat. Remember, I am true unto your bed.

Als. The bed itself 's a charnel, the sheets
shrouds 85

For murdered carcasses. It must ask pause
What I must do in this; meantime you shall
Be my prisoner only: enter my closet;

Exit BEATRICE [into closet].

I'll be your keeper yet. O, in what part
Of this sad story shall I first begin? Ha! 90
This same fellow has put me in. — De Flores!

Enter DE FLORES.

De F. Noble Alsemero!

Als. I can tell you
News, sir; my wife has her commended to you.
De F. That's news indeed, my lord; I think she would

Commend me to the gallows if she could, 95
She ever lov'd me so well; I thank her.

Als. What 's this blood upon your band, De Flores?

De F. Blood! no, sure 't was washt since.
Als. Since when, man?

De F. Since t' other day I got a knock
In a sword-and-dagger school; I think 't is out, Als. Yes, 't is almost out, but 't is perceiv'd
though. 101

I had forgot my message; this it is,
What price goes murder?

De F. How, sir?

Als. I ask you, sir;
My wife's behindhand with you, she tells me,
For a brave bloody blow you gave for her sake
Upon Piracquo.

De F. Upon? 'T was quite through him sure:
Has she confest it?

Als. As sure as death to both of you; 107
And much more than that.

De F. It could not be much more;
'T was but one thing, and that — she is a whore.

Als. It could not choose but follow. O cunning devils! 110

How should blind men know you from fair-fac'd saints?

Beat. [within.] He lies! the villain does belie
me!

De F. Let me go to her, sir.

Als. Nay, you shall to her. —
Peace, crying crocodile, your sounds are heard;
Take your prey to you; — get you into her, sir:

Exit DE FLORES [into closet].

I'll be your pander now; rehearse again 116
Your scene of lust, that you may be perfect

When you shall come to act it to the black audience,

Where howls and gnashings shall be music to you.
Clip<sup>1</sup> your adulteress freely, 't is the pilot 120

Will guide you to the mare mortuum,
Where you shall sink to fathoms bottomless.

Enter VERMANDERO, TOMASO, ALIBIUS, ISA-BELLA, FRANCISCUS, and ANTONIO.

Ver. O Alsemero! I've a wonder for you.

Als. No, sir, 't is I, I have a wonder for you.

Ver. I have suspicion near as proof itself 125
For Piracquo's murder.

Als. Sir, I have proof.

Beyond suspicion of Piracquo's murder.

Ver. Beseech you, hear me; these who have been disguis'd

E'er since the deed was done.

Als. I have two other
That were more close disguis'd than your two could be 130

E'er since the deed was done.

Ver. You'll hear me — these mine own servants —

Als. Hear me — those nearer than your servants

That shall acquit them, and prove them guilt-
less.

Fran. That may be done with easy truth,
sir, 135

Tom. How is my cause bandied through your delays!

<sup>1</sup> Embrace.

'T is urgent in [my] blood and calls for haste.
Give me a brother [or] alive or dead ;
Alive, a wife with him ; if dead, for both
A recompense for murder and adultery. 140
Beat. (within.) O, O, O !
Als. Hark ! 't is coming to you.
De F. (within.) Nay, I 'll along for company.
Beat. (within.) O, O !
Ver. What horrid sounds are these ?
Als. Come forth, you twins
Of mischief !

Re-enter DE FLORES, bringing in BEATRICE [wounded].

De F. Here we are ; if you have any more
To say to us, speak quickly, I shall not 145
Give you the hearing else ; I am so stout yet,
And so, I think, that broken rib of mankind.
Ver. A host of enemies ent'red my citadel
Could not amaze like this : Joanna ! Beatrice !
Joanna !

Beat. O, come not near me, sir, I shall defile
you ! 150
I that was of your blood was taken from you,
For your better health ; look no more upon 't,
But cast it to the ground regardlessly,
Let the common sewer take it from distinction.
Beneath the stars, upon yon meteor 155
[Pointing to DE FLORES.]

Ever hung my fate 'mongst things corruptible ;
I ne'er could pluck it from him ; my loathing
Was prophet to the rest, but ne'er believ'd.
Mine honour fell with him, and now my life. —
Alsemero, I 'm a stranger to your bed ; 160
Your bed was coz'ned on the nuptial night, —
For which your false bride died.

Als. Diaphanta ?
De F. Yes, and the while I coupled with your mate

At barley-break ; now we are left in hell.<sup>1</sup>
Ver. We are all there, it circumscribes us
here. 165
De F. I lov'd this woman in spite of her
heart :

Her love I earn'd out of Piracquo's murder.
Tom. Ha ! my brother's murderer ?
De F. Yes, and her honour's prize
Was my reward ; I thank life for nothing
But that pleasure ; it was so sweet to me, 170
That I have drunk up all, left none behind
For any man to pledge me.

Ver. Horrid villain !
Keep life in him for future tortures.

De F. No !
I can prevent you ; here 's my pen-knife still ;
It is but one thread more [stabbing himself], and now 't is cut. — 175
Make haste, Joanna, by that token to thee,
Canst not forget, so lately put in mind ;
I would not go to leave thee far behind.

Beat. Forgive me, Alsemero, all forgive !
'T is time to die when 't is a shame to live. 180

Dies.
Ver. O, my name 's ent'red now in that record

<sup>1</sup> See III. iii. 181, note.

Where till this fatal hour 't was never read.
Als. Let it be blotted out ; let your heart lose it,

And it can never look you in the face,
Nor tell a tale behind the back of life 185
To your dishonour. Justice hath so right
The guilty hit, that innocence is quit
By proclamation, and may joy again. —
Sir, you are sensible of what truth hath done ;
'T is the best comfort that your grief can find.

Tom. Sir, I am satisfied ; my injuries 191
Lie dead before me ; I can exact no more,
Unless my soul were loose, and could o'ertake
Those black fugitives that are fled from
hence,

To take<sup>2</sup> a second vengeance ; but there are wraths 195
Deeper than mine, 'tis to be fear'd, about
'em.

Als. What an opacous body had that moon
That last chang'd on us ! Here is beauty
chang'd

To ugly whoredom ; here servant-obedience
To a master-sin, imperious murder ; 200
I, a suppos'd husband, chang'd embraces
With wantonness, — but that was paid before. —

Your change is come too, from an ignorant
wrath
To knowing friendship. — Are there any more on 's ? 204

Ant. Yes, sir, I was chang'd too from a little ass as I was to a great fool as I am ; and had like to ha' been chang'd to the gallows, but that you know my innocence<sup>3</sup> always excuses
me.

Fran. I was chang'd from a little wit to be stark mad, 210
Almost for the same purpose.

Isa. Your change is still behind,
But deserve best your transformation :
You are a jealous coxcomb, keep schools of
folly,
And teach your scholars how to break your own
head.

Alib. I see all apparent, wife, and will change now 215
Into a better husband, and ne'er keep
Scholars that shall be wiser than myself.

Als. Sir, you have yet a son's duty living,
Please you, accept it ; let that your sorrow,
As it goes from your eye, go from your heart,
Man and his sorrow at the grave must part. 221

EPILOGUE

Als. All we can do to comfort one another,
To stay a brother's sorrow for a brother,
To dry a child from the kind father's eyes,
Is to no purpose, it rather multiplies : 225
Your only smiles have power to cause re-
live

The dead again, or in their rooms to give Brother a new brother, father a child ;
If these appear, all griefs are reconcil'd.

Exeunt omnes.

ACT I

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

[Enter] WELLBORN [in tattered apparel], TAPWELL, and FROTH.

Well. No house? <sup>2</sup> nor no tobacco?

Tap. Not a suck, sir; Nor the remainder of a single can Left by a drunken porter, all night pall'd <sup>3</sup> too.

Froth. Not the dropping of the tap for your morning's draught, sir.

'Tis verity, I assure you.

Well. Verity, you brach! <sup>4</sup> The devil turn'd precisian! <sup>5</sup> Rogue, what am I?

Tap. Troth, durst I trust you with a looking-glass,

To let you see your trim shape, you would quit me

And take the name yourself.

Well. How, dog! Tap. Even so, sir.

And I must tell you, if you but advance <sup>10</sup> Your Plymouth cloak <sup>6</sup> you shall be soon instructed

There dwells, and within call, if it please your worship,

A potent monarch call'd the constable, That does command a citadel call'd the stocks; Whose guards are certain files of rusty billmen Such as with great dexterity will hale <sup>16</sup>

Your tatter'd, lousy —

Well. Rascal! slave!

Froth. No rage, sir.

Tap. At his own peril. Do not put yourself In too much heat, there being no water near

To quench your thirst; and sure, for other liquor, <sup>20</sup>

As mighty ale, or beer, they are things, I take it,

You must no more remember; not in a dream, sir.

Well. Why, thou unthankful villain, dar'st thou talk thus!

Is not thy house, and all thou hast, my gift?

Tap. I find it not in chalk; and Timothy Tapwell <sup>25</sup>

Does keep no other register.

Well. Am not I he Whose riots fed and cloth'd thee? Wert thou not

Born on my father's land, and proud to be A drudge in his house?

Tap. What I was, sir, it skills <sup>7</sup> not; <sup>28</sup> What you are, is apparent. Now, for a farewell,

Since you talk of father, in my hope it will torment you,

I'll briefly tell your story. Your dead father, My quondam master, was a man of worship, Old Sir John Wellborn, justice of peace and <sup>32</sup>

And stood fair to be custos rotulorum; <sup>9</sup> <sup>35</sup> Bore the whole sway of the shire, kept a great

house,

Reliev'd the poor, and so forth; but he dying, And the twelve hundred a year coming to you,

Late Master Francis, but now forlorn Wellborn —

Well. Slave, stop! or I shall lose myself. Froth. Very hardly; <sup>40</sup>

You cannot out of your way. Tap. But to my story:

You were then a lord of acres, the prime galandant,

And I your under-butler. Note the change now :
You had a merry time of 't ; hawks and hounds ;
With choice of running horses ; mistresses <sup>45</sup>
Of all sorts and all sizes, yet so hot,
As their embraces made your lordship melt ;
Which your uncle, Sir Giles Overreach, observ-

ing,
(Resolving not to lose a drop of 'em.)
On foolish mortgages, statutes, and bonds, <sup>50</sup>
For a while suppli'd your looseness, and then left you.

Well. Some curate hath penn'd this invective, mongrel,

And you have studied it.

Tap. I have not done yet.
Your land gone, and your credit not worth a token,

You grew a common borrower ; no man scap'd
Your paper-pellets,<sup>1</sup> from the gentleman <sup>55</sup>
To the beggars on highways, that sold you switches

In your gallantry.

Well. I shall switch your brains out.
Tap. Where poor Tim Tapwell, with a little stock,

Some forty pounds or so, bought a small cottage ; <sup>60</sup>

Humbled myself to marriage with my Froth
here,

Gave entertainment —

Well. Yes, to whores and canters,<sup>2</sup>
Clubbers by night.

Tap. True, but they brought in profit,
And had a gift to pay for what they call'd for,
And stuck not like your mastership. The poor income <sup>65</sup>

I glean'd from them hath made me in my parish

Thought worthy to be scavenger, and in time
May rise to be overseer of the poor ;
Which if I do, on your petition, Wellborn,
May allow you thirteen-pence a quarter, <sup>70</sup>
And you shall thank my worship.

Well. Thus, you dog-bolt,
And thus — Beats and kicks him.

Tap. [to his wife.] Cry out for help !
Well. Stir, and thou diest !

Your potent prince, the constable, shall not save
you.

Hear me, ungrateful hell-bound ! Did not I Make purses for you ? Then you liek'd my boots, <sup>75</sup>

And thought your holiday cloak too coarse to clean 'em.

'T was I that, when I heard thee swear if ever Thou couldst arrive at forty pounds thou wouldst

Live like an emperor, 't was I that gave it
In ready gold. Deny this, wretch !

Tap. I must, sir ; <sup>80</sup>
For, from the tavern to the taphouse, all,
On forfeiture of their licenses, stand bound

Ne'er to remember who their best guests were,
If they grew poor like you.

Well. They are well rewarded
That beggar themselves to make such cuckolds rich, <sup>85</sup>

Thou viper, thankless viper ! impudent bawd !
But since you have grown forgetful, I will help
Your memory, and tread you into mortar,
Nor leave one bone unbroken.

[Beats him again.]
Oh !

Tap. Ask mercy.

Froth.

Enter ALLWORTH.

Well. 'T will not be granted.
All. Hold — for my sake, hold. <sup>90</sup>

Deny me, Frank ? They are not worth your anger.

Well. For once thou hast redeem'd them from this sceptre ; <sup>2</sup>

But let 'em vanish, creeping on their knees,
And, if they grumble, I revoke my pardon.

Froth. This comes of your prating, husband ;
you presum'd <sup>95</sup>

On your ambling wit, and must use your glib
tongue,

Though you are beaten lame for 't.

Tap. Patience, Froth ;
There's law to cure our bruises.

Well. They go off on their hands and knees.
Sent to your mother ?

All. My lady, Frank, my patroness, my all !
She's such a mourner for my father's death,

And, in her love to him, so favours me, <sup>101</sup>
That I cannot pay too much observance to her.
There are few such stepdames.

Well. 'T is a noble widow,
And keeps her reputation pure, and clear

From the least taint of infamy ; her life, <sup>105</sup>
With the splendour of her actions, leaves no
tongue

To envy or detraction. Prithee tell me,
Has she no suitors ?

All. Even the best of the shire, Frank,
My lord excepted ; such as sue and send,

And send and sue again, but to no purpose ; <sup>110</sup>
Their frequent visits have not gain'd her presence.

Yet she's so far from sullenness and pride,
That I dare undertake you shall meet from her
A liberal entertainment. I can give you
A catalogue of her suitors' names.

Well. Forbear it, <sup>115</sup> While I give you good counsel : I am bound to
it,

Thy father was my friend, and that affection
I bore to him, in right descends to thee ;

Thou art a handsome and a hopeful youth, <sup>118</sup>
Nor will I have the least affront stick on thee,
If I with any danger can prevent it.

All. I thank your noble care ; but, pray you,
in what

Do I run the hazard ?

Well. Art thou not in love ?
Put it not off with wonder.

<sup>2</sup> Whining beggars.

All. In love, at my years !
Well. You think you walk in clouds, but are transparent. <sup>125</sup>
 I have heard all, and the choice that you have made,
 And, with my finger, can point out the north star
 By which the loadstone of your folly's guided ;
 And, to confirm this true, what think you of Fair Margaret, the only child and heir <sup>130</sup>
 Of Cormorant Overreach ? Does it blush and start,
 To hear her only nam'd ? Blush at your want
 Of wit and reason.

All. You are too bitter, sir.
Well. Wounds of this nature are not to be cur'd
 With balms, but corrosives. I must be plain : <sup>135</sup>
 Art thou scarce manumis'd <sup>1</sup> from the porter's lodge <sup>2</sup>

And yet sworn servant to the pantofle, <sup>3</sup>
 And dar'st thou dream of marriage ? I fear
 'T will be concluded for impossible
 That there is now, or e'er shall be hereafter, <sup>140</sup>
 A handsome page or player's boy of fourteen
 But either loves a wench, or drabs love him ;
 Court-waiters not exempted.

All. This is madness.
 Howe'er you have discover'd my intents,
 You know my aims are lawful ; and if ever <sup>145</sup>
 The queen of flowers, the glory of the spring,
 The sweetest comfort to our smell, the rose,
 Sprang from an envious briar, I may infer
 There's such disparity in their conditions <sup>149</sup>
 Between the goodness of my soul, the daughter,
 And the base churl of her father.

Well. Grant this true,
 As I believe it, canst thou ever hope
 To enjoy a quiet bed with her whose father
 Ruin'd thy state ?

All. And yours too.
Well. I confess it ; <sup>154</sup>
 True ; I must tell you as a friend, and freely,
 That, where impossibilities are apparent,
 'T is indiscretion to nourish hopes.

Canst thou imagine (let not self-love blind thee)
 That Sir Giles Overreach, that, to make her great <sup>159</sup>
 In swelling titles, without touch of conscience Will cut his neighbour's throat, and I hope his own too,
 Will e'er consent to make her thine ? Give o'er,
 And think of some course suitable to thy rank,
 And prosper in it.

All. You have well advis'd me. <sup>164</sup>
 But in the meantime you that are so studious
 Of my affairs wholly neglect your own.
 Remember yourself, and in what plight you are.

Well. No matter, no matter.
All. Yes, 't is much material.
 You know my fortune and my means ; yet
 something

I can spare from myself to help your wants.
Well. How's this ? <sup>170</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Freed.<sup>2</sup> Where servants used to be punished.<sup>3</sup> Slipper.

All. Nay, be not angry ; there's eight pieces
 To put you in better fashion.

Well. Money from thee !
 From a boy. A stipendiary ! One that lives
 At the devotion of a stepmother
 And the uncertain favour of a lord ! <sup>175</sup> I'll eat my arms first. Howsoe'er blind Fortune

Hath spent the utmost of her malice on me —
 Though I am vomited out of an alehouse,
 And thus accoutred — know not where to eat,
 Or drink, or sleep, but underneath this can-ope — <sup>180</sup>

Although I thank thee, I despise thy offer ;
 And as I in my madness broke my state
 Without th' assistance of another's brain,
 In my right wits I'll piece it ; at the worst, <sup>184</sup>
 Die thus and be forgotten.

All. A strange humour ! Exeunt.

SCENE II.<sup>5</sup>

[Enter] ORDER, AMBLE, FURNACE, and WATCHALL.

Ord. Set all things right, or, as my name is Order,

And by this staff of office that commands you,
 This chain and double ruff, symbols of power,
 Whoever misses in his function,
 For one whole week makes forfeiture of his breakfast <sup>5</sup>

And privilege in the wine-cellar.

Amb. You are merry,
 Good master steward.

Furn. Let him ; I'll be angry.

Amb. Why, fellow Furnace, 't is not twelve o'clock yet,

Nor dinner taking up ; then, 't is allow'd,
 Cooks, by their places, may be choleric. <sup>10</sup>

Furn. You think you have spoke wisely,
 Goodman Amble,

My lady's go-before !

Ord. Nay, nay, no wrangling.

Furn. Twit me with the authority of the kitchen !

At all hours, and all places, I'll be angry ;
 And thus provok'd, when I am at my prayers <sup>15</sup>
 I will be angry.

Amb. There was no hurt meant.

Furn. I am friends with thee ; and yet I will be angry.

Ord. With whom ?

Furn. No matter whom : yet, now I think on it,

I am angry with my lady.

Watch. Heaven forbid, man !

Ord. What cause has she given thee ?

Furn. Cause enough, master steward. <sup>20</sup>

I was entertain'd by her to please her palate,
 And, till she forswore eating, I perform'd it.

Now, since our master, noble Allworth, died,
 Though I crack my brains to find out tempting sauces,

And raise fortifications in the pastry <sup>25</sup>

Such as might serve for models in the Low Countries,

Which, if they had been practised at Breda, Spinola might have thrown his cap at it, and ne'er took it<sup>1</sup>—

Amb. But you had wanted matter there to work on.

Furn. Matter! with six eggs, and a strike<sup>2</sup> of rye meal,

I had kept the town till doomsday, perhaps longer.

Ord. But what's this to your pet against my lady?

Furn. What's this? Marry this: when I am three parts roasted

And the fourth part parboil'd to prepare her viands,

She keeps her chamber, dines with a panada<sup>3</sup> as Or water-guel, my sweat never thought on.

Ord. But your art is seen in the dining-room. Furn. By whom?

By such as pretend love to her, but come To feed upon her. Yet, of all the harpies

That do devour her, I am out of charity<sup>4</sup> With none so much as the thin-gutted squire

That's stolen into commission.

Ord. Justice Greedy? Furn. The same, the same; meat's cast away upon him,

It never thrives; he holds this paradox, Who eats not well, can ne'er do justice well.

His stomach's as insatiate as the grave, Or strumpet's ravenous appetites. Knocking.

Watch. One knocks.

Enter ALLWORTH.

Ord. Our late young master!

Amb. Welcome, sir.

Furn. Your hand;

If you have a stomach, a cold bake-meat's ready.

Ord. His father's picture in little.

Furn. We are all your servants.

Amb. In you he lives.

All. At once, my thanks to all; This is yet some comfort. Is my lady stirring?

Enter LADY ALLWORTH, Waiting Woman, and Chambermaid.

Ord. Her presence answers for us.

L. All. Sort those silks well.

I'll take the air alone.

Exeunt W. Woman and Chambermaid.

Furn. You air and air;

But will you never taste but spoon-meat more?

To what use serve I?

L. All. Prithee, be not angry;

I shall ere long: i' the mean time, there is gold To buy these aprons, and a summer suit.

Furn. I am appeas'd, and Furnace now grows cool.<sup>4</sup>

L. All. And, as I gave directions, if this morning

I am visited by any, entertain 'em As heretofore; but say, in my excuse, I am indispos'd.

Ord. I shall, madam.

L. All. Do, and leave them.

Nay, stay you, Allworth.

Exeunt ORDER, AMBLE, FURNACE, and WATCHALL.

All. I shall gladly grow here, To wait on your commands.

L. All. So soon turn'd courtier! All. Style not that courtship, madam, which is duty

Purchas'd on your part.

L. All. Well, you shall o'ercome; I'll not contend in words. How is it with Your noble master?

All. Ever like himself, No scruple lessen'd in the full weight of honour.

He did command me, pardon my presumption, As his unworthy deputy, to kiss Your ladyship's fair hands.

L. All. I am honour'd in His favour to me. Does he hold his purpose For the Low Countries?

All. Constantly, good madam; But he will in person first present his service.

L. All. And how approve you of his course? You are yet

Like virgin parchment, capable of any Inscription, vicious or honourable.

I will not force your will, but leave you free To your own election.

All. Any form you please I will put on; but, might I make my choice, With humble emulation I would follow The path my lord marks to me.

L. All. 'Tis well answer'd, And I commend your spirit. You had a father, Blest be his memory! that some few hours Before the will of Heaven took him from me, Who did commend you, by the dearest ties Of perfect love between us, to my charge; And, therefore, what I speak you are bound to hear

With such respect as if he liv'd in me. He was my husband, and howe'er you are not Son of my womb, you may be of my love, Provided you deserve it.

All. I have found you, Most honour'd madam, the best mother to me; And, with my utmost strengths of care and service,

Will labour that you never may repent Your bounties shower'd upon me.

L. All. I much hope it. These were your father's words: "If e'er my son

Follow the war, tell him it is a school Where all the principles tending to honour Are taught, if truly followed: but for such As repair thither as a place in which They do presume they may with license practise Their lusts and riots, they shall never merit

100

The noble name of soldiers, To dare boldly
In a fair cause, and for their country's safety
To run upon the cannon's mouth undaunted;
To obey their leaders, and shun mutinies;
To bear with patience the winter's cold <sup>110</sup>
And summer's scorching heat, and not to faint,
When plenty of provision fails, with hunger;
Are the essential parts make up a soldier,
Not swearing, dice, or drinking.<sup>11</sup>

All. There's no syllable
You speak, but is to me an oracle, <sup>115</sup>
Which but to doubt were impious.

L. All. To conclude:
Beware ill company, for often men

Are like to those with whom they do converse;
And, from one man I warn<sup>1</sup> you, and that's Wellborn:

Not 'cause he's poor, that rather claims your pity; <sup>120</sup>

But that he's in his manners so debauch'd,
And hath to vicious courses sold himself.

'Tis true, your father lov'd him, while he was Worthy the loving; but if he had liv'd
To have seen him as he is, he had cast him off,
As you must do.

All. I shall obey in all things. <sup>125</sup>

L. All. Follow me to my chamber, you shall have gold

To furnish you like my son, and still supplied,
As I hear from you.

All. I am still your creature. Exeunt.

SCENE III.<sup>2</sup>

[Enter] OVERREACH, GREEDY, ORDER, AMBLE, FURNACE, WATCHALL, and MARRALL.

Greedy. Not to be seen!
Over. Still cloistered up! Her reason,

I hope, assures her, though she make herself
Close prisoner ever for her husband's loss,
'T will not recover him.

Ord. Sir, it is her will,
Which we, that are her servants, ought to serve it, <sup>5</sup>

And not dispute. Howe'er, you are nobly welcome;

And, if you please to stay, that you may think
so,

There came, not six days since, from Hull, a pipe

Of rich Canary, which shall spend itself
For my lady's honour.

Greedy. Is it of the right race? <sup>10</sup>

Ord. Yes, Master Greedy.

Amb. How his mouth runs o'er!

Furn. I'll make it run, and run. Save your good worship!

Greedy. Honest Master Cook, thy hand;
again, how I love thee!

Are the good dishes still in being? Speak, boy.

Furn. If you have a mind to feed, there is a chine<sup>3</sup> <sup>15</sup>

Of beef, well seasoned.

Greedy. Good!

Furn. A pheasant, larded,
Greedy. That I might now give thanks for 't!
Furn. Other kickshaws.

Besides, there came last night, from the forest of Sherwood,

The fattest stag I ever cook'd.

Greedy. A stag, man!

Furn. A stag, sir; part of it prepar'd for dinner, <sup>20</sup>

And bak'd in puff-paste.

Greedy. Puff-paste too! Sir Giles,
A ponderous chine of beef! a pheasant larded!

And red deer too, Sir Giles, and bak'd in puffpaste!

All business set aside, let us give thanks here.

Furn. How the lean skeleton's rapt!

Over. You know we cannot. <sup>25</sup>

Mar. Your worships are to sit on a commission,

And if you fail to come, you lose the cause.

Greedy. Cause me no causes. I'll prove 't, for such dinner

We may put off a commission: you shall find it
Henrici decimo quarto.

Over. Fie, Master Greedy! <sup>30</sup>

Will you lose me a thousand pounds for a dinner?

No more, for shame! We must forget the belly
When we think of profit.

Greedy. Well, you shall o'er-rule me;
I could ev'n cry now.—Do you hear, Master

Cook,
Send but a corner of that immortal pasty, <sup>35</sup>

And I, in thankfulness, will, by your boy,

Send you — a brace of three-pences.

Furn. Will you be so prodigal?

Enter WELLBORN.

Over. Remember me to your lady. Who have we here?

Well. You know me.

Over. I did once, but now I will not;
Thou art no blood of mine. Avaunt, thou beggar! <sup>40</sup>

If ever thou presume to own me more,
I'll have thee cag'd and whipp'd.

Greedy. I'll grant the warrant.

Think of, Pie-corner, Furnace!

Exeunt OVERREACH, GREEDY, and MARRALL.

Watch. Will you out, sir?
I wonder how you durst creep in.

Ord. This is rudeness,

And saucy impudence.

Amb. Cannot you stay <sup>45</sup>

To be serv'd, among your fellows, from the basket,<sup>4</sup>

But you must needs press into the hall?

Furn. Prithee, vanish

Into some outhouse, though it be the pigstye;

My scullion shall come to thee.

Enter ALLWORTH.

Well. This is rare.

Oh, here's Tom Allworth. Tom!

<sup>3</sup> Part of the back: ribs or sirloin.

All. We must be strangers; 50
Nor would I have you seen here for a million,

Well. Better and better. He contemns me
too!

Enter Waiting Woman and Chambermaid.

Woman. Foh, what a smell's here! What thing's this?

Cham. A creature
Made out of the privy; let us hence, for love's sake.

Or I shall swoon.

Woman. I begin to feel faint already. 55
Exeunt W. Woman and Chamber-
maid.

Watch. Will you know your way;

Amb. Or shall we teach it you,
By the head and shoulders?

Well. No; I will not stir;
Do you mark, I will not: let me see the wretch
That dares attempt to force me. Why, you slaves,

Created only to make legs,<sup>1</sup> and cringe; 60
To carry in a dish, and shift a trencher;
That have not souls only to hope a blessing Beyond black-jacks<sup>2</sup> or flagons; you, that were born

Only to consume meat and drink, and batten<sup>3</sup>
Upon reversions!—who advances? Who 65
Shews me the way?

Ord. My lady!

Enter LADY ALLWORTH, Waiting Woman, and Chambermaid.

Cham. Here's the monster.

Woman. Sweet madam, keep your glove to your nose.

Cham. Or let me
Fetch some perfumes may be predominant;
You wrong yourself else.

Well. Madam, my designs
Bear me to you.

L. All. To me!

Well. And though I have met with 70
But ragged entertainment from your grooms
here,

I hope from you to receive that noble usage
As may become the true friend of your husband,

And then I shall forget these.

L. All. I am amaz'd
To see and hear this rudeness. Dar'st thou
think, 75

Though sworn, that it can ever find belief,
That I, who to the best men of this country
Deni'd my presence since my husband's death,
Can fall so low as to change words with
thee?

Thou son of infamy, forbear my house, 80
And know and keep the distance that's between us;

Or, though it be against my gentler temper,
I shall take order you no more shall be
An eyesore to me.

Well. Scorn me not, good lady;
But, as in form you are angelical, 85

Imitate the heavenly natures, and vouchsafe
At the least awhile to hear me. You will grant
The blood that runs in this arm is as noble
As that which fills your veins; those costly
jewels,

And those rich clothes you wear, your men's observance 90

And women's flattery, are in you no virtues,
Nor these rags, with my poverty, in me vices.
You have a fair fame, and, I know, deserve it;
Yet, lady, I must say, in nothing more
Than in the pious sorrow you have shewn 95
For your late noble husband.

Ord. How she starts!
Furn. And hardly can keep finger from the eye,

To hear him nam'd.

L. All. Have you aught else to say?

Well. That husband, madam, was once in his fortune 99

Almost as low as I; want, debts, and quarrels
Lay heavy on him: let it not be thought
A boast in me, though I say I reliev'd him.

'Twas I that gave him fashion; mine the sword

That did on all occasions second his;
I brought him on and off with honour, lady; 105
And when in all men's judgments he was sunk,

And, in his own hopes, not to be buoy'd<sup>4</sup> up,
I stepp'd unto him, took him by the hand,
And set him upright.

Furn. Are not we base rogues,
That could forget this?

Well. I confess, you made him 110
Master of your estate; nor could your friends,
Though he brought no wealth with him, blame
you for 't;

For he had a shape, and to that shape a mind
Made up of all parts either great or noble;
So winning a behaviour, not to be 115
Resisted, madam.

L. All. 'Tis most true, he had.

Well. For his sake, then, in that I was his friend,

Do not contemn me.

L. All. For what's past excuse me,
I will redeem it. Order, give the gentleman
A hundred pounds,

Well. No, madam, on no terms: 120
I will nor beg nor borrow sixpence of you,
But be suppli'd elsewhere, or want thus ever.
Only one suit I make, which you deny not
To strangers; and 'tis this. Whispers to her.

L. All. Fie! nothing else?

Well. Nothing, unless you please to charge
your servants 125

To throw away a little respect upon me.

L. All. What you demand is yours.

Well. I thank you, lady.

Now what can be wrought out of such a suit
Is yet in supposition: I have said all;
When you please, you may retire,—

[Exit LADY ALL.]

<sup>2</sup> Leather beer cans.

<sup>4</sup> Q. bung'd

Nay, all's forgotten; [To the Servants.]
 And, for a lucky omen to my project, <sup>131</sup>
 Shake hands, and end all quarrels in the cellar.
Ord. Agreed, agreed.
Furn. Still merry Master Wellborn.
Exeunt.

ACT II

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter OVERREACH and MARRALL.

Over. He's gone, I warrant thee; this commission crush'd him.

Mar. Your workshops have the way on 't, and ne'er miss

To squeeze these unthrifths into air; and yet, The chapfallen <sup>2</sup> justice did his part, returning For your advantage the certificate, <sup>6</sup> Against his conscience, and his knowledge too, With your good favour, to the utter ruin Of the poor farmer.

Over. 'T was for these good ends I made him a justice; he that bribes his belly, Is certain to command his soul.

Mar. I wonder, <sup>10</sup> Still with your license, why your worship having

The power to put his thin-gut in commission, You are not in 't yourself?

Over. Thou art a fool; In being out of office I am out of danger; Where, if I were a justice, besides the trouble, I might, or out of wilfulness or error, <sup>18</sup> Run myself finely into a premunire,<sup>3</sup> And so become a prey to the informer.

No, I'll have none of 't; 't is enough I keep Greedy at my devotion; so he serve <sup>20</sup> My purposes, let him hang or damn, I care not; Friendship is but a word.

Mar. You are all wisdom. Over. I would be worldly wise; for the other wisdom,

That does prescribe us a well govern'd life, And to do right to others as ourselves, <sup>25</sup> I value not an atom.

Mar. What course take you, With your good patience, to hedge in the manor Of your neighbour, Master Frugal? as 't is said He will nor sell, nor borrow, nor exchange; And his land, lying in the midst of your many lordships, <sup>30</sup> Is a foul blemish.

Over. I have thought on 't, Marrall, And it shall take. I must have all men sellers, And I the only purchaser.

Mar. 'T is most fit, sir. Over. I'll therefore buy some cottage near his manor, Which done, I'll make my men break ope his fences, <sup>35</sup>

Ride o'er his standing corn, and in the night Set fire on his barns, or break his cattle's legs.

<sup>3</sup> A writ issued for the offence of acknowledging foreign authority within the realm, or some offence with the same penalties.

These trespasses draw on suits and suits expenses,

Which I can spare, but will soon beggar him. When I have harried him thus two or three year, <sup>40</sup>

Though he sue in forma pauperis, in spite Of all his thrift and care, he'll grow behindhand.

Mar. The best I ever heard! I could adore you.

Over. Then, with the favour of my man of law,

I will pretend some title. Want will force him To put it to arbitrement; then, if he sell <sup>45</sup> For half the value, he shall have ready money, And I possess his land.

Mar. 'T is above wonder! Wellborn was apt to sell, and needed not Those fine arts, sir, to hook him in.

Over. Well thought on. <sup>50</sup> This varlet, Marrall, lives too long, to upbraid me

With my close cheat upon him. Will nor cold Nor hunger kill him?

Mar. I know not what to think on 't. I have us'd all means; and the last night I caus'd <sup>55</sup>

His host, the tapster, to turn him out of doors; And have been since with all your friends and tenants,

And, on the forfeit of your favour, charg'd them,

Though a crust of mouldy bread would keep him from starving,

Yet they should not relieve him. This is done, sir,

Over. That was something, Marrall; but thou must go further, <sup>60</sup> And suddenly, Marrall.

Mar. Where, and when you please, sir.

Over. I would have thee seek him out, and, if thou canst,

Persuade him that 't is better steal than beg; Then, if I prove he has but robb'd a henroost,

Not all the world shall save him from the gal-lows. <sup>65</sup>

Do any thing to work him to despair; And 't is thy masterpiece.

Mar. I will do my best, sir.

Over. I am now on my main work with the Lord Lovell,

The gallant-minded, popular Lord Lovell, The minion of the people's love. I hear <sup>70</sup>

He's come into the country, and my aims are To insinuate myself into his knowledge, And then invite him to my house.

Mar. I have you; This points at my young mistress.

Over. She must part with That humble title, and write knowable, Right honourable, Marrall, my right honourable daughter, <sup>75</sup>

If all I have, or e'er shall get, will do it. I'll have her well attended; there are ladies

Of errant knights decay'd and brought so low,

That for cast clothes and meat will gladly serve her. <sup>80</sup>

And 'tis my glory, though I come from the city,
To have their issue whom I have undone,
To kneel to mine as bondslaves.

Mar. 'Tis fit state, sir.

Over. And therefore, I'll not have a chambermaid

That ties her shoes, or any meaner office,<sup>85</sup>
But such whose fathers were right worshipful.
'Tis a rich man's pride! there having ever been
More than a feud, a strange antipathy,
Between us and true gentry.

Enter WELLBORN.

Mar. See, who's here, sir.

Over. Hence, monster! prodigy!

Well. Sir, your wife's nephew;<sup>90</sup>
She and my father tumbled in one belly.

Over. Avoid my sight! thy breath's infectious, rogue!

I shun thee as a leprosy, or the plague.

Come hither, Marral—[aside] this is the time to work him. Exit.

Mar. I warrant you, sir,

Well. By this light I think he's mad.<sup>95</sup>

Mar. Mad! had you ta'en compassion on yourself,

You long since had been mad.

Well. You have ta'en a course,
Between you and my venerable uncle,

To make me so.

Mar. The more pale-spirited you.

That would not be instructed. I swear deeply—<sup>100</sup>

Well. By what?

Mar. By my religion.

Well. Thy religion!
The devil's creed:—but what would you have
done?

Mar. Had there been but one tree in all the shire,

Nor any hope to compass a penny halter,
Before, like you, I had outliv'd my fortunes,<sup>105</sup>
A withe had serv'd my turn to hang myself.

I am zealous in your cause; pray you hang
yourself,

And presently,<sup>1</sup> as you love your credit,

Well. I thank you.

Mar. Will you stay till you die in a ditch, or lice devour you?—

Or, if you dare not do the feat yourself,<sup>110</sup>

But that you'll put the state to charge and trouble,

Is there no purse to be cut, house to be broken,
Or market-woman with eggs, that you may murder,

And so dispatch the business?

Well. Here's variety,
I must confess; but I'll accept of none<sup>115</sup>

Of all your gentle offers, I assure you.

Mar. Why, have you hope ever to eat again,
Or drink? or be the master of three farthings?

If you like not hanging, drown yourself! Take some course

For your reputation.

Well. 'T will not do, dear tempter,<sup>120</sup>

With all the rhetoric the fiend hath taught you.
I am as far as thou art from despair;

Nay, I have confidence, which is more than hope,

To live, and suddenly, better than ever.

Mar. Ha! ha! these castles you build in the air<sup>125</sup>

Will not persuade me to give or lend

A token to you.

Well. I'll be more kind to thee:

Come, thou shalt dine with me.

Mar. With you!

Well. Nay more, dine gratis.

Mar. Under what hedge, I pray you? or at whose cost?

Are they padders<sup>2</sup> or abram-men<sup>3</sup> that are your consorts?<sup>130</sup>

Well. Thou art incredulous; but thou shalt dine

Not alone at her house, but with a gallant lady;

With me, and with a lady.

Mar. Lady! what lady?

With the Lady of the Lake, or Queen of Fairies?

For I know it must be an enchanted dinner.<sup>135</sup>

Well. With the Lady Allworth, knave.

Mar. Nay, now there's hope

Thy brain is crack'd.

Well. Mark there, with what respect
I am entertain'd.

Mar. With choice, no doubt, of dog-whips.

Why, dost thou ever hope to pass her porter?
Well. 'Tis not far off, go with me; trust thine own eyes.<sup>140</sup>

Mar. Troth, in my hope, or my assurance rather,

To see thee curvet<sup>4</sup> and mount like a dog in a blanket,

If ever thou presume to pass her threshold,

I will endure thy company.

Well. Come along then. Exeunt.

SCENE II.<sup>5</sup>

[Enter] ALLWORTH, Waiting Woman, Cham-bermaid, ORDER, AMBLE, FURNACE, and WATCHALL.

Woman. Could you not command your leisure one hour longer?

Cham. Or half an hour?

All. I have told you what my haste is:

Besides, being now another's, not mine own,
How'er I much desire to enjoy you longer,

My duty suffers, if, to please myself,<sup>5</sup>
I should neglect my lord.

Woman. Pray you do me the favour
To put these few quince-cakes into your pocket;

They are of mine own preserving.

Cham. And this manmalade;

'Tis comfortable for your stomach.

Woman. And, at parting,

Excuse me if I beg a farewell from you.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Beggars pretending lunacy.

<sup>4</sup> Bound. The reference is to the game of tossing in a blanket.

<sup>1</sup> At once.

Cham. You are still before me. I move the same suit, sir.

[ALLWORTH] kisses them severally.

Furn. How greedy these chamberers are of a heedless chin!

I think the tits<sup>1</sup> will ravish him.

All. My service
To both.

Woman. Ours waits on you.

Cham. And shall do ever.

Ord. You are my lady's charge, be therefore careful <sup>15</sup>

That you sustain your parts.

Woman. We can bear, I warrant you.

Exeunt W. Woman and Chambermaid.

Furn. Here, drink it off; the ingredients are cordial,

And this the true elixir; it hath boil'd since midnight for you. 'T is the quintessence of five cocks of the game, ten dozen of sparrows, <sup>20</sup>

Knuckles of veal, potato-roots and marrow, Coral and ambergris. Were you two years older,

And I had a wife, or gamesome mistress, I durst trust you with neither. You need not bait

After this, I warrant you, though your journey's long; <sup>25</sup>

You may ride on the strength of this till tomorrow morning.

All. Your courtesies overwhelm me: I much grieve

To part from such true friends; and yet find comfort,

My attendance on my honourable lord, Whose resolution holds to visit my lady, <sup>30</sup>
Will speedily bring me back.

Knocking at the gate.

Mar. (within.) Dar'st thou venture further?

Well. (within.) Yes, yes, and knock again.

Ord. 'T is he; disperse!

Amb. Perform it bravely.

Furn. I know my cue, ne'er doubt me.

Exeunt [all but ALLWORTH].

[Enter WATCHALL, ceremoniously introducing WELBORN and MARRALL.]

Watch. Beast that I was, to make you stay! Most welcome; <sup>35</sup>

You were long since expected.

Well. Say so much

To my friend, I pray you.

Watch. For your sake, I will, sir.

Mar. For his sake!

Well. Mum; this is nothing.

Mar. More than ever

I would have believ'd, though I had found it in my primer.

All. When I have given your reasons for my late harshness,

You 'll pardon and excuse me; for, believe me, <sup>40</sup>

Though now I part abruptly, in my service I will deserve it.

<sup>1</sup> Wenches.

Mar. Service! with a vengeance!

Well. I am satisfied: farewell, Tom.

All. All joy stay with you! Exit.

Re-enter AMBLE.

Amb. You are happily encounter'd; I yet never

Presented one so welcome as I know <sup>45</sup>
You will be to my lady.

Mar. This is some vision,
Or, sure, these men are mad, to worship a dunghill;

It cannot be a truth.

Well. Be still a pagan,
An unbelieving infidel; be so, miscreant,
And meditate on "blankets, and on dog-whips!" <sup>50</sup>

Re-enter FURNACE.

Furn. I am glad you are come; until I know your pleasure

I knew not how to serve up my lady's dinner.

Mar. His pleasure! is it possible?

Well. What's thy will?

Furn. Marry, sir, I have some grouse, and turkey chicken,
Some rails<sup>2</sup> and quails, and my lady will'd me ask you, <sup>55</sup>

What kind of sauces best affect your palate, That I may use my utmost skill to please it.

Mar. [Aside.] The devil's enter'd this cook. Sauce for his palate!

That, on my knowledge, for almost this twelvemonth,
Durst wish but cheese-parings and brown bread on Sundays. <sup>60</sup>

Well. That way I like 'em best.

Furn. It shall be done, sir. Exit.

Well. What think you of "the hedge we shall dine under?"
Shall we feed gratis?

Mar. I know not what to think;
Pray you make me not mad.

Re-enter ORDER.

Ord. This place becomes you not; 't
Pray you walk, sir, to the dining room.

Well. I am well here,
Till her ladyship quits her chamber.

Mar. Well here, say you?
'T is a rare change! But yesterday you thought Yourself well in a barn, wrapp'd up in peastraw.

Re-enter Waiting Woman and Chambermaid.

Woman. O! sir, you are wish'd for.

Cham. My lady dreamt, sir, of you.

Woman. And the first command she gave, after she rose, <sup>70</sup>

Was (her devotions done) to give her notice When you approach'd here.

Cham. Which is done, on my virtue.

Mar. I shall be converted; I begin to grow Into a new belief, which saints nor angels <sup>75</sup>

Could have won me to have faith in.

Woman. Sir, my lady!

<sup>2</sup> Marsh birds.

Enter LADY ALLWORTH.

L. All. I come to meet you, and languish'd till I saw you.

This first kiss is for form ; I allow a second
To such a friend. [Kisses WELLBORN.]

Mar. To such a friend ! Heaven bless me !

Well. I am wholly yours ; yet, madam, if you
please

To grace this gentleman with a salute — 80

Mar. Salute me at his bidding !

Well. I shall receive it
As a most high favour.

L. All. Sir, you may command me.

[Advances to kiss MARRALL, who retires.]

Well. Run backward from a lady ! and such a lady !

Mar. To kiss her foot is, to poor me, a favour
I am unworthy of. Offers to kiss her foot.

L. All. Nay, pray you rise ; 85

And since you are so humble, I'll exalt you.
You shall dine with me to-day, at mine own table.

Mar. Your ladyship's table ! I am not good enough

To sit at your steward's board.

L. All. You are too modest ;
I will not be deni'd.

Re-enter FURNACE.

Furn. Will you still be babbling 90
Till your meat freeze on the table ? The old trick still ;

My art ne'er thought on !

L. All. Your arm, Master Wellborn : —
Nay, keep us company. [To MARRALL.]

Mar. I was ne'er so grac'd.

Exeunt WELLBORN, LADY ALL-WORTH, AMBLE, MARRALL, W.
Woman, [and Chambermaid.]

Ord. So ! we have play'd our parts, and are come off well ;

But if I know the mystery, why my lady
Consented to it, or why Master Wellborn 95
Desir'd it, may I perish !

Furn. Would I had

The roasting of his heart that cheated him,
And forces the poor gentleman to these shifts !
By fire ! for cooks are Persians, and swear by
it, 100

Of all the griping and extorting tyrants
I ever heard or read of, I ne'er met
A match to Sir Giles Overreach.

Watch. What will you take
To tell him so, fellow Furnace ?

Furn. Just as much
As my throat is worth, for that would be the price on 't. 105

To have a usurer that starves himself,
And wears a cloak of one and twenty years
On a suit of fourteen groats, bought of the hangman,

To grow rich, and then purchase, is too common ;

But this Sir Giles feeds high, keeps many servants, 110

Who must at his command do any outrage ;

Rich in his habit, vast in his expenses ;
Yet he to admiration <sup>1</sup> still increases
In wealth and lordships.

Ord. He frights men out of their estates,
And breaks through all law-nets, made to curb ill men, 115

As they were cobwebs. No man dares reprove
him.

Such a spirit to dare and power to do were never

Lodg'd so unluckily.

Re-enter AMBLE [laughing].

Amb. Ha ! ha ! I shall burst.

Ord. Contain thyself, man.

Furn. Or make us partakers

Of your sudden mirth.

Amb. Ha ! ha ! my lady has got 120

Such a guest at her table ! — this term-driver,
Marrall,

This snip of an attorney —

Furn. What of him, man ?

Amb. The knave thinks still he's at the cook's shop in Ram Alley, <sup>2</sup>

Where the clerks divide, and the elder is to choose ;

And feeds so slovenly !

Furn. Is this all ?

Amb. My lady 125

Drank to him for fashion sake, or to please
Master Wellborn ;

As I live, he rises, and takes up a dish

In which there were some remnants of a boil'd
capon,

And pledges her in white broth !

Furn. Nay, 't is like

The rest of his tribe.

Amb. And when I brought him wine, 130
He leaves his stool, and, after a leg or two,
Most humbly thanks my worship.

Ord. Risen already !

Amb. I shall be chid.

Re-enter LADY ALLWORTH, WELLBORN, and MARRALL.

Furn. My lady frowns.

L. All. You wait well ! [To AMBLE.]

Let me have no more of this : I observ'd your jeering.

Sirrah, I'll have you know, whom I think worthy 135

To sit at my table, be he ne'er so mean,

When I am present, is not your companion.

Ord. Nay, she'll preserve what's due to her.

Furn. This refreshing

Follows your flux of laughter.

L. All. [to WELLBORN.] You are master
Of your own will. I know so much of manners,

As not to inquire your purposes ; in a word, 141
To me you are ever welcome, as to a house

That is your own.

Well. [Aside to MARRALL.] Mark that.

Mar. With reverence, sir,
An it like your worship.

Well. Trouble yourself no further,
Dear madam; my heart's full of zeal and service, 145

However in my language I am sparing.
Come, Master Marrall.

Mar. I attend your worship.
Exeunt WELLBORN and MARRALL.

L. All. I see in your looks you are sorry, and you know me

An easy mistress. Be merry; I have forgot all.
Order and Furnace, come with me; I must give you 150

Further directions.

Ord. What you please,
Furn. We are ready. Exeunt.

SCENE III.<sup>1</sup>

[Enter] WELLBORN, and MARRALL [bare-headed].

Well. I think I am in a good way.

Mar. Good! Sir, the best way,
The certain best way.

Well. There are casualties
That men are subject to.

Mar. You are above 'em;
And as you are already worshipful,
I hope ere long you will increase in worship, 6
And be right worshipful.

Well. Prithce do not flout me:
What I shall be, I shall be. Is't for your ease,
You keep your hat off?

Mar. Ease! an it like your worship!
I hope Jack Marrall shall not live so long,
To prove himself such an unmannerly beast, 10
Though it hail hazel-nuts, as to be cover'd
When your worship's present.

Well. (Aside.) Is not this a true rogue,
That, out of mere hope of a future coz'nage,<sup>2</sup>
Can turn thus suddenly? 'T is rank already.

Mar. I know your worship's wise, and needs
no counsel, 16
Yet if, in my desire to do you service,
I humbly offer my advice, (but still Under correction,) I hope I shall not Incur your high displeasure.

Well. No; speak freely.
Mar. Then, in my judgment, sir, my simple judgment, 20

(Still with your worship's favour,) I could wish
you

A better habit, for this cannot be
But much distasteful to the noble lady
(I say no more) that loves you; for, this morning,

To me, and I am but a swine to her, 25
Before th' assurance of her wealth perfum'd
you,

You savour'd not of amber.<sup>3</sup>
Well. I do now then!

Mar. This your baton hath got a touch of it.— Kisses the end of his cudgel.

Yet, if you please, for change, I have twenty pounds here,

<sup>3</sup> Ambergris, a fashionable perfume.

Which, out of my true love, I'll presently 30
Lay down at your worship's feet; 't will serve to buy you

A riding suit.

Well. But where's the horse?

Mar. My gelding
Is at your service; nay, you shall ride me,
Before your worship shall be put to the trouble
To walk afoot. Alas, when you are lord 35
Of this lady's manor, as I know you will be,
You may with the lease of glebe land, called Knave's-acre,

A place I would manure,<sup>4</sup> requite your vassal.

Well. I thank thy love, but must make no use of it;

What's twenty pounds?

Mar. 'T is all that I can make, sir. 40

Well. Dost thou think, though I want clothes, I could not have 'em,
For one word to my lady?

Mar. As I know not that!

Well. Come, I will tell thee a secret, and so leave thee.

I will not give her the advantage, though she
be

A gallant-minded lady, after we are married, 45
(There being no woman but is sometimes fro-ward,)

To hit me in the teeth, and say, she was forc'd
To buy my wedding-clothes, and took me on
With a plain riding-suit, and an ambling nag.

No, I'll be furnish'd something like myself, 50
And so farewell: for thy suit touching Knave'sacre,

When it is mine, 't is thine.

Mar. I thank your worship. Exit WELL.
How was I cozen'd<sup>5</sup> in the calculation

Of this man's fortune! My master cozen'd too,
Whose pupil I am in the art of undoing men; 55
For that is our profession! Well, well, Master
Wellborn,

You are of a sweet nature, and fit again to be cheated:

Which, if the Fates please, when you are possess'd

Of the land and lady, you, sans question, shall
be.

I'll presently think of the means.

Walks by, musing.

Enter OVERREACH, [speaking to a Servant within.]

Over. Sirrah, take my horse. 60
I'll walk to get me an appetite; 't is but a mile,
And exercise will keep me from being pury.<sup>6</sup>

Ha! Marrall! Is he conjuring? Perhaps

The knave has wrought the prodigal to do
Some outrage on himself, and now he feels 65
Compunction in his conscience for't: no matter,
So it be done. Marrall!

Mar. Sir.

Over. How succeed we
In our plot on Wellborn?

Mar. Never better, sir.
Over. Has he hang'd or drown'd himself?

<sup>4</sup> Cultivate. <sup>5</sup> Cheated. <sup>6</sup> Fat and short winded.

Mar. No, sir, he lives ;
Lives once more to be made a prey to you, <sup>70</sup>
A greater prey than ever.

Over. Art thou in thy wits ?
If thou art, reveal this miracle, and briefly.

Mar. A lady, sir, is fall'n in love with him.

Over. With him? What lady?

Mar. The rich Lady Allworth.

Over. Thou dolt! how dar'st thou speak this?

Mar. I speak truth; <sup>75</sup>

And I do so but once a year, unless
It be to you, sir. We din'd with her ladyship,
I thank his worship.

Over. His worship!

Mar. As I live, sir,
I din'd with him, at the great lady's table, Simple as I stand here; and saw when she kiss'd him, <sup>80</sup>

And would, at his request, have kiss'd me too:
But I was not so audacious as some youths are,
That dare do anything, be it ne'er so absurd,
And sad after performance.

Over. Why, thou rascal!

To tell me these impossibilities. <sup>85</sup>

Dine at her table! and kiss him! or thee! —

Impudent varlet, have not I myself,
To whom great countesses' doors have oft flew open,

Ten times attempted, since her husband's
death,

In vain, to see her, though I came — a suitor?

And yet your good solicitorship, and rogue
Wellborn, <sup>91</sup>

Were brought into her presence, feasted with
her! —

But that I know thee a dog that cannot blush,
This most incredible lie would call up one
On thy buttermilk cheeks.

Mar. Shall I not trust my eyes, sir, <sup>95</sup>
Or taste? I feel her good cheer in my belly.

Over. You shall feel me, if you give not over,
sirrah:

Recover your brains again, and be no more gull'd

With a beggar's plot, assisted by the aids
Of serving-men and chambermaids, for beyond these <sup>100</sup>

Thou never saw'st a woman, or I'll quit you
From my employments.

Mar. Will you credit this yet?
On my confidence of their marriage, I offer'd

Wellborn —

(Aside.) I would give a crown now I durst say
"his worship" —

My nag and twenty pounds.

Over. Did you so, idiot! (Strikes him down.)
Was this the way to work him to despair, <sup>105</sup>

Or rather to cross me?

Mar. Will your worship kill me?

Over. No, no; but drive the lying spirit out of you.

Mar. He's gone.

Over. I have done then: now, forgetting
Your late imaginary feast and lady, <sup>110</sup> Know, my Lord Lovell dines with me to-morrow.

Be careful nought be wanting to receive him;

And bid my daughter's women trim her up,
Though they paint her, so she catch the lord,
I'll thank them.

There's a piece for my late blows.

Mar. (Aside.) I must yet suffer: <sup>115</sup>
But there may be a time —

Over. Do you grumble?
Mar. No, sir. [Exeunt.]

ACT III

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

[Enter LORD] LOVELL, ALLWORTH, and Servants.

Lov. Walk the horses down the hill: something in private

I must impart to Allworth. Exeunt Servants.

All. O, my lord,
What a sacrifice of reverence, duty, watching,
Although I could put off the use of sleep,
And ever wait on your commands to serve

'em; <sup>5</sup>

What dangers, though in ne'er so horrid shapes,
Nay death itself, though I should run to meet

it,
Can I, and with a thankful willingness, suffer!

But still the retribution will fall short
Of your bounties shower'd upon me.

Lov. Loving youth, <sup>10</sup>

Till what I purpose be put into act,
Do not o'erprize it; since you have trusted me

With your soul's nearest, nay, her dearest
secret,

Rest confident 't is in a cabinet lock'd
Treachery shall never open. I have found you <sup>15</sup>

(For so much to your face I must profess, Howe'er you guard your modesty with a blush

for 't)
More zealous in your love and service to me
Than I have been in my rewards.

All. Still great ones,
Above my merit.

Lov. Such your gratitude calls 'em; <sup>20</sup>
Nor am I of that harsh and rugged temper

As some great men are tax'd <sup>2</sup> with, who imagine
They part from the respect due to their honours

If they use not all such as follow 'em, <sup>25</sup>
Without distinction of their births, like slaves.

I am not so condition'd; I can make
A fitting difference between my footboy

And a gentleman by want compell'd to serve
me.

All. 'T is thankfully acknowledg'd: you have been

More like a father to me than a master. <sup>30</sup>
Pray you, pardon the comparison.

Lov. I allow it:
And, to give you assurance I am pleas'd in 't,

My carriage and demeanour to your mistress,
Fair Margaret, shall truly witness for me

I can command my passions.

All. 'T is a conquest <sup>35</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The country near Overreach's house. <sup>2</sup> Charged.

Few lords can boast of when they are tempted
— Oh!

Lov. Why do you sigh? Can you be doubtful of me?

By that fair name I in the wars have purchas'd,

And all my actions, hitherto untainted,
I will not be more true to mine own honour 40
Than to my Allworth!

All. As you are the brave Lord Lovell,
Your bare word only given is an assurance
Of more validity and weight to me

Than all the oaths, bound up with imprecations,

Which, when they would deceive, most courtiers practise; 45

Yet being a man, (for, sure, to style you more
Would relish of gross flattery,) I am forc'd,
Against my confidence of your worth and virtues,

To doubt, nay, more, to fear.

Lov. So young, and jealous!

All. Were you to encounter with a single foe,
The victory were certain; but to stand 51

The charge of two such potent enemies,
At once assaulting you, as wealth and beauty,
And those too seconded with power, is odds
Too great for Hercules.

Lov. Speak your doubts and fears, 55
Since you will nourish 'em, in plainer language,

That I may understand them.

All. What's your will,
Though I lend arms against myself, (provided
They may advantage you,) must be obeyed.
My much-lov'd lord, were Margaret only fair, 60
The cannon of her more than earthly form,
Though mounted high, commanding all beneath it,

And ramm'd with bullets of her sparkling eyes,

Of all the bulwarks that defend your senses
Could batter none, but that which guards your sight. 65

But when the well-tun'd accents of her tongue
Make music to you, and with numerous<sup>1</sup> sounds Assault your hearing, (such as if Ulysses
Now liv'd again, howe'er he stood the Syrens,
Could not resist,) the combat must grow doubtful 70

Between your reason and rebellious passions.
Add this too; when you feel her touch, and breath

Like a soft western wind when it glides o'er
Arabia, creating gums and spices;

And, in the van, the nectar of her lips, 75
Which you must taste, bring the battalia on,
Well arm'd, and strongly lin'd<sup>2</sup> with her discourse,

And knowing manners, to give entertainment;—

Hippolytus himself would leave Diana,
To follow such a Venus.

Lov. Love hath made you 80
Poetical, Allworth.

All. Grant all these beat off,
Which if it be in man to do, you'll do it,
Mammon, in Sir Giles Overreach, steps in
With heaps of ill-got gold, and so much land,
To make her more remarkable, as would tire 85
A falcon's wings in one day to fly over.
O my good lord! these powerful aids, which
would

Make a mis-shapen negro beautiful,
(Yet are but ornaments to give her lustre,
That in herself is all perfection,) must 90
Prevail for her, I here release your trust;
'Tis happiness enough for me to serve you
And sometimes, with chaste eyes, to look upon
her.

Lov. Why, shall I swear?

All. O, by no means, my lord;
And wrong not so your judgment to the world
As from your fond indulgence to a boy, 95
Your page, your servant, to refuse a blessing
Divers great men are rivals for.

Lov. Suspend
Your judgment till the trial. How far is it
To Overreach's house?

All. At the most, some half hour's riding; 100
You'll soon be there.

Lov. And you the sooner freed
From your jealous fears.

All. O that I durst but hope it! Exeunt.

SCENE II.<sup>3</sup>

[Enter] OVERREACH, GREEDY, and MARRALL.

Over. Spare for no cost; let my dressers crack with the weight
Of curious viands.

Greedy. "Store indeed 's no sore," sir.

Over. That proverb fits your stomach, Master Greedy.

And let no plate be seen but what's pure gold,
Or such whose workmanship exceeds the
matter 5

That it is made of; let my choicest linen Perfume the room, and, when we wash, the water,

With precious powders mix'd, so please my
lord

That he may with envy wish to bathe so ever.

Mar. 'T will be very chargeable.

Over. Avaunt, you drudge! 10
Now all my labour'd ends are at the stake, Is't a time to think of thrift? Call in my daughter. [Exit MARRALL.]

And, Master Justice, since you love choice
dishes,

And plenty of 'em —

Greedy. As I do, indeed, sir,
Almost as much as to give thanks for 'em. 15

Over. I do confer that providence,<sup>4</sup> with my power

Of absolute command to have abundance,
To your best care.

Greedy. I'll punctually discharge it,
And give the best directions. Now am I,

<sup>2</sup> Reinforced. Q. lin'd.

In mine own conceit, a monarch; at the least,
Arch-president of the boil'd, the roast, the bak'd;

For which I will eat often, and give thanks
When my belly's brac'd up like a drum, and that's pure justice. Exit.

Over. It must be so. Should the foolish girl prove modest,
She may spoil all; she had it not from me,
But from her mother; I was ever forward,
As she must be, and therefore I'll prepare her.

[Enter] MARGARET.

Alone — and let your women wait without.

Marg. Your pleasure, sir?

Over. Ha! this is a neat dressing!
These orient pearls and diamonds well plac'd
too!

The gown affects me not, it should have been Embroider'd o'er and o'er with flowers of gold;
But these rich jewels and quaint fashion help
it.

And how below? since oft the wanton eye
The face observ'd, descends unto the foot,
Which being well proportion'd, as yours is,
Invites as much as perfect white and red,
Though without art. How like you your new
woman,

The Lady Downfall'n?

Marg. Well, for a companion;
Not as a servant.

Over. Is she humble, Meg,
And careful too, her ladyship forgotten?

Marg. I pity her fortune.

Over. Pity her! trample on her.
I took her up in an old tamin<sup>1</sup> gown, (Even starv'd for want of twopenny chops,) to serve thee;

And if I understand she but repines
To do thee any duty, though ne'er so servile, I'll pack her to her knight, where I have lodg'd him,
Into the Counter<sup>2</sup> and there let 'em howl together.

Marg. You know your own ways; but for me,
I blush

When I command her, that was once attended
With persons not inferior to myself
In birth.

Over. In birth! why, art thou not my
daughter,

The blest child of my industry and wealth?
Why, foolish girl, was't not to make thee great
That I have run, and still pursue, those ways
That hale down curses on me, which I mind not?
Part with these humble thoughts, and apt<sup>3</sup> thy-
self

To the noble state I labour to advance thee;
Or, by my hopes to see thee honourable,
I will adopt a stranger to my heir,
And throw thee from my care. Do not provoke
me.

Marg. I will not, sir; mould me which way
you please.

<sup>3</sup> Fit.

Re-enter GREEDY.

Over. How! Interrupted!

Greedy. 'Tis matter of importance.
The cook, sir, is self-will'd, and will not learn From my experience. There's a fawn brought in, sir,

And, for my life, I cannot make him roast it
With a Norfolk dumpling in the belly of it;
And, sir, we wise men know, without the dumpling

'Tis not worth three-pence.

Over. Would it were whole in thy belly,
To stuff it out! Cook it any way; prithee, leave
me.

Greedy. Without order for the dumpling?

Over. Let it be dump'd
Which way thou wilt; or tell him, I will scald him
In his own caldron.

Greedy. I had lost my stomach Had I lost my mistress dumpling; I'll give thanks for 't. [Exit.]

Over. But to our business, Meg; you have heard who dines here?

Marg. I have, sir. 'Tis an honourable man;

Over. A lord, Meg, and commands a regiment
Of soldiers, and, what's rare, is one himself,
A bold and understanding one; and to be
A lord and a good leader, in one volume,
Is granted unto few but such as rise up
The kingdom's glory.

Re-enter GREEDY.

Greedy. I'll resign my office,
If I be not better obey'd.

Over. 'Slight, art thou frantic?
Greedy. Frantic! 'T would make me frantic and stark mad,

Were I not a justice of peace and quorum too,
Which this rebellious cook cares not a straw
for.

There are a dozen of woodcocks —

Over. Make thyself
Thirteen, the baker's dozen.

Greedy. I am contented,
So they may be dress'd to my mind; he has found out

A new device for sauce, and will not dish 'em
With toasts and butter. My father was a tailor,

And my name, though a justice, Greedy Wood-
cook;

And, ere I'll see my lineage so abus'd,
I'll give up my commission.

Over. [Loudly.] Cook! — Rogue, obey him!
I have given the word, pray you now remove yourself

To a collar of brawn,<sup>4</sup> and trouble me no further.

Greedy. I will, and meditate what to eat at dinner. [Exit.]

Over. And as I said, Meg, when this gull<sup>5</sup>
disturb'd us,
This honourable lord, this colonel,
I would have thy husband.

<sup>4</sup> Neck of a boar.

<sup>5</sup> Fool.

Marg. There's too much disparity 100
Between his quality and mine, to hope it.

Over. I more than hope 't, and doubt not to effect it.

Be thou no enemy to thyself, my wealth
Shall weight his titles down, and make you equals.

Now for the means to assure him thine, observe me: 105

Remember he's a courtier and a soldier,
And not to be trifled with; and, therefore, when

He comes to woo you, see you do not coy it:
This mincing modesty has spoil'd many a match
By a first refusal, in vain after hop'd for. 110

Marg. You'll have me, sir, preserve the distance that Confines a virgin?

Over. Virgin me no virgins!
I must have you lose that name, or you lose me.
I will have you private — start not — I say,
private;

If thou art my true daughter, not a bastard, 115
Thou wilt venture alone with one man, though he came

Like Jupiter to Semele, and come off, too;
And therefore, when he kisses you, kiss close.

Marg. I have heard this is the strumpet's fashion, sir,

Which I must never learn.

Over. Learn any thing, 120
And from any creature that may make thee great;

From the devil himself.

Marg. [Aside.] This is but devilish doctrine!

Over. Or, if his blood grow hot, suppose he offer

Beyond this, do not you stay till it cool,
But meet his ardour; if a couch be near, 125
Sit down on 't, and invite him.

Marg. In your house,
Your own house, sir! For Heaven's sake, what are you then?

Or what shall I be, sir?

Over. Stand not on form;
Words are no substances.

Marg. Though you could dispense
With your own honour, cast aside religion, 130
The hopes of Heaven, or fear of hell, excuse me,
In worldly policy this is not the way
To make me his wife; his whore, I grant it may do.

My maiden honour so soon yielded up,
Nay, prostituted, cannot but assure him 135
I, that am light to him, will not hold weight
Whene'er<sup>1</sup> tempted by others; so, in judgment,

When to his lust I have given up my honour,
He must and will forsake me.

Over. How! forsake thee!
Do I wear a sword for fashion? or is this arm
Shrunk up or wither'd? Does there live a man 141
Of that large list I have encounter'd with

Can truly say I e'er gave inch of ground
Not purchas'd with his blood that did oppose me?

Forsake thee when the thing is done! He dares not. 145

Give me but proof he has enjoy'd thy person,
Though all his captains, echoes to his will,
Stood arm'd by his side to justify the wrong,
And he himself in the head of his bold troop,
Spite of his lordship, and his colonelship, 150
Or the judge's favour, I will make him render
A bloody and a strict account, and force him,
By marrying thee, to cure thy wounded honour!

I have said it.

Re-enter MARRALL.

Mar. Sir, the man of honour's come,
Newly alighted.

Over. In, without reply. 155
And do as I command, or thou art lost.

Exit MARGARET.

Is the loud music I gave order for Ready to receive him?

Mar. 'Tis, sir.

Over. Let 'em sound
A princely welcome. [Exit MARRALL.] Roughness awhile leave me;
For fawning now, a stranger to my nature, 160
Must make way for me.

Loud music. Enter LORD LOVELL, GREEDY,
ALLWORTH, and MARRALL.

Lov. Sir, you meet your trouble.
Over. What you are pleas'd to style so is an honour

Above my worth and fortunes.

All. [Aside.] Strange, so humble.
Over. A justice of peace, my lord.

Lov. Presents GREEDY to him.
Your hand, good sir.

Greedy. [Aside.] This is a lord, and some think this a favour; 165
But I had rather have my hand in my dumping.

Over. Room for my lord.

Lov. I miss, sir, your fair daughter
To crown my welcome.

Over. May it please my lord
To taste a glass of Greek wine first, and suddenly
She shall attend my lord.

Lov. You'll be obey'd, sir. 170
Exeunt all but OVERRÉACH.

Over. 'Tis to my wish: as soon as come, ask for her!

Why, Meg! Meg Overreach.—

[Re-enter MARGARET.]

How! tears in your eyes!
Hah! dry 'em quickly, or I'll dig 'em out.
Is this a time to whimper? Meet that greatness

That flies into thy bosom, think what 't is 175
For me to say, "My honourable daughter;"
And thou, when I stand bare, to say, "Put on;"

<sup>1</sup> So Gifford. Q. when he is.

Or, "Father, you forget yourself." No more:
But be instructed, or expect — He comes.

Re-enter LORD LOVELL, GREEDY, ALLWORTH, and MARRALL.

A black-brow'd girl, my lord,

Lov. As I live, a rare one. They salute. 180

All. [Aside.] He's took already: I am lost.

Over. [Aside.] That kiss
Came twanging off, I like it. — Quit the room.

[Exeunt all but OVERREACH, LOVELL, and MARGARET.]

A little bashful, my good lord, but you,
I hope, will teach her boldness.

Lov. I am happy

In such a scholar: but —

Over. I am past learning. 185

And therefore leave you to yourselves. — Remember!
Aside to MARGARET and exit.

Lov. You see, fair lady, your father is solicitous

To have you change the barren name of virgin
Into a hopeful wife.

Marg. His haste, my lord,
Holds no power o'er my will.

Lov. But o'er your duty. 190

Marg. Which fore'd too much, may break.

Lov. Bend rather, sweetest:

Think of your years.

Marg. Too few to match with yours:
And choicest fruits too soon pluck'd, rot and wither.

Lov. Do you think I am old?

Marg. I am sure I am too young.

Lov. I can advance you.

Marg. To a hill of sorrow, 195

Where every hour I may expect to fall,

But never hope firm footing. You are noble,

I of a low descent, however rich;

And tissues match'd with scarlet<sup>1</sup> suit but ill.

O, my good lord, I could say more, but that 200
I dare not trust these walls.

Lov. Pray you, trust my ear then.

Re-enter OVERREACH [behind], listening.

Over. Close at it! whispering! this is excellent!

And, by their postures, a consent on both parts.

Re-enter GREEDY behind.

Greedy. Sir Giles, Sir Giles!

Over. The great fiend stop that clapper!

Greedy. It must ring out, sir, when my belly rings noon. 205

The bak'd-meats are run out, the roasts turn'd powder.

Over. I shall powder you.

Greedy. Beat me to dust, I care not;

In such a cause as this, I'll die a martyr.

Over. Marry, and shall, you barathrum<sup>2</sup> of the shambles! Strikes him.

Greedy. How! strike a justice of peace! 'Tis petty treason, 210

Edwardi quinto: but that you are my friend,

<sup>1</sup> Silks matched with woolen.

<sup>2</sup> Gulf: here, insatiable glutton.

I would commit you without bail or main-prize.<sup>1</sup>

Over. Leave your bawling, sir, or I shall commit you

Where you shall not dine to-day. Disturb my
lord,

When he is in discourse!

Greedy. Is 't a time to talk 215

When we should be munching!

Lov. Hah! I heard some noise.

Over. Mum, villain; vanish! Shall we break a bargain

Almost made up? Thrusts GREEDY off.

Lov. Lady, I understand you.

And rest most happy in your choice, believe
it;

I'll be a careful pilot to direct 220

Your yet uncertain bark to a port of safety.

Marg. So shall your honour save two lives, and bind us

Your slaves for ever.

Lov. I am in the act rewarded,

Since it is good; howe'er, you must put on
An amorous carriage towards me to delude 225

Your subtle father.

Marg. I am prone to that.

Lov. Now break we off our conference. —
Sir Giles!

Where is Sir Giles?

[OVERREACH comes forward.]

Re-enter ALLWORTH, MARRALL, and GREEDY.

Over. My noble lord; and how Does your lordship find her?

Lov. Apt, Sir Giles, and coming;

And I like her the better.

Over. So do I too. 230

Love. Yet should we take forts at the first assault,

'T were poor in the defendant; I must confirm
her

With a love-letter or two, which I must have Deliver'd by my page, and you give way to 't.

Over. With all my soul: — a towardly gentleman! 235

Your hand, good Master Allworth: know my house

Is ever open to you.

All. [Aside.] 'T was shut till now.

Over. Well done, well done, my honourable
daughter!

Thou'rt so already. Know this gentle youth,
And cherish him, my honourable daughter. 240

Marg. I shall, with my best care.

Noise within, as of a coach.

Over. A coach!

Greedy. More stops

Before we go to dinner! O my guts!

Enter LADY ALLWORTH and WELLBORN.

L. All. If I find welcome,

You share in it; if not, I'll back again,
Now I know your ends; for I come arm'd for
all

Can be objected.

<sup>3</sup> A writ commanding the sheriff to take bail.

Lov. How! the Lady Allworth! 245
Over. And thus attended!
LOVELL salutes LADY ALLWORTH,
LADY ALLWORTH salutes MARRALL.

Mar. No, "I am a dolt!
 The spirit of lies had ent'red me!"

Over. Peace, Patch; 1
 'T is more than wonder! an astonishment
 That does possess me wholly!

Lov. Noble lady,
 This is a favour, to prevent 2 my visit, 250
 The service of my life can never equal.

L. All. My lord, I laid wait for you, and much hop'd
 You would have made my poor house your first inn:

And therefore doubting that you might forget
 me,

Or too long dwell here, having such ample
 cause, 255

In this unequal'd beauty, for your stay,
 And fearing to trust any but myself

With the relation of my service to you,
 I borrow'd so much from my long restraint
 And took the air in person to invite you. 260

Lov. Your bounties are so great, they rob me,
 madam,
 Of words to give you thanks.

L. All. Good Sir Giles Overreach.
Salutes him.

—How dost thou, Marrall? Lik'd you my meat
 so ill,

You'll dine no more with me?
Greedy. I will, when you please, 264

As it like<sup>3</sup> your ladyship.

L. All. When you please, Master Greedy;
 If meat can do it, you shall be satisfied.

And now, my lord, pray take into your knowledge

This gentleman; howe'er his outside's coarse,
Presents WELLBORN.

His inward linings are as fine and fair 269
 As any man's; wonder not I speak at large:

And howsoe'er his humour carries him
 To be thus accounted, or what taint soever,

For his wild life, hath stuck upon his fame,
 He may ere long, with boldness, rank himself

With some that have contemn'd him. Sir Giles Overreach, 275

If I am welcome, bid him so.
Over. My nephew!

He has been too long a stranger. Faith you
 have,

Pray let it be mended.
LOVELL confers aside with WELLBORN.

Mar. Why, sir, what do you mean?
 This is "rogue Wellborn, monster, prodigy,

That should hang or drown himself;" no man
 of worship, 280

Much less your nephew.
Over. Well, sirrah, we shall reckon

For this hereafter.
Mar. I'll not lose my jeer,

Though I be beaten dead for 't.

Well. Let my silence plead
 In my excuse, my lord, till better leisure
 Offer itself to hear a full relation 285
 Of my poor fortunes.

Lov. I would hear, and help 'em.
Over. Your dinner waits you.

Lov. Pray you lead, we follow.
L. All. Nay, you are my guest; come, dear

Master Wellborn.
Exeunt all but GREEDY.

Greedy. "Dear Master Wellborn!" so she said: Heaven! Heaven!

If my belly would give me leave, I could ruminate 290

All day on this. I have granted twenty warrants

To have him committed, from all prisons in the shire,

To Nottingham gaol; and now "Dear Master
 Wellborn!"

And, "My good nephew!" — but I play the
 fool 294

To stand here prating, and forget my dinner.
Re-enter MARRALL.

Are they set, Marrall?
Mar. Long since; pray you a word, sir.

Greedy. No wording now.
Mar. In troth, I must. My master,

Knowing you are his good friend, makes bold
 with you,

And does entreat you, more guests being come
 in

Than he expected, especially his nephew, 300

The table being full too, you would excuse
 him,

And sup with him on the cold meat.
Greedy. How! No dinner,

After all my care?
Mar. 'T is but a penance for

A meal; besides, you broke your fast.
Greedy. That was

But a bit to stay my stomach. A man in commission 305

Give place to a tatterdemalion!
Mar. No bug<sup>4</sup> words, sir;

Should his worship hear you —
Greedy. Lose my dumpling too,

And butter'd toasts, and woodcocks!
Mar. Come, have patience.

If you will dispense a little with your wor-
 ship,

And sit with the waiting women, you'll have dumpling, 310

Woodcock, and butter'd toasts too.
Greedy. This revives me:

I will gorge there sufficiently.
Mar. This is the way, sir. Exeunt.

SCENE III.<sup>5</sup>

[Enter] OVERREACH, as from dinner.

Over. She's caught! O women! — she neglects my lord,

<sup>5</sup> Another room in Overreach's house.

1 Fool.

2 Anticipate.

3 If it please.

And all her compliments appli'd to Wellborn!
The garments of her widowhood laid by,
She now appears as glorious as the spring,
Her eyes fix'd on him, in the wine she drinks, 5
He being her pledge, she sends him burning
kisses,

And sits on thorns, till she be private with him.
She leaves my meat to feed upon his looks,
And if in our discourse he be but nam'd,
From her a deep sigh follows. And why grieve
I 10

At this? It makes for me; if she prove his,
All that is hers is mine, as I will work him.

Enter MARRALL.

Mar. Sir, the whole board is troubled at your rising.

Over. No matter, I'll excuse it. Prithee,
Marrall,

Watch an occasion to invite my nephew 15
To speak with me in private.

Mar. Who? "The rogue
The lady scorn'd to look on"?

Over. You are a wag.

Enter LADY ALLWORTH and WELLBORN.

Mar. See, sir, she's come, and cannot be without him.

L. All. With your favour, sir, after a plenteous dinner,

I shall make bold to walk a turn or two, 20
In your rare garden.

Over. There's an arbour too,
If your ladyship please to use it.

L. All. Come, Master Wellborn,
*Exeunt LADY ALLWORTH and
WELLBORN.*

Over. Grosser and grosser! Now I believe the poet

Feign'd not, but was historical, when he wrote
Pasiphae was enamour'd of a bull: 25

This lady's lust's more monstrous. — My good
lord,

Enter LORD LOVELL, MARGARET, and the rest.

Excuse my manners.

Lov. There needs none, Sir Giles,
I may ere long say father, when it pleases
My dearest mistress to give warrant to it.

Over. She shall seal to it, my lord, and make me happy. 30

Re-enter WELLBORN and LADY ALLWORTH.

Marg. My lady is return'd.

L. All. Provide my coach,
I'll instantly away. My thanks, Sir Giles,
For my entertainment.

Over. 'Tis your nobleness
To think it such.

L. All. I must do you a further wrong
In taking away your honourable guest. 35

Lov. I wait on you, madam; farewell, good
Sir Giles.

L. All. Good Mistress Margaret! Nay, come,
Master Wellborn,

I must not leave you behind; in sooth, I must
not.

Over. Rob me not, madam, of all joys at
once;

Let my nephew stay behind. He shall have my coach, 40

And, after some small conference between us,
Soon overtake your ladyship.

L. All. Stay not long, sir.

Lov. This parting kiss: [kisses MARGARET] you shall every day hear from me,

By my faithful page.

All. 'Tis a service I am proud of.

Exeunt LORD LOVELL, LADY ALL-WORTH, ALLWORTH, and MAR-RALL.

Over. Daughter, to your chamber. —

Exit MARGARET.

— You may wonder, nephew, 45

After so long an enmity between us,
I should desire your friendship.

Well. So I do, sir;

'Tis strange to me.

Over. But I'll make it no wonder;
And what is more, unfold my nature to you.

We worldly men, when we see friends and kins-
men 50

Past hopes sunk in their fortunes, lend no
hand

To lift 'em up, but rather set our feet
Upon their heads, to press 'em to the bottom;

As, I must yield, with you I practis'd it:

But, now I see you in a way to rise, 55
I can and will assist you. This rich lady
(And I am glad of 't) is enamour'd of you;

'Tis too apparent, nephew.

Well. No such thing:

Compassion rather, sir.

Over. Well, in a word, 60

Because your stay is short, I'll have you seen
No more in this base shape; nor shall she say

She married you like a beggar, or in debt.
Well. (Aside.) He'll run into the noose, and save my labour.

Over. You have a trunk of rich clothes, not far hence,

In pawn; I will redeem 'em; and that no clam-
our 65

May taint your credit for your petty debts,
You shall have a thousand pounds to cut 'em
off,

And go a free man to the wealthy lady.

Well. This done, sir, out of love, and no ends
else —

Over. As it is, nephew.

Well. Binds me still your servant. 70

Over. No compliments; you are staid for. Ere you have supp'd

You shall hear from me. My coach, knaves, for my nephew.

To-morrow I will visit you.

Well. Here's an uncle
In a man's extremes! How much they do belie you,

That say you are hard-hearted!

Over. My deeds, nephew, 75 Shall speak my love; what men report I weigh not.

Exeunt.

<sup>1</sup> Admit.

ACT IV

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

[Enter LORD] LOVELL and ALLWORTH.

Lov. 'T is well; give me my cloak; I now discharge you
From further service. Mind your own affairs; I hope they will prove successful.

All. What is blest
With your good wish, my lord, cannot but prosper.

Let oftentimes report, and to your honour, 5
How much I stand engag'd, for I want language
To speak my debt; yet if a tear or two
Of joy, for your much goodness, can supply
My tongue's defects, I could —

Lov. Nay, do not melt:
This ceremonial thanks to me's superfluous. 10

Over. (within.) Is my lord stirring?

Lov. 'T is he I oh, here's your letter. Let him in.

Enter OVERREACH, GREEDY, and MARRALL.

Over. A good day to my lord!

Lov. You are an early riser,
Sir Giles.

Over. And reason, to attend your lordship. 15

Lov. And you, too, Master Greedy, up so soon!

Greedy. In troth, my lord, after the sun is up,
I cannot sleep, for I have a foolish stomach
That croaks for breakfast. With your lordship's favour,

I have a serious question to demand 20
Of my worthy friend Sir Giles.

Lov. Pray you use your pleasure.

Greedy. How far, Sir Giles, and pray you answer me

Upon your credit, hold you it to be
From your manor-house, to this of my Lady's Allworth's?

Over. Why, some four mile.

Greedy. How! four mile, good Sir Giles —
Upon your reputation, think better; 25

For if you do abate but one half-quarter

Of five, you do yourself the greatest wrong

That can be in the world; for four miles riding

Could not have rais'd so huge an appetite 30

As I feel gnawing on me.

Mar. Whether you ride,
Or go afoot, you are that way still provided,

An it please your worship.

Over. How now, sirrah? Prating

Before my lord! No difference? Go to my

nephew,

See all his debts discharg'd, and help his worship 35

To fit on his rich suit.

Mar. [Aside.] I may fit you too. Exit.

Toss'd like a dog still!

Lov. I have writ this morning

A few lines to my mistress, your fair daughter.

Over. 'T will fire her, for she's wholly yours
already. —

<sup>1</sup> A room in Lady Allworth's house.

Sweet Master Allworth, take my ring; 't will carry you 40

To her presence, I dare warrant you; and there plead

For my good lord, if you shall find occasion.

That done, pray ride to Nottingham, get a licence,

Still by this token. I'll have it dispatch'd,

And suddenly, my lord, that I may say, 45

My honourable, nay, right honourable daughter.

Greedy. Take my advice, young gentleman,
get your breakfast;

'T is unwholesome to ride fasting. I'll eat with
you,

And eat to purpose.

Over. Some Fury's in that gut;
Hungry again! Did you not devour, this morning, 50

A shield of brawn, and a barrel of Colchester oysters?

Greedy. Why, that was, sir, only to scour my stomach,

A kind of a preparative. Come, gentleman,
I will not have you feed like the hangman of Flushing,

Alone, while I am here.

Lov. Haste your return. 55

All. I will not fail, my lord.

Greedy. Nor I, to line

My Christmas coffer.

Exit GREEDY and ALLWORTH.

Over. To my wish: we are private.

I come not to make offer with my daughter

A certain portion, — that were poor and trivial:

In one word, I pronounce all that is mine, 60

In lands or leases, ready coin or goods,

With her, my lord, comes to you; nor shall you
have

One motive to induce you to believe

I live too long, since every year I'll add

Something unto the heap, which shall be yours
too. 65

Lov. You are a right kind father.

Over. You shall have reason

To think me such. How do you like this seat?

It is well wooded, and well water'd, the acres

Fertile and rich; would it not serve for change,

To entertain your friends in a summer progress?

What thinks my noble lord?

Lov. 'T is a wholesome air, 71

And well-built pile; and she that's mistress of
it,

Worthy the large revenue.

Over. She the mistress!

It may be so for a time: but let my lord

Say only that he likes it, and would have it, 75

I say, ere long 't is his.

Lov. Impossible.

Over. You do conclude too fast, not knowing
me,

Nor the engines<sup>2</sup> that I work by. 'T is not alone

The Lady Allworth's lands, for those once

Wellborn's 79

(As by her doteage on him I know they will be,)

<sup>2</sup> Devices.

Shall soon be mine ; but point out any man's
In all the shire, and say they lie convenient
And useful for your lordship, and once more
I say aloud, they are yours.

Lov. I dare not own
What's by unjust and cruel means extorted ;<sup>85</sup>
My fame and credit are more dear to me,
Than so to expose 'em to be censur'd by
The public voice.

Over. You run, my lord, no hazard.
Your reputation shall stand as fair,
In all good men's opinions, as now ;<sup>90</sup>
Nor can my actions, though condemn'd for ill,
Cast any foul aspersion upon yours.

For, though I do contemn report myself
As a mere sound, I still will be so tender<sup>94</sup>
Of what concerns you, in all points of honour,
That the immaculate whiteness of your fame,
Nor your unquestioned integrity,
Shall e'er be sullied with one taint or spot
That may take from your innocence and candour.<sup>1</sup>

All my ambition is to have my daughter<sup>100</sup>
Right honourable, which my lord can make her :
And might I live to dance upon my knee
A young Lord Lovell, borne by her unto you,
I write nil ultra<sup>2</sup> to my proudest hopes.

As for possessions and annual rents,<sup>105</sup>
Equivalent to maintain you in the port
Your noble birth and present state requires,
I do remove that burthen from your shoulders,
And take it on mine own : for, though I ruin
The country to supply your riotous waste,<sup>110</sup>
The scourge of prodigals, want, shall never find
you.

Lov. Are you not frighted with the imprecations
And curses of whole families, made wretched
By your sinister practices ?

Over. Yes, as rocks are,
When foamy billows split themselves against
Their flinty ribs ; or as the moon is mov'd<sup>116</sup>
When wolves, with hunger pin'd, howl at her brightness.

I am of a solid temper, and, like these,
Steer on a constant course. With mine own sword,<sup>119</sup>

If call'd into the field, I can make that right,
Which fearful enemies murmur'd at as wrong.
Now, for these other piddling complaints
Breath'd out in bitterness ; as when they call
me

Extortioneer, tyrant, cormorant, or intruder<sup>124</sup>
On my poor neighbour's right, or grand ineloser
Of what was common, to my private use ;
Nay, when my ears are pierc'd with widows'
cries,

And undone orphans wash with tears my threshold,

I only think what 'tis to have my daughter<sup>120</sup>
Right honourable ; and 'tis a powerful charm
Makes me insensible of remorse, or pity,
Or the least sting of conscience.

Lov. I admire<sup>3</sup>
The toughness of your nature.

Over. 'Tis for you,
My lord, and for my daughter, I am marble ;
Nay more, if you will have my character<sup>135</sup>
In little, I enjoy more true delight
In my arrival to my wealth these dark
And crooked ways, than you shall e'er take pleasure

In spending what my industry hath compass'd.
My haste commands me hence ; in one word,
therefore,<sup>140</sup>
Is it a match ?

Lov. I hope, that is past doubt now.
Over. Then rest secure ; not the hate of all mankind here,

Nor fear of what can fall on me hereafter,
Shall make me study aught but your advance-
ment

One story higher ; an earl ! if gold can do it.<sup>145</sup>
Dispute not my religion, nor my faith ;
Though I am borne thus headlong by my will,
You may make choice of what belief you
please,

To me they are equal ; so, my lord, good morrow.<sup>Exit.</sup>

Lov. He 's gone — I wonder how the earth can bear<sup>150</sup>

Such a portent ! I, that have liv'd a soldier,
And stood the enemy's violent charge undaunted,

To hear this blasphemous beast am bath'd all over

In a cold sweat : yet, like a mountain, he (Confirm'd in atheistical assertions)<sup>155</sup>

Is no more shaken than Olympus<sup>4</sup> is When angry Boreas loads his double head
With sudden drifts of snow.

Enter LADY ALLWORTH, Waiting Woman, and AMBLE.

L. All. Save you, my lord !
Disturb I not your privacy ?

Lov. No, good madam ;
For your own sake I am glad you came no sooner,<sup>160</sup>

Since this bold bad man, Sir Giles Overreach,
Made such a plain discovery of himself,
And read this morning such a devilish matins,
That I should think it a sin next to his
But to repeat it.

L. All. I ne'er press'd, my lord,<sup>165</sup>
On others' privacies ; yet, against my will,
Walking, for health's sake, in the gallery
Adjoining to your lodgings, I was made
(So vehement and loud he was) partaker
Of his tempting offers.

Lov. Please you to command<sup>170</sup>
Your servants hence, and I shall gladly hear
Your wiser counsel.

L. All. 'Tis, my lord, a woman's,
But true and hearty ; — wait in the next room,
But be within call ; yet not so near to force me
To whisper my intents.

Amb. We are taught better<sup>175</sup>
By you, good madam.

W. Wom. And well know our distance.

L. All. Do so, and talk not; 't will become your breeding,

Exeunt AMBLE and W. Woman.
Now, my good lord; if I may use my freedom, As to an honour'd friend —

Lov. You lessen else Your favour to me.

L. All. I dare then say thus: 180
As you are noble (howe'er common men
Make sordid wealth the object and sole end
Of their industrious aims) 't will not agree
With those of eminent blood, who are engag'd
More to prefer<sup>1</sup> their honours than to increase
The state left to 'em by their ancestors, 185
To study large additions to their fortunes,
And quite neglect their births: — though I must grant,
Riches, well got, to be a useful servant,
But a bad master.

Lov. Madam, 'tis confessed; 190
But what infer you from it?

L. All. This, my lord;
That as all wrongs, though thrust into one scale,
Slide of themselves off when right fills the other
And cannot hide the trial; so all wealth,
I mean if ill-acquir'd, cemented to honour 195
By virtuous ways achiev'd, and bravely purchas'd,

Is but as rabbish pour'd into a river,
(Howe'er intended to make good the bank,)
Rendering the water, that was pure before,
Polluted and unwholesome. I allow 200
The heir of Sir Giles Overreach, Margaret,
A maid well qualified and the richest match
Our north part can make boast of; yet she cannot,

With all that she brings with her, fill their mouths,

That never will forget who was her father; 205
Or that my husband Allworth's lands, and Wellborn's,

(How wrung from both needs now no repetition,)

Were real motives that more work'd your lordship

To join your families, than her form and virtues:

You may conceive the rest.

Lov. I do, sweet madam, 210
And long since have consider'd it. I know,

The sum of all that makes a just man happy
Consists in the well choosing of his wife:

And there, well to discharge it, does require
Equality of years, of birth, of fortune; 215

For beauty being poor, and not cried up
By birth or wealth, can truly mix with neither.

And wealth, where there's such difference in years,

And fair descent, must make the yoke uneasy: —

But I come nearer.

L. All. Pray you do, my lord. 220

Lov. Were Overreach's states thrice centupl'd, his daughter Millions of degrees much fairer than she is,

<sup>1</sup> Promote.

Howe'er I might urge precedents to excuse me,
I would not so adulterate my blood
By marrying Margaret, and so leave my issue
Made up of several pieces, one part scarlet, 225
And the other London blue. In my own tomb
I will inter my name first.

L. All. (Aside.) I am glad to hear this. —
Why then, my lord, pretend you marriage to her?

Dissimulation but ties false knots 230
On that straight line by which you, hitherto,
Have measur'd all your actions.

Lov. I make answer,
And aptly, with a question. Wherefore have you,

That, since your husband's death, have liv'd a strict
And chaste nun's life, on the sudden given yourself 235

To visits and entertainments? Think you, madam,

'Tis not grown public conference? <sup>2</sup> Or the favours

Which you too prodigally have thrown on Wellborn,

Being too reserv'd before, incur not censure?

L. All. I am innocent here; and, on my life, I swear 240

My ends are good.

Lov. On my soul, so are mine
To Margaret; but leave both to the event:

And since this friendly privacy does serve
But as an offer'd means unto ourselves,

To search each other farther, you having shewn
Your care of me, I my respect to you, 245

Deny me not, but still in chaste words, madam,
An afternoon's discourse.

L. All. So I shall hear you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.<sup>3</sup>

[Enter] TAPWELL and FROTH.

Tap. Undone, undone! this was your counsel, Froth.

Froth. Mine! I defy thee. Did not Master Marrall

(He has marr'd all, I am sure) strictly command us,

On pain of Sir Giles Overreach' displeasure,
To turn the gentleman out of doors?

Tap. 'Tis true; 5
But now he's his uncle's darling, and has got Master Justice Greedy, since he fill'd his belly,

At his commandment, to do anything.
Woe, woe to us!

Froth. He may prove merciful. 9
Tap. Froth, we do not deserve it at his hands.

Though he knew all the passages of our house,
As the receiving of stolen goods, and bawdry,

When he was rogue Wellborn no man would believe him,

And then his information could not hurt us;

But now he is right worshipful again, 15
Who dares but doubt his testimony? Methinks,
I see thee, Froth, already in a cart,

For a close<sup>1</sup> bawd, thine eyes ev'n pelted out
With dirt and rotten eggs; and my hand hissing
If I scape the halter, with the letter R<sup>2</sup> 20
Printed upon it.

Froth. Would that were the worst!
That were but nine days' wonder: as for credit,
We have none to lose, but we shall lose the money
He owes us, and his custom; there's the hell
on't.

Tap. He has summon'd all his creditors by the drum, 25
And they swarm about him like so many soldiers
On the pay day: and has found out such A NEW
WAY

TO PAY HIS OLD DEBTS, as 't is very likely
He shall be chronicled for it!

Froth. He deserves it More than ten pageants. But are you sure his worship 30
Comes this way, to my lady's?

A cry within: Brave Master Wellborn!
Tap. Yes: — I hear him.
Froth. Be ready with your petition and present it
To his good grace.

*Enter WELLBORN in a rich habit, [MARRALL,] GREEDY, ORDER, FURNACE, and Creditors;
TAPWELL kneeling, delivers his bill of debt.*

Well. How's this? Petition'd to?
But note what miracles the payment of
A little trash, and a rich suit of clothes, 35
Can work upon these rascals! I shall be,
I think, Prince Wellborn.

Mar. When your worship's married,
You may be — I know what I hope to see you.
Well. Then look thou for advancement.

Mar. To be known
Your worship's bailiff, is the mark I shoot at.
Well. And thou shalt hit it.

Mar. Pray you, sir, despatch 41
These needy followers, and for my admittance,<sup>3</sup>
Provided you'll defend me from Sir Giles,
Whose service I am weary of, I'll say something
You shall give thanks for.

Well. Fear me not Sir Giles.<sup>4</sup> 45
Greedy. Who, Tapwell? I remember thy wife brought me

Last new-year's tide, a couple of fat turkeys.
Tap. And shall do every Christmas, let your worship

But stand my friend now.
Greedy. How! with Master Wellborn?
I can do anything with him on such terms. —
See you this honest couple; they are good souls 51

As ever drew out faucet; have they not
A pair of honest faces?

Well. I o'erheard you,
And the bribe he promis'd. You are cozen'd in
them;

For, by all the scum that grew rich by my riots,
<sup>1</sup> Secret. <sup>2</sup> For "Rogue." <sup>3</sup> Appointment.
<sup>4</sup> Q. gives s. d., This interim, Tapwell and Froth flat- tering and bribing Justice Greedy.

This, for a most unthankful knave, and this, 55
For a base bawd and whore, have worst de-serv'd me,

And therefore speak not for 'em. By your place
You are rather to do me justice. Lend me your ear;

— Forget his turkeys, and call in his license, 60
And, at the next fair, I'll give you a yoke of oxen

Worth all his poultry.
Greedy. I am chang'd on the sudden
In my opinion! Come near; nearer, rascal.

And, now I view him better, did you e'er see
One look so like an archknave? His very countenance, 65

Should an understanding judge but look upon
him,
Would hang him, though he were innocent.

Tap. Froth. Worshipful sir,
Greedy. No, though the great Turk came, instead of turkeys,

To beg my favour, I am inexorable.
Thou hast an ill name: besides thy musty ale, 70
That hath destroy'd many of the king's liege
people,

Thou never hadst in thy house, to stay men's stomachs,

A piece of Suffolk cheese or gammon of bacon,
Or any esculent, as the learned call it,
For their emolument, but sheer drink only, 75
For which gross fault I here do damn thy license,
Forbidding thee ever to tap or draw;

For, instantly, I will, in mine own person,
Command the constable to pull down thy sign,
And do it before I eat.

Froth. No mercy?
Greedy. Vanish! 80
If I shew any, may my promis'd oxen gore me!

Tap. Unthankful knaves are ever so rewarded.

Exit WELLBORN, TAPWELL, and FROTH.
Well. Speak, what are you?

1 Cred. A decay'd vintner, sir,
That might have thriv'd, but that your worship broke me

With trusting you with muscadine<sup>5</sup> and eggs,
And five pound suppers, with your after drink-
ings, 85

When you lodg'd upon the Bankside.
Well. I remember.

1 Cred. I have not been hasty, nor e'er laid to arrest you;
And therefore, sir —

Well. Thou art an honest fellow,
I'll set thee up again; see his bill paid. — 90
What are you?

2 Cred. A tailor once, but now mere butcher.<sup>6</sup>
I gave you credit for a suit of clothes,
Which was all my stock, but you failing in pay-
ment,

I was remov'd from the shopboard, and confin'd
Under a stall.

Well. See him paid; — and botch no more. 95
2 Cred. I ask no interest, sir.
Well. Such tailors need not;

<sup>5</sup> Wine from muscadel grapes. <sup>6</sup> Repairer.

If their bills are paid in one and twenty year,
They are seldom losers. — O, I know thy face,
[To Creditor.]

Thou wert my surgeon. You must tell no tales;
Those days are done. I will pay you in private.

Ord. A royal gentleman!

Furn. Royal as an emperor! 101
He'll prove a brave master; my good lady knew
To choose a man.

Well. See all men else discharg'd;
And since old debts are clear'd by a new way,
A little bounty will not misbecome me; 105

There's something, honest cook, for thy good breakfasts;

And this, for your respect: [to ORDER] take 't,
't is good gold,

And I able to spare it.

Ord. You are too munificent.

Furn. He was ever so.

Well. Pray you, on before.

3 Cred. Heaven bless you!

Mar. At four o'clock; the rest know where to meet me. 110

Exeunt ORDER, FURNACE, and Creditors.

Well. Now, Master Marrall, what's the weighty secret

You promis'd to impart?

Mar. Sir, time nor place

Allow me to relate each circumstance;

This only, in a word: I know Sir Giles

Will come upon you for security 115

For his thousand pounds, which you must not consent to.

As he grows in heat, as I am sure he will,

Beyou but rough, and say he's in your debt

Ten times the sum, upon sale of your land;

I had a hand in 't (I speak it to my shame) 120

When you were defeated<sup>1</sup> of it.

Well. That's forgiven.

Mar. I shall deserve 't. Then urge him to produce

The deed in which you pass'd it over to him,

Which I know he'll have about him, to deliver

To the Lord Lovell, with many other writings, 125

And present monies; I'll instruct you further,

As I wait on your worship. If I play not my prize

To your full content, and your uncle's much vexation,

Hang up Jack Marrall.

Well. I rely upon thee. Exeunt.

SCENE III.<sup>2</sup>

Enter ALLWORTH and MARGARET.

All. Whether to yield the first praise to my lord's

Unequall'd temperance or your constant sweet-
ness

That I yet live, my weak hands fasten'd on Hope's anchor, spite of all storms of despair,

I yet rest doubtful.

Marg. Give it to Lord Lovell: 5

For what in him was bounty, in me's duty.

I make but payment of a debt to which

My vows, in that high office regist'ed,
Are faithful witnesses.

All. 'T is true, my dearest:

Yet, when I call to mind how many fair ones 10 Make wilful shipwrecks of their faiths, and oaths

To God and man, to fill the arms of greatness,
And you rise up [uo]<sup>3</sup> less than a glorious star,

To the amazement of the world, — hold out
Against the stern authority of a father, 15

And spurn at honour when it comes to court
you;

I am so tender of your good, that faintly,
With your wrong, I can wish myself that right

You yet are pleas'd to do me.

Marg. Yet, and ever.
To me what's title, when content is want-
ing? 20

Or wealth, rak'd up together with much care.
And to be kept with more, when the heart pines

In being dispospos'd of what it longs for Beyond the Indian mines? or the smooth brow

Of a pleas'd sire, that slaves me to his will, 25

And, so his ravenous humour may be feasted
By my obedience, and he see me great,

Leaves to my soul nor faculties nor power
To make her own election?

All. But the dangers

That follow the repulse —

Marg. To me they are nothing; 30
Let Allworth love, I cannot be unhappy.

Suppose the worst, that, in his rage, he kill me,
A tear or two, by you dropt on my hearse

In sorrow for my fate, will call back life
So far as but to say, that I die yours; 35

I then shall rest in peace: or should he prove
So cruel, as one death would not suffice

His thirst of vengeance, but with ling'ring tor-
ments

In mind and body I must waste to air,
In poverty join'd with banishment; so you share 40

In my afflictions, which I dare not wish you,
So high I prize you, I could undergo 'em

With such a patience as should look down
With scorn on his worst malice.

All. Heaven avert
Such trials of your true affection to me! 45

Nor will it unto you, that are all mercy,
Shew so much rigour: but since we must run

Such desperate hazards, let us do our best
To steer between them.

Marg. Your lord's ours, and sure:
And, though but a young actor, second me 50

In doing to the life what he has plotted.

Enter OVERREACH [behind].

The end may yet prove happy. Now, my All-worth — [Seeing her father.]

All. To your letter, and put on a seeming anger.

Marg. I'll pay my lord all debts due to his title;

And when with terms, not taking from his
honour, 55

<sup>3</sup> Inserted by Dodsley.

He does solicit me, I shall gladly hear him,
But in this peremptory, nay, commanding way,
To appoint a meeting, and without my knowledge,

A priest to tie the knot can ne'er be undone
Till death unloose it, is a confidence 60
In his lordship will deceive him.

All. I hope better,
Good lady.

Marg. Hope, sir, what you please: for me
I must take a safe and secure course; I have
A father, and without his full consent,
Though all lords of the land kneel'd for my favor, 65
I can grant nothing.

Over. I like this obedience: [Comes forward.]
But whatso'er my lord writes, must and shall
be Accepted and embrac'd. Sweet Master All-
worth,

You shew yourself a true and faithful servant
To your good lord; he has a jewel of you. 70
How! frowning, Meg? Are these looks to receive

A messenger from my lord? What's this?
Give me it.

Marg. A piece of arrogant paper, like th' inscriptions.

Over. (reads.) "Fair mistress, from your servant learn all joys
That we can hope for, if deferr'd, prove toys;<sup>1</sup>
Therefore this instant, and in private, meet 75
A husband, that will gladly at your feet
Lay down his honours, tend'ring them to you
With all content, the church being paid her due."

— Is this the arrogant piece of paper? Fool! 80
Will you still be one? In the name of madness what

Could his good honour write more to content
you?

Is there aught else to be wish'd, after these
two,

That are already offer'd; marriage first,
And lawful pleasure after: what would you
more? 85

Marg. Why, sir, I would be married like
your daughter;
Not hurried away i' th' night I know not whither,

Without all ceremony; no friends invited
To honour the solemnity.

All. An't please your honour,
For so before to-morrow I must style you, 90
My lord desires this privacy, in respect
His honourable kinsmen are afar off,
And his desires to have it done brook not
So long delay as to expect<sup>2</sup> their coming;
And yet he stands resolv'd, with all due pompe, 95
As running at the ring, plays, masques, and tilting,

To have his marriage at court celebrated,
When he has brought your honour up to London.

1 Trifles.

2 Wait for.

Over. He tells you true; 'tis the fashion, on my knowledge:

Yet the good lord, to please your peevish-
ness, 100

Must put it off, forsooth! and lose a night,
In which perhaps he might get two boys on
thee.

Tempt me no further, if you do, this goad
[Points to his sword.]

Shall prick you to him.

Marg. I could be contented,
Were you but by, to do a father's part, 105
And give me in the church.

Over. So my lord have you,
What do I care who gives you? Since my lord
Does purpose to be private, I'll not cross him.
I know not, Master Allworth, how my lord
May be provided, and therefore there's a purse 110
Of gold, 't will serve this night's expense; tomorrow

I'll furnish him with any sums. In the mean
time,

Use my ring to my chaplain; he is benefic'd
At my manor of Gotham, and call'd Parson Willdo.

'T is no matter for a licence, I'll bear him out
in't; 115

Marg. With your favour, sir, what warrant is your ring?

He may suppose I got that twenty ways,
Without your knowledge; and then to be re-
fus'd

Were such a stain upon me! — If you pleas'd,
sir,

Your presence would do better.

Over. Still perverse! 120
I say again, I will not cross my lord;
Yet I'll prevent<sup>3</sup> you too. — Paper and ink,
there!

All. I can furnish you.

Over. I thank you, I can write then.
Writes on his book.

All. You may, if you please, put out the name of my lord,
In respect he comes disguis'd, and only write, 125
"Marry her to this gentleman."

Over. Well advis'd.
'T is done; away; — (MARGARET kneels.) My blessing, girl? Thou hast it.

Nay, no reply, be gone. — Good Master All-
worth,

This shall be the best night's work you ever
made.

All. I hope so, sir. 130
Exeunt ALLWORTH and MAR-GARET.

Over. Farewell! — Now all's cocksure:
Methinks I hear already knights and ladies Say, Sir Giles Overreach, how is it with Your honourable daughter? Has her honour Slept well to-night? or, will her honour
please 135

To accept this monkey, dog, or paraquit<sup>4</sup>
(This is state in ladies), or my eldest son

3 Anticipate your objections.

4 Parrot.

To be her page, and wait upon her trencher?
My ends, my ends are compass'd!—then for
Wellborn
And the lands: were he once married to the widow,<sup>110</sup>
I have him here.—I can scarce contain myself,
I am so full of joy, nay, joy all over. Exit.

ACT V

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

[Enter LORD] LOVELL, LADY ALLWORTH, and AMBLE.

L. All. By this you know how strong the motives were
That did, my lord, induce me to dispense
A little with my gravity to advance,
In personating some few favours to him,
The plots and projects of the down-trod Well-born.<sup>5</sup>
Nor shall I e'er repent, although I suffer
In some few men's opinions for 't, the action:
For he that ventur'd all for my dear husband
Might justly claim an obligation from me
To pay him such a courtesy; which had I<sup>10</sup>
Coily or over-curiously<sup>2</sup> denied,
It might have argu'd me of little love
To the deceas'd.

Lov. What you intended, madam,
For the poor gentleman hath found good success;
For, as I understand, his debts are paid,<sup>15</sup>
And he once more furnish'd for fair employ-
ment:

But all the arts that I have us'd to raise
The fortunes of your joy and mine, young All-
worth,
Stand yet in supposition, though I hope well;
For the young lovers are in wit more pregnant Than their years can promise; and for their desires,<sup>21</sup>

On my knowledge, they are equal.

L. All. As my wishes
Are with yours, my lord; yet give me leave to
fear

The building, though well grounded: to deceive
Sir Giles, that's both a lion and a fox<sup>25</sup>
In his proceedings, were a work beyond
The strongest undertakers; not the trial
Of two weak innocents.

Lov. Despair not, madam:
Hard things are compass'd oft by easy means;
And judgment, being a gift deriv'd from Heaven,<sup>30</sup> Though sometimes lodg'd i' th' hearts of worldly men,

That ne'er consider from whom they receive it,
Forsakes such as abuse the giver of it.
Which is the reason that the politic
And cunning statesman, that believes he fathoms<sup>35</sup>

The counsels of all kingdoms on the earth,
Is by simplicity oft over-reach'd.

L. All. May he be so! Yet, in his name to express it,
Is a good omen.

Lov. May it to myself
Prove so, good lady, in my suit to you!<sup>40</sup>
What think you of the motion?

L. All. Troth, my lord,
My own unworthiness may answer for me;
For had you, when that I was in my prime,
My virgin flower uncropp'd, presented me
With this great favour; looking on my lowness
Not in a glass of self-love, but of truth,<sup>45</sup>
I could not but have thought it as a blessing
Far, far beyond my merit.

Lov. You are too modest,
And undervalue that which is above
My title, or whatever I call mine.<sup>50</sup>
I grant, were I a Spaniard, to marry
A widow might disparage me; but being
A true-born Englishman, I cannot find
How it can taint my honour: nay, what's more,
That which you think a blemish is to me<sup>55</sup>
The fairest lustre. You already, madam,
Have given sure proofs how dearly you can cherish

A husband that deserves you; which confirms
me
That, if I am not wanting in my care
To do you service, you'll be still the same<sup>60</sup>
That you were to your Allworth: in a word,
Our years, our states, our births are not unequal,

You being descended nobly, and all i'd so;
If then you may be won to make me happy,
But join your lips to mine, and that shall be<sup>65</sup>
A solemn contract.

L. All. I were blind to my own good Should I refuse it; [kisses him] yet, my lord, receive me

As such a one, the study of whose whole life
Shall know no other object but to please you.

Lov. If I return not, with all tenderness,<sup>70</sup>
Equal respect to you, may I die wretched!

L. All. There needs no protestation, my lord,
To her that cannot doubt,—

Enter WELLBORN [handsomely apparelled.]

You are welcome, sir.
Now you look like yourself.

Well. And will continue
Such in my free acknowledgment that I am<sup>75</sup>
Your creature, madam, and will never hold
My life mine own, when you please to command
it.

Lov. It is a thankfulness that well becomes
you.

You could not make choice of a better shape
To dress your mind in.

L. All. For me, I am happy<sup>80</sup>
That my endeavours prosper'd. Saw you of late Sir Giles, your uncle?

Well. I heard of him, madam,
By his minister, Marrall; he's grown into strange passions
About his daughter. This last night he look'd
for

Your lordship at his house, but missing you,<sup>85</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A room in Lady Allworth's house. <sup>2</sup> Fastidiously.

And she not yet appearing, his wise head
Is much perplex'd and troubl'd.

Lov. It may be,
Sweetheart, my project took.

L. All. I strongly hope.
Over. [within.] Ha! find her, booby, thou huge lump of nothing,
I'll bore thine eyes out else.

Well. May it please your lordship, 90
For some ends of mine own, but to withdraw
A little out of sight, though not of hearing,
You may, perhaps, have sport.

Lov. You shall direct me. Steps aside.

Enter OVERREACH, with distracted looks, driving in MARRALL before him [with a box].<sup>1</sup>

Over. I shall sol fa you, rogue!

Mar. Sir, for what cause
Do you use me thus?

Over. Cause, slave! Why, I am angry, 95
And thou a subject only fit for beating,
And so to cool my cholera. Look to the writing;
Let but the seal be broke upon the box
That hast slept in my cabinet these three years,

I'll rack thy soul for 't.

Mar. (Aside.) I may yet cry quittance, 100
Though now I suffer, and dare not resist.

Over. Lady, by your leave, did you see my daughter lady?
And the lord her husband? Are they in your house?

If they are, discover, that I may bid 'em joy;
And, as an entrance to her place of honour, 105
See your ladyship be on her left hand, and make courtesies

When she nods on you; which you must receive
As a special favour.

L. All. When I know, Sir Giles,
Her state requires such ceremony, I shall pay
it;

But in the meantime, as I am myself, 110
I give you to understand, I neither know
Nor care where her honour is.

Over. When you once see her
Supported, and led by the lord her husband,
You'll be taught better. — Nephew.

Well. Sir, No more?

Over. 'Tis all I owe you.

Over. Have your redeem'd rags 115
Made you thus insolent?

Well. (in scorn.) Insolent to you!
Why, what are you, sir, unless in your years,
At the best, more than myself?

Over. (Aside.) His fortune swells him.
'Tis rank 't he's married.

L. All. This is excellent!

Over. Sir, in calm language, though I seldom
use it, 120

I am familiar with the cause that makes you
Bear up thus bravely; there's a certain buzz
Of a stol'n marriage, do you hear? of a stol'n
marriage,

In which, 'tis said, there's somebody hath been cozen'd;

I name no parties.

Well. Well, sir, and what follows? 125
Over. Marry, this; since you are peremptory.

Remember,
Upon mere hope of your great match, I lent you
A thousand pounds: put me in good security,
And suddenly, by mortgage or by statute, 130
Of some of your new possessions, or I'll have you
Dragg'd in your lavender robes<sup>2</sup> to the goal.

You know me,
And therefore do not trifle.

Well. Can you be
So cruel to your nephew, now he's in
The way to rise? Was this the courtesy
You did me 'in pure love, and no ends else?' 135

Over. End me no ends! Engage the whole estate,
And force your spouse to sign it, you shall have Three or four thousand more, to roar and swag-
ger

And revel in bawdy taverns.

Well. And beg after;
Mean you not so?

Over. My thoughts are mine, and free. 140
Shall I have security?

Well. No, indeed, you shall not,
Nor bond, nor bill, nor bare acknowledgment;
Your great looks fright not me.

Over. But my deeds shall.
Outbray'd! Both draw.

L. All. Help, murder! murder!

Enter Servants.

Well. Let him come on,
With all his wrongs and injuries about him, 145
Arm'd with his cut-throat practices to guard
him;

The right that I bring with me will defend me,
And punish his extortion.

Over. That I had thee
But single in the field!

L. All. You may; but make not
My house your quarrelling scene.

Over. Were 't in a church, 150
By Heaven and Hell, I'll do 't!

Mar. Now put him to
The shewing of the deed.

Well. [Aside to WELLBORN.]
This rage is vain, sir;
For fighting, fear not, you shall have your hands full,

Upon the least incitement; and whereas
You charge me with a debt of a thousand pounds, 155

If there be law, (howe'er you have no conscience,)

Either restore my land or I'll recover
A debt, that's truly due to me from you,
In value ten times more than what you challenge.

Over. I in thy debt! O impudence! did I not purchase 160

<sup>2</sup> Clothes in pawn were said to be "laid up in lavender."

The land left by thy father, that rich land,
That had continued in Wellborn's name
Twenty descents; which, like a riotous fool, Thou didst make sale of it? Is not here incles'd

The deed that does confirm it mine?

Mar. Now, now! 165
Well. I do acknowledge none; I ne'er pass'd o'er

Any such land. I grant for a year or two
You had it in trust; which if you do discharge,

Surrend'ring the possession, you shall ease
Yourself and me of chargeable suits in law, 170
Which, if you prove not honest, as I doubt it,
Must of necessity follow.

L. All. In my judgment,
He does advise you well.

Over. Good! good! Conspire
With your new husband, lady; second him
In his dishonest practices; but when 175
This manor is extended<sup>1</sup> to my use, You'll speak in humbler key, and sue for fa-
your.

L. All. Never: do not hope it.

Well. Let despair first seize me.

Over. Yet, to shut up thy mouth, and make these give

Thyself the lie, the loud lie, I draw out 180
The precious evidence; if thou canst forswear
Thy hand and seal, and make a forfeit of

Opens the box [and displays the bond].

Thy ears to the pillory, see! here's that will make

My interest clear -- ha!

L. All. A fair skin of parchment.

Well. Indented, I confess, and labels too; 185
But neither wax nor words. How! thunderstruck?

Not a syllable to insult with? My wise uncle,
Is this your precious evidence? Is this that makes

Your interest clear?

Over. I am o'erwhelm'd with wonder!

What prodigy is this? What subtle devil 190
Hath raz'd out the inscription, the wax

Turn'd into dust? The rest of my deeds whole
As when they were deliver'd, and this only Made nothing! Do you deal with witches, rascal?

There is a statute<sup>2</sup> for you, which will bring 195
Your neck in an hempen circle; yes, there is;
And now 'tis better thought for, cheater,
know

This juggling shall not save you.

Well. To save thee

Would beggar the stock of mercy.

Over. Marrall!

Mar. Sir.

Over. (flattering him.) Though the witnesses are dead, your testimony 200

Help with an oath or two: and for thy master,
Thy liberal master, my good honest servant,
I know thou wilt swear anything, to dash

This cunning sleight: besides, I know thou art
A public notary, and such stand in law 205
For a dozen witnesses: the deed being drawn too
By thee, my careful Marrall, and deliver'd
When thou wert present, will make good my title.

Wilt thou not swear this?

Mar. I! No, I assure you: 209
I have a conscience not sear'd up like yours;
I know no deeds.

Over. Wilt thou betray me?

Mar. Keep him

From using of his hands, I'll use my tongue,
To his no little torment.

Over. Mine own varlet

Rebel against me!

Mar. Yes, and uncase<sup>3</sup> you too.

"The idiot, the patch, the slave, the booby, 215
The property fit only to be beaten
For your morning exercise," your "football," or
"Th' unprofitable lump of flesh," your
"drudge,"

Can now anatomise you, and lay open 219
All your black plots, and level with the earth
Your hill of pride, and, with these gabions<sup>4</sup> guarded

Unload my great artillery, and shake,
Nay pulverize, the walls you think defend you.

L. All. How he foams at the mouth with rage!

Well. To him again.

Over. O that I had thee in my gripe, I would tear thee 225

Joint after joint!

Mar. I know you are a tearer,
But I'll have first your fangs par'd off, and
then

Come nearer to you; when I have discover'd,<sup>5</sup>
And made it good before the judge, what ways

And devilish practices you us'd to cozen 230
With an army of whole families, who yet live,
And, but enroll'd for soldiers, were able To take in<sup>6</sup> Dunkirk.

Well. All will come out.

L. All. The better.

Over. But that I will live, rogue, to torture
thee, 234

And make thee wish, and kneel in vain, to die.
These swords that keep thee from me should fix here,

Although they made my body but one wound,
But I would reach thee.

Lov. (Aside.) Heaven's hand is in this;
One bandog<sup>7</sup> worry the other!

Over. I play the fool,
And make my anger but ridiculous; 240

There will be a time and place, there will be,
cowards,

When you shall feel what I dare do.

Well. I think so:

You dare do any ill, yet want true valour

To be honest, and repent.

<sup>4</sup> Wicker baskets filled with earth, used to protect soldiers when digging trenches.

<sup>2</sup> The law against witchcraft.

Over. They are words I know not,
Nor e'er will learn. Patience, the beggar's
virtue, 246

Enter GREEDY and PARSON WILLDO.

Shall find no harbour here: — after these storms

At length a calm appears. Welcome, most welcome!

There's comfort in thy looks. Is the deed done?
Is my daughter married? Say but so, my chaplain,

And I am tame.

Willdo. Married! Yes I assure you. 250

Over. Then vanish all sad thoughts! There's more gold for thee.

My doubts and fears are in the titles drown'd
Of my honourable, my right honourable
daughter.

Greedy. Here will<sup>1</sup> be feasting! At least for a month

I am provided: empty guts, croak no more. 255
You shall bestuff'd like bagpipes, not with wind,
But bearing<sup>2</sup> dishes.

Over. Instantly be here?

(Whispering to WILLDO.)

To my wish! to my wish! Now you that plot against me,

And hop'd to trip my heels up, that contemn'd me,
Think on't and tremble. — (Loud music) —

They come! I hear the music. 260

A lane there for my lord!

Well. This sudden heat

May yet be cool'd, sir.

Over. Make way there for my lord!

Enter ALLWORTH and MARGARET.

Marg. Sir, first your pardon, then your blessing, with

Your full allowance of the choice I have made.
As ever you could make use of your reason, 265

Kneeling.

Grow not in passion; since you may as well
Call back the day that's past, as untie the knot
Which is too strongly fasten'd. Not to dwell

Too long on words, this is my husband.

Over. How! 269

All. So I assure you; all the rites of marriage,
With every circumstance, are past. Alas! sir,

Although I am no lord, but a lord's page,
Your daughter and my lov'd wife mourns not

for it;

And, for right honourable son-in-law, you may
say,

Your dutiful daughter.

Over. Devil! are they married? 275

Willdo. Do a father's part, and say, "Heaven give 'em joy!"

Over. Confusion and ruin! Speak, and speak quickly,

Or thou art dead.

Willdo. They are married.

Over. Thou hadst better

Have made a contract with the king of fiends,
Than these: — my brain turns!

Willdo. Why this rage to me? 280
Is not this your letter, sir, and these the words?
"Marry her to this gentleman."

Over. It cannot —
Nor will I e'er believe it; 'sdeath! I will not;

That I, that in all passages I touch'd
At worldly profit have not left a print 285

Where I have trod for the most curious search
To trace my footsteps, should be gull'd by children,

Baff'd and fool'd, and all my hopes and labours
Defeated and made void.

Well. As it appears,

You are so, my grave uncle.

Over. Village nurses 290
Revenge their wrongs with curses; I'll not waste

A syllable, but thus I take the life

Which, wretched, I gave to thee.

Offers to kill MARGARET.

Lov. [coming forward.] Hold, for your own sake!

Though charity to your daughter hath quite
left you, 295

Will you do an act, though in your hopes lost here,
Can leave no hope for peace or rest hereafter?

Consider; at the best you are but a man,
And cannot so create your aims but that

They may be cross'd.

Over. Lord! thus I spit at thee, 300
And at thy counsel; and again desire thee,
And as thou art a soldier, if thy valour

Dares shew itself where multitude and example Lead not the way, let's quit the house, and

change
Six words in private.

Lov. I am ready.

L. All. Stay, sir, 305
Contest with one distracted!

Well. You'll grow like him,
Should you answer his vain challenge.

Over. Are you pale?
Borrow his help, though Hercules call it odds, I'll stand against both as I am, hemm'd in

thus, 310

Since, like a Libyan lion in the toil,
My fury cannot reach the coward hunters,
And only spends itself, I'll quit the place.

Alone I can do nothing; but I have servants
And friends to second me; and if I make not

This house a heap of ashes (by my wrongs, 315
What I have spoke I will make good) or leave
One throat uncut, — if it be possible,

Hell, add to my afflictions!

Exit.

Mar. Is't not brave sport?
Greedy. Brave sport! I am sure it has ta'en away my stomach;

I do not like the sauce.

All. Nay, weep not, dearest, 320
Though it express your pity; what's decreed
Above, we cannot alter.

L. All. His threats move me
No scruple, madam.

Mar. Was it not a rare trick,
An it please your worship, to make the deed
nothing?

I can do twenty neater, if you please 325

To purchase and grow rich ; for I will be Such a solicitor and steward for you,
As never worshipful had.

Well. I do believe thee ;
But first discover the quaint<sup>1</sup> means you us'd
To raze out the conveyance ?

Mar. They are mysteries <sup>330</sup>
Not to be spoke in public : certain miuerals
Incorporated in the ink and wax —
Besides, he gave me nothing, but still fed me
With hopes and blows ; but that was the inducement <sup>334</sup>

To this conundrum. If it please your worship
To call to memory, this mad beast once caus'd me
To urge you or to drown or hang yourself ;
I'll do the like to him, if you command me.

Well. You are a rascal ! He that dares be false <sup>339</sup>

To a master, though unjust, will ne'er be true
To any other. Look not for reward
Or favour from me ; I will shun thy sight
As I would do a basilisk's. Thank my pity
If thou keep thy ears ; howe'er, I will take order
Your practice shall be silenc'd.

Greedy. I'll commit him, <sup>345</sup>
If you'll have me, sir.

Well. That were to little purpose ;
His conscience be his prison. Not a word,
But instantly be gone.

Ord. Take this kick with you.
Furn. And this.

Furn. If that I had my cleaver here,
I would divide your knave's head,

Mar. This is the haven <sup>350</sup>
False servants still arrive at. Exit.

Re-enter OVERREACH.

L. All. Come again !

Lov. Fear not, I am your guard.
Well. His looks are ghastly.

Willdo. Some little time I have spent, under your favours,
In physical studies, and if my judgment err not,
He's mad beyond recovery : but observe him,
And look to yourselves.

Over. Why, is not the whole world
Included in myself ? To what use then <sup>357</sup>

Are friends and servants ? Say there were a squadron

Of pikes, lin'd through with shot, when I am mounted

Upon my injuries, shall I fear to charge 'em ?
No : I'll through the battalia, and, that routed,

Flourishing his sword sheathed.<sup>2</sup>
I'll fall to execution — Ha ! I am feeble : <sup>362</sup>

Some undone widow sits upon mine arm,
And takes away the use of 't ; and my sword,

Glud to my scabbard with wrong'd orphans'
tears, <sup>365</sup>

Will not be drawn. Ha ! what are these ? Sure, hangmen

That come to bind my hands, and then to drag me
Before the judgment-seat : now they are new shapes,

And do appear like Furies, with steel whips <sup>369</sup>

To scourge my ulcerous soul. Shall I then fall Ingloriously, and yield ? No ; spite of Fate,
I will be forc'd to hell like to myself.

Though you were legions of accursed spirits,
This would I fly among you,
[Kushes forward and flings himself on the ground.]

Well. There's no help ;
Disarm him first, then bind him.

Greedy. Take a mittimus. <sup>375</sup>
And carry him to Bedlam.

Lov. How he foams !
Well. And bites the earth !

Willdo. Carry him to some dark room,
There try what art can do for his recovery.

Marg. O my dear father !
They force OVERREACH off.

All. You must be patient, mistress. <sup>380</sup>
Lov. Here is a precedent to teach wicked
men

That when they leave religion, and turn atheists,

Their own abilities leave 'em. Pray you take comfort,

I will endeavour you shall be his guardians
In his distractions : and for your land, Master

Wellborn,

Be it good or ill in law, I'll be an umpire <sup>385</sup>
Between you, and this, th' undoubted heir

Of Sir Giles Overreach. For me, here's the anchor

That I must fix on.
All. What you shall determine,

My lord, I will allow of.
Well. 'Tis the language <sup>389</sup>

That I speak too ; but there is something else
Beside the repossession of my land,

And payment of my debts, that I must practise.

I had a reputation, but 't was lost
In my loose course, and until I redeem it

Some noble way, I am but half made up. <sup>395</sup>

It is a time of action ; if your lordship
Will please to confer a company upon me

In your command, I doubt not in my service
To my king and country but I shall do something

That may make me right again.
Lov. Your suit is granted <sup>400</sup>

And you lov'd for the motion.
Well. [coming forward.] Nothing wants then

But your allowance —

THE EPILOGUE

BUT your allowance. and in that our all
Is comprehended ; it being known, nor we,

Nor he that wrote the comedy, can be free <sup>405</sup>
Without your manumission ; which if you

Grant willingly, as a fair favour due
To the poet's and our labours, (as you may,

For we despair not, gentlemen, of the play.)
We jointly shall profess your grace hath might

To teach us action, and him how to write. <sup>411</sup>
[Exeunt.]

<sup>3</sup> A writ of committal.

PROLOGUE

OUR scene is Sparta. He whose best of art
Hath drawn this piece calls it THE BROKEN HEART.
The title lends no expectation here
Of apish laughter, or of some lame jeer
At place or persons; no pretended clause
Of jests fit for a brothel courts applause
From vulgar admiration: such low songs,
Tun'd to unchaste ears, suit not modest tongues.
The Virgin Sisters then deserv'd fresh bays
When Innocence and Sweetness crown'd their lays;
Then vices gasp'd for breath, whose whole commerce
Was whipp'd to exile by unblushing verse.
This law we keep in our presentment now,
Not to take freedom more than we allow;
What may be here thought fiction,<sup>2</sup> when time's youth
Wanted some riper years, was known a truth:
In which, if words have cloth'd the subject right,
You may partake a pity with delight.

ACT I

SCENE I.<sup>3</sup>

Enter CROTON and ORGILUS.

Crot. Dally not further; I will know the reason
That speeds thee to this journey.
Org. Reason! good sir,
I can yield many.
Crot. Give me one, a good one;
Such I expect, and ere we part must have.

Athens! Pray, why to Athens? You intend not
To kick against the world, turn cynic, stoic,
Or read the logic lecture, or become
An Areopagite,<sup>4</sup> and judge in cases
Touching the commonwealth; for, as I take it,
The budding of your chin cannot prognosticate
So grave an honour.

Org. All this I acknowledge. <sup>11</sup>
Crot. You do! Then, son, if books and love of knowledge
Inflame you to this travel, here in Sparta
You may as freely study.

<sup>4</sup> A member of the Areopagus, the highest judicial court in Athens.

Org. 'T is not that, sir.
Crot. Not that, sir! As a father, I command thee 15

To acquaint me with the truth.

Org. Thus I obey ye.
 After so many quarrels as dissension,
 Fury, and rage had broacht in blood, and sometimes

With death to such confederates as sided
 With now-dead Thrasus and yourself, my lord;
 Our present king, Amyclas, reconcil'd 21
 Your eager swords and seal'd a gentle peace:
 Friends you profest yourselves; which to confirm,

A resolution for a lasting league
 Betwixt your families was entertain'd, 28
 By joining in a Hymenean bond
 Me and the fair Penthea, only daughter
 To Thrasus.

Crot. What of this?

Org. Much, much, dear sir.
 A freedom of converse, an interchange
 Of holy and chaste love, so fixt our souls 30
 In a firm growth of union, that no time
 Can eat into the pledge: we had enjoy'd
 The sweets our vows expected, had not cruelty
 Prevented all those triumphs we prepar'd for,
 By Thrasus his untimely death.

Crot. Most certain. 35

Org. From this time sprouted up that poisonous stalk

Of aconite, whose ripened fruit hath ravish't
 All health, all comfort of a happy life;
 For Ithocles, her brother, proud of youth,
 And prouder in his power, nourisht closely 40
 The memory of former discontents,
 To glory in revenge. By cunning partly,
 Partly by threats, 'a woos at once and forces
 His virtuous sister to admit a marriage
 With Bassanes, a nobleman, in honour 45
 And riches, I confess, beyond my fortunes.

Crot. All this is no sound reason to impor-
 tune
 My leave for thy departure.

Org. Now it follows.
 Beauteous Penthea, wedded to this torture
 By an insulting brother, being secretly 50
 Compell'd to yield her virgin freedom up
 To him who never can usurp her heart,
 Before contracted mine, is now so yok'd
 To a most barbarous thralldrom, misery,
 Affliction, that he savours not humanity, 55
 Whose sorrow melts not into more than pity
 In hearing but her name.

Crot. As how, pray?

Org. Bassanes,
 The man that calls her wife, considers truly
 What heaven of perfections he is lord of
 By thinking fair Penthea his: this thought 60
 Begets a kind of monster-love, which love
 Is nurse unto a fear so strong and servile
 As brands all dotage with a jealousy:
 All eyes who gaze upon that shrine of beauty
 He doth resolve<sup>1</sup> do homage to the miracle; 65
 Some one, he is assur'd, may now or then,

If opportunity but sort,<sup>2</sup> prevail.
 So much, out of a self-unworthiness,
 His fears transport him; not that he finds
 cause

In her obedience, but his own distrust. 70
Crot. You spin out your discourse.

Org. My griefs are violent:
 For knowing how the maid was heretofore
 Courted by me, his jealousies grow wild
 That I should steal again into her favours,
 And undermine her virtues; which the gods 75 Know I nor dare nor dream of. Hence, from
 hence

I undertake a voluntary exile;
 First, by my absence to take off the cares
 Of jealous Bassanes; but chiefly, sir,
 To free Penthea from a hell on earth; 80
 Lastly, to lose the memory of something
 Her presence makes to live in me afresh.

Crot. Enough, my Orgilus, enough. To Athens,

I give a full consent. — Alas, good lady! —
 We shall hear from thee often?

Org. Often. See, 85

Crot. Thy sister comes to give a farewell.

Enter EUPHRANEA.

Euph. Brother!
Org. Euphranea, thus upon thy cheeks I print

A brother's kiss; more careful of thine honour,
 Thy health, and thy well-doing, than my life.
 Before we part, in presence of our father, 90
 I must prefer a suit t' ye.

Euph. You may style it,
 My brother, a command.

Org. That you will promise
 To pass never to any man, however Worthy, your faith, till, with our father's
 leave,

I give a free consent. An easy motion! 95
Crot. I'll promise for her, Orgilus.

Org. Your pardon;
 Euphranea's oath must yield me satisfaction.
Euph. By Vesta's sacred fires I swear.

Crot. And I,
 By Great Apollo's beams, join in the vow,
 Not without thy allowance to bestow her 100
 On any living.

Org. Dear Euphranea,
 Mistake me not: far, far 't is from my thought,
 As far from any wish of mine, to hinder
 Preferment to an honourable bed
 Or fitting fortune; thou art young and handsome; 105

And 't were injustice, — more, a tyranny, —
 Not to advance thy merit. Trust me, sister,
 It shall be my first care to see thee match'd
 As may become thy choice and our contents. 109
 I have your oath.

Euph. You have. But mean you, brother,
 To leave us, as you say?

Crot. Ay, ay, Euphranea;

<sup>2</sup> Agree.

He has just grounds direct him. I will prove
A father and a brother to thee.

Euph. Heaven
Does look into the secrets of all hearts:
Gods, you have mercy with ye, else —

Crot. Doubt nothing; 115
Thy brother will return in safety to us.

Org. Souls sunk in sorrows never are without
'em;

They change fresh airs, but bear their griefs about 'em. Exeunt omnes.

SCENE II.<sup>1</sup>

Flourish. Enter AMYCLAS the King, ARMOS-TES, PROPHILUS, [Courtiers,] and Attendants.

Amy. The Spartan gods are gracious; our humility

Shall bend before their altars, and perfume
Their temples with abundant sacrifice.

See, lords, Amyclas, your old king, is ent'ring
Into his youth again! I shall shake off 5

This silver badge of age, and change this snow
For hairs as gay as are Apollo's locks;
Our heart leaps in new vigour.

Arm. May old time
Run back to double your long life, great sir!

Amy. It will, it must, Armotes: thy bold
nephew, 10

Death-braving Ithocles, brings to our gates
Triumphs and peace upon his conquering
sword.

Laconia is a monarchy at length;
Hath in this latter war trod under foot

Messene's pride; Messene bows her neck 15
To Lacedaemon's royalty. O, 't was
A glorious victory, and doth deserve

More than a chronicle — a temple, lords,
A temple to the name of Ithocles. —

Where didst thou leave him, Prophilus?
Pro. At Pephon, 20

Most gracious sovereign; twenty of the noblest
Of the Messenians there attend your pleasure,

For such conditions as you shall propose
In settling peace, and liberty of life.

Amy. When comes your friend, the general?
Pro. He promis'd 25

To follow with all speed convenient.

Enter CALANTHA, EUPHRANEA; CHRISTALLA and PHILEMA [with a garland,] and CROTO-LON.

Amy. Our daughter! — Dear Calantha, the happy news,

The conquest of Messene, hath already Enrich'd thy knowledge.

Cal. With the circumstance
And manner of the fight, related faithfully 30

By Prophilus himself. — But, pray, sir, tell me
How doth the youthful general demean

His actions in these fortunes?
Pro. Excellent princess,

Your own fair eyes may soon report a truth
Unto your judgment, with what moderation, 35

1 A room in the palace.

Calmness of nature, measure, bounds, and limits
Of thankfulness and joy, 'a doth digest
Such amplitude of his success as would

In others, moulded of a spirit less clear,
Advance 'em to comparison with heaven: 40

But Ithocles —
Cal. Your friend —

Pro. He is so, madam,
In which the period of my fate consists:

He, in this firmament of honour, stands
Like a star fixt, not mov'd with any thunder

Of popular applause or sudden lightning 45
Of self-opinion; he hath serv'd his country,
And thinks 't was but his duty.

Crot. You describe
A miracle of man.

Amy. Such, Crotolon,
On forfeit of a king's word, thou wilt find

him. — Flourish. 49
Hark, warning of his coming! All attend him.

Enter ITHOCLES, HEMOPHIL, and GRONEAS;
the rest of the Lords ushering him in.

Return into these arms, thy home, thy sanctuary,

Delight of Sparta, treasure of my bosom,
Mine own, own Ithocles!

Ith. Your humblest subject.
Arm. Proud of the blood I claim an interest

in,
As brother to thy mother, I embrace thee, 55

Right noble nephew.

Ith. Sir, your love's too partial.
Crot. Our country speaks by me, who by thy

valour,
Wisdom, and service, shares in this great action;

Returning thee, in part of thy due merits,
A general welcome.

Ith. You exceed in bounty. 60
Cal. Christalla, Philema, the chaplet, [Takes

the chaplet from them.] — Ithocles,
Upon the wings of Fame the singular

And chosen fortune of an high attempt
Is borne so past the view of common sight,

That I myself with mine own hands have
wrought, 65

To crown thy temples, this provincial garland: 2
Accept, wear, and enjoy it as our gift

Deserv'd, not purchas'd.

Ith. Y' are a royal maid.
Amy. She is in all our daughter.

Ith. Let me blush,
Acknowledging how poorly I have serv'd, 70

What nothings I have done, compar'd with th'
honours

Heap'd on the issue of a willing mind;
In that lay mine ability, that only:

For who is he so sluggish from his birth,
So little worthy of a name or country, 75

That owes not out of gratitude for life
A debt of service, in what kind soever

Safety or counsel of the commonwealth
Requires, for payment?

2 The laurel wreath . . . conferred on those who added a province to the empire. (Gifford.)

Cal. 'A speaks truth.
It. Whom heaven
 Is pleas'd to style victorious, there to such <sup>80</sup>
 Applause runs madding, like the drunken priests
 In Bacchus' sacrifices, without reason,
 Voicing the leader-on a demi-god;
 Whenas, indeed, each common soldier's blood
 Drops down as current coin in that hard purchase <sup>85</sup>
 As his whose much more delicate condition
 Hath suckt the milk of ease: judgment commands,
 But resolution executes. I use not,
 Before this royal presence, these fit slights <sup>1</sup>
 As in contempt of such as can direct; <sup>90</sup>
 My speech hath other end; not to attribute All praise to one man's fortune, which is strengthen'd
 By many hands. For instance, here is Prophilus,
 A gentleman — I cannot flatter truth—
 Of much desert; and, though in other rank, <sup>95</sup>
 Both Hemophil and Gronneas were not missing
 To wish their country's peace; for, in a word,
 All there did strive their best, and 't was our duty.
Amy. Courtiers turn soldiers! — We vouchsafe our hand.
 [HEMOPHIL and GRONEAS kiss his
 hand.]
 Observe your great example.
Hem. With all diligence. <sup>100</sup>
Gro. Obsequiously and hourly.
Amy. Some repose
 After these toils is <sup>2</sup> needful. We must think
 on Conditions for the conquered; they expect <sup>3</sup>
 'em.
 On! — Come, my Ithocles.
Euph. Sir, with your favour,
 I need not a supporter.
Pro. Fate instructs me. <sup>105</sup>
Exeunt. HEMOPHIL stays CHRIS-TALLA; GRONEAS, PHILEMA.
Chris. With me?
Phil. Indeed, I dare not stay.
Hem. Sweet lady.
 Soldiers are blunt, — your lip.
Chris. Fie, this is rudeness:
 You went not hence such creatures.
Gro. Spirit of valour
 Is of a mounting nature.
Phil. It appears so.—
 Pray, in earnest, how many men apiece <sup>110</sup>
 Have you two been the death of?
Gro. 'Faith, not many;
 We were compos'd of mercy.
Hem. For our daring,
 You heard the general's approbation
 Before the king.
Chris. You "wish'd your country's peace;"
 That show'd your charity: where are your spoils, <sup>115</sup>
 Such as the soldier fights for?

<sup>1</sup> Appropriately belittling terms.<sup>2</sup> Q. are. <sup>3</sup> Await.

Phil. They are coming.
Chris. By the next carrier, are they not?
Gro. Sweet Philema,
 When I was in the thickest of mine enemies,
 Slashing off one man's head, another's nose,
 Another's arms and legs,—
Phil. And all together. <sup>120</sup>
Gro. Then would I with a sigh remember
 thee,
 And cry "Dear Philema, 'tis for thy sake
 I do these deeds of wonder!" — Dost not love
 me
 With all thy heart now?
Phil. Now as heretofore.
 I have not put my love to use; the principal <sup>125</sup>
 Will hardly yield an interest.
Gro. By Mars,
 I'll marry thee!
Phil. By Vulcan, you're forsworn,
 Except my mind do alter strangely.
Gro. One word.
Chris. You lie beyond all modesty: — bear me. <sup>130</sup>
Hem. I'll make thee mistress of a city; 't is Mine own by conquest.
Chris. By petition; sue for 't
In forma pauperis. — City! kennel. — Gallants,
 Off with your feathers, put on aprons, gallants;
 Learn to reel, thrum,<sup>4</sup> or trim a lady's dog, <sup>135</sup>
 And be good quiet souls of peace, hobgoblins!
Hem. Christalla!
Chris. Practise to drill hogs, in hope
 To share in the acorns. — Soldiers! corncutters,
 But not so valiant; they ofttimes draw blood,
 Which you durst never do. When you have practis'd
 More wit or more civility, we'll rank ye <sup>140</sup>
 I' th' list of men: till then, brave things-at-
 arms,
 Dare not to speak to us, — most potent Gro-neas! —
Phil. And Hemophil the hardy! — at your services.
Exeunt CHRISTALLA and PHILEMA.
Gro. They scorn us as they did before we went.
Hem. Hang 'em! let us scorn them, and be reveng'd. <sup>145</sup>
Gro. Shall we?
Hem. We will: and when we slight them thus,
 Instead of following them, they'll follow us;
 It is a woman's nature,
Gro. 'T is a scurvy one. Exeunt.

SCENE III.<sup>5</sup>

Enter TECNICUS, a philosopher, and ORGILUS disguised like a Scholar of his.
Tec. Tempt not the stars; young man, thou canst not play
 With the severity of fate: this change
 Of habit and disguise in outward view
 Hides not the secrets of thy soul within thee
 From their quick-piercing eyes, which dive at all times <sup>5</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Weave. <sup>5</sup> The gardens of the palace. A grove.

Down to thy thoughts : in thy aspect I note
A consequence of danger.

Org. Give me leave,
Grave Tecnicus, without foredooming destiny,
Under thy roof to ease my silent griefs,
By applying to my hidden wounds the balm 10
Of thy oraculous lectures. If my fortune
Run such a crooked by-way as to wrest
My steps to ruin, yet thy learned precepts
Shall call me back and set my footings straight.
I will not court the world.

Tec. Ah, Orgilus, 15
Neglects in young men of delights and life
Run often to extremities ; they care not
For harms to others who contemn their own.

Org. But I, most learned artist, am not so
much

At odds with nature that I grudge the thrift 20
Of any true deserver ; nor doth malice
Of present hopes so check them with despair
As that I yield to thought of more affliction
Than what is incident to frailty : wherefore
Impute not this retired course of living 25
Some little time to any other cause
Than what I justly render, — the information
Of an unsettled mind ; as the effect
Must clearly witness.

Tec. Spirit of truth inspire thee !
On these conditions I conceal thy change, 30
And willingly admit thee for an auditor. —
I'll to my study.

Org. I to contemplations
In these delightful walks. — Exit TECNICUS.

Thus metamorphos'd
I may without suspicion hearken after
Pentheæ's usage and Euphraneæ's faith. 35
Love, thou art full of mystery ! The deities Themselves are not secure<sup>1</sup> in searching out
The secrets of those flames, which, hidden,
waste

A breast made tributary to the laws
Of beauty : physic yet hath never found 40
A remedy to cure a lover's wound. —
Ha ! who are those that cross yon private walk
Into the shadowing grove in amorous foldings ?

PROPHILUS passeth over, supporting<sup>2</sup> EUPHRA-
NEA, and whispering.

My sister ! O, my sister ! 't is Euphraneæ
With Prophilus : supported too ! I would 45
It were an apparition ! Prophilus
Is Ithocles his friend ; it strangely puzzles me.
Again ! help me, my book ; this scholar's habit
Must stand my privilege : my mind is busy,
Mine eyes and ears are open.

Walks by, reading.

Re-enter PROPHILUS and EUPHRANEÆ.

Pro. Do not waste 50
The span of this stol'n time, lent by the gods
For precious use, in niceness.<sup>3</sup> Bright Eu-phraneæ,
Should I repeat old vows, or study new,
For purchase of belief to my desires, —

<sup>3</sup> Coyness ; over-particular scruples.

Org. [Aside.] Desires !

Pro. My service, my integrity, — 65

Org. [Aside.] That's better.

Pro. I should but repeat a lesson
Oft conn'd without a prompter but thine eyes.
My love is honourable.

Org. [Aside.] So was mine
To my Pentheæ, chastely honourable.

Pro. Nor wants there more addition to my wish 60

Of happiness than having thee a wife ;
Already sure of Ithocles, a friend
Firm and unalterable.

Org. [Aside.] But a brother
More cruel than the grave.

Euph. What can you look for,
In answer to your noble protestations, 65
From an unskilful maid, but language suited
To a divided mind ?

Org. [Aside.] Hold out, Euphraneæ !

Euph. Know, Prophilus, I never undervalu'd,
From the first time you mentioned worthy love,
Your merit, means, or person : it had been 70
A fault of judgment in me, and a dulness
In my affections, not to weigh and thank
My better stars that offered me the grace
Of so much blissfulness. For, to speak truth,
The law of my desires kept equal pace 75
With yours ; nor have I left that resolution :
But only, in a word, whatever choice
Lives nearest in my heart must first procure
Consent both from my father and my brother,
Ere he can own me his.

Org. [Aside.] She is forsworn else. 80
Pro. Leave me that task.

Euph. My brother, ere he parted
To Athens, had my oath.

Org. [Aside.] Yes, yes, 'a had, sure.
Pro. I doubt not, with the means the court supplies,
But to prevail at pleasure.

Org. [Aside.] Very likely !
Pro. Meantime, best, dearest, I may build my hopes 85

On the foundation of thy constant suff'rance
In any opposition.

Euph. Death shall sooner
Divorce life and the joys I have in living
Than my chaste vows from truth.

Pro. On thy fair hand
I seal the like. 90

Org. [Aside.] There is no faith in woman.
Passion, O, be contain'd ! My very heart-strings
Are on the tenters.<sup>4</sup>

Euph. Sir, we are overheard.
Cupid protect us ! 'T was a stirring, sir,
Of some one near.

Pro. Your fears are needless, lady ; 95
None have access into these private pleasures
Except some near in court, or bosom-student
From Tecnicus his oratory, granted
By special favour lately from the king
Unto the grave philosopher.

Euph. Methinks 100
I hear one talking to himself, — I see him.

<sup>4</sup> Hooks for stretching cloth ; on the rack.

Pro. 'Tis a poor scholar, as I told you, lady.

Org. [Aside.] I am discovered. — [Half aloud to himself, as if studying.] Say it; is it possible,

With a smooth tongue, a leering countenance,
Flattery, or force of reason — I come t' ye,
sir — 105

To turn or to appease the raging sea?
Answer to that. — Your art! what art to catch
And hold fast in a net the sun's small atoms?
No, no; they 'll out, they 'll out: ye may as easily

Outrun a cloud driven by a northern blast 110
As fiddle-faddle so! Peace, or speak sense.

Euph. Call you this thing a scholar? 'Las,
he's lunatic.

Pro. Observe him, sweet; 't is but his recreation.

Org. But will you hear a little? You're so tetchy,

You keep no rule in argument. Philosophy 115
Works not upon impossibilities,

But natural conclusions. — Mew! — absurd!
The metaphysics are but speculations

Of the celestial bodies, or such accidents
As not mixt perfectly, in the air engend'red 120

Appear to us unnatural; that's all.
Prove it; yet, with a reverence to your gravity,
I'll balk illiterate sauciness, submitting

My sole opinion to the touch of writers.
Pro. Now let us fall in with him.

[They come forward.]
Ha, ha, ha! 125

Org. These apish boys, when they but taste the grammates<sup>1</sup>

And principles of theory, imagine
They can oppose their teachers. Confidence Leads many into errors.

Pro. By your leave, sir.
Euph. Are you a scholar, friend?

Org. I am, gay creature, 130
With pardon of your deities, a mushroom

On whom the dew of heaven drops now and
then;

The sun shines on me too, I thank his beams!
Sometime I feel their warmth; and eat and
sleep.

Pro. Does Tecnicus read to thee?
Org. Yes, forsooth, 135

He is my master surely; yonder door
Opens upon his study.

Pro. Happy creatures!
Such people toil not, sweet, in heats of state,

Nor sink in thaws of greatness; their affections
Keep order with the limits of their modesty; 140

Their love is love of virtue. — What's thy
name?

Org. Aplotes, sumptuous master, a poor
wretch.

Euph. Dost thou want anything?
Org. Books, Venus, books.

Pro. Lady, a new conceit comes in my thought,

And most available for both our comforts. 145
Euph. My lord, —

<sup>1</sup> Rudiments.

Pro. Whiles I endeavour to deserve
Your father's blessing to our loves, this scholar

May daily at some certain hours attend<sup>2</sup>
What notice I can write of my success, 149

Here in this grove, and give it to your hands;
The like from you to me: so can we never,

Barr'd of our mutual speech, want sure intelligence,

And thus our hearts may talk when our tongues cannot.

Euph. Occasion is most favourable; use it.
Pro. Aplotes, wilt thou wait us twice a day,

At nine i<sup>3</sup> the morning and at four at night, 158
Here in this bow, to convey such letters

As each shall send to other? Do it willingly, Safely, and secretly, and I will furnish

Thy study, or what else thou canst desire. 160
Org. Jove, make me thankful, thankful, I beseech thee,

Propitious Jove! I will prove sure and trusty:
You will not fail me books?

Pro. Nor aught besides Thy heart can wish. This lady's name's Eu-phraena,

Mine Propihilus.

Org. I have a pretty memory; 165
It must prove my best friend. I will not miss
One minute of the hours appointed.

Pro. Write
The books thou wouldst have bought thee in a
note,

Or take thyself some money.

Org. No, no money;
Money to scholars is a spirit invisible, 170

We dare not finger it: or books, or nothing.
Pro. Books of what sort thou wilt: do not forget

Our names.

Org. I warrant ye, I warrant ye.
Pro. Smile, Hymen, on the growth of our desires;

We'll feed thy torches with eternal fires! 175
Exeunt PROPHILUS and EUPHRANA.

Org. Put out thy torches, Hymen, or their
light

Shall meet a darkness of eternal night!
Inspire me, Mercury, with swift deceits.

Ingenious Fate has leapt into mine arms,
Beyond the compass of my brain.<sup>8</sup> Mortality 180

Creeps on the dung of earth, and cannot reach
The riddles which are purpos'd by the gods.

Great arts best write themselves in their own stories;

They die too basely who outlive their glories.
Exit.

ACT II

SCENE I.<sup>4</sup>

Enter BASSANES and PHULAS.

Bass. I'll have that window next the street
damm'd up;

<sup>2</sup> Wait for.

<sup>4</sup> A room in Bassanes' house.

It gives too full a prospect to temptation,
And courts a gazer's glances. There's a lust Committed by the eye, that sweats and travails,

Plots, wakes, contrives, till the deformed bear-
whelp,

Adultery, be lick'd into the act,
The very act. That light shall be damm'd up ;
D' ye hear, sir ?

Phu. I do hear, my lord ; a mason
Shall be provided suddenly.<sup>1</sup>

Bass. Some rogue, Some rogue,
Some rogue of your confederacy, — factor<sup>2</sup> 10
For slaves and strumpets ! — to convey close packets

From this spruce springal<sup>3</sup> and t' other youngster,

That gaudy earwig, or my lord your patron,
Whose pensioner you are. — I'll tear thy throat
out,

Son of a cat, ill-looking hound's-head, rip-up 15
Thy ulcerous maw, if I but scent a paper,
A scroll, but half as big as what can cover

A wart upon thy nose, a spot, a pimple,
Directed to my lady ; it may prove

A mystical preparative to lewdness. 20
Phu. Care shall be had : I will turn every thread

About me to an eye. — [Aside.] Here's a sweet
life !

Bass. The city housewives, cunning in the traffic

Of chamber merchandise, set all at price
By wholesale ; yet they wipe their mouths and simper,

Cull, 4 kisses, and cry "sweetheart," and stroke
the head 25

Which they have branch'd ;<sup>5</sup> and all is well
again !

Dull clods of dirt, who dare not feel the rubs
Stuck on the[ir] foreheads.

Phu. 'Tis a villanous world ;
One cannot hold his own in 't.

Bass. Dames at court, 30
Who flaunt in riots, run another bias ;<sup>6</sup>
Their pleasure heaves the patient ass that suffers

Up on the stilts of office, titles, incomes ;
Promotion justifies the shame, and sues for 't.

Poor honour, thou art stabb'd, and bleed'st to
death 35

By such unlawful hire ! The country mistress
Is yet more wary, and in blushes hides

Whatever trespass draws her troth to guilt.
But all are false : on this truth I am bold,

No woman but can fall, and doth, or would. —
Now for the newest news about the city ; 41

What blab the voices, sirrah ?
Phu. O, my lord,

The rarest, quaintest, strangest, tickling news
That ever —

Bass. Hey-day ! up and ride me, rascal !
What is 't ?

<sup>5</sup> Cuckolded: the inevitable jest on the cuckold's horns.

<sup>6</sup> Direction.

Phu. Forsooth, they say the king has mew'd<sup>7</sup> 45

All his gray beard, instead of which is budded
Another of a pure carnation colour,

Speckled with green and russet.
Bass. Ignorant block !

Phu. Yes, truly ; and 't is talkt about the streets

That, since Lord Ithocles came home, the lions
Never left roaring, at which noise the bears 51
Have danc'd their very hearts out.

Bass. Dance out thine too.
Phu. Besides, Lord Orgilus is fled to Athens
Upon a fiery dragon, and 't is thought

'A never can return.

Bass. Grant it, Apollo ! 55
Phu. Moreover, please your lordship, 't is reported

For certain, that whoever is found jealous
Without apparent proof that 's wife is wanton

Shall be divorce'd : but this is but she-news ;
I had it from a midwife. I have more yet. 60

Bass. Antic, no more ! Idiots and stupid fools Grate my calamities. Why to be fair

Should yield presumption of a faulty soul —
Look to the doors.

Phu. [Aside.] The horn of plenty crest him !
Exit.

Bass. Swarms of confusion huddle in my
thoughts 65

In rare distemper. — Beauty ! O, it is An unmatched blessing or a horrid curse.

Enter PENTHEA and GRAUSIS, an old Lady.

She comes, she comes ! so shoots the morning
forth,

Spangled with pearls of transparent dew. —
The way to poverty is to be rich, 70

As I in her am wealthy ; but for her,
In all contents a bankrupt. —

Lov'd Penthea !
How fares my heart's best joy ?

Graus. In sooth, not well,
She is so over-sad.

Bass. Leave chattering, magpie. —
Thy brother is return'd, sweet, safe, and honour'd 75

With a triumphant victory ; thou shalt visit
him :

We will to court, where, if it be thy pleasure,
Thou shalt appear in such a ravishing lustre

Of jewels above value, that the dames
Who brave it there, in rage to be outshin'd, 80

Shall hide them in their closets, and unseen
Fret in their tears ; whiles every wond'ring eye

Shall crave none other brightness but thy presence.

Choose thine own recreations ; be a queen
Of what delights thou fanciest best, what company, 85

What place, what times ; do anything, do all things

Youth can command, so thou wilt chase these clouds

From the pure firmament of thy fair looks.

<sup>7</sup> Moulded.

Grau. Now 'tis well said, my lord. — What, lady! laugh,
Be merry; time is precious.

Bass. [Aside.] Furies whip thee! <sup>90</sup>
Pen. Alas, my lord, this language to your hand-maid

Sounds as would music to the deaf; I need
No braveries nor cost of art to draw
The whiteness of my name into offence:
Let such, if any such there are, who covet <sup>95</sup>
A curiosity of admiration,
By laying-out their plenty to full view,
Appear in gaudy outsides; my attires
Shall suit the inward fashion of my mind;
From which, if your opinion, nobly plac'd, <sup>100</sup>
Change not the livery your words bestow,
My fortunes with my hopes are at the highest.

Bass. This house, methinks, stands somewhat too much inward,
It is too melancholy; we'll remove <sup>104</sup>
Nearer the court: or what thinks my Penthea
Of the delightful island we command?
Rule me as thou canst wish.

Pen. I am no mistress.
Whither you please, I must attend; all ways
Are alike pleasant to me.

Grau. Island; prison!
A prison is as gaysome: we'll no islands; <sup>110</sup> Marry, out upon 'em! Whom shall we see
there?

Sea-gulls, and porpoises, and water-rats,
And crabs, and mews, and dog-fish; goodly gear

For a young lady's dealing, — or an old one's!
On no terms islands; I'll be stew'd first.

Bass. [Aside to GRAUSIS.] <sup>115</sup>
You are a juggling bawd. — This sadness, sweetest,

Becomes not youthful blood. — [Aside to GRAUSIS.] I'll have you pounded. —

For my sake put on a more cheerful mirth;
Thou'lt mar thy cheeks, and make me old in
griefs. —

[Aside to GRAUSIS.] Damnable bitch-fox!

Grau. I am thick of hearing, <sup>120</sup> Still, when the wind blows southerly. — What think ye,

If your fresh lady breed young bones, my
lord?

Would not a chopping boy d'ye good at heart?
But, as you said —

Bass. [Aside to GRAUSIS.] I'll spit thee on a stake,

Or chop thee into collops!
Grau. Pray, speak louder. <sup>125</sup>
Sure, sure the wind blows south still.

Pen. Thou prat'st madly.
Bass. 'Tis very hot; I sweat extremely.

Re-enter PHULAS.

Now?

Phu. A herd of lords, sir.

Bass. Ha!

Phu. A flock of ladies.

Bass. Where?

Phu. Shoals of horses.

Bass. Peasant, how?

Phu. Caroches <sup>1</sup>
In drifts; th' one enter, th' other stand without, sir: <sup>150</sup>
And now I vanish. Exit.

Enter PROPHILUS, HEMOPHIL, GRONEAS, CHRISTALLA, and PHILEMA.

Pro. Noble Bassanes!

Bass. Most welcome, Prophilus; ladies, gentlemen,

To all my heart is open; you all honour me, — [Aside.] A tympany <sup>2</sup> swells in my head already, —

Honour me bountifully. — [Aside.] How they flutter, <sup>125</sup>

Waqtails and jays together!
Pro. From your brother

By virtue of your love to him, I require
Your instant presence, fairest.

Pen. He is well, sir?

Pro. The gods preserve him ever! Yet, dear
beauty,

I find some alteration in him lately,
Since his return to Sparta. — My good lord,
I pray, use no delay. <sup>140</sup>

Bass. We had not needed
An invitation, if his sister's health

Had not fallen into question. — Haste, Penthea,
Slack not a minute. — Lead the way, good
Prophilus; <sup>145</sup>

I'll follow step by step.

Pro. Your arm, fair madam.

Execunt all but BASSANES and GRAUSIS.
Bass. One word with your old bawdship: th'
hadst been better

Rail'd at the sins <sup>3</sup> thou worshipp'st than have thwarted

My will: I'll use thee cursedly.
Grau. You dote, <sup>150</sup>

You are beside yourself. A politician
In jealousy? No, y' are too gross, too vulgar.

Fish, teach not me my trade; I know my cue.
My crossing you sinks me into her trust,

By which I shall know all; my trade's a sure
one.

Bass. Forgive me, Grausis, 't was consideration <sup>155</sup>

I relish'd not; <sup>4</sup> but have a care now.
Grau. Fear not,

I am no new-come-to 't.
Bass. Thy life's upon it,
And so is mine. My agonies are infinite.

Execunt.

SCENE II.<sup>5</sup>

Enter ITHOCLES, alone.

Ith. Ambition! 'tis of vipers' breed: it gnaws

A passage through the womb that gave it motion.

Ambition, like a seeled <sup>6</sup> dove, mounts upward,
Higher and higher still, to perch on clouds,
But tumbles headlong down with heavier ruin.

So squibs and crackers fly into the air, 6
Then, only breaking with a noise, they vanish
In stench and smoke. Morality, appli'd
To timely practice, keeps the soul in tune,
At whose sweet music all our actions dance: 10
But this is form of books and school-tradition;
It physics not the sickness of a mind
Broken with griefs: strong fevers are not eas'd
With counsel, but with best receipts and means;
Means, speedy means and certain; that's the 16
cure.

Enter ARMOSTES and CROTOLON.

Arm. You stick, Lord Crotolon, upon a point
Too nice and too unnecessary; Prophilus
Is every way desertful. I am confident
Your wisdom is too ripe to need instruction
From your son's tutelage.

Crot. Yet not so ripe, 20
My Lord Armostes, that it dares to dote
Upon the painted meat<sup>1</sup> of smooth persuasion,
Which tempts me to a breach of faith.

Ith. Not yet
Resolv'd, my lord? Why, if your son's consent
Be so available, we'll write to Athens 25
For his repair to Sparta. The king's hand Will join with our desires; he has been mov'd to 't.

Arm. Yes, and the king himself imp'rtun'd
Crotolon
For a dispatch.

Crot. Kings may command; their wills
Are laws not to be questioned.

Ith. By this marriage 30
You knit an union so devout, so hearty,
Between your loves to me and mine to yours,
As if mine own blood had an interest in it;
For Prophilus is mine, and I am his.

Crot. My lord, my lord! —
Ith. What, good sir? Speak your thought. 35
Crot. Had this sincerity been real once,
My Orgilus had not been now unwiv'd,
Nor your lost sister buried in a bride-bed.

Your uncle here, Armostes, knows this truth;
For had your father Thrasus liv'd, — but peace
Dwell in his grave! I have done.

Arm. Y' are bold and bitter. 41
Ith. [Aside.] 'A presses home the injury; it smarts, —

No reprehensions, uncle; I deserve 'em.
Yet, gentle sir, consider what the heat
Of an unsteady youth, a giddy brain, 45
Green indiscretion, flattery of greatness,
Rawnness of judgment, wilfulness in folly,
Thoughts vagrant as the wind and as uncertain,
Might lead a boy in years to: — 't was a fault,
A capital fault; for then I could not dive 50
Into the secrets of commanding love; Since when, experience, by the extremes<sup>2</sup> (in others),

Hath forc'd me collect.<sup>3</sup> And, trust me, Crotolon,

I will redeem those wrongs with any service
Your satisfaction can require for current. 55

Arm. The<sup>4</sup> acknowledgment is satisfaction:
What would you more?

Crot. I'm conquer'd: if Euphranea
Herself admit the motion, let it be so;
I doubt not my son's liking.

Ith. Use my fortunes, Life, power, sword, and heart, — all are your
own. 60

Arm. The princess, with your sister.

Enter CALANTHA, PENTHEA, EUPHRANEA, CHRISTALLA, PHILEMA, GRAUSIS, BASSANES, and PROPHILUS.

Cal. I present ye
A stranger here in court, my lord; for did not Desire of seeing you draw her abroad,
We had not been made happy in her company.

Ith. You are a gracious princess. — Sister, wedlock 65

Holds too severe a passion in your nature,
Which can engross all duty to your husband,
Without attendance on so dear a mistress. —
[To BASSANES.] 'Tis not my brother's pleasure,

I presume,
T'immure her in a chamber.

Bass. 'Tis her will; 70
She governs her own hours. Noble Ithocles,
We thank the gods for your success and welfare:

Our lady has of late been indispos'd,
Else we had waited on you with the first.

Ith. How does Penthea now?
Pen. You best know, brother, 75
From whom my health and comforts are deriv'd.

Bass. [Aside.] I like the answer well; 'tis sad and modest.

There may be tricks yet, tricks. — Have an eye, Grausis!

Cal. Now, Crotolon, the suit we join'd in must not

Fall by too long demur.
Crot. 'Tis granted, princess, 80
For my part.

Arm. With condition, that his son
Favour the contract.

Cal. Such delay is easy. —
The joys of marriage make thee, Prophilus,
A proud deserver of Euphranea's love,
And her of thy desert!

Pro. Most sweetly gracious! 85
Bass. The joys of marriage are the heaven on earth,

Life's paradise, great princess, the soul's quiet,
Sinews of concord, earthly immortality,
Eternity of pleasures; — no restoratives
Like to a constant woman! — [Aside.] But where is she? 90

'T would puzzle all the gods but to create
Such a new monster. — I can speak by proof,
For I rest in Elysium; 'tis my happiness.

Crot. Euphranea, how are you resolv'd, speak freely,

In your affections to this gentleman? 95

Euph. Nor more nor less than as his love assures me;

<sup>4</sup> Q. Thy.

Which — if your liking with my brother's warrants —

I cannot but approve in all points worthy.

Crot. So, so! — [To PROPHILUS.] I know your answer.

Ith. 'T had been pity
To sunder hearts so equally consented. 100

Enter HEMOPHIL.

Hem. The king, Lord Ithocles, commands your presence; —

And, fairest princess, yours.

Cal. We will attend him.

Enter GRONEAS.

Gro. Where are the lords? All must unto the
king

Without delay: the Prince of Argos —

Cal. Well, sir?

Gro. Is coming to the court, sweet lady.

Cal. How! 105

The Prince of Argos?

Gro. 'T was my fortune, madam,
'T enjoy the honour of these happy tidings.

Ith. Penthea! —

Pen. Brother?

Ith. Let me an hour hence

Meet you alone within the palace-grove; 109

I have some secret with you. — Prithee, friend,

Conduct her thither, and have special care

The walks be clear'd of any to disturb us.

Pro. I shall.

Bass. [Aside.] How's that?

Ith. Alone, pray be alone. —

I am your creature, princess. — On, my lords!

Exeunt all but BASSANES.

Bass. Alone! alone! What means that word

"alone"? 115

Why might not I be there? — hum! — he's her brother.

Brothers and sisters are but flesh and blood,

And this same whoreson court-ease is tempta-

tion

To a rebellion in the veins; — besides, 119

His fine friend Prophilus must be her guardian:

Why may not he dispatch a business nimbly

Before the other come? — or — pand'ring, pand-d'ring

For one another, — be 't to sister, mother,

Wife, cousin, anything, — 'mongst youths of mettle

Is in request; it is so — stubborn fate! 125

But if I be a cuckold, and can know it,

I will be fell, and fell.

Re-enter GRONEAS.

Gro. My lord, y'are call'd for.

Bass. Most heartily I thank ye. Where's my wife, pray?

Gro. Retir'd amongst the ladies.

Bass. Still I thank ye.

There's an old waiter with her; saw you her

too? 130

Gro. She sits i' th' presence-lobby fast asleep,

sir.

Bass. Asleep! asleep, sir!

Gro. Is your lordship troubled?
You will not to the king?

Bass. Your humblest vassal.

Gro. Your servant, my good lord.

Bass. I wait your footsteps.

Exeunt.

SCENE III.<sup>1</sup>

Enter PROPHILUS and PENTHEA.

Pro. In this walk, lady, will your brother find
you:

And, with your favour, give me leave a little

To work a preparation. In his fashion

I have observ'd of late some kind of slackness

To such alacrity as nature [once] 5

And custom took delight in; sadness grows

Upon his recreations, which he boards

In such a willing silence, that to question

The grounds will argue little skill in friendship,

And less good manners.

Pen. Sir, I'm not inquisitive 10

Of secrecies without an invitation.

Pro. With pardon, lady, not a syllable

Of mine implies so rude a sense; the drift —

Enter ORGILUS, [disguised as before.]

[To ORG.] Do thy best

To make this lady merry for an hour. Exit. 15

Org. Your will shall be a law, sir.

Pen. Prithee, leave me;

I have some private thoughts I would account

with;

Use thou thine own.

Org. Speak on, fair nymph; our souls

Can dance as well to music of the spheres

As any's who have feasted with the gods. 20

Pen. Your school-terms are too troublesome.

Org. What Heaven

Refines mortality from dross of earth

But such as uncompounded beauty hallows

With glorified perfection?

Pen. Set thy wits

In a less wild proportion.

Org. Time can never 25

On the white table of unguilty faith

Write counterfeit dishonour; turn those eyes,

The arrows of pure love, upon that fire,

Which once rose to a flame, perfum'd with vows

As sweetly scented as the incense smoking 30

On Vesta's altars, . . . . .<sup>2</sup>

. . . . . the holiest odours, virgin's tears,

. . . . . sprinkled, like dews, to feed 'em

And to increase their fervour.

Pen. Be not frantic.

Org. All pleasures are but mere imagination,

Feeding the hungry appetite with steam. 35

And sight of banquet, whilst the body pines,

Not relishing the real taste of food:

Such is the leanness of a heart divided

From intercourse of troth-contracted loves; 40

as the incense smoking

The holiest altars, virgin tears (like
On Vesta's odours) sprinkled dews to feed 'em,
And to increase.

No horror should deface, that precious figure
Seal'd with the lively stamp of equal souls.

Pen. Away! some Fury hath bewitch'd thy tongue.

The breath of ignorance, that flies from thence,
Ripens a knowledge in me of afflictions <sup>45</sup>
Above all sufferance. — Thing of talk, begone!
Begone, without reply!

Org. Be just, Penthea,
In thy commands; when thou send'st forth a doom

Of banishment, know first on whom it lights.
Thus I take off the shroud, in which my cares <sup>50</sup>
Are folded up from view of common eyes.

[Throws off his Scholar's dress.]

What is thy sentence next?

Pen. Rash man! thou layest
A blemish on mine honour, with the hazard
Of thy too-desperate life: yet I profess,
By all the laws of ceremonious wedlock, <sup>55</sup>
I have not given admittance to one thought
Of female change since cruelty enforc'd
Divorce betwixt my body and my heart.
Why would you fall from goodness thus?

Org. O, rather Examine me, how I could live to say <sup>60</sup>
I have been much, much wrong'd. 'Tis for thy
sake

I put on this imposture: dear Penthea,
If thy soft bosom be not turn'd to marble,
Thou 't pity our calamities; my interest
Confirms me thou art mine still.

Pen. Lend your hand; <sup>65</sup>
With both of mine I clasp it thus, thus kiss it,
Thus kneel before ye.

Org. You instruct my duty.
Pen. We may stand up. — Have you aught else to urge

Of new demand? As for the old, forget it;
'T is buried in an everlasting silence, <sup>70</sup>
And shall be, shall be ever. What more would
ye?

Org. I would possess my wife; the equity
Of very reason bids me.

Pen. Is that all?

Org. Why, 't is the all of me, myself.

Pen. Remove
Your steps some distance from me: — at this space <sup>75</sup>

A few words I dare change; but first put on
Your borrowed shape.

Org. You are obey'd; 't is done.
[He resumes his disguise.]

Pen. How, Orgilus, by promise I was thine
The heavens do witness: they can witness too
A rape done on my truth: how I do love thee <sup>80</sup>
Yet, Orgilus, and yet, must best appear
In tendering thy freedom; for I find
The constant preservation of thy merit,
By thy not daring to attempt my fame
With injury of any loose conceit, <sup>85</sup>
Which might give deeper wounds to discon-tents.

Continue this fair race: <sup>1</sup> then, though I cannot Add to thy comfort, yet I shall more often

Remember from what fortune I am fallen, <sup>89</sup>
And pity mine own ruin. — Live, live happy, —
Happy in thy next choice, that thou mayst people

This barren age with virtues in thy issue!
And O, when thou art married, think on me
With mercy, not contempt! I hope thy wife,
Hearing my story, will not scorn my fall. — <sup>95</sup>
Now let us part.

Org. Part! yet advise thee better:
Penthea is the wife to Orgilus,
And ever shall be.

Pen. Never shall nor will.

Org. How!

Pen. Hear me; in a word I'll tell thee why.
The virgin-dowry which my birth bestow'd <sup>100</sup>
Is ravish'd by another; my true love
Abhors to think that Orgilus deserv'd
No better favours than a second bed.

Org. I must not take this reason.

Pen. To confirm it
Should I outlive my bondage, let me meet <sup>105</sup>
Another worse than this and less desir'd,
If, of all men alive, thou shouldst but touch
My lip or hand again!

Org. Penthea, now
I tell ye, you grow wanton in my sufferance:
Come, sweet, th' art mine.

Pen. Uncivil sir, forbear! <sup>110</sup>
Or I can turn affection into vengeance;

Your reputation, if you value any,
Lies bleeding at my feet. Unworthy man,
If ever henceforth thou appear in language, <sup>115</sup>

Message, or letter, to betray my frailty,
I'll call thy former protestations lust,
And curse my stars for forfeit of my judgment.

Go thou, fit only for disguise, and walks, <sup>2</sup>
To hide thy shame: this once I spare thy life.
I laugh at mine own confidence; my sorrows
By thee are made inferior to my fortunes. <sup>121</sup>
If ever thou didst harbour worthy love,
Dare not to answer. My good genius guide me,
That I may never see thee more! — Go from
me!

Org. I'll tear my veil of politic French off,
And stand up like a man resolv'd to do: <sup>125</sup>
Action, not words, shall show me. — O Penthea!

Exit.

Pen. 'A sighed my name, sure, as he parted
from me:

I fear I was too rough. Alas, poor gentleman
'A look'd not like the ruins of his youth, <sup>130</sup>
But like the ruins of those ruins. Honour,
How much we fight with weakness to preserve thee! [Walks aside.]

Enter BASSANES and GRAUSIS.

Bass. Fie on thee! damn thee, rotten mag-got, damn thee!
Sleep? sleep at court? and now? Aches, <sup>3</sup> convulsions,

Imposthumes, rheums, gouts, palsies, clog thy bones <sup>135</sup>

A dozen years more yet!

<sup>3</sup> The word was pronounced atches.

Grau. Now y' are in humours.

Bass. She 's by herself, there 's hope of that; she 's sad too;

She 's in strong contemplation; yes, and fixt: The signs are wholesome.

Grau. Very wholesome, truly.

Bass. Hold your chops,<sup>1</sup> nightmare! — Lady, come; your brother

Is carried to his closet; you must thither.

Pen. Not well, my lord?

Bass. A sudden fit; 't will off! Some surfeit or disorder. — How dost, dearest?

Pen. Your news is none o' the best.

Re-enter PROPHILUS.

Pro. The chief of men, The excellentest Ithoelos, desires

Your presence, madam.

Bass. We are hasting to him.

Pen. In vain we labour in this course of life

To piece our journey out at length, or crave

Respite of breath: our home is in the grave.

Bass. Perfect philosophy!

[Pen.] Then let us care

To live so, that our reckonings may fall even

When we 're to make account.

Pro. He cannot fear

Who builds on noble grounds: sickness or pain

Is the deserfer's exercise;<sup>2</sup> and such

Your virtuous brother to the world is known.

Speak comfort to him, lady; be allgentle: 168

Stars fall but in the grossness of our sight;

A good man dying, th' earth doth lose a light.

Exeunt omnes.

ACT III

SCENE I.<sup>3</sup>

Enter TECNICUS, and ORGILUS in his own shape.

Tec. Be well advis'd; let not a resolution Of giddy rashness choke the breath of reason.

Org. It shall not, most sage master.

Tec. I am jealous; 4

For if the borrowed shape so late put on

Infer'd a consequence, we must conclude 5

Some violent design of sudden nature

Hath shook that shadow off, to fly upon

A new-hatch'd execution. Orgilus,

Take heed thou hast not, under our integrity,

Shrouded unlawful plots; our mortal eyes 10

Pierce not the secrets of your heart, the gods

Are only privy to them.

Org. Learned Technicus,

Such doubts are causeless; and, to clear the truth

From misconceit, the present state commands me.

The Prince of Argos comes himself in person 15

In quest of great Calantha for his bride,

Our kingdom's heir; besides, mine only sister,

Euphranea, is dispos'd to Prophilus;

Lastly, the king is sending letters for me

To Athens, for my quick repair to court: 20
Please to accept these reasons.

Tec. Just ones, Orgilus,

Not to be contradicted: yet beware

Of an unsure foundation; no fair colours

Can fortify a building faintly jointed.

I have observ'd a growth in thy aspect 25

Of dangerous extent, sudden, and — look to 't —

I might add, certain —

Org. My aspect! Could art

Run through mine inmost thoughts, it should not sift

An inclination there more than what suited

With justice of mine honour. 30

Tec. I believe it.

But know then, Orgilus, what honour is.

Honour consists not in a bare opinion

By doing any act that feeds content,

Brave in appearance, 'cause we think it brave;

Such honour comes by accident, not nature, 35

Proceeding from the vices of our passion,

Which makes our reason drunk: but real hon-

our

Is the reward of virtue, and acquir'd

By justice, or by valour which for basis

Hath justice to uphold it. He then fails 40

In honour, who for lucre [or] revenge

Commits thefts, murders, treasons, and adul-

teries,

With suchlike, by intrenching on just laws,

Whose sovereignty is best preserv'd by justice.

Thus, as you see how honour must be grounded

On knowledge, not opinion, — for opinion 45

Relies on probability and accident,

But knowledge on necessity and truth, —

I leave thee to the fit consideration

Of what becomes the grace of real honour, 50

Wishing success to all thy virtuous meanings.

Org. The gods increase thy wisdom, reverend oracle,

And in thy precepts make me ever thrifty! 55

Tec. I thank thy wish. Exit.

Much mystery of fate

Lies hid in that man's fortunes; curiosity 55

May lead his actions into rare attempts: —

But let the gods be moderators still;

No human power can prevent their will.

Enter ARMOSTES [with a casket].

From whence come ye?

Arm. From King Amyclas, — pardon

My interruption of your studies. — Here, 60

In this seal'd box, he sends a treasure [to you,]

Dear to him as his crown. 'A prays your gravity

You would examine, ponder, sift, and bolt

The pith and circumstance of every tittle

The scroll within contains.

Tec. What is 't, Armostes? 65

Arm. It is the health of Sparta, the king's

life,

Sinews and safety of the commonwealth;

The sum of what the oracle deliver'd

When last he visited the prophetic temple

At Delphos: what his reasons are, for which, 70

<sup>5</sup> Make me ever avail myself of thy precepts.

After so long a silence, he requires
Your counsel now, grave man, his majesty
Will soon himself acquaint you with.

Tec. [Takes the casket.] Apollo Inspire my intellect! — The Prince of Argos
Is entertain'd?

Arm. He is; and has demanded 75
Our princess for his wife; which I conceive
One special cause the king importunes you
For resolution of the oracle.

Tec. My duty to the king, good peace to Sparta,

And fair day to Armostes!

Arm. Like to Tecnicus! Exeunt. 80

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Soft music, during which time enter PROPHILUS, BASSANES, PENTHEA, GRAUSIS, passing over the stage. BASSANES and GRAUSIS enter again softly, stealing to several stands, and listen.

A SONG.

Can you paint a thought? or number
Every fancy in a slumber?

Can you count soft minutes roving
From a dial's point by moving?
Can you grasp a sigh? or, lastly,
Rob a virgin's honour chastely?

No, O, no! yet you may
Sooner do both that and this,
This and that, and never miss,

Than by any praise display
Beauty's beauty; such a glory,
As beyond all fate, all story,

All arms, all arts,
All loves, all hearts,
Greater than those or they,
Do, shall, and must obey. 15

Bass. All silent, calm, secure. — Grausis, no creaking?

No noise? Dost hear nothing?

Grau. Not a mouse,
Or whisper of the wind.

Bass. The floor is matted;
The bedposts sure are steel or marble. — Soldiers 20

Should not affect, methinks, strains so effeminate:

Sounds of such delicacy are but fawnings

Upon the sloth of luxury, they heighten
Cinders of covert lust up to a flame.

Grau. What do you mean, my lord? — speak low; that gabbling 25
Of yours will but undo us.

Bass. Chamber-combats
Are felt, not heard.

Pro. [within.] 'A wakes.

Bass. What's that?

It. [within.] Who's there?
Sister? — All quit the room else.

Bass. 'T is consented!

Re-enter PROPHILUS.

Pro. Lord Bassanes, your brother would be private,

We must forbear; his sleep hath newly left
him. 30

Please ye withdraw.

Bass. By any means; 't is fit.

Pro. Pray, gentlewoman, walk too.

Grau. Yes, I will, sir. Exeunt omnes.

ITHOCLÉS discovered in a chair, and PENTHEA
[beside him].

It. Sit nearer, sister to me; nearer yet.
We had one father, in one womb took life, 34
Were brought up twins together, yet have liv'd
At distance, like two strangers. I could wish
That the first pillow whereon I was cradled
Had prov'd to me a grave.

Pen. You had been happy:
Then had you never known that sin of life
Which blots all following glories with a vengeance, 40

For forfeiting the last will of the dead,
From whom you had your being.

It. Sad Penthea,
Thou canst not be too cruel; my rash spleen Hath with a violent hand pluck'd from thy bosom

A love-blest<sup>2</sup> heart, to grind it into dust; 45
For which mine's now a-breaking.

Pen. Not yet, Heaven,
I do beseech thee! First let some wild fires Scorch, not consume it! may the heat be cher-ish't

With desires infinite, but hopes impossible!

It. Wrong'd soul, thy prayers are heard.

Pen. Here, lo, I breathe, 50
A miserable creature, led to ruin
By an unnatural brother!

It. I consume
In languishing affections for that trespass;
Yet cannot die.

Pen. The handmaid to the wages 54
Of country toil drinks the untroubled streams
With leaping kids and with the bleating lambs,
And so allays her thirst secure; whiles I Quench my hot sighs with fleetings<sup>3</sup> of my tears.

It. The labourer doth eat his coarsest bread,

Earn'd with his sweat, and lies him down to
sleep; 60

While<sup>4</sup> every bit I touch turns in digestion

To gall as bitter as Penthea's curse.

Put me to any penance for my tyranny,
And I will call thee merciful.

Pen. Pray kill me,
Rid me from living with a jealous husband; 65
Then we will join in friendship, be again
Brother and sister. — Kill me, pray; nay, will
ye?

It. How does thy lord esteem thee?

Pen. Such an one
As only you have made me; a faith-breaker,
A spotted whore; — forgive me, I am one 70
In act, not in desires, the gods must witness.

It. Thou dost belie thy friend.

Pen. I do not, Ithocles;

<sup>4</sup> Q. Which.

For she that's wife to Orgilus, and lives
In known adultery with Bassanes,
Is at the best a whore. Wilt kill me now? 75
The ashes of our parents will assume
Some dreadful figure, and appear to charge
Thy bloody guilt, that hast betray'd their name
To infamy in this reproachful match.

Ith. After my victories abroad, at home 80
I meet despair; ingratitude of nature Hath made my actions monstrous. Thou shalt
stand

A deity, my sister, and be worshipp'd
For thy resolved martyrdom; wrong'd maids
And married wives shall to thy hallowed
shrine 85

Offer their orisons, and sacrifice
Pure turtles, crown'd with myrtle; if thy pity
Unto a yielding brother's pressure lend
One finger hut to ease it.

Pen. O, no more!

Ith. Death waits to waft me to the Stygian banks, 90

And free me from this chaos of my bondage;
And till thou wilt forgive, I must endure.

Pen. Who is the saint you serve?

Ith. Friendship, or [nearness] 1
Of birth to any but my sister, durst not Have mov'd that question; ['tis] 2 a secret,
sister, 95

I dare not murmur to myself.

Pen. Let me,

By your new protestations I conjure ye,
Partake her name.

Ith. Her name? — 'tis — 'tis — I dare not.

Pen. All your respects are forg'd. 3

Ith. They are not. — Peace!
Calantha is — the princess — the king's daughter — 100

Sole heir of Sparta. — Me, most miserable
Do I now love thee? For my injuries
Revenge thyself with bravery, and gossip
My treasons to the king's ears, do: — Calantha
Knows it not yet, nor Propbilus, my nearest. 105

Pen. Suppose you were contracted to her, would it not

Split even your very soul to see her father
Snatch her out of your arms against her will,
And force her on the Prince of Argos?

Ith. Trouble not
The fountains of mine eyes with thine own story; 110

I sweat in blood for 't.

Pen. We are reconcil'd.

Alas, sir, being children, but two branches
Of one stock, 't is not fit we should divide:
Have comfort, you may find it.

Ith. Yes, in thee;
Only in thee, Penthea mine.

Pen. If sorrows 115

Have not too much dull'd my infected brain,
I'll cheer invention for an active strain. 4

Ith. Mad man! why have I wrong'd a maid
so excellent!

Enter BASSANES with a poniard; PROPHILUS, GRONNAS, HEMOPHIL, and GRAUSIS.

Bass. I can forbear no longer; more, I will
not.

Keep off your hands, or fall upon my point. —
Patience is tir'd; for, like a slow-pac'd ass, 121
Ye ride my easy nature, and proclaim
My sloth to vengeance a reproach and property. 5

Ith. The meaning of this rudeness?

Pro. He's distracted.

Pen. O, my griev'd lord! —

Grau. Sweet lady, come not near him; 125
He holds his perilous weapon in his hand
To prick 'a cares not whom nor where, — see,
see, see!

Bass. My birth is noble: though the popular blast

Of vanity, as giddy as thy youth,
Hath rear'd thy name up to bestride a cloud, 130
Or progress in the chariot of the sun,
I am no clod of trade, to lackey pride,
Nor, like your slave of expectation, 6 wait
The bawdy hinges of your doors, or whistle
For mystical conveyance to your bed-sports. 135

Gro. Fine humours! they become him.

Hem. How 'a stares, Struts, puffs, and sweats! Most admirable 7
lunacy!

Ith. But that I may conceive the spirit of wine

Has took possession of your soberer custom,
I'd say you were unmannerly.

Pen. Dear brother! — 140

Bass. Unmannerly! — mew, kitling! — smooth Formality

Is usher to the rankness of the blood,
But Impudence bears up the train. Indeed, sir,
Your fiery mettle, or your springal 8 blaze
Of huge renown, is no sufficient royalty 145
To print upon my forehead the scorn, "cuck-
old."

Ith. His jealousy has robb'd him of his wits;
'A talks 'a knows not what.

Bass. Yes, and 'a knows
To whom 'a talks; to one that franks 9 his lust
In swine-security of bestial incest. 150

Ith. Ha, devil!

Bass. I will haloo 't; 10 though I blush more
To name the filthiness than thou to act it.

Ith. Monster! [Draws his sword.]

Pro. Sir, by our friendship —

Pen. By our bloods —
Will you quite both undo us, brother?

Grau. Out on him!
These are his megrims, firks, 11 and melanco-
hes. 155

Hem. Well said, old touch-hole.

Gro. Kick him out of doors.

Pen. With favour, let me speak. — My lord,
what slackness

In my obedience hath deserv'd this rage?
Except humility and silent duty

5 Personal characteristics. 7 Wonderful.

6 Attendant slave. 8 Youthful.

9 Feeds; fattens, as one fattens swine.

10 Proclaim. 11 Freaks.

1 Q. omits. 2 'Tis, Dyce emend. Q. as.

3 I. e. You do not care for me as you say.

4 I will attempt to devise something.

Have drawn on your unquiet, my simplicity 100
Ne'er studied your vexation.

Bass. Light of beauty,
Deal not ungently with a desperate wound!
No breach of reason dares make war with
her

Whose looks are sovereignty, whose breath is balm.

O, that I could preserve thee in fruition 105
As in devotion!

Pen. Sir, may every evil
Lock'd in Pandora's box shower, in your presence,

On my unhappy head, if, since you made me
A partner in your bed, I have been faulty
In one unseemly thought against your honour!
Ith. Purge not his griefs, Penthea.

Bass. Yes, say on, 171
Excellent creature! — [To ITHOCLES.] Good, be not a hindrance

To peace and praise of virtue. — O, my senses
Are charm'd with sounds celestial! — On, dear,
on:

I never gave you one ill word; say, did I? 175
Indeed I did not.

Pen. Nor, by Juno's forehead,
Was I e'er guilty of a wanton error.

Bass. A goddess! let me kneel.
Grau. Alas, kind animal!

Ith. No; but for penance.
Bass. Noble sir, what is it?

With gladness I embrace it; yet, pray let not
My rashness teach you to be too unmerciful. 181

Ith. When you shall show good proof that manly wisdom,

Not oversway'd by passion or opinion,
Knows how to lead [your] judgment, then
this lady,

Your wife, my sister, shall return in safety 185
Home, to be guided by you; but, till first
I can out of clear evidence approve it,
She shall be my care.

Bass. Rip my bosom up,
I'll stand the execution with a constancy;
This torture is unsufferable.

Ith. Well, sir, 190
I dare not trust her to your fury.

Bass. But
Penthea says not so.

Pen. She needs no tongue
To plead excuse who never purpos'd wrong.

Hem. Virgin of reverence and antiquity,
Stay you behind.

Gro. [to GRAUSIS.] The court wants not your diligence. 195

Grau. What will you do, my lord? My lady's gone;

Bass. I may see her,
Or speak to her once more?

Grau. And feel her too, man;
Be of good cheer, she's your own flesh and bone.

Bass. Diseases desperate must find cures alike. 200

She swore she has been true.

Grau. True, on my modesty.
Bass. Let him want truth who credits not her vows!

Much wrong I did her, but her brother infinite;
Rumour will voice me the contempt of manhood, 204

Should I run on thus. Some way I must try
To outdo art, and [jealousy deery.]<sup>1</sup> Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>2</sup>

Flourish. Enter AMYCLAS, NEARCHUS, leading
CALANTHA, ARMOSTES, CROTON, EUPHRANEA,
CHRISTALLA, PHILEMA, and AME-LUS.

Amy. Cousin of Argos, what the heavens have pleas'd,

In their unchanging counsels to conclude
For both our kingdoms' weal, we must submit
to:

Nor can we be unthankful to their bounties,
Who, when we were even creeping to our
grave, 5

Sent us a daughter, in whose birth our hope Continues of succession. As you are

In title next, being grandchild to our aunt,
So we in heart desire you may sit nearest

Calantha's love; since we have ever vow'd 10
Not to enforce affection by our will,
But by her own choice to confirm it gladly.

Near. You speak the nature of a right just father.

I come not hither roughly to demand
My cousin's thraldom, but to free mine own. 15

Report of great Calantha's beauty, virtue,
Sweetness, and singular perfections, courted

All ears to credit what I find was publish'd
By constant truth; from which, if any service

Of my desert can purchase fair construction, 20
This lady must command it.

Cal. Princely sir,
So well you know how to profess observance,<sup>3</sup>

That you instruct your hearers to become Practitioners in duty; of which number

I'll study to be chief.
Near. Chief, glorious virgin, 25

In my devotions, as in all men's wonder.
Amy. Excellent cousin, we deny no liberty;

Use thine own opportunities. — Armostes,
We must consult with the philosophers;

The business is of weight.
Arm. Sir, at your pleasure. 30

Amy. You told me, Crotolon, your son's re-turn'd

From Athens: wherefore comes he not to court
As we commanded?

Crot. He shall soon attend
Your royal will, great sir.

Amy. The marriage
Between young Prophilus and Euphranea 35

Tastes of too much delay.
Crot. My lord, —

Amy. Some pleasures
At celebration of it would give life

To th' entertainment of the prince our kinsman;

Our court wears gravity more than we relish.

Arm. Yet the heavens smile on all your high attempts,<sup>40</sup>
Without a cloud.

Crot. So may the gods protect us.

Cal. A prince a subject?

Near. Yes, to beauty's sceptre;
As all hearts kneel, so mine.

Cal. You are too courtly.

Enter ITHOCLÉS, ORGILUS, and PROPHEILUS.

Ith. Your safe return to Sparta is most welcome:

I joy to meet you here, and, as occasion<sup>45</sup>
Shall grant us privacy, will yield you reasons
Why I should covet to deserve the title
Of your respected friend; for, without compliment,

Believe it, Orgilus, 't is my ambition.

Org. Your lordship may command me, your poor servant.<sup>50</sup>

Ith. [Aside.] So amourosly close! — so soon!
— my heart!

Pro. What sudden change is next?

Ith. Life to the king!

To whom I here present this noble gentleman,
New come from Athens: royal sir, vouchsafe
Your gracious hand in favour of his merit.<sup>55</sup>

[The King gives ORGILUS his hand to kiss.]

Crot. [Aside.] My son preferr'd by Ithocles!

Amy. Your bounties

Shall open to thee, Orgilus; for instance, —
Hark in thine ear, — if, out of those inventions
Which flow in Athens, thou hast there engrostr<sup>1</sup>

Some rarity of wit, to grace the nuptials<sup>60</sup>

Of thy fair sister, and renown our court

In th' eyes of this young prince, we shall be debtor

To thy conceit: think on 't.

Org. Your highness honours me.

Near. My tongue and heart are twins.

Cal. A noble birth,

Becoming such a father. — Worthy Orgilus,<sup>65</sup>
You are a guest most wish'd for.

Org. May my duty
Still rise in your opinion, sacred princess!

Ith. Euphranea's brother, sir; a gentleman

Well worthy of your knowledge.

Near. We embrace him,
Proud of so dear acquaintance.

Amy. All prepare<sup>70</sup>

For revels and disport; the joys of Hymen,

Like Phoebus in his lustre, put to flight

All mists of dulness, crown the hours with gladness:

No sounds but music, no discourse but mirth!

Cal. Thine arm, I prithee, Ithocles. — Nay, good<sup>75</sup>

My lord, keep on your way; I am provided.

Near. I dare not disobey.

Ith. Most heavenly lady! Exeunt.

<sup>1</sup> Acquired.

[SCENE IV.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter CROTOLON and ORGILUS.

Crot. The king hath spoke his mind.

Org. His will he hath;

But were it lawful to hold plea against
The power of greatness, not the reason, haply
Such undershrubs as subjects sometimes might Borrow of nature justice, to inform<sup>5</sup>
That license sovereignty holds without check
Over a meek obedience.

Crot. How resolve you
Touching your sister's marriage? Prophilus
Is a deserving and a hopeful youth.

Org. I envy not his merit, but applaud it; <sup>10</sup>
Could wish him thrif<sup>3</sup> in all his best desires,
And with a willingness inleague our blood
With his, for purchase of full growth in friendship.

He never touch'd on any wrong that malic'd
The honour of our house nor stir'd our peace:
Yet, with your favour, let me not forget<sup>15</sup>
Under whose wing he gathers warmth and comfort,

Whose creature he is bound, made, and must live so.

Crot. Son, son, I find in thee a harsh condition;<sup>4</sup>

No courtesy can win it; 't is too rancorous.<sup>20</sup>

Org. Good sir, be not severe in your construction;

I am no stranger to such easy calms
As sit in tender bosoms: lordly Ithocles
Hath grac'd my entertainment in abundance,
Too humbly hath descended from that height<sup>25</sup>
Of arrogance and spleen which wrought the rape

On griev'd Penthea's purity; his scorn
Of my untoward fortunes is reclaim'd
Unto a courtship, almost to a fawning: —
I'll kiss his foot, since you will have it so.<sup>30</sup>

Crot. Since I will have it so! Friend, I will have it so,

Without our ruin by your politic plots,
Or wolf of hatred snarling in your breast.
You have a spirit, sir, have ye? A familiar
That posts i' th' air for your intelligence?<sup>35</sup>
Some such hobgoblin hurried you from Athens,
For yet you come unsent for.

Org. If unwelcome,
I might have found a grave there.

Crot. Sure, your business
Was soon dispatch'd, or your mind alter'd quickly.

Org. 'T was care, sir, of my health ent short my journey;<sup>40</sup>

For there a general infection
Threatens a desolation.

Crot. And I fear
Thou hast brought back a worse infection with
thee, —

Infection of thy mind; which, as thou say'st,
Threatens the desolation of our family.<sup>45</sup>

Org. Forbid it, our dear genius! I will rather

Be made a sacrifice on Thrasus' monument,
Or kneel to Ithocles, his son, in dust,
Than woo a father's curse. My sister's marriage

With Prophilus is from my heart confirm'd ; 50
May I live hated, may I die despis'd,
If I omit to further it in all
That can concern me!

Crot. I have been too rough.
My duty to my king made me so earnest ;
Excuse it, Orgilus.

Org. Dear sir ! — Here comes 55
Crot. Euphranea with Prophilus and Ithocles.

Enter PROPHILUS, EUPHRANEA, ITHOCLES,
GRONEAS, and HEMOPHIL.

Org. Most honoured ! — ever famous !
Ith. Your true friend ;
On earth not any truer. — With smooth eyes
Look on this worthy couple ; your consent
Can only make them one.

Org. They have it. — Sister, 60
Thou pawn'dst to me an oath, of which engagement

I never will release thee, if thou aim'st
At any other choice than this.

Euph. Dear brother,
At him, or none.
Crot. To which my blessing 's added.
Org. Which, till a greater ceremony perfect, — 65

Euphranea, lend thy hand, — here, take her,
Prophilus ;
Live long a happy man and wife ; and further,
That these in presence may conclude an omen,
Thus for a bridal song I close my wishes :

[Sings.] Comforts lasting, loves increasing, 70
Like soft hours never ceasing :
Plenty's pleasure, peace complying,
Without jars, or tongues envying ;
Hearts by holy union wedded,
More than theirs by custom bedded ; 75
Fruitful issues ; life so graced,
Not by age to be defaced,
Budding, as the year ensu'th,
Every spring another youth :
All what thought can add beside 80
Crown this bridegroom and this bride !

Pro. You have seal'd joy close to my soul. —
Euphranea,

Now I may call thee mine. I but exchange
Ith. One good friend for another.

Org. If these gallants 85
Will please to grace a poor invention
By joining with me in some slight device,
I'll venture on a strain my younger days
Have studied for delight.

Hem. With thankful willingness
I offer my attendance.

Gro. No endeavour
Of mine shall fail to show itself.

Ith. We will 90
All join to wait on thy directions, Orgilus.

Org. O, my good lord, your favours flow towards

A too unworthy worm ; — but as you please ;
I am what you will shape me.

Ith. A fast friend.
Crot. I thank thee, son, for this acknowledg- 95
ment ;

It is a sight of gladness.
Org. But my duty. Exeunt.

[SCENE V.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter CALANTHA, PENTHEA, CHRISTALLA, and PHILEMA.

Cal. Whoe'er would speak with us, deny his entrance ;

Be careful of our charge.
Chris. We shall, madam.

Cal. Except the king himself, give none admittance ;

Not any.

Phil. Madam, it shall be our care.
Exeunt [CHRISTALLA and PHIL-
EMA].

Cal. Being alone, Penthea, you have granted
The opportunity you sought, and might 6
At all times have commanded.

Pen. 'Tis a benefit
Which I shall owe your goodness even in death
for.

My glass of life, sweet princess, hath few minutes
Remaining to run down ; the sands are spent ;
For by an inward messenger I feel 11
The summons of departure short and certain.

Cal. You feel too much your melancholy.
Pen. Glories

Of human greatness are but pleasing dreams
And shadows soon decaying : on the stage 15
Of my mortality my youth hath acted

Some scenes of vanity, drawn out at length
By varied pleasures, sweet'ned in the mixture,

But tragical in issue : beauty, pomp,
With every sensuality our giddiness 20
Doth frame an idol, are unconstant friends,

When any troubled passion makes assault
On the unguarded castle of the mind.

Cal. Contemn not your condition for the proof
Of bare opinion only : to what end 25
Reach all these moral texts ?

Pen. To place before ye
A perfect mirror, wherein you may see

How weary I am of a ling'ring life,
Who count the best a misery.

Cal. Indeed
You have no little cause ; yet none so great 30
As to distrust a remedy.

Pen. That remedy
Must be a winding-sheet, a fold of lead,
And some untrod-on corner in the earth. —
Not to detain your expectation, princess,
I have an humble suit.

Cal. Speak ; I enjoy<sup>2</sup> it. 35
Pen. Vouchsafe, then, to be my executrix,
And take that trouble on ye to dispose
Such legacies as I bequeath, impartially.

I have not much to give, the pains are easy ;

<sup>1</sup> Calantha's apartment in the palace.

Heaven will reward your piety, and thank it 40
When I am dead; for sure I must not live;
I hope I cannot.

Cal. Now, beshrew thy sadness,
Thou turn'st me too much woman. [Weeps.]

Pen. [Aside.] Her fair eyes
Melt into passion. — Then I have assurance Encouraging my boldness. In this paper 45
My will was character'd; which you, with pardon,

Shall now know from mine own mouth.

Cal. Talk on, prithee;
It is a pretty earnest.

Pen. I have left me
But three poor jewels to bequeath. The first is My youth; for though I am much old in griefs,
In years I am a child.

Cal. To whom that [jewel] ? 51

Pen. To virgin-wives, such as abuse not wedlock

By freedom of desires, but covet chiefly
The pledges of chaste beds for ties of love, 54
Rather than ranging of their blood; and next
To married maids, such as prefer the number
Of honourable issue in their virtues
Before the flattery of delights by marriage:
May those be ever young!

Cal. A second jewel

You mean to part with ?

Pen. 'Tis my fame, I trust 50
By scandal yet untouch'd: this I bequeath
To Memory, and Time's old daughter, Truth.
If ever my unhappy name find mention
When I am fall'n to dust, may it deserve
Beseeching charity without dishonour! 55

Cal. How handsomely thou play'st with harmless sport

Of mere imagination! Speak the last.
I strangely like thy will.

Pen. This jewel, madam,

Is dearly precious to me; you must use
The best of your discretion to employ 70
This gift as I intend it.

Cal. Do not doubt me.

Pen. 'Tis long ago since first I lost my
heart:

Long I have liv'd without it, else for certain
I should have given that too; but instead
Of it, to great Calantha, Sparta's heir, 75
By service bound and by affection vow'd,
I do bequeath, in holiest rites of love,
Mine only brother, Ithocles.

Cal. What saidst thou ?

Pen. Impute not, heaven-blest lady, to ambition

A faith as humbly perfect as the prayers 60
Of a devoted suppliant can endow it.
Look on him, princess, with an eye of pity;
How like the ghost of what he late appear'd
'A moves before you.

Cal. Shall I answer here,

Or lend my ear too grossly ?

Pen. First his heart 65

Shall fall in cinders, scorch'd by your disdain,
Ere he will dare, poor man, to ope an eye
On these divine looks, but with low-bent
thoughts

Accusing such presumption; as for words,
'A dares not utter any but of service: 90
Yet this lost creature loves ye. — Be a princess
In sweetness as in blood; give him his doom,
Or raise him up to comfort.

Cal. What new change
Appears in my behaviour, that thou dar'st
Tempt my displeasure ?

Pen. I must leave the world 95
To revel in Elysium, and 'tis just
To wish my brother some advantage here;

Yet, by my best hopes, Ithocles is ignorant
Of this pursuit. But if you please to kill him,
Lend him one angry look or one harsh word, 100
And you shall soon conclude how strong a
power
Your absolute authority holds over
His life and end.

Cal. You have forgot, Penthea,

How still I have a father.

Pen. But remember
I am a sister, though to me this brother 105
Hath been, you know, unkind, O, most unkind!

Cal. Christalla, Philema, where are ye? —
Lady,

Your check lies in my silence.

Re-enter CHRISTALLA and PHILEMA.

Chris. and Phil. Madam, here.

Cal. I think ye sleep, ye drones: wait on Penthea

Unto her lodging. — [Aside.] Ithocles? Wrong'd
lady! 110

Pen. My reckonings are made even; death or fate

Can now nor strike too soon, nor force too late.
Exeunt.

ACT IV

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter ITHOCLES and ARMOSTES.

Ith. Forbear your inquisition: curiosity
Is of too subtle and too searching nature,
In fears of love too quick, too slow of credit. —
I am not what you doubt me.

Arm. Nephew, be, then,
As I would wish; — all is not right. — Good
heaven 5

Confirm your resolutions for dependance
On worthy ends, which may advance your quiet!

Ith. I did the noble Orgilus much injury,
But griev'd Penthea more: I now repent it, —
Now, uncle, now; this "now" is now too late.

So provident is folly in sad issue, 11
That after-wit, like bankrupts' debts, stands tallied,

Without all possibilities of payment.
Sure, he's an honest, very honest gentleman;

A man of single<sup>2</sup> meaning.

Arm. I believe it: 15

Yet, nephew, 'tis the tongue informs our ears;
Our eyes can never pierce into the thoughts,

For they are lodg'd too inward: — but I question

No truth in Orgilus. — The princess, sir.

Ith. The princess! ha!

Arm. With her the Prince of Argos. 20

Enter NEARCHUS, leading CALANTHA; AMELUS, CRISTALLA, PEILEMA.

Near. Great fair one, grace my hopes with any instance

Of livery,<sup>1</sup> from the allowance of your favour; This little spark —

[Attempts to take a ring from her finger.]

Cal. A toy!

Near. Love feasts on toys, For Cupid is a child; — vouchsafe this bounty; It cannot be deny'd.

Cal. You shall not value, 25 Sweet cousin, at a price, what I count cheap; So cheap, that let him take it who dares stoop for 't.

And give it at next meeting to a mistress: She 'll thank him for 't, perhaps.

Casts the ring to ITHOCLES.

Ame. The ring, sir, is

The princess's; I could have took it up. 30

Ith. Learn manners, prithee. — To the blessed owner,

Upon my knees —

Near. Kneels and offers it to CALANTHA. Y' are saucy.

Cal. This is pretty!

I am, belike, "a mistress" — wondrous pretty! Let the man keep his fortune, since he found it;

He's worthy on 't. — On, cousin!

Ith. [to AMELUS.] Follow, spaniel; 35

I'll force ye to a fawning else.

Ame. You dare not.

Exeunt. Manent ITH. and ARM.

Arm. My lord, you were too forward.

Ith. Look ye, uncle,

Some such there are whose liberal contents Swarm without care in every sort of plenty;

Who after full repasts can lay them down 40 To sleep; and they sleep, uncle: in which silence

Their very dreams present 'em choice of pleasures,

Pleasures — observe me, uncle — of rare object; Here heaps of gold, there increments of honours,

Now change of garments, then the votes of people; 45

Anon varieties of beauties, courting, In flatteries of the night, exchange of dalliance:

Yet these are still but dreams. Give me felicity

Of which my senses waking are partakers, 50 A real, visible, material happiness;

And then, too, when I stagger in expectation Of the least comfort that can cherish life. —

I saw it, sir, I saw it; for it came

From her own hand.

Arm. The princess threw it t' ye.

Ith. True; and she said — well I remember what — 55

Her cousin prince would beg it.

Arm. Yes, and parted

In anger at your taking on 't.

Ith. Panthea,

O, thou hast pleaded with a powerful language! I want a fee to gratify thy merit;

But I will do —

Arm. What is 't you say?

Ith. In anger! 60

In anger let him part; for could his breath, Like whirlwinds, toss such servile slaves as lick

The dust his footsteps print into a vapour, It durst not stir a hair of mine, it should not;

I'd rend it up by th' roots first. To be any-thing 65

Calantha smiles on, is to be a blessing

More sacred than a petty prince of Argos

Can wish to equal, or in worth or title.

Arm. Contain yourself, my lord: Ixion, aiming

To embrace Juno, bosom'd but a cloud, 70

And begat Centaurs; 't is an useful moral.

Ambition hatch'd in clouds of mere opinion

Proves but in birth a prodigy.

Ith. I thank ye;

Yet, with your licence, I should seem uncharitable

To gentler fate, if, relishing the dainties 75 Of a soul's settled peace, I were so feeble Not to digest it.

Arm. He deserves small trust

Who is not privy-counsellor to himself.

Re-enter NEARCHUS and AMELUS, with ORGILUS.

Near. Brave me!

Org. Your excellence mistakes his temper;

For Ithocles in fashion of his mind 80 Is beautiful, soft, gentle, the clear mirror Of absolute perfection.

Ame. Was 't your modesty

Term'd any of the prince's servants "spaniel"? 85 Your nurse, sure, taught you other language.

Ith. Language!

Near. A gallant man-at-arms is here, a doctor 90

In feats of chivalry, blunt and rough-spoken, Vouchsafing not the fustian of civility,

Which [less]<sup>1</sup> rash spirits style good manners! 95

Ith. Manners!

Org. No more, illustrious sir; 'tis matchless Ithocles.

Near. You might have understood who I am.

Ith. Yes, 99

I did; else — but the presence calm'd th' affront —

Y' are cousin to the princess.

Near. To the king, too;

A certain instrument that lent supportance To you colossic greatness — to that king too,

You might have added.

Ith. There is more divinity

In beauty than in majesty. 99

<sup>1</sup> Badge of a retainer.

<sup>2</sup> Q. omits.

Arm. O fie, fie!

Near. This odd youth's pride turns heretic in loyalty.

Sirrah! low mushrooms never rival cedars.

Exeunt NEARCHEUS and AMELUS.

Ith. Come back! — What pitiful dull thing am I

So to be tamely scolded at! come back! — 100

Let him come back, and echo once again

That scornful sound of mushroom! painted colts —

Like heralds' coats gilt o'er with crowns and sceptres —

May bait a muzzled lion.

Arm. Cousin, cousin,

Thy tongue is not thy friend.

Org. In point of honour 105

Discretion knows no bounds. Amelus told me
'T was all about a little ring.

Ith. A ring

The princess threw away, and I took up.

Admit she threw 't to me, what arm of brass Can snatch it hence? No; could he grind the hoop 110

To powder, 'a might sooner reach my heart
Than steal and wear one dust on 't. — Orgilus,
I am extremely wrong'd.

Org. A lady's favour

Is not to be so slighted.

Ith. Slighted!

Arm. Quiet

These vain unruly passions, which will render
ye 115

Into a madness.

Org. Grievs will have their vent.

Enter TECNICUS [with a scroll].

Arm. Welcome; thou com'st in season, reverend man,

To pour the balsam of a suppling<sup>1</sup> patience
Into the festering wound of ill-spent fury.

Org. [Aside.] What makes he here?

Tec. The hurts are yet but<sup>2</sup> mortal, 120

Which shortly will prove deadly. To the king,
Armotes, see in safety thou deliver

This seal'd-up counsel; bid him with a constancy

Peruse the secrets of the gods. — O Sparta,
O Lacedaemon! double-nam'd, but one 125

In fate: when kingdoms reel, — mark well my saw, —

Their heads must needs be giddy. Tell the
king

That henceforth he no more must inquire after
My aged head; Apollo wills it so:

I am for Delphos.

Arm. Not without some conference 130

With our great master?

Tec. Never more to see him:

A greater prince commands me. — Ithocles,
When youth is ripe, and age from time doth
part,

The lifeless trunk shall wed the broken heart.

Ith. What's this, if understood?

Tec. List, Orgilus; 135

Remember what I told thee long before,
These tears shall be my witness.

Arm. 'Las, good man!

Tec. Let craft with courtesy a while confer,
Revenge proves its own executioner.

Org. Dark sentences are for Apollo's priests;
I am not Oedipus.

Tec. My hour is come; 141

Cheer up the king; farewell to all. — O Sparta, O Lacedaemon! Exit.

Arm. If prophetic fire

Have warm'd this old man's bosom, we might construe

His words to fatal sense.

Ith. Leave to the powers 145

Above us the effects of their decrees;

My burthen lies within me: servile fears

Prevent no great effects. — Divine Calantha!

Arm. The gods be still propitious!

Exeunt ITHOCLES and ARMOTES.

Org. Something oddly

The book-man prated, yet 'a talk'd it weeping;
Let craft with courtesy a while confer, 151

Revenge proves its own executioner.

Con it again; — for what? It shall not puzzle
me;

'T is dotage of a withered brain. — Penthea
Forbade me not her presence; I may see her,
And gaze my fill. Why see her, then, I may, 155

When, if I faint to speak — I must be silent. Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter BASSANES, GRAUSIS, and PHULAS.

Bass. Pray, use your recreations, all the service

I will expect is quietness amongst ye;

Take liberty at home, abroad, at all times,

And in your charities appease the gods,
Whom I, with my distractions, have offended. 5

Gram. Fair blessings on thy heart!

Phu. [Aside.] Here 's a rare change!

My lord, to cure the itch, is surely gelded;

The cuckold in conceit hath cast his horns.

Bass. Betake ye to your several occasions;
And wherein I have heretofore been faulty, 10

Let your constructions mildly pass it over.

Henceforth I'll study reformation, — more

I have not for employment.

Gram. O, sweet man!

Thou art the very "Honeycomb of Honesty,"<sup>4</sup>

Phu. The "Garland of Good-will." — Old lady, hold up 15

Thy reverend snout, and trot behind me softly,
As it becomes a moil<sup>5</sup> of ancient carriage.

Exeunt GRAUSIS and PHULAS.

Bass. Beasts, only capable of sense, enjoy
The benefit of food and ease with thankful-
ness;

Such silly creatures, with a grudging, kick not Against the portion nature hath bestow'd: 21

But men, endow'd with reason and the use

<sup>2</sup> Gifford suggests hot.

Of reason, to distinguish from the chaff
Of abject scarcity the quintessence,
Soul, and elixir of the earth's abundance, 25
The treasures of the sea, the air, nay, heaven,
Repining at these glories of creation
Are verier beasts than beasts; and of those beasts

The worst am I: I, who was made a monarch
Of what a heart could wish for,—a chaste
wife,— 30

Endeavour'd what in me lay to pull down
That temple built for adoration only,
And level'd it in the dust of causeless scandal.
But, to redeem a sacrilege so impious,
Humility shall pour, before the deities 35
I have incens'd, a largess of more patience
Than their displeas'd altars can require:
No tempests of commotion shall disquiet
The calms of my composure.

Enter ORGILUS.

Org. I have found thee,
Thou patron of more horrors than the bulk 40
Of manhood, hoop'd about with ribs of iron,
Can cram within thy breast: Penthea, Bassanes,

Curst by thy jealousies,—more, by thy dot-
age,—

Is left a prey to words.
Bass. Exercise
Your trials for addition to my penance; 45
I am resolv'd.

Org. Play not with misery
Past cure: some angry minister of fate hath Depos'd the empress of her soul, her reason,
From its most proper throne; but, what's the miracle

More new, I, I have seen it, and yet live! 50

Bass. You may delude my senses, not my judgment;

'Tis anchor'd into a firm resolution;
Dalliance of mirth or wit can ne'er unfix it:
Practise<sup>1</sup> yet further.

Org. May thy death of love to her
Damn all thy comforts to a lasting fast 55
From every joy of life! Thou barren rock,
By thee we have been split in ken<sup>2</sup> of harbour.

Enter ITHOCLAS, PENTHEA her hair about her ears, [ARMOSTES,] PHILEMA, and CHRIS-TALLA.

Ith. Sister, look up; your Ithocles, your
brother,

Speaks t' ye; why do you weep? Dear, turn not from me.—

Here is a killing sight; lo, Bassanes, 60
A lamentable object!

Org. Man, dost see 't?
Sports are more gamesome; am I yet in merri-
ment?

Why dost not laugh?

Bass. Divine and best of ladies,
Please to forget my outrage; mercy ever
Cannot but lodge under a roof so excellent. 65
I have cast off that cruelty of frenzy

<sup>2</sup> Sight.

Which once appear'd imposture,<sup>3</sup> and then juggled

To cheat my sleeps of rest.
Org. Was I in earnest?
Pen. Sure, if we were all Sirens, we should sing pitifully.

And 't were a comely music, when in parts 70
One sung another's knell. The turtle sighs
When he hath lost his mate; and yet some say
He must be dead first. 'T is a fine deceit
To pass away in a dream; indeed, I've slept With mine eyes open a great while. No falsehood 75

Equals a broken faith; there's not a hair
Sticks on my head but, like a leaden plum-
met,

It sinks me to the grave. I must creep thither;
The journey is not long.

Ith. But, thou, Penthea,
Hast many years, I hope, to number yet, 80
Ere thou canst travel that way.

Bass. Let the sun first
Be wrapp'd up in an everlasting darkness,
Before the light of nature, chiefly form'd
For the whole world's delight, feel an eclipse
So universal!

Org. Wisdom, look ye, begins 85
To rave! — Art thou mad too, antiquity?

Pen. Since I was first a wife, I might have been

Mother to many pretty prattling babes;
They would have smil'd when I smil'd, and for certain

I should have cri'd when they cri'd; — truly,
brother, 90

My father would have pick'd me out a husband,

And then my little ones had been no bastards;
But 'tis too late for me to marry now,
I am past child-bearing; 't is not my fault.

Bass. Fall on me, if there be a burning
Aetna, 95

And bury me in flames! Sweats hot as sulphur
Boil through my pores! Affliction hath in store
No torture like to this.

Org. Behold a patience!
Lay by thy whining gray dissimulation,

Do something worth a chronicle; show justice
Upon the author of this mischief; dig out 100

The jealousies that hatch'd this thralldom first
With thine own poniard. Every antic rapture
Can roar as thine does.

Ith. Orgilus, forbear.

Bass. Disturb him not; it is a talking motion<sup>4</sup>
Provided for my torment. What a fool am I 105

To bandy<sup>5</sup> passion! Ere I'll speak a word,
I will look on and burst.

Pen. I lov'd you once. [To ORGILUS.]
Org. Thou didst, wrong'd creature: in despite of malice,

For it I love thee ever.

Pen. Spare your hand; 110
Believe me, I'll not hurt it.

Org. My<sup>6</sup> heart too.

[Pen.] Complain not though I wring it hard.

I'll kiss it;

O, 'tis a fine soft palm! — hark, in thine ear;
Like whom do I look, prithes? — Nay, no whispering.

Goodness! we had been happy; too much happiness <sup>115</sup>

Will make folk proud, they say — but that is he — <sup>Points at ITHOCLES.</sup>

And yet he paid for 't home; alas, his heart
Is crept into the cabinet of the princess;

We shall have points<sup>1</sup> and bride-laces. Remember,

When we last gather'd roses in the garden, <sup>120</sup>
I found my wits; but truly you lost yours.

That's he, and still 't is he.

[Again pointing at ITHOCLES.]

Ith. Poor soul, how idly

Her fancies guide her tongue!

Bass. [Aside.] Keep in, vexation,
And break not into clamour.

Org. [Aside.] She has tutor'd me:
Some powerful inspiration checks my laziness. <sup>125</sup>

Now let me kiss your hand, griev'd beauty.

Pen. Kiss it. —

Alack, alack, his lips be wondrous cold.

Dear soul, h'as lost his colour: have ye seen
A straying heart? All errannies! every drop
Of blood is turned to an amethyst, <sup>130</sup>

Which married bachelors hang in their ears.

Org. Peace usher her into Elysium! —

If this be madness, madness is an oracle. Exit.

Ith. Christalla, Philema, when slept my sister,
Her ravings are so wild?

Chris. Sir, not these ten days. <sup>135</sup>

Phil. We watch by her continually; besides,
We can not any way pray her to eat.

Bass. O, misery of miseries!

Pen. Take comfort;

You may live well, and die a good old man.

By yea and nay, an oath not to be broken, <sup>140</sup>
If you had join'd our hands once in the temple, —

'T was since my father died, for had he liv'd
He would have done 't, — I must have call'd you father. —

O, my wrack'd honour! ruin'd by those tyrants,
A cruel brother and a desperate dotage! <sup>145</sup>

There is no peace left for a ravish'd wife
Widow'd by lawless marriage; to all memory
Pentheas's, poor Pentheas's name is strumpeted:

But since her blood was season'd by the forfeit
Of noble shame with mixtures of pollution, <sup>150</sup>

Her blood — 'tis just — be henceforth never height'ned

With taste of sustenance! Starve; let that ful-
ness

Whose pluriety<sup>2</sup> hath fever'd faith and modesty —

Forgive me; O, I faint!

[Falls into the arms of her Attendants.]

Arm. Be not so wilful,

Sweet niece, to work thine own destruction.

Ith. Nature <sup>155</sup>

Will call her daughter monster! — What! not eat?

Refuse the only ordinary means
Which are ordain'd for life? Be not, my sister,
A murderess to thyself. — Hear'st thou this,
Bassanes?

Bass. Foh! I am busy; for I have not thoughts <sup>160</sup>

Enow to think: all shall be well anon.

'T is tumbling in my head; there is a mastery
In art to fatten and keep smooth the outside;

Yes, and to comfort up the vital spirits <sup>165</sup>
Without the help of food, fumes or perfumes, Perfumes or fumes. Let her alone; I'll search
out

The trick on 't.

Pen. Lead me gently; heavens reward ye.
Griefs are sure friends; they leave without control

Nor cure nor comforts for a leprous soul.

Exeunt the maids supporting PEN-THEA.

Bass. I grant ye; and will put in practice instantly <sup>170</sup>

What you shall still admire: 't is wonderful,
'T is super-singular, not to be match'd;

Yet, when I've done 't, I've done 't: — ye shall all thank me. Exit.

Arm. The sight is full of terror.

Ith. On my soul
Lies such an infinite clog of massy dulness, <sup>175</sup>
As that I have not sense enough to feel it. —
See, uncle, th' angry<sup>3</sup> thing returns again;

Shall's welcome him with thunder? We are haunted,

And must use exorcism to conjure down
This spirit of malevolence.

Arm. Mildly, nephew. <sup>180</sup>

Enter NEARCHUS and AMELUS.

Near. I come not, sir, to chide your late disorder,

Admitting that th' inurement to a roughness
In soldiers of your years and fortunes, chiefly,
So lately prosperous, hath not yet shook off
The custom of the war in hours of leisure; <sup>185</sup>
Nor shall you need excuse, since y' are to render

Account to that fair excellence, the princess,
Who in her private gallery expects it
From your own mouth alone: I am a messenger
But to her pleasure.

Ith. Excellent Nearchus, <sup>190</sup>

Be prince still of my services, and conquer
Without the combat of dispute; I honour ye.

Near. The king is on a sudden indispos'd,
Physicians are call'd for; 't were fit, Armostes,
You should be near him.

Arm. Sir, I kiss your hands. <sup>195</sup>

Exeunt ITHOCLES and ARMOSTES.

Near. Amelus, I perceive Calantha's bosom
Is warm'd with other fires than such as can Take strength from any fuel of the love
I might address to her. Young Ithocles,
Or ever I mistake, is lord ascendant <sup>200</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Q. augury.

Of her devotions ; one, to speak him truly,
In every disposition nobly fashioned.

Ame. But can your highness brook to be so rival'd,

Considering the inequality of the persons? <sup>204</sup>

Near. I can, Amelus ; for affections injur'd
By tyranny or rigour of compulsion,
Like tempest-threat'ned trees unfirmly rooted,
Ne'er spring to timely growth : observe, for instance,

Life-spent Penthea and unhappy Orgilus.

Ame. How does your grace determine?

Near. To be jealous <sup>210</sup>

In public of what privately I'll further ;
And though they shall not know, yet they shall find it. Exeunt.

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter HEMOPHIL and GRONEAS leading AMY-CLAS, and placing him in a chair ; followed by ARMOSTES [with a box], CROTOLON, and PROPHILUS.

Amy. Our daughter is not near?

Arm. She is retir'd, sir,
Into her gallery.

Amy. Where's the prince our cousin?

Pro. New walk'd into the grove, my lord.

Amy. All leave us

Except Armotes, and you, Crotolon ;

We would be private.

Pro. Health unto your majesty ! <sup>5</sup>

Exeunt PROPHILUS, HEMOPHIL, and GRONEAS.

Amy. What ! Tecnicus is gone ?

Arm. He is to Delphos ;
And to your royal hands presents this box.

Amy. Unseal it, good Armotes ; therein lie
The secrets of the oracle ; out with it :

[ARMOSTES takes out the scroll.]

Apollo live our patron ! Read, Armotes. <sup>10</sup>

Arm. [reads.] The plot in which the vine takes root

Begins to dry from head to foot ;

The stock soon withering, want of sap

Doth cause to quail the budding grape ;

But from the neighbouring elm a dew <sup>15</sup>

Shall drop, and feed the plot anew.

Amy. That is the oracle : what exposition
Makes the philosopher ?

Arm. This brief one only.

[Reads.] *The plot is Sparta, the dri'd vine the
king ;*

The quailing grape his daughter ; but the thing <sup>20</sup>

Of most importance, not to be reveal'd,

Is a near prince, the elm : the rest conceal'd.

TECNICUS.

Amy. Enough ; although the opening of this riddle

Be but itself a riddle, yet we construe

How near our labouring age draws to a rest. <sup>25</sup>

But must Calantha quail too ? that young grape

Untimely budded ! I could mourn for her ;

Her tenderness hath yet deserv'd no rigour

So to be crost by fate.

<sup>1</sup> An apartment in the palace.

Arm. You misapply, sir,—

With favour let me speak it,— what Apollo <sup>30</sup>
Hath clouded in hid sense. I here conjecture Her marriage with some neighb'ring prince, the dew

Of which befriending elm shall ever strengthen
Your subjects with a sovereignty of power.

Crot. Besides, most gracious lord, the pith of oracles <sup>35</sup>

Is to be then digested when th' events

Expound their truth, not brought as soon to
light

As utter'd. Truth is child of Time ; and herein
I find no scruple, rather cause of comfort,

With unity of kingdoms.

Amy. May it prove so, <sup>40</sup>

For weal of this dear nation !— Where is Ithocles ?—

Armotes, Crotolon, when this wither'd vine

Of my frail carcass, on the funeral pile

Is fir'd into its ashes, let that young man

Be hedg'd about still with your cares and loves. <sup>45</sup>

Much owe I to his worth, much to his service.—
Let such as wait come in now.

Arm. All attend here !

Enter CALANTHA, ITHOCLES, PROPHILUS, ORGILUS, EUPHRANEA, HEMOPHIL, and GRONEAS.

Cal. Dear sir ! king ! father !

Ith. O my royal master !

Amy. Cleave not my heart, sweet twins of my life's solace,

With your forejudging fears ; there is no
physic <sup>50</sup>

So cunningly restorative to cherish

The fall of age, or call back youth and vigour,

As your consents in duty. I will shake off

This languishing disease of time, to quicken

Fresh pleasures in these drooping hours of sadness. <sup>55</sup>

Is fair Euphranea married yet to Prophilus ?

Crot. This morning, gracious lord.

Org. This very morning ;
Which, with your highness' leave, you may observe too.

Our sister looks, methinks, mirthful and sprightly,

As if her chaster fancy could already <sup>60</sup>

Expound the riddle of her gain in losing

A trifle maids know only that they know not.

Pish ! prithee, blush not ; 'tis but honest
change

Of fashion in the garment, loose for strait,

And so the modest maid is made a wife. <sup>65</sup>

Shrewd business— is 't not, sister ?

Euph. You are pleasant.

Amy. We thank thee, Orgilus ; this mirth becomes thee.

But wherefore sits the court in such a silence ?
A wedding without revels is not seemly.

Cal. Your late indisposition, sir, forbade
it. <sup>70</sup>

Amy. Be it thy charge, Calantha, to set forward

The bridal sports, to which I will be present ;

If not, at least consenting. — Mine own Ithocles,
I have done little for thee yet.

Ith. Y' have built me
To the full height I stand in.

Cal. [Aside.] Now or never! — 75
May I propose a suit?

Amy. Demand, and have it.

Cal. Pray, sir, give me this young man, and no further

Account him yours than he deserves in all things

To be thought worth mine: I will esteem him
According to his merit.

Amy. Still thou'rt my daughter, 80
Still grow'st upon my heart. — [To ITHOCLES.]

Give me thine hand; —

Calantha, take thine own: in noble actions
Thou'lt find him firm and absolute. — I would not Have parted with thee, Ithocles, to any

But to a mistress who is all what I am. 85

Ith. A change, great king, most wisht for,
'cause the same.

Cal. [Aside to ITHOCLES.] Th' art mine. Have
I now kept my word?

Ith. [Aside to CALANTHA.] Divinely.

Org. Rich fortunes guard, [the]<sup>1</sup> favour of a princess

Rock thee, brave man, in ever-crowned plenty!
Y' are minion of the time; be thankful for
it. — 90

[Aside.] Ho! here's a swing in destiny — apparent!

The youth is up on tiptoe, yet may stumble.

Amy. On to your recreations. — Now convey
me

Unto my bed-chamber; none on his forehead
Wear a distempred look.

All. The gods preserve ye! 95

Cal. [Aside to ITHOCLES.] Sweet, be not from my sight.

Ith. [Aside to CALANTHA.] My whole felicity!
Execunt carrying out the king. ORGI-LUS stays ITHOCLES.

Org. Shall I be bold, my lord?

Ith. Thou canst not, Orgilus.
Call me thine own; for Propilus must henceforth

Be all thy sister's: friendship, though it cease
not 100

In marriage, yet is oft at less command
Than when a single freedom can dispose it.

Org. Most right, my most good lord, my most great lord,

My gracious princely lord, I might add, royal.

Ith. Royal! A subject royal?

Org. Why not, pray, sir? 105

The sovereignty of kingdoms in their nonage Stoop'd to desert, not birth; there's as much merit

In clearness of affection as in puddle
Of generation: you have conquer'd love

Even in the loveliest; if I greatly err not, 110

The son of Venus hath bequeath'd his quiver
To Ithocles his manage,<sup>2</sup> by whose arrows
Calantha's breast is open'd.

<sup>2</sup> To the control of Ithocles.

Ith. Can 't be possible?

Org. I was myself a piece of suitor once,
And forward in preferment too; so forward 115

That, speaking truth, I may without offence,
sir,

Presume to whisper that my hopes, and — hark
ye —

My certainty of marriage stood assured
With as firm footing — by your leave — as any's

Now at this very instant — but —

Ith. 'T is granted: 120

And for a league of privacy between us,
Read o'er my bosom and partake a secret;

The princess is contracted mine.

Org. Still, why not?
I now applaud her wisdom: when your kingdom

Stands seated in your will, secure and settled, 125
I dare pronounce you will be a just monarch;
Greece must admire and tremble.

Ith. Then the sweetness
Of so imparadis'd a comfort, Orgilus!
It is to banquet with the gods.

Org. The glory
Of numerous children, potency of nobles, 130
Bent knees, hearts pav'd to tread on!

Ith. With a friendship
So dear, so fast as thine.

Org. I am unfitting
For office; but for service —

Ith. We 'll distinguish
Our fortunes merely in the title; partners
In all respects else but the bed.

Org. The bed! 135
For fend it Jove's own jealousy! — till lastly
We slip down in the common earth together,
And there our beds are equal; save some monument

To show this was the king, and this the subject. — Soft sad music.

List, what sad sounds are these, — extremely sad ones? 140

Ith. Sure, from Penthea's lodgings.
Org. Hark! a voice too.

A SONG [within].

O, no more, no more, too late
Sighs are spent; the burning tapers

Of a life as chaste as fate,
Pure as are unwritten papers, 145
Are burnt out: no heat, no light
Now remains; 't is ever night.

Love is dead; let lovers' eyes,
Lock'd in endless dreams,

Th' extremes of all extremes, 150
Ope no more, for now Love dies,
Now Love dies, — implying

Love's martyrs must be ever, ever dying.

Ith. O, my misgiving heart!

Org. A horrid stillness Succeeds this deathful air; let's know the reason: 155

Tread softly; there is mystery in mourning.

Execunt.

SCENE [IV].<sup>1</sup>

Enter CHRISTALLA and PHILEMA, bringing in PENTHEA in a chair, veiled; two other Servants placing two chairs, one on the one side, and the other with an engine<sup>2</sup> on the other. The Maids sit down at her feet, mourning. The Servants go out: meet them ITHOCLES and ORGILUS.

1 Ser. [Aside to ORGILUS.] 'Tis done; that on her right hand.
Org. Good; begone.

[Exeunt Servants.]

Ith. Soft peace enrich this room!
Org. How fares the lady?

Phil. Dead!

Chris. Dead!

Phil. Starv'd!

Chris. Starv'd!

Ith. Me miserable!

Org. Tell us

How parted she from life.
Phil. She call'd for music,

And begg'd some gentle voice to tune a farewell

To life and griefs: Christalla touch'd the lute;

I wept the funeral song.
Chris. Which scarce was ended

But her last breath seal'd up these hollow sounds,

"O, cruel Ithocles and injur'd Orgilus!"

So down she drew her veil, so died.
Ith. So died! <sup>10</sup>

Org. Up! you are messengers of death; go from us;

Here's woe enough to court without a prompter:
Away: and — hark ye — till you see us next,

No syllable that she is dead. — Away,
Keep a smooth brow.

Exeunt CHRISTALLA and PHILEMA.

Ith. My lord, —
Mine only sister! <sup>15</sup>

Another is not left me.
Org. Take that chair;

I'll seat me here in this: between us sits
The object of our sorrows; some few tears

We'll part among us: I perhaps can mix
One lamentable story to prepare 'em. — <sup>20</sup>

There, there; sit there, my lord.
Ith. Yes, as you please.

ITHOCLES sits down, and is caught in the engine.

What means this treachery?
Org. Caught! you are caught,

Young master; 'tis thy throne of coronation,
Thou fool of greatness! See, I take this veil off;

Survey a beauty wither'd by the flames <sup>25</sup>
Of an insulting Phaëton, her brother.

Ith. Thou mean'st to kill me basely?
Org. I foreknew

The last act of her life, and train'd thee hither
To sacrifice a tyrant to a turtle.

You dreamt of kingdoms, did ye? How to bosom <sup>30</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Penthea's apartment in the palace.

<sup>2</sup> A piece of mechanism.

The delicacies of a youngling princess;
How with this nod to grace that subtle courtier,
How with that frown to make this noble trem-
ble,

And so forth; whiles Penthea's groans and tor-
tures,

Her agonies, her miseries, afflictions, <sup>35</sup>
Ne'er toucht upon your thought: as for my injuries,

Alas, they were beneath your royal pity;
But yet they liv'd, thou proud man, to confound thee.

Behold thy fate; this steel! [Draws a dagger.]

Ith. Strike home! A courage

As keen as thy revenge shall give it welcome:
But prithee faint not; if the wound close up, <sup>41</sup>

Tent<sup>3</sup> it with double force, and search it deeply.
Thou look'st that I should whine and beg compassion,

As loth to leave the vainness of my glories.
A statelier resolution arms my confidence, <sup>45</sup>

To cozen thee of honour; neither could I
With equal trial of unequal fortune

By hazard of a duel; 't were a bravery
Too mighty for a slave intending murder.

On to the execution, and inherit <sup>50</sup>
A conflict with thy horrors.

Org. By Apollo,

Thou talk'st a goodly language! for requital
I will report thee to thy mistress richly.

And take this peace along: some few short minutes

Determin'd, my resolves shall quickly follow <sup>55</sup>
Thy wrathful ghost; then, if we tug for mastery,

Penthea's sacred eyes shall lend new courage.
Give me thy hand: be healthful in thy part-
ing

From lost mortality! thus, thus I free it.

Ith. Yet, yet, I scorn to shrink. Kills him.

Org. Keep up thy spirit: <sup>60</sup>
I will be gentle even in blood; to linger
Pain, which I strive to cure, were to be cruel.

[Stabs him again.]

Ith. Nimble in vengeance, I forgive thee.
Follow

Safety, with best success: O, may it prosper! —
Penthea, by thy side thy brother bleeds; <sup>65</sup>

The earnest of his wrongs to thy fore'd faith.
Thoughts of ambition, or delicious banquet

With beauty, youth, and love, together perish
In my last breath, which on the sacred altar

Of a long-look'd-for peace — now — moves — to heaven. Dies. <sup>70</sup>

Org. Farewell, fair spring of manhood!
Henceforth welcome

Best expectation of a noble suff'rance.
I'll lock the bodies safe, till what must follow

Shall be approv'd. — Sweet twins, shine stars for ever! —

In vain they build their hopes whose life is shame: <sup>75</sup>

No monument lasts but a happy name. Exit.

<sup>3</sup> Probe.

ACT V

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>Enter BASSANES, alone.

Bass. Athens — to Athens I have sent, the nursery
Of Greece for learning and the fount of knowledge;
For here in Sparta there 's not left amongst us
One wise man to direct; we 're all turn'd mad-caps.

'T is said Apollo is the god of herbs, 5
Then certainly he knows the virtue of 'em:
To Delphos I have sent too. If there can be
A help for nature, we are sure yet.

Enter ORGILUS.

Org. Honour
Attend thy counsels ever!
Bass. I beseech thee
With all my heart, let me go from thee quietly;
I will not aught to do with thee, of all men. 11
The doubles<sup>2</sup> of a hare, — or, in a morning,
Salutes from a splay-footed witch, — to drop
Three drops of blood at th' nose just and no
more, —
Croaking of ravens, or the screech of owls, 15
Are not so boding mischief as thy crossing
My private meditations. Shun me, prithee;
And if I cannot love thee heartily,
I'll love thee as well as I can.

Org. Noble Bassanes, Mistake me not.

Bass. Phew! then we shall be troubled. 20
Thou wert ordain'd my plague — heaven make me thankful,
And give me patience too, heaven, I beseech
thee.

Org. Accept a league of amity; for henceforth,

I vow, by my best genius, in a syllable,
Never to speak vexation. I will study 25
Service and friendship, with a zealous sorrow
For my past incivility towards ye.

Bass. Hey-day, good words, good words! I must believe 'em,
And be a coxcomb for my labour.

Org. Use not
So hard a language; your misdoubt is cause-
less. 30

For instance, if you promise to put on
A constancy of patience, such a patience
As chronicle or history ne'er mentioned,
As follows not example, but shall stand 35
A wonder and a theme for imitation,
The first, the index<sup>3</sup> pointing to a second,
I will acquaint ye with an unmatch'd secret,
Whose knowledge to your griefs shall set a period.

Bass. Thou canst not, Orgilus; 't is in the
power
Of the gods only: yet, for satisfaction, 40
Because I note an earnest in thine utterance,

Unforc'd and naturally free, be resolute<sup>4</sup>
The virgin-bays shall not withstand the lightning

With a more careless danger than my constancy
The full of thy relation. Could it move 45
Distraction in a senseless marble statue,
It should find me a rock: I do expect now
Some truth of unheard moment.

Org. To your patience
You must add privacy, as strong in silence
As mysteries lock'd-up in Jove's own bosom. 50

Bass. A skull hid in the earth a treble age
Shall sooner prate.

Org. Lastly, to such direction
As the severity of a glorious action
Deserves to lead your wisdom and your judgment,

You ought to yield obedience.

Bass. With assurance 55
Of will and thankfulness.

Org. With manly courage
Please, then, to follow me.

Bass. Where'er, I fear not.
Exeunt omnes.

SCENE II.<sup>5</sup>

*Loud music. Enter GRONEAS and HEMOPHIL, leading EUPHRANEA; CHRISTALLA and PHI-LEMA, leading PROPHILUS; NEARCHEUS supporting CALANTHA; CROTON and AMELUS.
Cease loud music; all make a stand.*

Cal. We miss our servant Ithocles and Orgilus;
On whom attend they?

Crot. My son, gracious princess,
Whisper'd some new device, to which these revels
Should be but usher: wherein I conceive
Lord Ithocles and himself are actors. 5

Cal. A fair excuse for absence: as for Bass-
anes,

Delights to him are troublesome: Armostes
Is with the king?

Crot. He is.

Cal. On to the dance! —
Dear cousin, hand you the bride; the bridegroom must be

Intrusted to my courtship, Be not jealous, 10
Euphranea; I shall scarcely prove a temptress. —

Fall to our dance.

MUSIC.

NEARCHEUS dances with EUPHRANEA, PROPHI-
LUS with CALANTHA, CHRISTALLA with HEM-
OPHIL, PHILEMA with GRONEAS.

They dance the first change; during which AR-MOSTES enters.

Arm. (in CALANTHA'S ear.) The king your father's dead.

Cal. To the other change.

Arm. Is't possible? They dance again.

Enter BASSANES.

Bass. [whispers CALANTHA.] O, madam!
Pentheas, poor Pentheas 's starved.

Cal. Beshrew thee! —
Lead to the next.
Bass. Amazement dulls my senses. 15
They dance again.

Enter ORGILUS.

Org. [whispers CALANTHA.] Brave Ithocles is murder'd, murder'd cruelly.

Cal. How dull this music sounds! Strike up more sprightly;

Our footings are not active like our heart,
Which treads the nimble measure.

Org. I am thunderstruck.

The last change. Cease music.

Cal. So! let us breathe awhile. — Hath not this motion, 20

Rais'd fresher colour on your cheeks?

Near. Sweet princess,

A perfect purity of blood enamels

The beauty of your white.

Cal. We all look cheerfully;

And, cousin, 'tis, methinks, a rare presumption
In any who prefer our lawful pleasures 25

Before their own sour censure, t' interrupt

The custom of this ceremony bluntly.

Near. None dares, lady.

Cal. Yes, yes; some hollow voice deliver'd
to me

How that the king was dead.

Arm. The king is dead: 30

That fatal news was mine; for in mine arms

He breath'd his last, and with his crown be-queath'd ye

Your mother's wedding ring; which here I tender.

Crot. Most strange!

Cal. Peace crown his ashes! We are queen,
then. 35

Near. Long live Calantha! Sparta's sovereign queen!

All. Long live the queen!

Cal. What whispered Bassanes?

Bass. That my Penthea, miserable soul,

Was starv'd to death.

Cal. She's happy; she hath finish'd

A long and painful progress. — A third murmur

Pierc'd mine unwilling ears.

Org. That Ithocles 41

Was murder'd; — rather butcher'd, had not bravery

Of an undaunted spirit, conquering terror,

Proclaim'd his last act triumph over ruin.

Arm. How! murder'd!

Cal. By whose hand?

Org. By mine; this weapon 45

Was instrument to my revenge: the reasons

Are just, and known; quit him of these, and
then

Never liv'd gentleman of greater merit,

Hope or abilitment<sup>1</sup> to steer a kingdom.

Crot. Fie, Orgilus!

Euph. Fie, brother!

Cal. You have done it? 50

Bass. How it was done let him report, the forfeit

<sup>1</sup> Capacity.

Of whose allegiance to our laws doth covet
Rigour of justice; but that done it is,
Mine eyes have been an evidence of credit
Too sure to be convinc'd.<sup>2</sup> Armostes, rent not Thine arteries with hearing the bare circumstances 55

Of these calamities; thou 'st lost a nephew,
A niece, and I a wife: continue man still;
Make me the pattern of digesting evils,
Who can outlive my mighty ones, not shrink-
ing 60

At such a pressure as would sink a soul
Into what's most of death, the worst of horrors.

But I have seal'd a covenant with sadness,
And enter'd into bonds without condition,
To stand these tempests calmly; mark me,
nobles, 65

I do not shed a tear, not for Penthea!

Excellent misery!

Cal. We begin our reign

With a first act of justice: thy confession,

Unhappy Orgilus, dooms thee a sentence;

But yet thy father's or thy sister's presence 70

Shall be excus'd. — Give, Crotolon, a blessing

To thy lost son; — Euphranea, take a farewell; —

And both be gone.

Crot. [to ORGILUS.] Confirm thee, noble sorrow,

In worthy resolution!

Euph. Could my tears speak,

My griefs were slight.

Org. All goodness dwell amongst ye! 75

Enjoy my sister, Prophilus: my vengeance

Aim'd never at thy prejudice.

Cal. Now withdraw.

Exit CROTOLON, PROPHILUS, and EUPHRANEA.

Bloody relater of thy stains in blood,

For that thou hast reported him, whose fortunes

And life by thee are both at once snatch'd
from him, 80

With honourable mention, make thy choice

Of what death likes thee best; there's all our bounty. —

But to excuse delays, let me, dear cousin,

Intreat you and these lords see execution

Instant before ye part.

Near. Your will commands us, 85

Org. One suit, just queen, my last: vouchsafe your clemency,

That by no common hand I be divided

From this my humble frailty.

Cal. To their wisdoms

Who are to be spectators of thine end

I make the reference. Those that are dead 90

Are dead; had they not now died, of necessity

They must have paid the debt they ow'd to nature

One time or other. — Use dispatch, my lords;

We'll suddenly prepare our coronation.

Exit CALANTHA, PHILENA, and CHRISTALLA.

<sup>2</sup> Confuted.

Arm. 'Tis strange these tragedies should never touch on 95
Her female pity.

Bass. She has a masculine spirit ;
And wherefore should I pule, and, like a girl,
Put finger in the eye ? Let's be all toughness,
Without distinction betwixt sex and sex.

Near. Now, Orgilus, thy choice ?

Org. To bleed to death. 100

Arm. The executioner ?

Org. Myself, no surgeon ;
I am well skill'd in letting blood. Bind fast
This arm, that so the pipes may from their conduits

Convey a full stream ; here's a skilful instru-

Only I am a beggar to some charity 105

To speed me in this execution
By lending th' other prick to th' tother arm,
When this is bubbling life out.

Bass. I am for ye ;
It most concerns my art, my care, my credit. —
Quick, fillet both his arms.

Org. Gramercy, friendship ! 110
Such courtesies are real which flow cheerfully
Without an expectation of requital.

Reach me a staff in this hand.

[They give him a staff.]

—If a proneness

Or custom in my nature from my cradle
Had been inclin'd to fierce and eager bloodshed, 115

A coward guilt, hid in a coward quaking,
Would have betray'd fame to ignoble flight
And vagabond pursuit of dreadful safety :
But look upon my steadiness, and scorn not
The sickness of my fortune, which, since Bass-
anes 120

Was husband to Penthea, had lain bed-rid.
We trifle time in words : — thus I show cunning
In opening of a vein too full, too lively.

[Pierces the vein with his dagger.]

Arm. Desperate courage !

[Near.]<sup>1</sup> Honourable infamy !

Hem. I tremble at the sight,

Gro. Would I were loose ! 125

Bass. It sparkles like a lusty wine new brought ;

The vessel must be sound from which it issues. —

Grasp hard this other stick — I'll be as nimble —

But prithee, look not pale — have at ye ! stretch
out

Thine arm with vigour and [with]<sup>2</sup> unshook virtue. [Opens the vein.]

Good ! O, I envy not a rival, fitted 131

To conquer in extremities. This pastime
Appears majestic ; some high-tun'd poem

Hereafter shall deliver to posterity

The writer's glory and his subject's triumph. 135

How is 't, man ? Droop not yet.

Org. I feel no palsies.

On a pair-royal do I wait in death ;

My sovereign, as his liegeman ; on my mistress,

As a devoted servant ; and on Ithocles,
As if no brave, yet no unworthy enemy. 140

Nor did I use an engine to entrap
His life, out of a slavish fear to combat

Youth, strength, or cunning ;<sup>3</sup> but for that I durst not

Engage the goodness of a cause on fortune,
By which his name might have outfac'd my vengeance. 145

O, Teonius, inspir'd with Phoebus' fire !
I call to mind thy augury, 't was perfect ;

Revenge proves its own executioner.

When feeble man is bending to his mother,
The dust 'a was first fram'd on, thus he totters.

Bass. Life's fountain is dri'd up.

Org. So falls the standard 151
Of my prerogative in being a creature !
A mist hangs o'er mine eyes, the sun's bright splendour

Is clouded in an everlasting shadow ;
Welcome, thou ice, that sitt'st about my heart

No heat can ever thaw thee. Dies.

Near. Speech hath left him. 155
Bass. 'A has shook hands with time ; his funeral urn

Shall be my charge : remove the bloodless body.
The coronation must require attendance ;

That past, my few days can be but one mourning. Exeunt. 160

SCENE III.<sup>4</sup>

*An altar covered with white ; two lights of virgin wax, during which music of recorders ; enter four bearing ITHOCLES on a hearse, or in a chair, in a rich robe, with a crown on his head ; place him on one side of the altar. After him enter CALANTHA in a white robe and crown'd ; EU-PHRANEA, PHILEMA, and CHRISTALLA, in white ; NEARCHUS, ARMOSTES, CROTOLON, PROPHILUS, AMELUS, BASSANES, HEMO-
PHIL, and GRONEAS.*

CALANTHA goes and kneels before the altar, the rest stand off, the women kneeling behind, the recorders cease during her devotions. Soft music. CALANTHA and the rest rise, doing obei-sance to the altar.

Cal. Our orisons are heard ; the gods are merciful. —

Now tell me, you whose loyalties pay tribute
To us your lawful sovereign, how unskilful

Your duties or obedience is to render Subjection to the sceptre of a virgin, 5

Who have been ever fortunate in princes
Of masculine and stirring composition.

A woman has enough to govern wisely
Her own demeanours, passions, and divisions.

A nation warlike and inur'd to practice 10
Of policy and labour cannot brook

A feminine authority : we therefore Command your counsel, how you may advise

us
In choosing of a husband whose abilities
Can better guide this kingdom.

Near. Royal lady, 15
Your law is in your will.

<sup>4</sup> A temple.

Arm. We have seen tokens
Of constancy too lately to mistrust it.

Crot. Yet, if your highness settle on a choice
By your own judgment both allow'd and lik'd
of,
Sparta may grow in power, and proceed 20
To an increasing height.

Cal. Hold you the same mind?
Bass. Alas, great mistress, reason is so clouded
With the thick darkness of my infinite woes,
That I forecast nor dangers, hopes, or safety.
Give me some corner of the world to wear
out 25

The remnant of the minutes I must number,
Where I may hear no sounds but sad complaints
Of virgins who have lost contracting partners;
Of husbands howling that their wives were ravish'd
By some untimely fate; of friends divided 30
By churlish opposition; or of fathers
Weeping upon their children's slaughtered carcases;
Or daughters groaning o'er their fathers'
hearses;
And I can dwell there, and with these keep consort
As musical as theirs. What can you look for 35
From an old, foolish, peevish, doting man
But craziness of age?
Cal. Cousin of Argos, —
Near. Madam?
Cal. Were I presently
To choose you for my lord, I'll open freely
What articles I would propose to treat on 40
Before our marriage.
Near. Name them, virtuous lady.
Cal. I would presume you would retain the royalty
Of Sparta in her own bounds; then in Argos
Armestes might be viceroy; in Messene
Might Crotolon bear sway; and Bassanes — 45
Bass. I, queen! alas, what I?
Cal. Be Sparta's marshal.
The multitudes of high employments could
not
But set a peace to private griefs. These gentle-
men,
Groneas and Hemophil, with worthy pensions,
Should wait upon your person in your chamber. — 50
I would bestow Christalla on Amelus.
She'll prove a constant wife; and Philema
Should into Vesta's Temple.
Bass. This is a testament!
It sounds not like conditions on a marriage.
Near. All this should be perform'd.
Cal. Lastly, for Prophilus, 55
He should be, cousin, solemnly invested
In all those honours, titles, and preferments
Which his dear friend and my neglected husband
Too short a time enjoy'd.
Pro. I am unworthy
To live in your remembrance.
Euph. Excellent lady! 60

Near. Madam, what means that word, "neglected husband"?

Cal. Forgive me: — now I turn to thee, thou shadow
Of my contracted lord! Bear witness all,
I put my mother's wedding-ring upon
His finger; 't was my father's last bequest. 65 [Places a ring on the finger of ITHOCLES.]
Thus I new-marry him whose wife I am;
Death shall not separate us. O, my lords,
I but deceiv'd your eyes with antic gesture,
When one news straight came huddling on
another
Of death! and death! and death! still I danced forward; 70
But it struck home, and here, and in an instant.
Be such mere women, who with shrieks and outeries
Can vow a present end to all their sorrows,
Yet live to [court]<sup>1</sup> new pleasures, and outlive
them.
They are the silent griefs which cut the heart-
strings; 75
Let me die smiling.
Near. 'T is a truth too ominous.
Cal. One kiss on these cold lips, my last!
[Kisses ITHOCLES.] — Crack, crack! — Argos now 's Sparta's king. — Command the voices
Which wait at th' altar now to sing the song
I fitted for my end.
Near. Sirs, the song! 80

A SONG.

All. Glories, pleasures, pomps, delights, and ease,
Can but please
Outward senses when the mind
Is [or]<sup>2</sup> untroubled or by peace refin'd.
1 [Voice.] Crowns may flourish and decay, 85
Beauties shine, but fade away.
2 [Voice.] Youth may revel, yet it must Lie down in a bed of dust.
3 [Voice.] Earthly honours flow and waste,
Time alone doth change and last. 90
All. Sorrows mingled with contents prepare Rest for care;
Love only reigns in death; though art
Can find no comfort for a broken heart.

[CALANTHA dies.]

Arm. Look to the queen!
Bass. Her heart is broke, indeed. 95
O, royal maid, would thou hadst mist this part!
Yet 't was a brave one. I must weep to see
Her smile in death.
Arm. Wise Tecneius! thus said he;
When youth is ripe, and age from time doth
part,
The Lifeless Trunk shall wed the Broken Heart
Is here fulfill'd.
Near. I am your king. Long live 101
All.
Nearchus, King of Sparta!
Near. Her last will Shall never be digrest from: wait in order

1 Q. vow.

2 Q. not.

Upon these faithful lovers, as becomes us. —
 The counsels of the gods are never known <sup>105</sup>
 Till men can call th' effects of them their own,
 [Exeunt.]

THE EPILOGUE

WHERE noble judgments and clear eyes are fix'd
 To grace endeavour, there sits truth, not mix'd
 With ignorance; those censures may command
 Belief which talk not till they understand.

Let some say, "This was flat;" some, "Here
 the scene
 Fell from its height;" another, that the mean
 Was "ill observ'd" in such a growing passion
 As it transcended either state or fashion:
 Some few may cry, "'Twas pretty well," or
 so,
 "But—" and there shrug in silence; yet we know <sup>10</sup>
 Our writer's aim was in the whole address
 Well to deserve of all, but please the best;
 Which granted, by th' allowance of this strain
 The BROKEN HEART may be piec'd up again.

SCENE. — The Strand.

ACT I

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter Lady BORNWELL,<sup>2</sup> and her Steward.

Stew. Be patient, madam; you may have your pleasure.

Lady B.<sup>3</sup> 'T is that I came to town for. I would not Endure again the country conversation,

 To be the lady of six shires! The men,
 So near the primitive making, they retain<sup>5</sup>
 A sense of nothing but the earth; their brains,
 And barren heads standing as much in want
 Of ploughing as their ground. To hear a fellow Make himself merry and his horse, with whistling

Sellinger's Round!<sup>3</sup> To observe with what solemnity<sup>10</sup>

They keep their wakes, and throw for pewter candle-sticks!

How they become the morris, with whose bells
 They ring all in to Whitsun-ales; and sweat, Through twenty scarfs and napkins, till the hobby-horse<sup>3</sup>

Tire, and the Maid Marian,<sup>4</sup> dissolv'd to a jelly,
 Be kept for spoon meat!<sup>16</sup>

Stew. These, with your pardon, are no argument

To make the country life appear so hateful;
 At least to your particular, who enjoy'd
 A blessing in that calm, would you be pleas'd<sup>20</sup>
 To think so, and the pleasure of a kingdom;
 While your own will commanded what should move

Delights, your husband's love and power join'd

<sup>1</sup> A room in Sir Thomas Bornwell's house.

<sup>2</sup> In the Q, Lady Bornwell is called Aretina throughout in stage directions and speech-tags.

To give your life more harmony. You liv'd
 there

Secure, and innocent, belov'd of all;<sup>25</sup>
 Prais'd for your hospitality, and pray'd for:
 You might be envi'd, but malice knew
 Not where you dwelt. I would not prophesy,
 But leave to your own apprehension,
 What may succeed your change.

Lady B. You do imagine,<sup>30</sup>

No doubt, you have talk'd wisely, and confuted
 London past all defence. Your master should Do well to send you back into the country,
 With title of superintendent-bailiff.

Stew. How, madam!

Lady B. Even so, sir.

Stew. I am a gentleman,<sup>35</sup>

Though now your servant.

Lady B. A country gentleman,
 By your affection to converse with stubble.

His tenants will advance your wit, and plump
 it so

With beef and bag-pudding!

Stew. You may say your pleasure,
 It becomes not me dispute.

Lady B. Complain to<sup>40</sup>
 The lord of the soil, your master.

Stew. You're a woman
 Of an ungovern'd passion, and I pity you.

Enter Sir THOMAS BORNWELL.

Born. How now? What's the matter?
Stew. Nothing, sir. [Exit.]

Born. Angry, sweetheart?
Lady B. I am angry with myself,<sup>45</sup>

To be so miserably restrain'd in things,
 Wherein it doth concern your love and honour
 To see me satisfied.

Born. In what, Aretina,
 Dost thou accuse me? Have I not obey'd

All thy desires? Against mine own opinion
 Quitted the country, and remov'd the hope<sup>50</sup>

Of our return, by sale of that fair lordship
We liv'd in? Chang'd a calm and retir'd life
For this wild town, compos'd of noise and charge?<sup>1</sup>

Lady B. What charge, more than is necessary for

A lady of my birth and education? <sup>65</sup>

Born. I am not ignorant how much nobility Flows in your blood; your kinsmen great and powerful

I' th' state; but with this, lose not you memory

Of being my wife. I shall be studious,
Madam, to give the dignity of your birth <sup>60</sup>

All the best ornaments which become my fortune;

But would not flatter it, to ruin both,
And be the fable of the town, to teach

Other men loss of wit by mine, employ'd
To serve your vast expenses.

Lady B. Am I then <sup>66</sup>
Brought in the balance? So, sir!

Born. Though you weigh
Me in a partial<sup>2</sup> scale, my heart is honest,

And must take liberty to think you have Obey'd no modest counsel, to affect;<sup>3</sup> <sup>69</sup>

Nay, study ways of pride and costly ceremony:
Your change of gaudy furniture, and pictures

Of this Italian master, and that Dutchman's;
Your mighty looking-glasses, like artillery,

Brought home on engines; the superfluous
plate,

Antique and novel; vanities of tires;<sup>4</sup> <sup>75</sup>
Fourscore-pound suppers for my lord, your kins-

man,
Banquets for t' other lady aunt, and cousins,

And perfumes that exceed all: train of servants,

To stifle us at home, and show abroad
More motley than the French or the Venetian, <sup>80</sup>

About your coach, whose rude postillion
Must pester<sup>5</sup> every narrow lane, till passengers

And tradesmen curse your choking up their stalls;

And common cries pursue your ladyship,
For hind'ring o' their market.

Lady B. Have you done, sir? <sup>85</sup>
Born. I could accuse the gaiety of your wardrobe,

And prodigal embroideries, under which Rich satins, plushes, cloth of silver, dare

Not show their own complexions; your jewels,
Able to burn out the spectators' eyes, <sup>90</sup>

And show like bonfires on you by the tapers.
Something might here be spar'd, with safety of

Your birth and honour, since the truest wealth
Shines from the soul, and draws up just admirers.—

I could urge something more.

Lady B. Pray do, I like <sup>95</sup>
Your homily of thrift.

Born. I could wish, madam,
You would not game so much.

Lady B. A gamester too!

Born. But are not come to that acquaintance
yet,

Should teach you skill enough to raise your profit.

You look not through the subtilty of cards, <sup>100</sup>
And mysteries of dice; nor can you save

Charge with the box, buy petticoats and pearls;
And keep your family by the precious income;

Nor do I wish you should: my poorest servant
Shall not upbraid my tables, nor his hire, <sup>105</sup>

Purchas'd beneath my honour. You make play
Not a pastime but a tyranny, and vex

Yourself and my estate by it.
Lady B. Good! proceed.

Born. Another game you have, which consumes more

Your fame than purse; your revels in the night, <sup>110</sup>

Your meetings called the "Ball," to which repair,

As to the Court of Pleasure, all your gallants
And ladies, thither bound by a subpoena

Of Venus, and small Cupid's high displeasure;
'Tis but the Family of Love<sup>6</sup> translated <sup>115</sup>

Into more costly sin! There was a play on 't,<sup>7</sup>
And had the poet not been brib'd to a modest

Expression of your antic gambols in 't,
Some darks had been discovered, and the deeds
too.

In time he may repent, and make some blush,
To see the second part danc'd on the stage. <sup>121</sup>

My thoughts acquit you for dishonouring me
By any foul act; but the virtuous know

'Tis not enough to clear ourselves, but the Suspicious of our shame.

Lady B. Have you concluded <sup>125</sup>
Your lecture?

Born. I ha' done; and howsoever
My language may appear to you, it carries

No other than my fair and just intent
To your delights, without curb to their modest<sup>8</sup>

And noble freedom.

Lady B. I'll not be so tedious <sup>130</sup>
In my reply; but, without art or elegance,

Assure you, I keep still my first opinion:
And though you veil your avaricious meaning

With handsome names of modesty and thrift,
I find you would intrench and wound the liberty <sup>135</sup>

I was born with. Were my desires unprivileg'd

By example, while my judgment thought 'em
fit,

You ought not to oppose; but when the practice

And track of every honourable lady
Authorise me, I take it great injustice <sup>140</sup>

To have my pleasures circumscrib'd, and taught
me.

A narrow-minded husband is a thief
To his own fame, and his preferment too;

He shuts his parts and fortunes from the
world,

<sup>6</sup> A religious sect often accused of licentiousness.
<sup>7</sup> "The Ball," a comedy by Shirley and Chapman, 1632.

1 Expense.

3 Desire.

2 Unjust.

4 Headdresses.

5 Obstruct.

While, from the popular vote and knowledge, men <sup>145</sup>

Rise to employment in the state.

Born. I have
No great ambition to buy preferment at
So dear a rate.

Lady B. Nor I to sell my honour,
By living poor and sparingly. I was not Bred in that ebb of fortune, and my fate <sup>150</sup>
Shall not compel me to it.

Born. I know not,
Madam; but you pursue these ways—

Lady B. What ways?

Born. In the strict sense of honesty, I dare
Make oath they are innocent.

Lady B. Do not divert,
By busy troubling of your brain, those thoughts
That should preserve 'em.

Born. How was that?
Lady B. 'T is English. <sup>155</sup>
Born. But carries some unkind sense.

Enter MADAM DECOY.

Dec. Good morrow, my sweet madam.

Lady B. Decoy! welcome;
This visit is a favour.

Dec. Alas, sweet madam,
I cannot stay: I came but to present <sup>160</sup>
My service to your ladyship; I could not Pass by your door, but I must take the bold-
ness

To tender my respects.

Lady B. You oblige me, madam;
But I must not dispense so with your absence.

Dec. Alas, the coach, madam, stays for me at the door. <sup>165</sup>

Lady B. Thousha't command mine; prithee, sweet Decoy—

Dec. I would wait on you, madam, but I have many

Visits to make this morning; I beseech—

Lady B. So you will promise to dine with
me.

Dec. I shall

Present a guest.

Lady B. Why, then good morrow, madam.

Dec. A happy day shine on your ladyship! <sup>170</sup>
Exit.

Re-enter Steward.

Lady B. What's your news, sir?

Stew. Madam, two gentlemen.

Lady B. What gentlemen? Have they no names?

Stew. They are

The gentleman with his own head of hair,
Whom you commended for his horsemanship <sup>175</sup>
In Hyde Park, and becoming so the saddle,
The t' other day.

Lady B. What circumstance is this
To know him by?

Stew. His name's at my tongue's end:—
He lik'd the fashion of your pearl chain,
madam;

And borrowed it for his jeweller to take <sup>180</sup>
A copy by it.

Born. [Aside.] What cheating gallant's this?

Stew. That never walks without a lady's busk, <sup>1</sup>

And plays with fans—Master Alexander Kick-
shaw,—

I thought I should remember him.

Lady B. What's the other?

Stew. What an unlucky memory I have! <sup>185</sup>

The gallant that still danceth in the street,
And wears a gross of ribbon in his hat;

That carries oringado <sup>2</sup> in his pocket,
And sugar-plums, to sweeten his discourse;

That studies compliment, defies all wit <sup>190</sup>
In black, and censures plays that are not bawdy—

Master John Littleworth.

Lady B. They are welcome; but Pray entertain them a small time, lest I

Be unprovided.

Born. Did they ask for me?

Stew. No, sir.

Born. It matters not, they must be welcome.

Lady B. Fie! how's this hair disordered?
Here's a curl <sup>195</sup>

Straddles most impiously. I must to my closet.
Exit.

Born. Wait on 'em; my lady will return
again. [Exit Steward.]

I have to such a height fulfill'd <sup>3</sup> her humour,
All application's <sup>4</sup> dangerous: these gallants <sup>200</sup>

Must be receiv'd, or she will fall into
A tempest, and the house be shook with names

Of all her kindred. 'T is a servitude

I may in time shake off.

*Enter ALEXANDER [KICKSHAW] and LITTLE-
WORTH.*

Kick. and Little. Save you, Sir Thomas!

Born. Save you, gentlemen!

Kick. I kiss your hand. <sup>205</sup>

Born. What's day is it abroad?

Little. The morning rises from your lady's eye:

If she look clear, we take the happy omen

Of a fair day.

Born. She'll instantly appear,

To the discredit of your compliment; <sup>210</sup>

But you express your wit thus.

Kick. And you modesty,
Not to affect <sup>5</sup> the praises of your own.

Born. Leaving this subject, what game's now on foot?

What exercise carries the general vote

O' the town? Nothing moves without your knowledge. <sup>215</sup>

Kick. The cocking now has all the noise; I'll have

A hundred pieces of one battle.—Oh,

These birds of Mars!

Little. Venus is Mars his bird too.

Kick. Why, and the pretty doves are Venns's,
To show that kisses draw the chariot. <sup>220</sup>

Little. I am for that skirmish.

Born. When shall we have

More booths and bagpipes upon Banstead
downs?
No mighty race is expected? — But my lady Returns!

Re-enter LADY BORNWELL.

Lady B. Fair morning to you, gentlemen!
You went not late to bed by your early visit. 255
You do me honour.

Kick. It becomes our service.

Lady B. What news abroad? You hold precious intelligence.

Little. All tongues are so much busy with your praise,
They have not time to frame other discourse.

Will 't please you, madam, taste a sugar-plum?

Born. What does the goldsmith think the pearl is worth 251

You borrowed of my lady?

Kick. 'Tis a rich one.

Born. She has many other toys, whose fashion you

Will like extremely: you have no intention
To buy any of her jewels?

Kick. Understand me — 255

Born. You had rather sell, perhaps. But,
leaving this,

I hope you 'll dine with us.

Kick. I came a' purpose.

Lady B. And where were you last night?

Kick. I, madam? Where

I slept not; it had been sin, where so much
Delight and beauty was to keep me waking. 240

There is a lady, madam, will be worth
Your free society; my conversation

Ne'er knew so elegant and brave a soul,
With most incomparable flesh and blood;

So spirited! so courtly! speaks the languages, 246

Sings, dances, plays o' th' lute to admiration!
Is fair, and paints not; games too, keeps a table,

And talks most witty satire; has a wit
Of a clean Mercury —

Little. Is she married?

Kick. No.

Lady B. A virgin?

Kick. Neither.

Little. What! a widow! Something

Of this wide commendation might have Excus'd. This such a prodigy! 251

Kick. Repent,

Before I name her: she did never see
Yet full sixteen, an age, in the opinion

Of wise men, not contemptible. She has 255
Mourn'd out her year, too, for the honest

knight

That had compassion of her youth, and died
So timely. Such a widow is not common;

And now she shines more fresh and tempting
Than any natural virgin.

Lady B. What 's her name? 260

Kick. She was christened Celestina; by her
husband,

The Lady Bellamour; this ring was hers.

Born. You borrowed it to copy out the posy.

Kick. Are they not pretty rubies? 't was a
grace

She was pleas'd to show me, that I might have
one 265

Made of the self-same fashion; for I love
All pretty forms.

Lady B. And is she glorious?

Kick. She is full of jewels, madam; but I
am

Most taken with the bravery of her mind,
Although her garments have all grace and ornament. 270

Lady B. You have been high in praises.

Kick. I come short;

No flattery can reach her.

Born. [Aside.] Now my lady

Is troubled, as she fear'd to be eclips'd:

This news will cost me somewhat.

Lady B. You deserve 275

Her favour, for this noble character.
Kick. And I possess it, by my stars benevolence.

Lady B. You must bring us acquainted.

Born. I pray do, sir;

I long to see her too. — Madam, I have Thought upon 't, and corrected my opinion.

Pursue what ways of pleasure your desires 280

Incline you to, not only with my state,
But with my person; I will follow you.

I see the folly of my thrift, and will
Repent in sack and prodigality,

To your own heart's content.
Lady B. But do not mock. 285

Born. Take me to your embraces, gentlemen,
And tutor me.

Little. And will you kiss the ladies?

Born. And sing and dance. I long to see this beauty;

I would fain lose a hundred pounds at dice now.
Thou sha't have another gown and petticoat 290

To-morrow. Will you sell my running-horses?

We have no Greek wine in the house, I think;

Pray send one of our footmen to the merchant,

And throw the hogshead of March-beer into 295

The kennel,<sup>1</sup> to make room for sack and claret.

What think you to be drunk yet before dinner?

We will have constant music, and maintain

Them and their fiddles in fantastic liveries:

I'll tune my voice to catches. I must have

My dining-room enlarg'd, to invite ambassadors. 300

We'll feast the parish in the fields, and teach

The military men new discipline,

Who shall charge all their great artillery

With oranges and lemons, boy, to play

All dinner upon our capons.

Kick. He's exalted! 305

Born. I will do anything to please my lady,

Let that suffice; and kiss o' th' same condition.

I am converted; do not you dispute,

But patiently allow the miracle.

Lady B. I am glad to hear you, sir, in so good tune. 310

Enter Servant.

Serv. Madam, the painter.

Lady B. I am to sit this morning.

<sup>1</sup> Gutter.

Born. Do, while I give new directions to my steward.

Kick. With your favour, we'll wait on you: sitting 's but

A melancholy exercise without
Some company to discourse.

Lady B. It does conclude <sup>516</sup>

A lady's morning work. We rise, make fine,
Sit for our picture, and 't is time to dine.

Little. Praying 's forgot.

Kick. 'T is out of fashion. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter CELESTINA and her Steward.

Cel. Fie! what an air this room has!

Stew. 'T is perfum'd.

Cel. With some cheap stuff. Is it your wisdom's thrift

To infect my nostrils thus? Or is 't to favour
The gout in your worship's hand, you are afraid

To exercise your pen in your account book? <sup>6</sup>
Or do you doubt my credit to discharge
Your bills?

Stew. Madam, I hope you have not found
My duty, with the guilt of sloth or jealousy,
Unapt to your command.

Cel. You can extenuate
Your faults with language, sir; but I expect <sup>10</sup>
'To be obey'd. What hangings have we here!

Stew. They are arras, madam.

Cel. Impudence! I know 't.
I will have fresher, and more rich; not
wrought

With faces that may scandalize a Christian, <sup>14</sup>
With Jewish stories stuff with corn and camels.
You had best wrap all my chambers in wild Irish,

And make a nursery of monsters here,
To fright the ladies come to visit me.

Stew. Madam, I hope —

Cel. I say I will have other,
Good Master Steward, of a finer loom; <sup>20</sup>

Some silk and silver, if your worship please

To let me be at so much cost. I'll have Stories to fit the seasons of the year,

And change as often as I please.

Stew. You shall, madam.

Cel. I am bound to your consent, forsooth!
And is <sup>26</sup>

My coach brought home?

Stew. This morning I expect it.

Cel. The inside, as I gave direction,
Of crimson plush?

Stew. Of crimson camel plush.

Cel. Ten thousand moths consume 't! Shall I ride through
The streets in penance, wrapt up round in hair cloth? <sup>30</sup>

Sell 't to an alderman, 't will serve his wife

To go a feasting to their country-house;

Or fetch a merchant's nurse-child, and come
home

Laden with fruit and cheese-cakes. I despise
it!

<sup>1</sup> A room in Celestina's house.

Stew. The nails adorn it, madam, set in method, <sup>35</sup>

And pretty forms.

Cel. But single gilt, I warrant.

Stew. No, madam.

Cel. Another solecism! Oh fie!

This fellow will bring me to a consumption

With fretting at his ignorance. Some lady

Had rather never pray than go to church in 't. <sup>40</sup>

The nails not double gilt! To market wo 't? <sup>2</sup>

'T will hackney out to Mile-end, or convey

Your city tumblers <sup>3</sup> to be drunk with cream

And prunes at Islington. <sup>4</sup>

Stew. Good madam, hear me.

Cel. I'll rather be beholding to my aunt, <sup>45</sup>

The countess, for her mourning coach, than be

Disparag'd so. Shall any juggling tradesman

Be at charge to shoe his running-horse with
gold,

And shall my coach nails be but single gilt!

How dare these knaves abuse me so?

Stew. Vouchsafe <sup>60</sup>

To hear me speak.

Cel. Is my sedan yet finish'd,

And liveries for my men-mules, <sup>5</sup> according

As I gave charge?

Stew. Yes, madam, it is finish'd,

But without tilting-plumes at the four corners;

The scarlet 's pure, but not embroidered. <sup>65</sup>

Cel. What mischief were it to your con-

science

Were my coach lin'd with tissue, and my har-

ness

Cover'd with needle-work? if my sedan

Had all the story of the prodigal

Embroidered with pearl?

Stew. Alas, good madam, <sup>60</sup>

I know 'tis your own cost; I am but your

steward,

And would discharge my duty the best way.

You have been pleas'd to hear me; 't is not for

My profit that I manage your estate

And save expense, but for your honour, madam.

Cel. How, sir! my honour?

Stew. Though you hear it not, <sup>65</sup>

Men's tongues are liberal in your character,

Since you began to live thus high. I know

Your fame is precious to you.

Cel. I were best

Make you my governor. Audacious varlet! <sup>70</sup>

How dare you interpose your dotting counsel?

Mind your affairs with more obedience,

Or I shall ease you of an office, sir.

Must I be limited to please your honour,

Or, for the vulgar breath, confine my pleasures? <sup>70</sup>

I will pursue 'em in what shapes I fancy,

Here, and abroad; y' entertainments shall

Be oft'ner, and more rich. Who shall control

me?

I live i' th' Strand, whither few ladies come

To live, and purchase more than fame. I will

Be hospitable then, and spare no cost <sup>81</sup>

That may engage all generous report

To trumpet forth my bounty and my bravery, <sup>5</sup>

Till the court envy, and remove. I'll have
My house the academy of wits, who shall 85
Exalt their genius with rich sack and sturgeon,
Write panegyrics of my feasts, and praise
The method of my witty superfluities.

The horses shall be taught, with frequent waiting

Upon my gates, to stop in their career 90
Toward Charing-cross, spite of the coachman's fury ;

And not a tilter but shall strike<sup>1</sup> his plume,
When he sails by my window : my balcony
Shall be the courtier's idol, and more gar'd at Than all the pageantry at Temple Bar, 95
By country clients.

Stew. Sure my lady's mad.

Cel. Take that for your ill manners.

[Strikes him.]

Stew. Thank you, madam.—
I would there were less quicksilver in your fingers. Exit.

Cel. There's more than simple honesty in a servant

Requir'd to his full duty ; none should dare 100
But with a look, much less a saucy language,
Check at their mistress' pleasure. I'm resolv'd
To pay for some delight, my estate will bear it ;
I'll rein it shorter when I please.

Re-enter Steward.

Stew. A gentleman
Desires to speak with your ladyship.

Cel. His name ? 105

Stew. He says you know him not ; he seems to be

Of quality.

Cel. Admit him. [Exit Steward.]

Enter HAIRCUT.

Sir, with me ?

Hair. Madam, I know not how you may receive

This boldness from me ; but my fair intents
Known, will incline you to be charitable. 110

Cel. No doubt, sir.

Hair. He must live obscurely, madam,
That hath not heard what virtues you possess ;
And I, a poor admirer of your fame,
Am come to kiss your hand.

Cel. That all your business ?

Hair. Though it were worth much travel, I have more 115

In my ambition.

Cel. Speak it freely, sir.

Hair. You are a widow.

Cel. So !

Hair. And I a bachelor.

Cel. You come a wooing, sir, and would perhaps

Show me a way to reconcile the two ?

Hair. And bless my stars for such a happi-
ness. 120

Cel. I like you, sir, the better, that you do
not

Wander about, but shoot home to the mean-
ing ;

<sup>1</sup> Lower.

It is a confidence will make a man
Know sooner what to trust to : but I never Saw you before, and I believe you come not 125
With hope to find me desperate upon marriage.
If maids, out of their ignorance of what
Men are, refuse these offers, widows may,
Out of their knowledge, be allow'd some coy-
ness :

And yet I know not how much happiness 130
A peremptory answer may deprive me of ;—

You may be some young lord, and though I see
not

Your footmen and your groom, they may not
be

Far off, in conference with your horse. Please
you

To instruct me with your title, against which
I would not willingly offend.

Hair. I am 135
A gentleman ; my name is Haircut, madam.

Cel. Sweet Master Haircut, are you a courtier ?

Hair. Yes.

Cel. I did think so, by your confidence.
Not to detain you, sir, with circumstance, 140

I was not so unhappy in my husband,
But that 't is possible I may be a wife
Again ; but I must tell you, he that wins
My affection, shall deserve me.

Hair. I will hope,
If you can love, I shall not present, madam, 145
An object to displease you in my person :

And when time, and your patience, shall possess you

With further knowledge of me, and the truth
Of my devotion, you will not repent

The offer of my service.

Cel. You say well. 150
How long do you imagine you can love, sir ?
Is it a quotidian, or will it hold
But every other day ?

Hair. You are pleasant,<sup>2</sup> madam.

Cel. Does it take you with a burning at the
first,

Or with a cold fit ? for you gentlemen 155
Have both your summer and your winter service.

Hair. I am ignorant what you mean ; but I shall never

Be cold in my affection to such beauty.

Cel. And 't will be somewhat long ere I be warm in 't.

Hair. If you vouchsafe me so much honour,
madam, 160

That I may wait on you sometimes, I sha' not Despair to see a change.

Cel. But now I know
Your mind, you shall not need to tell it when You come again ; I shall remember it.

Hair. You make me fortunate.

Re-enter Steward.

Stew. Madam, your kinswomen, 165
The lady Novice, and her sister, are
New lighted from their coach.

<sup>2</sup> Jocular.

Cel. I did expect 'em,
They partly are my pupils. I'll attend 'em.

[Exit Steward.]

Hair. Madam, I have been too great a trespasser
Upon your patience; I will take my leave. 170
You have affairs, and I have some employment
Calls me to court; I shall present again
A servant to you. Exit.

Cel. Sir, you may present,
But not give fire, I hope. — Now to the ladies.
This recreation 's past, the next must be 175
To read to them some court philosophy. Exit.

ACT II

SCENE I.<sup>1</sup>

Enter SIR THOMAS BORNWELL.

Born. 'Tis a strange humour I have undertaken,
To dance, and play, and spend as fast as she does;

But I am resolv'd: it may do good upon her,
And fright her into thrift. Nay, I'll endeavour
To make her jealous too; if this do not 5
Allay her gamboling, she's past a woman,
And only a miracle must tame her.

Enter Steward.

Stew. 'Tis master Frederick, my lady's
nephew.

Born. What of him?

Stew. Is come from the university.

Born. By whose directions?

Stew. It seems, my lady's.

Born. Let me speak with him 10
Before he see his aunt. [Exit Stew.] — I do not like it. —

Enter [Steward, with] MASTER FREDERICK, [in his college dress.]

Master Frederick, welcome! I expected not
So soon your presence; what 's the hasty cause?

Fred. These letters, from my tutor, will acquaint you. [Gives BORNWELL letters.]

Stew. Welcome home, sweet Master Frederick!

Fred. Where 's my aunt? 15

Stew. She 's busy about her painting, in her closet;

The outlandish man of art is copying out
Her countenance.

Fred. She is sitting for her picture?

Stew. Yes, sir; and when 'tis drawn she will be hang'd

Next the French cardinal, in the dining-room.
But when she hears you 're come, she will dismiss 21

The Belgic gentleman, to entertain
Your worship.

Fred. Change of air has made you witty.

Born. Your tutor gives you a handsome character,

Frederick, and is sorry your aunt's pleasure 25
Commands you from your studies; but I hope
You have no quarrel to the liberal arts.
Learning is an addition<sup>2</sup> beyond
Nobility of birth. Honour of blood,
Without the ornament of knowledge, is 30
A glorious<sup>3</sup> ignorance.

Fred. I never knew more sweet and happy hours

Than I employ'd upon my books. I heard
A part of my philosophy, and was so
Delighted with the harmony of nature, 35
I could have wasted my whole life upon 't.

Born. [Aside.] 'Tis pity a rash indulgence should corrupt

So fair a genius! She 's here; I'll observe.

Enter Lady BORNWELL, KICKSHAW, and LITTLEWORTH.

Fred. My most lov'd aunt!

Lady B. Support me, I shall faint.

Little. What ails your ladyship?

Lady B. Is that Frederick, 40
In black?

Kick. Yes, madam; but the doublet's satin.

Lady B. The boy's undone!

Fred. Madam, you appear troubled.

Lady B. Have I not cause? Was not I trusted with

Thy education, boy, and have they sent thee
Home like a very scholar!

Kick. 'Twas ill done, 45

How'er they us'd him in the university,

To send him to his friends thus.

Fred. Why, sir? Black,

(For 'tis the colour that offends your eye-sight,)

Is not, within my reading, any blemish;

Sables are no disgrace in heraldry. 50

Kick. 'Tis coming from the college thus,
that makes it

Dishonourable. While you wore it for

Your father, it was commendable; or were

Your aunt dead, you might mourn, and justify.

Lady B. What luck<sup>4</sup> I did not send him into France! 55

They would have given him generous education,

Taught him another garb, to wear his lock,<sup>5</sup>

And shape, as gaudy as the summer; how

To dance, and wag his feather à-la-mode,

To compliment, and cringe; to talk not modestly, 60

Like, "ay forsooth," and "no forsooth;" to blush,

And look so like a chaplain! — There he might

Have learn'd a brazen confidence, and observ'd

So well the custom of the country, that

He might, by this time, have invented fashions

For us, and been a benefit to the kingdom; 65

Preserv'd our tailors in their wits, and sav'd

The charge of sending into foreign courts

For pride and antic fashions. — Observe

In what a posture he does hold his hat now! 70

Fred. Madam, with your pardon, you have

<sup>1</sup> A room in Sir Thomas Bornwell's house.

Another dialect than was taught me when
I was commended to your care and breeding.
I understand not this; Latin or Greek
Are more familiar to my apprehension: 76
Logie was not so hard in my first lectures
As your strange language.

Lady B. Some strong waters; oh!
Little. Comfits will be as comfortable to your stomach, madam. [Offers his box.]

Lady B. I fear he's spoil'd for ever! He did
name

Logie, and may, for aught I know, be gone 80
So far to understand it. I did always Suspect they would corrupt him in the college.—

Will your Greek saws and sentences discharge
The mercer? Or is Latin a fit language
To court a mistress in? — Master Alexander, 86
If you have any charity, let me
Commend him to your breeding. — I suspect
I must employ my doctor first, to purge
The university that lies in 's head;
It alters his complexion.

Kick. If you dare 90
Trust me to serve him —

Lady B. Master Littleworth,
Be you join'd in commission.

Little. I will teach him
Postures and rudiments.

Lady B. I have no patience
To see him in this shape; it turns my stomach.
When he has cast his academic skin 95
He shall be yours. I am bound in conscience
To see him bred; his own state shall maintain
The charge, while he's my ward. — Come hither, sir.

Fred. What does my aunt mean to do with
me?

Stew. To make you a fine gentleman, and translate you 100

Out of your learned language, sir, into
The present Goth and Vandal, which is French.
Born. [Aside.] Into what mischief will this humour ebb?

She will undo the boy; I see him ruin'd.
My patience is not manly; but I must 105
Use stratagem to reduce her: open ways
Give me no hope.

Stew. You shall be obey'd, madam.
Exeunt [all but FREDERICK and
Steward.]

Fred. Master Steward, are you sure we do not dream?

Was 't not my aunt you talkt to?
Stew. One that loves you

Dear as her life. These clothes do not become
you, 110

You must have better, sir —
Fred. These are not old.

Stew. More suitable to the town and time;
we keep

No Lent here, nor is 't my lady's pleasure you Should fast from anything you have a mind to;
Unless it be your learning, which she would have you 116

Forget with all convenient speed that may be,
For the credit of your noble family.

The case is alter'd since we liv'd i' th' country;
We do not now invite the poor o' th' parish
To dinner, keep a table for the tenants; 120
Our kitchen does not smell of beef; the cellar
Defies the price of malt and hops; the footmen
And coach-drivers may be drunk like gentle-
men,

With wine; nor will three fiddlers upon holidays,

With aid of bag-pipes, that call'd in the country 125

To dance, and plough the hall up with their hob-nails,

Now make my lady merry. We do feed
Like princes, and feast nothing else but princes;
And are these robes fit to to be seen amongst
'em?

Fred. My lady keeps a court then! Is Sir
Thomas 130

Affected<sup>1</sup> with this state and cost?
Stew. He was not,

But is converted: and I hope you wo' not Persist in heresy, but take a course
Of riot, to content your friends; you shall Want nothing, if you can be proud, and spend
it 135

For my lady's honour. Here are a hundred
Pieces, will serve you till you have new clothes;
I will present you with a nag of mine,
Poor tender of my service, please you accept;
My lady's smile more than rewards me for it. 140
I must provide fit servants to attend you,
Monsieurs, for horse and foot.

Fred. I shall submit,
If this be my aunt's pleasure, and be rul'd;
My eyes are open'd with this purse already,
And sack will help to inspire me. I must spend
it? 145

Stew. What else, sir?
Fred. I'll begin with you: to encourage

You to have still a special care of me,
There is five pieces, — not for your nag.

Stew. No, sir; I hope it is not.
Fred. Buy a beaver

For thy own block;<sup>2</sup> I shall be rul'd. Who does 150

Command the wine cellar?
Stew. Who commands but you, sir?

Fred. I'll try to drink a health or two, my aunt's,

Or anybody's; and if that foundation
Stagger me not too much, I will commence
In all the arts of London.

Stew. If you find, sir, 155
The operation of the wine exalt

Your blood to the desire of any female
Delight, I know your aunt wo' not deny
Any of her chambermaids to practise on;
She loves you but too well.

Fred. I know not how 160
I may be for that exercise. — Farewell, Aristotle,

Prithce commend me to the library
At Westminster; my bones I bequeath thither,

And to the learned worms that mean to visit
'em.

I will compose myself ; I begin to think <sup>165</sup>
I have lost time indeed. — Come to the wine cellar. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter CELESTINA, MARIANA, and ISABELLA.

Mar. But shall we not, madam, expose ourselves

To censure for this freedom ?

Cel. Let them answer
That dare mistake us. Shall we be so much
Cowards, to be frighted from our pleasure,
Because men have malicious tongues, and show
What miserable souls they have ? No, cousin, <sup>6</sup>
We hold our life and fortunes upon no
Man's charity ; if they dare show so little Discretion to traduce our fames, we will
Be guilty of so much wit to laugh at 'em. <sup>10</sup>

Isab. 'T is a becoming fortitude.

Cel. My stars
Are yet kind to me ; for, in a happy minute
Be 't spent, I 'm not in love, and men shall never

Make my heart lean with sighing, nor with
tears

Draw on my eyes the infamy of spectacles. <sup>15</sup>
'T is the chief principle to keep your heart
Under your own obedience ; jest, but love not.
I say my prayers, yet can wear good clothes,
And only satisfy my tailor for 'em.
I will not lose my privilege. <sup>20</sup>

Mar. And yet they say your entertainments
are,
Give me your pardon, madam, to proclaim
Yourself a widow, and to get a husband.

Cel. As if a lady of my years, some beauty, Left by her husband rich, that had mourn'd for
him <sup>25</sup>
A twelvemonth too, could live so obscure i' th'
town,

That gallants would not know her, and invite Themselves, without her chargeable <sup>2</sup> proclamations !

Then we are worse than citizens : no widow Left wealthy can be thoroughly warm in mourning, <sup>30</sup>

But some one noble blood, or lusty kindred,
Claps in, with his gilt coach, and Flandrian <sup>3</sup>
trotters,

And hurries her away to be a countess.
Courtiers have spies, and great ones with large titles,

Cold in their own estates, would warm themselves <sup>35</sup>
At a rich city bonfire.

Isab. Most true, madam.

Cel. No matter for corruption of the blood :
Some undone courtier made her husband rich,
And this new lord receives it back again.
Admit it were my policy, and that <sup>40</sup>
My entertainments pointed to acquaint me
With many suitors, that I might be safe

<sup>2</sup> Expensive. <sup>3</sup> Flemish.

And make the best election, could you blame
me ?

Mar. Madam, 't is wisdom.

Cel. But I should be
In my thoughts miserable, to be fond <sup>4</sup> <sup>45</sup>
Of leaving the sweet freedom I possess,
And court myself into new marriage fetters.
I now observe men's several wits and windings, <sup>5</sup>
And can laugh at their follies.

Mar. You have given
A most ingenious satisfaction. <sup>50</sup>

Cel. One thing I 'll tell you more, and this I give you

Worthy your imitation, from my practice :
You see me merry, full of song and dancing,
Pleasant in language, apt to all delights
That crown a public meeting ; but you cannot Accuse me of being prodigal of my favours <sup>55</sup>
To any of my guests. I do not summon,
By any wink, a gentleman to follow me
To my withdrawing chamber ; I hear all
Their pleas in court, nor can they boast abroad,
And do me justice, after a salute, <sup>60</sup>
They have much conversation with my lip.
I hold the kissing of my hand a courtesy,
And he that loves me, must, upon the strength
Of that, expect till I renew his favour. <sup>65</sup>

Some ladies are so expensive in their graces
To those that honour 'em, and so prodigal,
That in a little time they have nothing but
The naked sin left to reward their servants ;
Whereas, a thrift in our rewards will keep <sup>70</sup>
Men long in their devotion, and preserve Ourselves in stock, to encourage those that honour us.

Isab. This is an art worthy a lady's practice.

Cel. It takes not from the freedom of our
mirth,

But seems to advance it, when we can possess
Our pleasures with security of our honour ; <sup>75</sup>
And, that preserv'd, I welcome all the joys
My fancy can let in. In this I have given
The copy of my mind, nor do I blush
You understand it.

Isab. You have honour'd us. <sup>80</sup>

Enter CELESTINA'S Gentlewoman.

Gentlew. Madam, Sir William Scentlove's come to wait on you.

Cel. There's one would be a client. — Make excuse
For a few minutes. [Exit Gentlewoman.]

Mar. One that comes a wooing ?

Cel. Such a thing he would seem, but in his guiltiness
Of little land, his expectation is not <sup>85</sup>
So valiant as it might be. He wears rich clothes,
And feeds with noblemen ; to some, I hear,
No better than a wanton emissary,
Or scout for Venus' wild fowl ; which made tame,

He thinks no shame to stand court sentinel, <sup>90</sup>
In hope of the reversion.

Mar. I have heard

<sup>5</sup> Devices, schemings.

That some of them are often my lord's tasters,
The first fruits they condition for, and will
Exact as fees, for the promotion.

Cel. Let them agree; there's no account shall lie <sup>95</sup>
For me among their traffic.

Re-enter Gentlewoman.

Gentlew. Master Haircut, madam,
Is new come in, to tender you his service.

Cel. Let him discourse a little with Sir William.
Exit Gentlewoman.

Mar. What is this gentleman, Master Haircut, madam?

I note him very gallant, and much courted <sup>100</sup>
By gentlemen of quality.

Cel. I know not,
More than a trim gay man; he has some great
office,

Sure, by his confident behaviour.

He would be entertain'd under the title

Of servant<sup>1</sup> to me, and I must confess, <sup>105</sup>

He is the sweetest of all men that visit me.

Isab. How mean you, madam?

Cel. He is full of powder;
He will save much in perfume for my chamber,
Were he but constant here. — Give 'em access.

Enter SIR WILLIAM SCENTLOVE and HAIRCUT.

Scent. Madam, the humblest of your servants is Exalted to a happiness, if you smile <sup>111</sup>

Upon my visit.

Hair. I must beg your charity
Upon my rudeness, madam; I shall give
That day up lost to any happiness,

When I forget to tender you my service. <sup>115</sup>

Cel. You practise courtship, gentlemen.

Scent. But cannot Find where with more desert to exercise it.

What lady's this, I pray?

Cel. A kinswoman

Of mine, Sir William.

Scent. I am more her servant.

Cel. You came from court, now, I presume?

Hair. 'Tis, madam, <sup>120</sup>

The sphere I move in, and my destiny

Was kind to place me there, where I enjoy

All blessings that a mortal can possess,

That lives not in your presence; and I should

Fix my ambition, when you would vouchsafe <sup>125</sup>

Me so much honour, to accept from me

An humble entertainment there.

Cel. But by What name shall I be known? In what degree

Shall I be of kindred to you?

Hair. How mean you, madam?

Cel. Perhaps you'll call me sister, I shall take it <sup>130</sup>

A special preferment; or it may be

I may pass under title of your mistress,

If I seem rich, and fair enough, to engage

Your confidence to own me.

Hair. I would hope —

Cel. But 'tis not come to that yet: you will,
sir, <sup>135</sup>

Excuse my mirth.

<sup>1</sup> Lover.

Hair. Sweet madam! Shall I take

Boldness to ask what place you hold in court?
'Tis an uncivil curiosity;

But you'll have mercy to a woman's question.

Hair. My present condition, madam, carries

Honour and profit, though not to be nam'd <sup>141</sup>

With that employment I expect i' th' state,

Which shall discharge the first maturity

Upon your knowledge; until then, I beg

You allow a modest silence.

Cel. I am charm'd, sir; <sup>145</sup>

And if you scape ambassador, you cannot

Reach a preferment wherein I'm against you.

But where is Sir William Scentlove?

Hair. Give him leave
To follow his nose, madam, while he hunts

In view, — he'll soon be at a fault. <sup>2</sup>

Cel. You know him? <sup>150</sup>

Hair. Know Scentlove? Not a page but can decipher him;

The waiting-women know him to a scruple;

He's called the blister-maker of the town.

Cel. What's that?

Hair. The laundry ladies can resolve you,

And you may guess: an arrant epicure, <sup>155</sup>

As this day lives, born to a pretty wit,

A knight, too; but no gentleman. I must

Be plain to you; — your ladyship may have

Use of this knowledge, but conceal the author.

Scent. I kiss your fairest hand.

Mar. You make a difference; <sup>160</sup>

Pray reconcile them to an equal whiteness.

Scent. You wound my meaning, lady.

Cel. Nay, Sir William

Has the art of compliment.

Scent. Madam, you honour me

'Bove my desert of language.

Cel. Will you please

To enrich me with your knowledge of that gentleman? <sup>165</sup>

Scent. Do you not know him, madam?

Cel. What is he?

Scent. A camphire ball; you shall know more hereafter;

He shall tell you himself, and save my character;

Till then, — you see he's proud.

Cel. One thing, gentlemen,

I observe in your behaviour, which is rare <sup>170</sup>

In two that court one mistress: you preserve

A noble friendship; there's no gum within

Your hearts; you cannot fret,<sup>3</sup> or show an envy

Of one another's hope; some would not govern

Their passions with that temper!

Scent. The whole world <sup>175</sup>

Shall nor divorce our friendship. — Master Haircut!

Would I had lives to serve him! He is lost

To goodness does not honour him.

Hair. My knight!

Cel. [Aside.] This is right playing at court shuttlecock. <sup>179</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Cf. 1 Henry IV, II. ii. 2, "I have hid Falstaff's horse, and he frets like gumm'd velvet." (Gifford.)

Re-enter Gentlewoman.

Gentlew. Madam, there is a gentleman desires
To speak wi' ye, one Sir Thomas Bornwell.

Cel. Bornwell?

Gentlew. He says he is a stranger to your ladyship.

Scent. I know him.

Hair. Your neighbour, madam.

Scent. Husband to

The lady that so revels in the Strand.

Hair. He has good parts, they say, but cannot help 185

His lady's bias.

Cel. They have both much fame
I' th' town, for several merits. Pray admit him.

[Exit Gentlewoman.]

Hair. [Aside.] What comes he for?

Enter Sir THOMAS BORNWELL.

Born. Your pardon, noble lady, that I have Presum'd a stranger to your knowledge, —

[Salutes CELESTINA.]

Cel. Sir, 190

Your worth was here before you, and your person
Cannot be here ungrateful.

Born. 'Tis the bounty

Of your sweet disposition, madam. — Make me
Your servant, lady, by her fair example,

To favour me. [Offers to salute ISABELLA, who turns from him. Aside.] — I never knew one turn 195

Her cheek to a gentleman that came to kiss her,
But she 'd a stinking breath. — Your servant,
gentlemen.

Will Scentlove, how is 't?

Cel. I am sorry, coz,

To accuse you; we in nothing more betray
Ourselves to censure of ridiculous pride, 200

Than answering a fair salute too rudely.

Oh, it shows ill upon a gentlewoman

Not to return the modest lip, if she Would have the world believe her breath is not Offensive.

Born. Madam, I have business 205

With you.

Scent. His looks are pleasant.

Cel. With me, sir?

Born. I hear you have an exc'llent wit,
madam;

I see you are fair.

Cel. The first is but report;

And do not trust your eye-sight for the last,
'Cause I presume y' are mortal, and may err.

Hair. He is very gamesome.

Born. Y' have an exc'llent voice, 211

(They say you catcht it from a dying swan,)
[With] which, join'd to the harmony of your lute,

You ravish all mankind.

Cel. Ravish mankind?

Born. With their consent.

Cel. It were the stranger rape; 215

But there's the less indictment lies against it:
And there is hope your little honesties <sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Chastities.

Cannot be much the worse, for men do rather Believe they had a maidenhead, than put Themselves to th' rack of memory how long <sup>220</sup>
'Tis since they left the burden of their innocence.

Born. Why, you are bitter, madam!

Cel. So is physick;

I do not know your constitution.

Born. You shall, if 't please you, madam.

Cel. Y' are too hasty,

I must examine what certificate 225

You have first, to prefer you.

Born. Fine! certificate?

Cel. Under your lady's hand and seal.

Born. Go to;

I see you are a wag.

Cel. But take heed how

You trust to 't.

Born. I can love you in my wedlock,

As well as that young gallant o' th' first
hair, 231

Or the knight-bachelor; and can return
As amorous delight to thy soft bosom.

Cel. Your person and your language are both strangers.

Born. But may be more familiar; I have those

That dare make affidavit for my body. 235

Cel. D' ye mean your surgeon?

Born. My surgeon, madam?

I know not how you value my abilities,

But I dare undertake as much, to express

My service to your ladyship, and with

As fierce ambition fly to your commands, 240

As the most valiant of these lay siege to you.

Cel. You dare not, sir.

Born. How, madam?

Cel. I will justify 't.

You dare not marry me; and I imagine
Some here, should I consent, would fetch a priest

Out of the fire.

Born. I have a wife indeed. 245

Cel. And there's a statute not repeal'd, I take it.

Born. Y' are in the right; I must confess y' have hit

And bled me in a master vein.

Cel. You think

I took you on the advantage; use your best

Skill at defence, I'll come up to your valour, 250

And show another work you dare not do:

You dare not, sir, be virtuous.

Born. I dare,

By this fair hand I dare; and ask a pardon,

If my rude words offend your innocence,

Which, in a form so beautiful, would shine 255

To force a blush in them suspected it,

And from the rest draw wonder.

Hair. I like not

Their secret parley; shall I interrupt them?

Isab. By no means, sir.

Scent. Sir Thomas was not wont

To show so much a courtier.

Mar. He cannot 260

Be prejudicial to you; suspect not

Your own deserts so much; he's married.

Born. I have other business, madam. You keep music:
I came to try how you can dance.

Cel. You did? — [Aside.] I'll try his humour out of breath. 205

Although I boast no cunning, sir, in revels, If you desire to show your art that way, I can wait on you.

Born. You much honour me;
Nay, all must join to make a harmony.

Born. I have nothing now, madam, but to beseech, 270

After a pardon for my boldness, you Would give occasion to pay my gratitude. I have a house will be much honoured, If you vouchsafe your presence; and a wife Desires to present herself your servant. 278
I came with the ambition to invite you, Deny me not; your person you shall trust On fair security.

Cel. Sir, although I use not This freedom with a stranger, you shall have No cause to hold me obstinate.

Born. You grace me. 280
Sir William Scentlove —

Hair. I must take my leave.
You will excuse me, madam; court attendances —

Cel. By any means.

Born. Ladies, you will vouchsafe
Your company?

Isab. We wait upon you, sir. Exeunt.

ACT III

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

Table and looking-glass. Enter LORD — un-ready.<sup>2</sup> HAIRCUT preparing his periwig.

Lord. What hour is 't?

Hair. 'Bout three o'clock, my lord.

Lord. 'T is time to rise.

Hair. Your lordship went but late
To bed last night.

Lord. 'T was early in the morning.

Sec. [within.] Expect<sup>3</sup> awhile, my lord is busy.

Enter Secretary.

Lord. What's the matter?

Sec. Here is a lady<sup>5</sup>
Desires access to you upon some affairs,
She says, may specially concern your lordship.

Lord. A lady? What's her name?

Sec. Madam Decoy.

Lord. Decoy? Prithes admit her.

[Exit Secretary.]

Enter DECOY.

Have you business, madam,

With me?

Dec. And such, I hope, as will not be<sup>10</sup>
Offensive to your lordship.

<sup>3</sup> Wait.

Lord. I pray speak it.

Dec. I would desire your lordship's ear more private.

Lord. Wait i' th' next chamber till I call. —
Now, madam. Exit [HAIRCUT].

Dec. Although I am a stranger to your lord-
ship,

I would not lose a fair occasion offer'd<sup>15</sup>
To show how much I honour, and would serve
you.

Lord. Please you to give me the particular,
That I may know the extent of my engagement.<sup>4</sup>

I am ignorant by what desert you should
Be encourag'd to have care of me.

Dec. My lord, 20
I will take boldness to be plain; beside
Your other excellent parts, you have much
fame

For your sweet inclination to our sex.

Lord. How d' ye mean, madam?

Dec. I that way your lordship
Hath honourably practis'd upon some<sup>25</sup>

Not to be nam'd. Your noble constancy
To a mistress hath deserv'd our general vote;
And I, a part of womankind, have thought
How to express my duty.

Lord. In what, madam?

Dec. Be not so strange, my lord. I knew the beauty<sup>30</sup>

And pleasures of your eyes; that handsome
creature

With whose fair life all your delight took
leave,

And to whose memory you have paid too much
Sad tribute.

Lord. What's all this?

Dec. This: if your lordship
Accept my service, in pure zeal to cure<sup>35</sup>

Your melancholy, I could point where you might

Repair your loss.

Lord. Your ladyship, I conceive,
Doth traffic in flesh merchandize.

Dec. To men
Of honour, like yourself. I am well known<sup>39</sup>

To some in court, and come not with ambition
Now to supplant your officer.

Lord. What is
The lady of pleasure you prefer?

Dec. A lady
Of birth and fortune, one upon whose virtue

I may presume, the lady Aretina.

Lord. Wife to Sir Thomas Bornwell?

Dec. The same, sir. 40

Lord. Have you prepar'd her?
Dec. Not for your lordship, till I have found your pulse.

I am acquainted with her disposition,
She has a very applicable<sup>5</sup> nature.

Lord. And, madam, when expect you to be whipt<sup>50</sup>

For doing these fine favours?
Dec. How, my lord?

Your lordship does but jest, I hope; you make

<sup>5</sup> Accessible.

A difference between a lady that Does honourable offices, and one 54
They call a bawd. Your lordship was not wont
To have such coarse opinion of our practice.

Lord. The Lady Aretina is my kinswoman.

Dec. What if she be, my lord? The nearer
blood,

The dearer sympathy.

Lord. I 'll have thee carted.<sup>1</sup>

Dec. Your lordship will not so much stain your honour 60

And education, to use a woman

Of my quality—

Lord. 'T is possible you may

Be sent off with an honourable convoy
Of halberdiers.

Dec. Oh, my good lord! 64

Lord. Your ladyship shall be no protection,
If you but stay three minutes.

Dec. I am gone.—

When next you find rebellion in your blood,
May all within ten mile o' th' court turn honest!<sup>2</sup> Exit.

Lord. I do not find that proneness, since the fair

Bella Maria died; my blood is cold, 70
Nor is there beauty enough surviving
To heighten me to wantonness.— Who waits?

Re-enter HAIRCUT [and Secretary].

And what said my lady?

Hair. The silent language of her face, my
lord,

Was not so pleasant, as it show'd upon 76
Her entrance.

Lord. Would any man that meets

This lady take her for a bawd?

Hair. She does

The trade an honour, credit to the profession.
We may in time see baldness, quarter noses, 70
And rotten legs to take the wall of footcloths.

Lord. I ha' thought better; call the lady back.—

I wo' not lose this opportunity.—

Bid her not fear. [Exit Secretary.—] The favour is not common,

And I 'll reward it. I do wonder much

Will Scentlove was not here to-day. 85

Hair. I heard him say this morning he would wait

Upon your lordship.— She is return'd, sir.

Re-enter Secretary and DECOY.

Sec. Madam, be confident, my lord's not angry.

Lord. You return welcome, madam; you are better

Read in your art, I hope, than to be frighted 90

With any shape of anger, when you bring

Such news to gentlemen. Madam, you shall

Soon understand how I accept the office.

Dec. You are the first lord, since I studied carriage,

That show'd such infidelity and fury 95

<sup>1</sup> The punishment of bawds was to be whipt and carted.

Upon so kind a message. Every gentleman
Will show some breeding; but if one right honourable

Should not have noble blood—

Lord. You shall return

My compliment, in a letter, to my lady 99
Aretina. Favour me with a little patience.—

Show her that chamber.

Dec. I 'll attend your lordship.

Execut [DECOY and HAIRCUT.—
Secretary seats himself at a table.]

Lord. Write,—“Madam, where your honour is in danger, my love must not be silent.”

Enter [Sir WILLIAM] SCENTLOVE and KICK-SHAW.

Scentlove and Kickshaw!

Kick. Your lordship's busy. 104

Lord. Writing a letter;—nay, it sh' not bar
Any discourse.

[*Walks alternately to the Secretary and to SCENTLOVE and KICK-
SHAW.*]

Sec. “Silent.”

Lord. “Though I be no physician, I may prevent a fever in your blood.”—

And where have you spent the morning's conversation? 110

Scnt. Where you would have given the best barbary

In your stable to have met on honourable
terms.

Lord. What new beauty? You acquaint yourselves

With none but wonders.

Scnt. 'T is too low,—a miracle.

Lord. It will require a strong faith. 115

Sec. “Your blood.”

Lord. “If you be innocent, preserve your fame, lest this Decoy-madam betray it, to your repentance” —

By what name is she known?

Scnt. Ask Alexander; 120

He knows her.

Kick. Whom?

Scnt. The lady Celestina.

Lord. He has a vast knowledge of ladies.

'Las, poor Alexander!

When dost thou mean thy body shall lie fal-
low?

Kick. When there is mercy in a petticoat:

I must turn pilgrim for some breath.

Lord. I think

'T were cooler travel, if you examine it, 126
Upon the hoof through Spain.

Scnt. Through Ethiopia.

Lord. Nay, less laborious to serve a prentice-
ship

In Peru, and dig gold out of the mine,

Though all the year were dog-days. 130

Sec. “To repentance.”

Lord. “In brief, this lady, could you fall from virtue, within my knowledge, will not blush to be a bawd.”

Scnt. But hang 't, 't is honourable journey-work; 135

Thou art famous by it, and thy name's up.

Kick. So, sir!
Let me ask you a question, my dear knight:
Which is less servile, to bring up the pheasant,

And wait, or sit at table uncontroll'd, 140
And carve to my own appetite?

Scent. No more;
Thou'rt witty, as I am.

Sec. "A bawd."
Scent. How 's that?
Kick. Oh, you are famous by 't, and your name 's up, sir.

Lord. "Be wise, and reward my caution with timely care of yourself, so I shall not [145] repent to be known your loving kinsman and servant" —

Gentlemen, the lady Celestina,
Is she so rare a thing?

Kick. If you 'll have my Opinion, my lord, I never saw 150
So sweet, so fair, so rich a piece of nature.

Lord. I 'll show thee a fairer presently, to shame

Thy eyes and judgment; look o' that. [Gives him a miniature.]—So; I 'll subscribe. [Signs his name to the letter.]

Seal it; I 'll excuse your pen for the direction.

Kick. Bella Maria's picture! she was handsome. 155

Scent. But not to be compar'd —

Lord. Your patience, gentlemen; I 'll return instantly. Exit.

Kick. Whither is my lord gone?

Sec. To a lady i' th' next chamber.

Scent. What is she?

Sec. You shall pardon me, I am his secretary. 160

Scent. I was wont to be of his counsel. A new officer,

And I not know 't? I am resolv'd to batter

All other with the praise of Celestina:

I must retain him.

Re-enter LORD.

Lord. Has not that object

Convinc'd your erring judgments?

Kick. What! this picture? 165

Lord. Were but your thoughts as capable as mine

Of her idea, you would wish no thought

That were not active in her praise, above

All worth and memory of her sex.

Scent. She was fair,

I must confess; but had your lordship look'd 170

With eyes more narrow, and some less affection,

Upon her face, —

Kick. I do not love the copies

Of any dead, they make me dream of goblins;

Give me a living mistress, with but half

The beauty of Celestina. Come, my lord, 175

'Tis pity that a lord of so much flesh

Should waste upon a ghost, when they are living

Can give you a more honourable consumption.

Scent. Why, do you mean, my lord, to live an infidel?

Do, and see what will come on 't; observe 1
still, 180

And dote upon your vigils; build a chamber
Within a rock, a tomb among the worms,
Not far off, where you may, in proof apocryphal,

Court 'em not to devour the pretty pile
Of flesh your mistress carried to the grave. 185

There are no women in the world; all eyes,
And tongues, and lips, are buried in her coffin!

Lord. Why, do you think yourselves competent judges

Of beauty, gentlemen?

Both. What should hinder us? 190

Kick. I have seen and tried as many as another,

With a mortal back.

Lord. Your eyes are brib'd,
And your hearts chain'd to some desires; you cannot

Enjoy the freedom of a sense.

Kick. Your lordship
Has a clear eyesight, and can judge and penetrate.

Lord. I can, and give a perfect censure of 195
Each line and point; distinguish beauty from

A thousand forms, which your corrupted optics

Would pass for natural.

Scent. I desire no other
Judge should determine us, and if your lordship

Dare venture but your eyes upon this lady, 200
I 'll stand their justice, and be confident

You shall give Celestina victory

And triumph o'er all beauties past and living.

Kick. I dare, my lord, venture a suit of clothes,

You 'll be o'ercome.

Lord. You do not know my fortitude. 205

Scent. Nor frailty; you dare not trust yourself to see her.

Lord. Think you so, gentlemen? I dare see this creature

To make you know your errors, and the difference

Of her whose memory is my saint. Not trust
My senses! I dare see, and speak with her. 210

Which holds the best acquaintance to prepare
My visit to her?

Scent. I will do 't, my lord.

Kick. She is a lady free in entertainments.

Lord. I would give this advantage to your cause,

Bid her appear in all the ornaments 215
Did ever wait on beauty, all the riches

Pride can put on, and teach her face more charm

Than ever poet drest up Venus in;

Bid her be all the Graces, and the Queen
Of Love in one, I 'll see her, Scentlove, and 220

Bring off my heart, arm'd but [with a] single thought

Of one that's dead, without a wound; and when

<sup>1</sup> Pay observance, worship.

I have made your folly prisoner, I'll laugh at you.

Scnt. She shall expect you; trust to me for knowledge.

Lord. I'm for the present somewhere else engag'd;

Let me hear from you. [Exit.]

Scnt. So! I am glad he's yet So near conversion.

Kick. I am for Aretina.

Scnt. No mention of my lord.

Kick. Prepare his lady, 'Tis time he were reduc'd<sup>1</sup> to the old sport;

One lord like him more would undo the court. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter LADY BORNWELL, with a letter, and DECOY.

Dec. He is the ornament of your blood, madam;

I am much bound to his lordship.

Lady B. He gives you A noble character.

Dec. 'Tis his goodness, madam.

Lady B. [Aside.] I wanted such an engine. My lord has Done me a courtesy, to disclose her nature; I now know one to trust, and will employ her.—

Touching my lord, for reasons which I shall Offer to your ladyship hereafter, I Desire you would be silent; but, to show How much I dare be confident in your secrecy,

I pour my bosom forth. I love a gentleman, One whom there wo' not need much conjuration

To meet.—Your ear. [Whispers her.]

Dec. I apprehend you, and I shall Be happy to be serviceable. I am sorry

Your ladyship did not know me before now: I have done offices: and not a few

Of the nobility but have done feats Within my house, which is convenient

For situation, and artful chambers, And pretty pictures to provoke the fancy.

Enter LITTLEWORTH.

Little. Madam, all pleasures languish in your absence.

Lady B. Your pardon a few minutes, sir.— You must

Contrive it thus. [Walks aside with DECOY.]

Little. I attend, and shall account it Honour to wait on your return.

Lady B. He may not Have the least knowledge of my name or person.

Dec. I have practis'd that already for some great ones,

And dare again, to satisfy you, madam; I have a thousand ways to do sweet offices.

Little. If this Lady Aretina should be honest, I ha' lost time. She's free as air; I must Have closer conference, and if I have art, Make her affect me in revenge.

Dec. This evening? Leave me to manage things.

Lady B. You will oblige me.

Dec. You shall commend my art, and thank me after. Exit.

Lady B. I hope the revels are maintain'd within?

Little. By Sir Thomas and his mistress. Lady B. How? His mistress?

Little. The lady Celestina; I ne'er saw Eyes shoot more amorous interchange.

Lady B. Is 't so? Little. He wears her favour with mere pride—

Lady B. Her favour? Little. A feather that he ravish'd from her fan;

And is so full of courtship, which she smiles on. Lady B. 'T is well.

Little. And praises her beyond all poetry. Lady B. I'm glad he has so much wit.

Little. [Aside.] Not jealous! Lady B. [Aside.] This secures me. What would make other ladies pale With jealousy, gives but license to my wand'rings.

Let him now tax<sup>3</sup> me, if he dare; and yet Her beauty's worth my envy, and I wish

Revenge upon it, not because he loves, But that it shines above my own.

Enter KICKSHAW.

Kick. Dear madam! Lady B. I have it.—You two gentlemen profess Much service to me; if I have a way To employ your wit and secrecy?—

Both. You'll honour us. Lady B. You gave a high and worthy character

Of Celestina. Kick. I remember, madam.

Lady B. Do either of you love her? Kick. Not I, madam.

Little. I would not, if I might. Lady B. She's now my guest,

And, by a trick, invited by my husband, To disgrace me.—You, gentlemen, are held

Wits of the town, the consuls that do govern The senate here, whose jeers are all authentic.

The taverns and the ordinaries are Made academies, where you come, and all

Your sins and surfeits made the time's example.

Your very nods can quell a theatre, No speech or poem good without your seal;

You can protect sourrility, and publish; By your authority believ'd, no rapture

Ought to have honest meaning. Kick. Leave our characters.

Little. And name the employment. Lady B. You must exercise

The strength of both your wits upon this lady, And talk her into humbleness or anger,

Both which are equal, to my thought. If you

Dare undertake this slight thing for my sake,
My favour shall reward it; but be faithful,
And seem to let all spring from your own freedom.

Kick. This all! We can defame her; if you please,

My friend shall call her whore, or any thing,
And never be endanger'd to a duel.

Lady B. How's that?

Kick. He can endure a cudgelling, and no man

Will fight after so fair a satisfaction:

But leave us to our art, and do not limit us.

Lady B. They are here; begin not till I whisper you.

Enter SIR THOMAS BORNWELL, CELESTINA, MARIANA, and ISABELLA.

Lady B. Je vous prie, madame, d'excuser l'importunité de mes affaires, qui m'ont fait offenser, par mon absence, une dame de laquelle j'ai reçu tant d'obligations.

Cel. Pardonnez moi, madame; vous me faites trop d'honneur.

Lady B. C'est bien de la douceur de votre nature, que vous tenez cette langage; mais j'espère que mon mari n'a pas manqué de vous entretenir en mon absence.

Cel. En vérité, monsieur nous a fort obligé.

Lady B. Il eût trop failli, s'il n'eût taché de tout son pouvoir à vous rendre toutes sortes de services.

Cel. C'est de sa bonté qu'il nous a tant favorisé.

Lady B. De la vôtre plutôt, madame, que vous fait donner d'interprétation si délicate à ses efforts.

Cel. Je vois bien que la victoire sera toujours à madame, et de langage et de la courtesie.

Lady B. Vraiment, madame, que jamais personne a plus désiré l'honneur de votre compagnie que moi.

Cel. Laissons-en, je vous supplie, des compliments, et permettez à votre servante de vous baiser les mains.

Lady B. Vous m'obligez trop.

Born. I have no more patience; let's be merry again

In our own language: madam, our mirth cools.
Our nephew!

Enter FREDERICK [intoxicated, and Steward].

Lady B. Passion of my brain!

Fred. Save you, gentlemen! save you, ladies!

Lady B. I am undone.

Fred. I must salute; no matter at which end I begin.

Lady B. There's a compliment!

Cel. Is this your nephew, madam?

Lady B. Je vous prie, madame, d'excuser les habits et le rude comportement de mon cousin. Il est tout fraîchement venu de l'université, où on l'a tout gâté.

Cel. Excusez moi, madame, il est bien accompli.

Fred. This language should be French by the motions of your heads, and the mirth of your faces.

Lady B. I am dishonour'd.

Fred. 'Tis one of the finest tongues for ladies to show their teeth in: if you'll Latin it, I am for you, or Greek it; my tailor has not put me into French yet. Mille basia, basia mille.

Cel. Je ne vous entends pas, monsieur; I understand you not, sir.

Fred. Why, so!

You and I then shall be in charity;

For though we should be abusive, we ha' the benefit

Not to understand one another. Where's my aunt?

I did hear music somewhere; and my brains, Tun'd with a bottle of your capering claret, Made haste to show their dancing.

Little. Please you, madam,

[Offering his box of sweetmeats to CELESTINA.]

They are very uncomfortable.<sup>1</sup>

Stew. Alas, madam, How would you have me help it? I did use

All means I could, after he heard the music, To make him drunk, in hope so to contain him;

But the wine made him lighter, and his head Flew hither, ere I mist his heels.

Kick. Nay, he spoke Latin to the lady.

Lady B. O most unpardonable! Get him off Quickly, and discreetly too; or, if I live—

Stew. It is not in my power; he swears I am An absurd sober fellow; and if you keep

A servant in his house to cross his humour, When the rich sword and belt comes home, he'll kill him.

Lady B. What shall I do? Try your skill, Master Littleworth.

Little. He has ne'er a sword.—Sweet master Frederick—

Born. 'Tis pity, madam, such a scion should Be lost;—but you are clouded.

Cel. Not I, sir, I never found myself more clear at heart.

Born. I could play with a feather; your fan, lady.—

Gentlemen, Aretina, ta, ra, ra, ra! Come, madam.

Fred. Why, my good tutor in election, You might have been a scholar.

Little. But I thank My friends, they brought me up a little better.

Give me the town wits, that deliver jests Clean from the bow, that whistle in the air,

And cleave the pin at twelvescore! Ladies do But laugh at a gentleman that has any learning;

'Tis sin enough to have your clothes suspected. Leave us, and I will find a time to instruct you.

Come, here are sugar plums; 'tis a good Frederick.

Fred. Why, is not this my aunt's house in the Strand?

The noble rendezvous? Who laughs at me? Go, I will root here if I list, and talk

Of rhetoric, logic, Latin, Greek, or any thing,

<sup>1</sup> Comforting.

And understand 'em too; who says the contrary?

Yet, in a fair way, I condemn all learning,
And will be as ignorant as he, or he, 180
Or any taffeta, satin, scarlet, plush,
Tissue, or cloth o' bodkin<sup>1</sup> gentleman,
Whose manners are most gloriously infected.—
Did you laugh at me, lady?

Cel. Not I, sir;
But if I did show mirth upon your question, 185
I hope you would not beat me, little gentleman?

Fred. How! "little gentleman?" You dare not say

These words to my new clothes, and fighting
sword.

Lady B. Nephew Frederick!

Fred. "Little gentleman!"
'Tis an affront both to my blood and person. 190

I am a gentleman of as tall a birth
As any boast<sup>2</sup> nobility; though my clothes
Smell o' the lamp, my coat is honourable,
Right honourable, full of or and argent.—
A "little gentleman!"

Born. Coz, you must be patient; 195
My lady meant you no dishonour, and
You must remember she's a woman.

Fred. Is she a woman? That's another matter.—

Do you hear? My uncle tells me what you are.

Cel. So, sir. 200

Fred. You call'd me "little gentleman."

Cel. I did, sir.

Fred. A little pink<sup>3</sup> has made a lusty ship Strike her top-sail; the crow may heard the elephant,

A whelp may tame the tiger, spite of all 205
False decks and murderers;<sup>4</sup> and a "little
gentleman"

Be hard enough to grapple with your ladyship,
Top and top-gallant.— Will you go drink, uncle,
T' other enchanted bottle? You and I
Will tittle, and talk philosophy.

Born. Come, nephew.— 210
You will excuse a minute's absence, madam.—
Wait you on us.

Stew. My duty, sir.

Exeunt Sir THOMAS BORNWELL, FREDERICK, and Steward.

Lady B. Now, gentlemen.

Kick. Madam, I had rather you excuse my language

For speaking truth, than virtue suffer in
My farther silence; and it is my wonder 215
That you, whose noble carriage hath deserv'd
All honour and opinion, should now
Be guilty of ill manners.

Cel. What was that
You told me, sir?

Little. Do you not blush, madam,
To ask that question?

Cel. You amaze rather 220
My cheek to paleness. What mean you by this?
I am not troubled with the hiccup, gentlemen,
You should bestow this fright upon me.

<sup>4</sup> Cannon charged with grape-shot.

Little. Then

Pride and ill memory go together.

Cel. How, sir?

Kick. The gentleman on whom you exercis'd
Your thin wit, was a nephew to the lady 225
Whose guest you are; and though her modesty
Look calm on the abuse of one so near
Her blood, the affront was impious.

Little. I am asham'd on 't.

You an ingenious lady, and well manner'd! 230
I'll teach a bear as much civility.

Cel. You may be master of the college, sir,
For aught I know.

Little. What college?

[Cel.]<sup>5</sup> Of the bears.
Have you a plot upon me? Do you possess
Your wits, or know me, gentlemen?

Re-enter Sir THOMAS BORNWELL [behind].

Born. How's this? 235

Kick. Know you? Yes; we do know you to an atom.

Little. Madam, we know what stuff your soul is made on.

Cel. But do not bark so like a mastiff, pray.—
Sure they are mad.— Let your brains stand awhile,

And settle, gentlemen; you know not me; 240
What am I?

Little. Th' art a puppet, a thing made
Of clothes and painting, and not half so handsome

As that which play'd Susanna in the fair.

Cel. I heard you visited those canvas tragedies, 244

One of their constant audience, and so taken
With Susan, that you wish'd yourself a rival
With the two wicked elders.

Kick. You think this Is wit now. Come, you are—

Cel. What, I beseech you?
Your character will be full of salt and satire,
No doubt. What am I?

Kick. Why, you are a woman— 250

Cel. And that's at least a bow wide of your knowledge.

Kick. Would be thought handsome, and might pass i' th' country

Upon a market day; but so miserably
Forfeit to pride and fashions, that if Heaven

Were a new gown, you'd not stay in 't a fort-
night. 255

Cel. It must be miserably out of fashion then.
Have I no sin but pride?

Kick. Hast any virtue,
Or but a good face, to excuse that want?

Cel. You prais'd it yesterday.

Kick. That made you proud.

Cel. More pride!

Kick. You need not:— to close up the praise, 260

I have seen a better countenance in a sybil.
Cel. When you wore spectacles of sack,<sup>6</sup> mis-

The painted cloth,<sup>1</sup> and kist it for your mistress.

Kick. Let me ask you a question: how much Have you consum'd in expectation <sup>265</sup> That I would love you?

Cel. Why, I think as much As you have paid away in honest debts This seven year. 'Tis a pretty impudence, But cannot make me angry.

Little. Is there any Man that will cast away his limbs upon her? <sup>270</sup>

Kick. You do not sing so well as I imagin'd, Nor dance; you reel in your coranto,<sup>2</sup> and pinch Your petticoat too hard: y' have no good ear To th' music, and incline too much one shoulder, As you were dancing on the rope, and falling. <sup>275</sup>

You speak abominable French, and make A curtsie like a dairy-maid. — [Aside.] Not mad!

Little. Do we not sting her handsomely?
Born. A conspiracy!

Kick. Your state is not so much as 'tis reported,
When you confer notes, all your husband's debts, <sup>280</sup>

And your own reconcil'd; but that's not it Will so much spoil your marriage.

Cel. As what, sir?
Let me know all my faults.

Kick. Some men do whisper You are not over honest.<sup>3</sup>

Cel. All this shall not Move me to more than laughter, and some pity, <sup>285</sup>

Because you have the shapes of gentlemen; And though you have been insolent upon me, I will engage no friend to kick or cudgel you, To spoil your living and your limbs together: I leave that to diseases that offend you, <sup>290</sup>

And spare my curse, poor silken vermin! and Hereafter shall distinguish men from monkeys.

Born. [coming forward.] Brave soul! — You brace of horse-leeches! — I have heard Their barbarous language, madam; y' are too merciful:

They shall be silent to your tongue; pray punish 'em. <sup>295</sup>

Cel. They are things not worth my character,<sup>4</sup> nor mention

Of any clean breath; so lost in honesty, They cannot satisfy for wrongs enough, Though they should steal out of the world at Tyburn.<sup>5</sup>

Little. We are hang'd already. <sup>300</sup>

Cel. Yet I will talk a little to the pilchards.—<sup>6</sup>

You two, that have not 'twixt you both the hundred

Part of a soul, coarse woollen-witted fellows, Without a nap, with bodies made for burdens! You, that are only stuffings for apparel, <sup>305</sup>

As you were made but engines<sup>7</sup> for your tail-ors

To frame their clothes upon, and get them custom,

Until men see you move; yet, then you dare not,

Out of your guilt<sup>8</sup> of being the ignobler beast, But give a horse the wall, whom you excel <sup>310</sup>

Only in dancing of the brawls,<sup>9</sup> because The horse was not taught the French way.

Your two faces,
One fat, like Christmas, t' other lean, like Candlemas,

And prologue to a Lent, both bound together, Would figure Janus, and do many cures <sup>315</sup>

On agues, and the green disease,<sup>10</sup> by frightening; But neither can, with all the characters

And conjuring circles, charm a woman, though She'd fourscore years upon her, and but one

Tooth in her head, to love, or think well of you: <sup>320</sup>

And I were miserable to be at cost To court such a complexion as your malice

Did impudently insinuate. But I waste time, And stain my breath in talking to such tadpoles.

Go home, and wash your tongues in barley-water, <sup>325</sup>

Drink<sup>11</sup> clean tobacco, be not hot i' th' mouth, And you may scape the beadle; so I leave you

To shame, and your own garters! — Sir, I must Entreat you, for my honour, do not penance

them,

They are not worth your anger. How shall I <sup>330</sup> Acquit your lady's silence?

Born. Madam, I Am sorry to suspect, and dare revenge.

Cel. No cause of mine,
Born. It must become me to attend you

home.

Cel. You are noble. — Farewell, mushrooms. [Exit with SIR THOMAS BORNWELL.]

Lady B. Is she gone? <sup>335</sup>

Little. I think we pepper'd her.

Kick. I'm glad 't is over; But I repent no service for you, madam. —

Enter Servant, with a letter [and a jewel, which he delivers to KICKSHAW].

To me? From whence? — A jewel! a good preface.

Be happy the conclusion. He smiles upon 't.

Lady B. Some love letter.
Little. He has a hundred mistresses: you <sup>340</sup>

may

Be charitable, madam, I ha' none; He surfeits, and I fall away i' th' kidneys.

Kick. I'll meet. — [Exit Servant.]

[Aside.] 'T is some great lady, questionless, that has Taken notice, and would satisfy her appetite.

Lady B. Now, Master Alexander, you look bright o' the sudden; <sup>345</sup>

Another spirit's in your eye.

<sup>11</sup> Smoke.

Kick. Not mine, madam ;
 Only a summons to meet a friend.
Lady B. What friend ?
Little. By this jewel, I know her not.
Lady B. 'Tis a she-friend. I'll follow, gentlemen ;
 We may have a game at cent<sup>1</sup> before you go.
Kick. I shall attend you, madam.
Little. 'Tis our duty.
 [Exeunt KICKSHAW and LITTLEWORTH.]
Lady B. I blush while I converse with my own thoughts.
 Some strange fate governs me, but I must on ;
 The ways are cast already, and we thrive
 When our sin fears no eye nor perspective. Exit.

ACT IV

[SCENE I.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter two men leading KICKSHAW blinded, and go off suddenly.

Kick. I am not hurt ; my patience to obey 'em,
 Not without fear to ha' my throat cut else,
 Did me a courtesy. Whether ha' they brought me ?
 'Tis devilish dark ; the bottom of a well
 At midnight, with but two stars on the top,
 Were broad day to this darkness. I but think
 How like a whirlwind these rogues caught me up,
 And smothered my eyesight. Let me see,
 These may be spirits, and, for aught I know,
 Have brought me hither over twenty steeples.
 Pray Heaven they were not bailiffs ! that 's more worth
 My fear, and this a prison. All my debts
 Reek in my nostril, and my bones begin
 To ache with fear to be made dice ; and yet
 This is too calm and quiet for a prison. —
 What if the riddle prove I am robb'd ? And I did not feel 'em search me. How now ! music !
 [Music within.]
Enter DECOY, like an old Woman, with a light.
 And a light ! What beldam 's this ? I cannot pray. —
 What art ?
Dec. A friend. Fear not, young man, I am
 No spirit.
Kick. Off !
Dec. Despise me not for age,
 Or this coarse outside, which I wear not out
 Of poverty. Thy eyes be witness, 'tis
 No cave, or beggar's cell, th' art brought to ;
 That gold speak here 's no want, which thou mayst spend,
 And find a spring to tire even prodigality,
 If thou be'st wise. [Gives him a purse.]
Kick. The devil was a coiner
 From the beginning ; yet the gold looks current.
Dec. Th' art still in wonder : know, I am mistress of

This house, and of a fortune that shall serve
 And feed thee with delights ; 't was I sent for
 thee ;
 The jewel and the letter came from me.
 It was my art thus to contrive our meeting,
 Because I would not trust thee with my fame,
 Until I found thee worth a woman's honour.
Kick [Aside.] Honour and fame ! the devil means to have
 A care on 's credit. Though she sent for me,
 I hope she has another customer
 To do the trick withal ; I would not turn Familiar to a witch.
Dec. What say 'st ? Canst thou Dwell in my arms to-night ? Shall we change
 kisses,
 And entertain the silent hours with pleasure,
 Such as old Time shall be delighted with,
 And blame the too swift motion of his wings,
 While we embrace ?
Kick. [Aside.] Embrace ! She has had no teeth
 This twenty years, and the next violent cough Brings up her tongue ; it cannot possibly Be sound at root. I do not think but one Strong sneeze upon her, and well meant, would make
 Her quarters fall away ; one kick would blow
 Her up like gunpowder, and loose all her limbs.
 She is so cold, an incubus would not heat her ;
 Her phlegm would quench a furnace, and her breath
 Would damp a musket bullet.
Dec. Have you, sir,
 Consider'd ?
Kick. What ?
Dec. My proposition.
 Canst love ?
Kick. I could have done ; whom do you mean ?
 I know you are pleas'd but to make sport.
Dec. Thou art not
 So dull of soul as thou appear'st.
Kick. [Aside.] This is But some device ; my grannam has some trick
 in 't. —
 Yes, I can love.
Dec. But canst thou affect me ?
Kick. Although to reverence so grave a matron
 Were an ambitious word in me, yet since
 You give me boldness, I do love you.
Dec. Then
 Thou art my own.
Kick. [Aside.] Has she no cloven foot ?
Dec. And I am thine, and all that I command
 Thy servants ; from this minute thou art happy,
 And fate in thee will crown all my desires.
 I griev'd a proper man should be compell'd
 To bring his body to the common market.
 My wealth shall make thee glorious ; and, the
 more
 To encourage thee, how'er this form may fright
 Thy youthful eyes, yet thou wo't find, by light
 Of thy own sense, for other light is banish'd
 My chamber, when our arms tis lovers' knots-
 And kisses seal the welcome of our lips,

<sup>1</sup> A game at cards.    <sup>2</sup> A room in Decoy's house.

I shall not there affright thee, nor seem old,<sup>75</sup>
With rivell'd<sup>1</sup> veins; my skin is smooth and soft

As ermines, with a spirit to meet thine,
Active, and equal to the Queen of Love's
When she did court Adonis.

Kick. [Aside.] This doth more Confirm she is a devil, and I am<sup>80</sup>
Within his own dominions. I must on,
Or else be torn a' pieces. I have heard
These succubae must not be crost.

Dec. We trifle
Too precious time away; I'll show you a prospect

Of the next chamber, and then out the candle.<sup>85</sup>

Kick. Have you no sack i' th' house? I would go arm'd

Upon this breach.

Dec. It sh' not need.

Kick. One word,
Mother; have not you been a cat in your days?

Dec. I am glad you are so merry, sir. You observe

That bed? [Opens a door.]

Kick. A very brave one.

Dec. When you are<sup>90</sup>

Disrob'd, you can come thither in the dark.

You sha' not stay for me? Come, as you wish
For happiness. Exit.

Kick. I am preferr'd, if I
Be modest and obey; she cannot have<sup>94</sup>

The heart to do me harm, an she were Hecate Herself. I will have a strong faith, and think

I march upon a mistress, the less evil.
If I scape fire now, I defy the devil. Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter FREDERICK [gaily dressed,] LITTLE-WORTH, and Steward.

Fred. And how d' ye like me now?

Stew. Most excellent.

Fred. Your opinion, Master Littleworth.

Little. Your French tailor

Has made you a perfect gentleman; I may

Converse now with you, and preserve my credit.

D' ye find no alteration in your body<sup>5</sup>

With these new clothes?

Fred. My body alter'd? No.

Little. You are not yet in fashion then. That must

Have a new motion, garb, and posture too,

Or all your pride is cast away; it is not

The cut of your apparel makes a gallant,<sup>10</sup>

But the geometrical wearing of your clothes.

Stew. Master Littleworth tells you right; you wear your hat

Too like a citizen.

Little. 'T is like a midwife;

Place it with best advantage of your hair.<sup>14</sup>

Is half your feather moulted? This does make

No show; it should spread over, like a canopy;

Your hot-rein'd monsieur wears it for a shade

And cooler to his back. Your doublet must

Be more unbutton'd hereabouts; you 'll not
Be a sloven else, a foul shirt is no blemish;<sup>20</sup>
You must be confident, and outface clean linen.
Your doublet and your breeches must be al-low'd

No private meeting here; your cloak's too long.
It reaches to your buttock, and doth smell

Too much of Spanish gravity; the fashion<sup>25</sup>

Is to wear nothing but a cape; a coat

May be allow'd a covering for one elbow,

And some, to avoid the trouble, choose to walk

In querpo,<sup>3</sup> thus.

Stew. [Aside.] Your coat and cloak's a brushing

In Long-Lane, Lombard.<sup>4</sup>

Fred. But what if it rain?<sup>30</sup>

Little. Your belt about your shoulder is sufficient

To keep off any storm; beside, a reed

But wavy'd discreetly, has so many pores,

It sucks up all the rain that falls about one.<sup>34</sup>

With this defence, when other men have been

Wet to the skin through all their cloaks, I

have

Defied a tempest, and walk'd by the taverns

Dry as a bone.

Stew. [Aside.] Because he had no money

To call for wine.

Fred. Why, do you walk enchanted?

Have you such pretty charms in town? But stay;<sup>40</sup>

Who must I have to attend me?

Little. Is not that

Yet thought upon?

Stew. I have laid out<sup>6</sup> for servants.

Little. They are everywhere.

Stew. I cannot yet be furnish'd

With such as I would put into his hands.

Fred. Of what condition must they be, and
how<sup>45</sup>

Many in number, sir?

Little. Beside your fencing,

Your singing, dancing, riding, and French master,

Two may serve domestic, to be constant waiters

Upon a gentleman; a fool, a pimp.

Stew. For these two officers I have enquir'd,

And I am promis'd a convenient whiskin.<sup>6</sup><sup>51</sup>

I could save charges, and employ the pie-wench,

That carries her intelligence in whitepots;<sup>7</sup>

Or 't is but taking order<sup>8</sup> with the woman

That [trolls]<sup>9</sup> the ballads, she could fit him with<sup>55</sup>

A concubine to any tune; but I

Have a design to place a fellow with him

That has read all Sir Pandarus' works; a Trojan<sup>10</sup>

That lies conceal'd, and is acquainted with

Both city and suburban fripperies,<sup>11</sup><sup>60</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Lombard Street: pawn-shops were common in Long Lane.

<sup>2</sup> A room in Sir Thomas Bornwell's house.

Can fetch 'em with a spell at midnight to him,
And warrant which are for his turn; can, for
A need, supply the surgeon too.

Fred. I like thy providence; <sup>1</sup> such a one deserves

A livery twice a year. <sup>65</sup>
Stew. It sha' not need; a cast suit of your worship's

Will serve; he'll find a cloak to cover it,
Out of his share with those he brings to bed to
you.

Fred. But must I call this fellow pimp?
Little, It is

Not necessary; [Tom,] or Jack, or Harry, <sup>70</sup>
Or what he's known abroad by, will sound better,

That men may think he is a Christian.

Fred. But hear you, Master Littleworth: is there not

A method, and degrees of title in Men of this art?

Little. According to the honour <sup>75</sup>
Of men that do employ 'em. An emperor
May give this office to a duke; a king

May have his viceroy to negotiate for him;
A duke may use a lord; the lord a knight,
A knight may trust a gentleman; and when <sup>80</sup>
They are abroad, and merry, gentlemen
May pimp to one another.

Fred. Good, good fellowship!
But for the fool now, that should wait on me,
And break me jests?

Little. A fool is necessary.
Stew. By any <sup>2</sup> means.

Fred. But which of these two servants <sup>85</sup>
Must now take place? <sup>3</sup>

Little. That question, Master Frederick,
The school of heraldry should conclude upon:
But if my judgment may be heard, the fool
Is your first man; and it is known a point
Of state to have a fool.

Stew. But, sir, the other <sup>90</sup>
Is held the finer servant; his employments
Are full of trust, his person clean and nimble,
And none so soon can leap into preferment,
Where fools are poor.

Little. Not all; there's story for 't;
Princes have been no wiser than they should be.
Would any nobleman, that were no fool, <sup>95</sup>
Spend all in hope of the philosopher's stone,
To buy new lordships in another country?
Would knights build colleges, or gentlemen
Of good estates challenge the field, and fight, <sup>100</sup>
Because a whore wo' not be honest? Come,
Fools are a family over all the world;
We do affect one naturally; indeed
The fool is leiger <sup>4</sup> with us.

Stew. Then the pimp
Is extraordinary.

Fred. Do not you fall out <sup>105</sup>
About their places. — Here's my noble aunt!

Enter LADY BORNWELL.

Little. How do you like your nephew, madam,
now?

Lady B. Well! — Turn about, Frederick. —
Very well!

Fred. Am I not now a proper gentleman?
The virtue of rich clothes! Now could I take
The wall of Julius Caesar, or affront <sup>111</sup>
Great Pompey's upper lip, and defy the senate.
Nay, I can be as proud as your own heart,
madam,

You may take that for your comfort; I put on
That virtue with my clothes, and I doubt not
But in a little time I shall be impudent <sup>115</sup>
As any page, or player's boy. I am
Beholding to this gentleman's good discipline;
But I shall do him credit in my practice.
Your steward has some pretty notions, too, <sup>120</sup>
In moral mischief.

Lady B. Your desert in this Exceeds all other service, and shall bind me
Both to acknowledge and reward.

Little. Sweet madam, Think me but worth your favour; I would creep

Upon my knees to honour you, and for every <sup>125</sup>
Minute you lend to my reward, I'll pay
A year of serviceable tribute.

Lady B. You
Can compliment.

Little. (Aside.) Thus still she puts me off;
Unless I speak the downright word, she'll never

Understand me. A man would think that creeping <sup>130</sup>
Upon one's knees were English to a lady.

Enter KICKSEAW.

Kick. How is 't, Jack. — Pleasures attend you, madam!

How does my plant of honour?
Lady B. Who is this?

Kick. 'Tis Alexander.
Lady B. Rich and glorious!

Little. 'Tis Alexander the Great.
Kick. And my Bucephalus <sup>135</sup>

Waits at the door.
Lady B. Your case is alter'd, sir.

Kick. I cannot help these things, the Fates will have it;

'Tis not my land does this.
Little, But thou hast a plough

That brings it in.
Lady B. Now he looks brave and lovely.

Fred. Welcome, my gallant Macedonian. <sup>140</sup>
Kick. Madam, you gave your nephew for my pupil.

I read <sup>5</sup> but in a tavern; if you'll honour us,
The Bear at the Bridge foot shall entertain you.

A drawer <sup>6</sup> is my Ganymede, he shall skink <sup>7</sup>
Brisk nectar to us; we will only have <sup>145</sup>

A dozen partridge in a dish; as many pheas-
ants,

Quails, cocks, and godwits shall come marching up

Like the train'd-band; <sup>8</sup> a fort of sturgeon
Shall give most bold defiance to an army,
And triumph o'er the table. —

Lady B. Sir, it will 150
But dull the appetite to hear more, and mine
Must be excus'd. Another time I may be Your guest.

Kick. 'Tis grown in fashion now with ladies;
When you please, I'll attend you. Little-
worth. —

Come, Frederick.

Fred. We'll have music; I love noise. 155
We will outroar the Thames, and shake the bridge, boy. Exit [with KICKSHAW].

Little. Madam, I kiss your hand; would you would think

Of your poor servant: flesh and blood is frail,
And troublesome to carry, without help.

Lady B. A coach will easily convey it, or 160
You may take water at Strand Bridge.

Little. But I
Have taken fire.

Lady B. The Thames will cool [it, sir].

Little. But never quench my heart; your charity

Can only do that.

Lady B. I will keep it cold
Of purpose.

Little. Now you bless me, and I dare 165
Be drunk in expectation. [Exit.]

Lady B. I am confident
He knows me not, and I were worse than mad
To be my own betrayer. — Here 's my husband.

Enter SIR THOMAS BORNWELL.

Born. Why, how now, Aretina? What! alone?

The mystery of this solitude? My house 170
Turn desert o' the sudden! All the gamesters Blown up! Why is the music put to silence?
Or have their instruments caught a cold, since

Gave 'em the last heat? I must know thy ground

Of melancholy.

Lady B. You are merry, as 175
You came from kissing Celestina.

Born. I Feel her yet warm upon my lip; she is Most excellent company: I did not think There was that sweetness in her sex. I must Acknowledge, 't was thy cure to disenchant
me 180

From a dull husband to an active lover.
With such a lady I could spend more years
Than since my birth my glass hath run soft
minutes,

And yet be young; her presence hath a spell
To keep off age; she has an eye would strike 185
Fire through an adamant.

Lady B. I have heard as much
Bestow'd upon a dull-fac'd chambermaid,
Whom love and wit would thus commend. True
beauty

Is mock'd when we compare thus, itself being Above what can be fetch'd<sup>1</sup> to make it lovely;
Or,<sup>2</sup> could our thoughts reach something to declare 191

The glories of a face, or body's elegance
(That touches but our sense), when beauty spreads

Over the soul, and calls up understanding
To look [what]<sup>3</sup> thence is offer'd, and admire! 195

In both I must acknowledge Celestina
Most excellently fair, fair above all
The beauties I ha' seen, and one most worthy Man's love and wonder.

Born. Do you speak, Aretina,
This with a pure sense to commend? Or is't 200
The mockery of my praise?

Lady B. Although it shame
Myself, I must be just, and give her all
The excellency of women; and were I
A man —

Born. What then?

Lady B. I know not with what loss
I should attempt her love. She is a piece 205
So angelically moving, I should think
Fracily excus'd to dote upon her form,
And almost virtue to be wicked with her.

Exit.
Born. What should this mean? This is no jealousy,

Or she believes I counterfeit. I feel 210
Something within me, like a heat, to give
Her cause, would Celestina but consent.

What a frail thing is man! It is not worth
Our glory to be chaste, while we deny
Mirth and converse with women. He is good 215
That dares the tempter, yet corrects his blood.
Exit.

[SCENE III.]<sup>4</sup>

[Enter] CELESTINA, MARIANA, and ISABELLA.

Cel. I have told you all my knowledge: since he is pleas'd
To invite himself, he shall be entertain'd,
And you shall be my witnesses.

Mar. Who comes with him?
Cel. Sir William Scentlove, that prepar'd me
for

The honourable encounter. I expect 5
His lordship every minute.

Enter SIR WILLIAM SCENTLOVE.

Scent. My lord is come.

Cel. He has honour'd me.

Enter Lord — and HAIRCUT.

Scent. My Lord, your periwig is awry.

Lord. You, sir —

While HAIRCUT is busy about his hair, SIR WILLIAM SCENTLOVE goes to CELESTINA.

Scent. You may guess at the gentleman
that's with him.

It is his barber, madam, d' ye observe?

An your ladyship wants a shaver.

Hair. She is here, sir. 10
I am betray'd. — Scentlove, your plot. I may Have opportunity to be reveng'd. Exit.

Scent. She in the midst.

<sup>4</sup> A room in Celestina's house.

Lord. She's fair, I must confess ;
But does she keep this distance out of state ?

Cel. Though I am poor in language to express <sup>15</sup>

How much your lordship honours me, my heart
Is rich and proud in such a guest. I shall Be out of love with every air abroad,
And for his grace done my unworthy house,
Be a fond prisoner, become anchorite, <sup>20</sup>
And spend my hours in prayer, to reward
The blessing and the bounty of this presence.

Lord. Though you could turn each place you move in to

A temple, rather than a wall should hide
So rich a beauty from the world, it were <sup>25</sup>
Less want to lose our piety and your prayer.

A throne were fitter to present you to Our wonder, whence your eyes, more worth than
all

They look on, should chain every heart a pris-soner.

Scent. 'T was pretty well come off.

Lord. By your example <sup>30</sup>
I shall know how to compliment ; in this,
You more confirm my welcome.

Cel. I shall love
My lips the better, if their silent language
Persuade your lordship but to think so truly.

Lord. You make me smile, madam.

Cel. I hope you came not <sup>35</sup>
With fear that any sadness here should shake
One blossom from your eye. I should be miserable

To present any object should displease you.

Lord. You do not, madam.

Cel. As I should account
It no less sorrow, if your lordship should <sup>40</sup>
Lay too severe a censure on my freedom.

I wo' not court a prince against his justice,
Nor bribe him with a smile to think me honest.

Pardon, my lord, this boldness, and the mirth
That may flow from me. I believe my father <sup>45</sup>
Thought of no winding-sheet when he begot me.

Lord. She has a merry soul. — It will become Me ask your pardon, madam, for my rude
Approach, so much a stranger to your knowledge.

Cel. Not, my lord, so much stranger to my knowledge ; <sup>50</sup>

Though I have but seen your person afar off,
I am acquainted with your character,
Which I have heard so often, I can speak it.

Lord. You shall do me an honour.

Cel. If your lordship will Be patient.

Lord. And glad to hear my faults. <sup>55</sup>

Cel. That as your conscience can agree upon
'em ;

However, if your lordship give me privilege,
I'll tell you what's the opinion of the world.

Lord. You cannot please me better.

Cel. Y' are a lord
Born with as much nobility as would, <sup>60</sup>
Divided, serve to make ten noblemen,
Without a herald ; but with so much spirit
And height of soul, as well might furnish twenty.

You are learn'd, a thing not compatible now
With native honour ; and are master of <sup>65</sup>
A language that doth chain all ears,<sup>1</sup> and charm
All hearts, where you persuade ; a wit so flow-
ing,

And prudence to correct it, that all men
Believe they only meet in you, which, with <sup>70</sup>
A spacious memory, make up the full wonders :

To these you have [joined]<sup>2</sup> valour and upon
A noble cause, know how to use a sword

To honour's best advantage, though you wear<sup>3</sup>
none.

You are as bountiful as the showers that fall
Into the spring's green bosom ; as you were <sup>75</sup>
Created lord of Fortune, not her steward ;

So constant to the cause in which you make Yourself an advocate, you dare all dangers ;

And men had rather you should be their friend,
Than justice or the bench bound up together. <sup>80</sup>

Lord. But did you hear all this ?

Cel. And more, my lord.

Lord. Pray let me have it, madam.

Cel. To all these virtues there is added
one, —

(Your lordship will remember, when I name it,
I speak but what I gather from the voice <sup>85</sup>
Of others) — it is grown to a full fame
That you have lov'd a woman.

Lord. But one, madam ?

Cel. Yes, many ; give me leave to smile, my
lord,

I shall not need to interpret in what sense ;
But you have show'd yourself right honourable, <sup>90</sup>

And, for your love to ladies, have deserv'd,
If their vote might prevail, a marble statue.

I make no comment on the people's text, —
My lord, I should be sorry to offend.

Lord. You cannot, madam ; these are things
we owe <sup>95</sup>

To nature for.

Cel. And honest men will pay.
Their debts.

Lord. If they be able, or compound.

Cel. She had a hard heart would be unmerciful,

And not give day to men so promising ;
But you ow'd women nothing.

Lord. Yes, I am <sup>100</sup>
Still in their debt, and I must owe them love,
It was part of my character.

Cel. With your lordship's
Pardon, I only said you had a fame

For loving women ; but of late, men say
You have, against the imperial laws of love, <sup>105</sup>
Restrain'd the active flowings of your blood,
And with a mistress buried all that is Hop'd for in love's succession, as all beauty
Had died with her, and left the world benighted !

In this you more dishonour all our sex. <sup>110</sup>
Than you did grace a part ; when everywhere
Love tempts your eye to admire a glorious harvest,

And everywhere as full blown ears submit

Their golden heads, the laden trees bow down
Their willing fruit, and court your amorous tasting. <sup>115</sup>

Lord. I see men would dissect me to a fibre;
But do you believe this?

Cel. It is my wonder,
I must confess, a man of nobler earth
Than goes to vulgar composition,
(Born and bred high, so unconfin'd, so rich <sup>120</sup>
In fortunes, and so read in all that sum
Up human knowledge, to feed gloriously,
And live at court, the only sphere wherein True beauty moves, nature's most wealthy garden,

Where every blossom is more worth than all <sup>125</sup>
The Hesperian fruit by jealous dragon watch'd,
Where all delights do circle appetite,
And pleasures multiply by being tasted.)
Should be so lost with thought of one turn'd ashes.

There's nothing left, my lord, that can excuse
you, <sup>130</sup>

Unless you plead, what I am asham'd to prompt
Your wisdom to?

Lord. What 's that?

Cel. That you have play'd
The surgeon with yourself.

Lord. And am made eunuch?

Cel. It were much pity.

Lord. Trouble not yourself,
I could convince your fears with demonstration <sup>135</sup>

That I am man enough, but knew not where,
Until this meeting, beauty dwelt. The court
You talk'd of must be where the Queen of Love
is,

Which moves but with your person; in your eye
Her glory shines, and only at that flame <sup>140</sup>
Her wanton boy doth light his quick'ning torch.

Cel. Nay, now you compliment; I would it did,

My lord, for your own sake.

Lord. You would be kind,
And love me then?

Cel. My lord, I should be loving,
Where I found worth to invite it, and should cherish <sup>145</sup>

A constant man.

Lord. Then you should me, madam.

Cel. But is the ice about your heart fallen off?
Can you return to do what love commands? —
Cupid, thou shalt have instant sacrifice,
And I dare be the priest.

Lord. Your hand, your lip; <sup>150</sup>
[Kisses her.]

Now I am proof 'gainst all temptation.

Cel. Your meaning, my good lord?

Lord. I, that have strength
Against thy voice and beauty, after this May dare the charms of womankind. — Thou
art,

Bella Maria, unprofaned yet; <sup>155</sup>

This magic has no power upon my blood. —
Farewell, madam! if you durst be the example
Of chaste as well as fair, thou wert a brave one.

Cel. I hope your lordship means not this for earnest:

Be pleas'd to grace a banquet.

Lord. Pardon, madam. — <sup>160</sup>

Will Sentlove, follow; I must laugh at you.

Cel. My lord, I must beseech you stay, for
honour,

For her whose memory you love best.

Lord. Your pleasure.

Cel. And by that virtue you have now profest,
I charge you to believe me too; I can <sup>165</sup>
Now glory that you have been worth my trial,
Which, I beseech you, pardon. Had not you
So valiantly recover'd in this conflict,
You had been my triumph, without hope of
more

Than my just scorn upon your wanton flame;
Nor will I think these noble thoughts grew
first <sup>171</sup>

From melancholy, for some female loss,
As the fantastic world believes, but from Truth, and your love of innocence, which shine
So bright in the two royal luminaries <sup>175</sup>
At court, you cannot lose your way to chastity.
Proceed, and speak of me as honour guides you.

Exit LORD.

I am almost tir'd. — Come, ladies, we'll beguile
Dull time, and take the air another while.

Exeunt.

ACT V

[SCENE I.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter Lady BORNWELL, and a Servant [with a purse].

Lady B. But hath Sir Thomas lost five hundred pounds

Already?

Serv. And five hundred more he borrow'd.
The dice are notable devourers, madam;
They make no more of pieces than of pebbles,
But thrust their heaps together, to engender. <sup>5</sup>
"Two hundred more the caster!" <sup>3</sup> cries this
gentleman.

"I am wi' ye. — I ha' that to nothing, sir.
The caster

Again." 'T is covered, and the table too,
With sums that frighted me. Here one sneaks
out,

And with a martyr's patience smiles upon <sup>10</sup>
His money's executioner, the dice;
Commands a pipe of good tobacco, and I th' smoke on 't vanishes. Another makes
The bones vault o'er his head, swears that ill-throwing

Has put his shoulder out of joint, calls for <sup>15</sup>
A bone-setter. That looks to th' box, to bid
His master send him some more hundred pounds,

Which lost, he takes tobacco, and is quiet.
Here a strong arm throws in and in, with which He brusheth all the table, pays the rooks <sup>4</sup> <sup>20</sup>
That went their smelts <sup>5</sup> a piece upon his hand,

<sup>5</sup> Staked their coins (?).

Yet swears he has not drawn a stake this seven year.

But I was bid make haste; my master may Lose this five hundred pounds ere I come thither.

Exit.

Lady B. If we both waste so fast, we shall soon find

Our state is not immortal. Something in His other ways appear not well ready.

Enter Sir THOMAS BORNWELL, [and Servants, one with a purse.]

Born. Ye tortoises, why make ye no more haste?

Go pay to th' master of the house that money,
And tell the noble gamesters I have another
Superfluous thousand pound; at night I'll visit 'em.

D' ye hear?

Serv. Yes, an please you.

Born. Do 't ye drudges.
[Exeunt Servants.]

Ta, ra, ra! — Aretina!

Lady B. You have a pleasant humour, sir.

Born. What! should a gentleman be sad?

Lady B. You have lost —

Born. A transitory sum; as good that way as another.

Lady B. Do you not vex within for 't?

Born. I had rather lose a thousand more, than one

Sad thought come near my heart for 't. Vex for trash!

Although it go from other men like drops
Of their life blood, we lose with the alacrity

We drink a cup of sack, or kiss a mistress.
No money is considerable with a gamester;

They have souls more spacious than kings. Did two

Gamesters divide the empire of the world,
They'd make one throw for 't all, and he that

lost

Be no more melancholy than to have play'd for
A morning's draught. Vex a rich soul for dirt,

The quiet of whose every thought is worth
A province!

Lady B. But when dice have consum'd all,
Your patience will not pawn for as much more.

Born. Hang pawning! Sell outright, and the fear's over.

Lady B. Say you so? I'll have another coach to-morrow

If there be rich above ground.

Born. I forgot
To bid the fellow ask my jeweller

Whether the chain of diamonds be made up; I will present it to my Lady Bellamour, Fair Celestina.

Lady B. This gown I have worn
Six days already; it looks dull, I'll give it

My waiting-woman, and have one of cloth
Of gold embroidered; shoes and pantables

Will show well of the same.

Born. I have invited
A covey of ladies, and as many gentlemen

<sup>1</sup> Slippers.

To-morrow, to the Italian ordinary;

I shall have rarities and regalias<sup>2</sup>
To pay for, madam; music, wanton songs,
And tunes of silken petticoats to dance to.

Lady B. And to-morrow have I invited half the court

To dine here. What misfortune 't is your company

And ours should be divided! After dinner
I entertain 'em with a play.

Born. By that time
Your play inclines to the epilogue, shall we

Quit our Italian host; and whirl in coaches
To the Dutch magazine of sauce, the Steelyard,

Where deal,<sup>3</sup> and backrag,<sup>4</sup> and what strange wine else

They dare but give a name to in the reckoning, Shall flow into our room, and drown Westphalias,<sup>5</sup>

Tongues, and anchovies, like some little town Endangered by a sluice, through whose fierce ebb

We wade, and wash ourselves into a boat,
And bid our coachmen drive their leather tenements

By land, while we sail home, with a fresh tide,
To some new rendezvous.

Lady B. If you have not 'Pointed the place, pray bring your ladies
hither;

I mean to have a ball to-morrow night,
And a rich banquet for 'em, where we'll dance
Till morning rise, and blush to interrupt us.

Born. Have you no ladies i' th' next room,
to advance<sup>6</sup>

A present mirth? What a dull house you govern!
Farewell! a wife's no company. — Aretina,

I've summ'd up my estate, and find we may
have

A month good yet.

Lady B. What mean you?
Born. And I'd rather

Be lord one month of pleasures, to the height
And rapture of our senses, than be years
Consuming what we have in foolish temperance,

Live in the dark, and no fame wait upon us!
I will live so, posterity shall stand

At gaze when I am mentioned.

Lady B. A month good!
And what shall be done then?

Born. I'll over sea,
And trail a pike. With watching, marching, lying

In trenches, with enduring cold and hunger,
And taking here and there a musket-shot,
I can earn every week four shillings, madam;

And if the bullets favour me to snatch
Any superfluous limb, when I return,
With good friends, I despair not to be enroll'd Poor knight of Windsor.<sup>7</sup> For your course,
madam,

No doubt you may do well; your friends are great;

Or if your poverty and their pride cannot Agree, you need not trouble much invention To find a trade to live by; there are custom-ers. 110

Farewell, be frolic, madam! If I live, I will feast all my senses, and not fall Less than a Phaeton from my throne of pleas-ure, Though my estate flame like the world about me. Exit.

Lady B. 'T is very pretty! —

Enter DECOY.

Madam Decoy!

Dec. What! melancholy, 115
After so sweet a night's work? Have not I Show'd myself mistress of my art?

Lady B. A lady.

Dec. That title makes the credit of the act A story higher. Y' have not seen him yet? I wonder what he 'll say.

Lady B. He 's here.

Enter KICKSHAW and FREDERICK.

Kick. Bear up, 120
My little myrmidon; does not Jack Little-worth

Follow? Fred. Follow? He fell into the Thames

At landing. Kick. The devil shall dive for him, Ere I endanger my silk stockings for him.

Let the watermen alone, they have drags and engines.<sup>1</sup> 125

When he has drunk his julep, I shall laugh To see him come in pickled the next tide.

Fred. He'll never sink, he has such a cork brain.

Kick. Let him be hang'd or drown'd, all 's one to me;

Yet he deserves to die by water, cannot 130
Bear his wine credibly.

Fred. Is not this my aunt?

Kick. And another handsome lady; I must know her. [Goes up to DECOY.]

Fred. My blood is rampant too, I must court somebody;

As good my aunt as any other body.

Lady B. Where have you been, cousin?

Fred. At the Bridge, 135
At the Bear's foot, where our first health began

To the fair Aretina, whose sweet company Was wished by all. We could not get a lay, A tumbler, a device, a bona roba.<sup>2</sup>

For any money; drawers were grown dull: 140

We wanted our true firks,<sup>3</sup> and our vagaries.— When were you in drink, aunt?

Lady B. How?

Fred. Do not ladies

Play the good fellows too? There's no true mirth

Without 'em. I have now such tickling fancies! That doctor of the chair of wit has read 145
A precious lecture, how I should behave Myself to ladies; as now, for example.

[Goes up to LADY BORNWELL.]

Lady B. Would you practise upon me?

Fred. I first salute you,

You have a soft hand, madam; are you so All over?

Lady B. Nephew!

Fred. Nay, you should but smile. 150

And then again I kiss you; and thus draw Off your white glove, and start, to see your hand

More excellently white. I grace my own Lip with this touch, and turning gently thus,

Prepare you for my skill in palmistry, 155
Which, out of curiosity, no lady But easily applies<sup>4</sup> to. The first line

I look with most ambition to find out, Is Venus' girdle, a fair semicircle,

Enclosing both the mount of Sol and Saturn; 160
If that appear, she's for my turn; a lady Whom nature has prepar'd for the career;

And, Cupid at my elbow, I put forward:

You have this very lieue, aunt.

Lady B. The boy's frantic!

Fred. You have a couch or pallet; I can shut The chamber door. Enrich a stranger, when 165
Your nephew's coming into play!

Lady B. No more.

Fred. Are you so coy to your own flesh and blood?

Kick. Here, take your playfellow; I talk of sport,

And she would have me marry her. 170

Fred. Here's Littleworth.

Enter LITTLEWORTH, wet.

Why, how now, tutor?

Little. I have been fishing.

Fred. And what ha' you caught?

Little. My belly full of water.

Kick. Ha, ha! Where's thy rapier?

Little. My rapier is drown'd, And I am little better. I was up by th' heels, 175
And out came a tun of water, beside wine.

Kick. 'T has made thee sober.

Little. Would you have me drunk With water?

Lady B. I hope your fire is quench'd by this time.

Fred. It is not now, as when your worship "walk'd

By all the taverns, Jack, dry as a bone." 180

Kick. You had store of fish under water, Jack.

Little. It has made a poor John of me.

Fred. I do not think but if we cast an angle Into his belly, we might find some pilchards.<sup>5</sup>

Little. And boil'd, by this time.— Dear madam, a bed. 185

Kick. Carry but the water-spaniel to a grass-plot,

<sup>3</sup> A vague piece of contemporary slang, the meaning of which has usually to be derived from the context.

Where he may roll himself; let him but shake
His ears twice in the sun, and you may grind him
Into a posset.

Fred. Come, thou shalt to my bed,
Poor pickereel.

Dec. Alas, sweet gentleman! 190
Little. I have ill luck an I should smell by this time;

I am but new ta'en, I am sure. — Sweet gentle-
woman!

Dec. Your servant.
Little. Pray do not pluck off my skin;

It is so wet, unless you have good eyes,
You'll hardly know it from a shirt.

Dec. Fear nothing. 195
Ereunt [all but KICKSHAW and Lady BORNWELL.]

Lady B. [Aside.] He has sack enough, and I may find his humour.

Kick. And how is't with your ladyship? You look

Without a sunshine in your face.

Lady B. You are glorious
In mind and habit.

Kicks. Ends of gold and silver!
Lady B. Your other clothes were not so rich.

Who was 200
Your tailor, sir?

Kick. They were made for me long since;
They have known but two bright days upon my back.

I had a humour, madam, to lay things by;
They will serve two days more: I think I ha'
gold enough

To go to th' mercer. I'll now allow myself 205
A suit a week, as this, with necessary

Dependances, beaver, silk stockings, garters,
And roses, in their due conformity;

Boots are forbid a clean leg, but to ride in.
My linen every morning comes in new, 210

The old goes to great bellies.
Lady B. You are charitable.

Kick. I may dine wi' ye sometime, or at the
court,

To meet good company, not for the table.
My clerk o' th' kitchen's here, a witty epicure,

A spirit, that, to please me with what's rare,
Can fly a hundred mile a day to market, 215

And make me lord of fish and fowl. I shall Forget there is a butcher; and to make

My footman nimble, he shall feed on nothing
But wings of wild fowl.

Lady B. These ways are costly. 220
Kick. Therefore I'll have it so; I ha' sprung a mine.

Lady B. You make me wonder, sir, to see this change

Of fortune: your revenue was not late
So plentiful.

Kick. Hang dirty land, and lordships!
I wo' not change one lodging I ha' got, 225

For the Chamber of London.
Lady B. Strange, of such a sudden,

To rise to this estate! No fortunate hand
At dice could lift you up so, for 'tis since

Last night: yesterday, you were no such monarch.

Kick. There be more games than dice.

Lady B. It cannot be 230
A mistress, though your person is worth love;

None possibly are rich enough to feed
As you have cast the method of your riots.

A princess, after all her jewels, must
Be fore'd to sell her provinces.

Kick. Now you talk 235
Of jewels, what do you think of this?

Lady B. A rich one.
Kick. You'll honour me to wear't; this other toy

I had from you; this chain I borrowed of you,
A friend had it in keeping. [Gives her the jewel and chain.] — If your ladyship

Want any sum, you know your friend, and Alexander. 240

Lady B. Dare you trust my security?
Kick. There's gold,

I shall have more to-morrow.
Lady B. You astonish me;

Who can supply these?
Kick. A dear friend I have.

She promis'd we should meet again i' th' morning.

Lady B. Not that I wish to know 245
More of your happiness than I have already

Heart to congratulate, — be pleas'd to lay
My wonder.

Kick. 'Tis a secret —
Lady B. Which I'll die

Ere I'll betray.
Kick. You have always wish'd me well;

But you shall swear not to reveal the party. 250
Lady B. I'll lose the benefit of my tongue.

Kick. Nor be Afraid at what I say. What think you first

Of an old witch, a strange ill-favour'd hag,
That, for my company last night, has wrought

This cure upon my fortune? I do sweat 255
To think upon her name.

Lady B. How, sir! a witch?
Kick. I would not fright your ladyship too

much
At first, but witches are akin to spirits.
The truth is — Nay, if you look pale already,

I ha' done.
Lady B. Sir, I beseech you.

Kick. If you have 260
But courage then to know the truth, I'll tell
you

In one word; my chief friend is — the devil!
Lady B. What devil? how I tremble!

Kick. Have a heart;
'T was a she-devil too, a most insatiate,

Abominable devil, with a tail 265
Thus long.

Lady B. Goodness defend me! Did you see
her?

Kick. No, 't was i' th' dark; but she appear'd
first to me

I' th' likeness of a beldam, and was brought,
I know not how, nor whither, by two goblins,

More hooded than a hawk.
Lady B. But would you venture 270

Upon a devil!
Kick. Ay, for means.

Lady B. [Aside.] How black
An impudence is this! — But are you sure
It was the devil you enjoy'd?

Kick. Say nothing;
I did the best to please her; but as sure
As you live, 't was a hell-cat.

Lady B. D' ye not quake? 275
Kick. I found myself in the very room<sup>1</sup> i' th'
morning,

Where two of her familiars had left me.

Enter Servant.

Serv. My lord is come to visit you.

Kick. No words,
As you respect my safety. I ha' told tales
Out of the devil's school; if it be known, 280
I lose a friend. 'T is now about the time
I promis'd her to meet again; at my Return I'll tell you wonders. Not a word. Exit.

Lady B. 'T is a false glass; sure I am more deform'd: [Looks in her pocket mirror.]
What have I done? — My soul is miserable. 285

Enter LORD —.

Lord. I sent you a letter, madam.

Lady B. You exprest
Your noble care of me, my lord.

Re-enter Sir THOMAS BORNWELL with CELESTINA.

Born. Your lordship
Does me an honour.

Lord. Madam, I am glad
To see you here; I meant to have kist your
hand,

Ere my return to court. 290
Cel. Sir Thomas has
Prevail'd to bring me, to his trouble, hither.

Lord. You do him grace.

Born. Why, what's the matter, madam?
Your eyes are tuning Lachrimae.<sup>2</sup>

Lady B. As you
Do hope for Heaven, withdraw, and give me
but

The patience of ten minutes. 295
Born. Wonderful!
I will not hear you above that proportion.

She talks of Heaven: — Come, where must we to counsel?

Lady B. You shall conclude me when you please. [Exit.]

Born. I follow.
Lord. [Aside.] What alteration is this? I, that so late

Stood the temptation of her eye and voice, 300
Boasted a heart 'bove all licentious flame,
At second view turn renegade, and think

I was too superstitious, and full
Of phlegm, not to reward her amorous courtship

With manly freedom.

Cel. I obey you, sir. 305
Born. I'll wait upon your lordship presently.
[Exit.]

<sup>2</sup> A punning allusion to Dowland's Lachrimae or Seven Tears, etc., a popular musical work of the time for stringed instruments.

Lord. She could not want a cunning to seem honest

When I neglected her. I am resolv'd.—
You still look pleasant, madam.

Cel. I have cause, 309
My lord, the rather for your presence, which Hath power to charm all trouble in my thoughts.

Lord. I must translate that compliment, and owe

All that is cheerful in myself to these
All-quick'ning smiles; and rather than such bright

Eyes should repent their influence upon me, 315
I would release the aspects, and quit the bounty
Of all the other stars. Did you not think me
A strange and melancholy gentleman,
To use you so unkindly?

Cel. Me, my lord?
Lord. I hope you made no loud complaint; I would not 320

Be tried by a jury of ladies.

Cel. For what, my lord?

Lord. I did not meet that noble entertain-
ment

You were late pleas'd to show me.

Cel. I observ'd
No such defect in your lordship, but a brave
And noble fortitude.

Lord. A noble folly; 325
I bring repentance for 't. I know you have,
Madam, a gentle faith, and wo' not ruin

What you have built to honour you.

Cel. What's that?

Lord. If you can love, I'll tell your ladyship.

Cel. I have a stubborn soul else.
Lord. You are all 330
Compos'd of harmony.

Cel. What love d' ye mean?

Lord. That which doth perfect both. Madam, you have heard

I can be constant, and if you consent
To grace it so, there is a spacious dwelling
Prepar'd within my heart for such a mistress, 335

Cel. Your mistress, my good lord?

Lord. Why, my good lady,
Your sex doth hold it no dishonour
To become mistress to a noble servant

In the now court Platonic way. Consider Who 'tis that pleads to you; my birth and
present 340

Value can be no stain to your embrace;
But these are shadows when my love appears,
Which shall, in his first miracle, return

Me in my bloom of youth, and thee a virgin;
When I, within some new Elysium, 345
Of purpose made and meant for us, shall be
In every thing Adonis, but in his Contempt of love; and court thee from a Daphne

Hid in the cold rind of a bashful tree,
With such warm language and delight, till
thou 350

Leap from that bay<sup>2</sup> into the Queen of Love,
And pay my conquest with composing garlands
Of thy own myrtle for me.

<sup>2</sup> Daphne was transformed into a bay-tree.

Cel.

What's all this?

Lord. Consent to be my mistress, Celestina,
And we will have it spring-time all the year; <sup>355</sup>
Upon whose invitations, when we walk,
The winds shall play soft descant to our feet,
And breathe the rich odours to re-pure the air:
Green bowers on every side shall tempt our stay,
And violets stoop to have us tread upon 'em. <sup>360</sup>
The red rose shall grow pale, being near thy
cheek,
And the white blush, o'ercome with such a fore-
head.

Here laid, and measuring with ourselves some bank,

A thousand birds shall from the woods repair,
And place themselves so cunningly behind <sup>365</sup>
The leaves of every tree, that while they pay
Us tribute of their songs, thou sha't imagine
'The very trees bear music, and sweet voices
Do grow in every arbour. Here can we Embrace and kiss, tell tales, and kiss again, <sup>370</sup>
And none but Heaven our rival.

Cel.

When we are

Weary of these, what if we shift our paradise,
And through a grove of tall and even pine,
Descend into a valley, that shall shame
All the delights of Tempe; upon whose <sup>375</sup>
Green plush the Graces shall be call'd to dance
To please us, and maintain their fairy revels,
To the harmonious murmurs of a stream
That gently falls upon a rock of pearl. <sup>379</sup>
Here doth the nymph, forsaken Echo, dwell,
To whom we'll tell the story of our love,
Till at our surfeit and her want of joy,
We break her heart with envy. Not far off,
A grove shall call us to a wanton river,
To see a dying swan give up the ghost, <sup>385</sup>
The fishes shooting up their tears in bubbles,
That they must lose the genius of their waves—

And such love linsey woolsey, to no purpose.

Lord. You chide me handsomely; pray tell me how

You like this language.

Cel. Good my lord, forbear. <sup>390</sup>

Lord. You need not fly out of this circle,
madam;—

These widows are so full of circumstance!—
I'll undertake, in this time I ha' courted
Your ladyship for the toy, to ha' broken ten,
Nay, twenty colts, virgins I mean, and taught
'em <sup>395</sup>

The amble, or what pace I most affected.

Cel. You're not, my lord, again, the lord I thought you;

And I must tell you now, you do forget
Yourself and me.

Lord. You'll not be angry, madam?Cel. Nor rude, (though gay men have a privilege.) <sup>400</sup>

It shall appear:—there is a man, my lord,
Within my acquaintance, rich in worldly for-
tures,

But cannot boast any descent of blood,

Would buy a coat of arms.

Lord. He may, and legs

Booted and spur'd, to ride into the country. <sup>405</sup>

Cel. But these will want antiquity, my
lord,

The seal of honour. What's a coat cut out
But yesterday, to make a man a gentleman?
Your family, as old as the first virtue
That merited an escutcheon, doth owe <sup>410</sup>
A glorious coat of arms; if you will sell now
All that your name doth challenge in that ensign,

I'll help you to a chapman that shall pay,
And pour down wealth enough for 't.

Lord.

Sell my arms!

I cannot, madam.

Cel.

Give but your consent, <sup>415</sup>
You know not how the state may be inclin'd
To dispensation; we may prevail
Upon the Herald's office afterward.

Lord. I'll sooner give these arms to th'
hangman's axe,

My head, my heart, to twenty executions, <sup>420</sup>
Than sell one atom from my name.

Cel.

Change that,
And answer him would buy my honour from
me;

Honour, that is not worn upon a flag
Or pennon, that, without the owner's dangers,
An enemy may ravish, and bear from me; <sup>425</sup>
But that which grows and withers with my
soul,

Beside the body's stain: think, think, my
lord,

To what you would unworthily betray me,
If you would not, for price of gold, or pleasure,
(If that be more your idol,) lose the glory <sup>430</sup>
And painted honour of your house.—I ha'
done.

Lord. Enough to rectify a satyr's blood.
Obscure my blushes here.

Enter SIR WILLIAM SCENTLOVE and HAIRCUT.

Hair.

Or this, or fight with me;
It shall be no exception that I wait
Upon my lord; I am a gentleman, <sup>435</sup>
You may be less and be a knight: the office
I do my lord is honest, sir. How many Such you have been guilty of, Heaven knows.

Scent. 'T is no fear of your sword, but that I would not <sup>439</sup>

Break the good laws establish'd against duels.

Hair. Off with your periwig, and stand bare.
[SIR WILLIAM SCENTLOVE takes off his periwig.]

Lord.

From this
Minute I'll be a servant to thy goodness;
A mistress in the wanton sense is common,
I'll honour you with chaste thoughts, and call you so.

Cel. I'll study to be worth your fair opinion.

Lord. Scentlove, your head was us'd to a covering, <sup>440</sup>

Beside a hat; when went the hair away?

Scent. I laid a wager, my lord, with Haircut.

Who thinks I shall catch cold, that I'll stand bare

This half hour.

* Own.

Hair. Pardon my ambition, 460
Madam, I told you truth; I am a gentleman,
And cannot fear that name is drown'd in my Relation to my lord.

Cel. I dare not think so.

Hair. From henceforth call my service duty,
madam.

That pig's head, that betray'd me to your
mirth, 465

Is doing penance for 't.

Scent. Why may not I,
My lord, begin a fashion of no hair?

Cel. Do you sweat, Sir William?

Scent. Not with store of nightcaps.

Re-enter SIR THOMAS and LADY BORNWELL.

Lady B. Heaven has dissolv'd the clouds that hung upon

My eyes, and if you can with mercy meet 460
A penitent, I throw my own will off.

And now in all things obey yours. My nephew
Send back again to th' college, and myself
To what place you'll confine me.

Born. Dearer now
Than ever to my bosom, thou sha't please 465

Me best to live at thy own choice. I did
But fright thee with a noise of my expenses;

The sums are safe, and we have wealth enough,
If yet we use it nobly. My lord—madam,
Pray honour us to-night.

Lady B. I beg your presence, 470
And pardon.

Born. I know not how my Aretina
May be dispos'd to-morrow for the country.

Cel. You must not go before you have done
Me honour to accept an entertainment

Where I have power; on those terms I'm your guest. 475

Born. You grace us, madam.

Lady B. [Aside.] Already
I feel a cure upon my soul, and promise
My after life to virtue. Pardon, Heaven,
My shame, yet hid from the world's eye.

Re-enter DECOY.

Dec. Sweet madam!

Lady B. Not for the world be seen here! 480
We are lost.

I'll visit you at home.—[Aside.] But not to practise

What she expects: my counsel may recover
her. [Exit DECOY.]

Re-enter KICKSHAW.

Kick. Where's madam?—Pray lend me a little money,

My spirit has deceiv'd me; Proserpine
Has broke her word.

Lady B. Do you expect to find 485
The devil true to you?

Kick. Not too loud.

Lady B. I'll voice it
Louder, to all the world, your horrid sin,

Unless you promise me religiously,
To purge your foul blood by repentance, sir.

Kick. Then I'm undone.

Lady B. Not while I have power 490
To encourage you to virtue. I'll endeavour
To find you out some nobler way at court,

To thrive in.

Kick. Do 't and I'll forsake the devil,
And bring my flesh to obedience. You shall steer me.—

My lord, your servant.

Lord. You are brave again. 495

Kick. Madam, your pardon.

Born. Your offence requires
Humility.

Kick. Low as my heart.—Sir Thomas,
I'll sup with you, a part of satisfaction.

Born. Our pleasures cool. Music! and when our ladies

Are tir'd with active motion, to give 500
Them rest, in some new rapture to advance
Full mirth, our souls shall leap into a dance.

Exeunt.

THE PROLOGUE

THE CARDINAL ! 'Cause we express no scene,
We do believe most of you, gentlemen,
Are at this hour in France, and busy there,
Though you vouchsafe to lend your bodies here ;
But keep your fancy active, till you know,
By th' progress of our play, 't is nothing so.
A poet's art is to lead on your thought
Through subtle paths and workings of a plot ;
And where your expectation does not thrive,
If things fall better, yet you may forgive.
I will say nothing positive ; you may Think what you please ; we call it but a Play :
Whether the comic Muse, or ladies' love,
Romance, or direful tragedy it prove,
The bill determines not ; and would you be Persuaded, I would have 't a Comedy,
For all the purple in the name and state
Of him that owns it ; but 't is left to fate.
Yet I will tell you, ere you see it play'd,
What the author, and he blusht too, when he said,
Comparing with his own, (for 't had been pride,
He thought, to build his wit a pyramid
Upon another's wounded fame,) this play
Might rival with his best, and dar'd to say — Troth, I am out : he said no more. You, then,
When 't's done, may say your pleasures, gentlemen.

ACT I

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter two Lords at one door ; secretary [ANTONIO]<sup>2</sup> at the other.

1 Lord. Who is that ?
2 Lord. The duchess' secretary.

<sup>2</sup> In stage directions and speech-tags throughout, Antonio is called Secretary.

1 Lord. Signior !
Ant. Your lordship's servant.
1 Lord. How does her grace, since she left off her mourning
For the young Duke Mendoza, whose timeless
death
At sea left her a virgin and a widow ?
2 Lord. She's now inclining to a second bride.<sup>3</sup> —

<sup>3</sup> Bridegroom, as often.

When is the day of mighty marriage
To our great Cardinal's nephew, Don Columbo?

Ant. When they agree; they will not steal to church,

I guess the ceremonies will be loud and public.

Your lordships will excuse me. Exit.

1 Lord. When they agree! Alas! poor lady, she

Dotes not upon Columbo, when she thinks
Of the young Count d'Alvarez, divorc'd from her

By the king's power.

2 Lord. And counsel of the Cardinal,
To advance his nephew to the duchess' bed;
It is not well.

1 Lord. Take heed; the Cardinal holds Intelligence with every bird i' th' air.

2 Lord. Death on his purple pride! He governs all;

And yet Columbo is a gallant gentleman.

1 Lord. The darling of the war, whom victory
Hath often courted; a man of daring,

And most exalted spirit. Pride in him
Dwells like an ornament, where so much honour

Secures his praise.

2 Lord. This is no argument
He should usurp, and wear Alvarez' title

To the fair duchess; men of coarser blood,
Would not so tamely give this treasure up.

1 Lord. Although Columbo's name is great in war,

Whose glorious art and practice is above
The greatness of Alvarez, yet he cannot

Want soul, in whom alone survives the virtue
Of many noble ancestors, being the last

Of his great family.

2 Lord. 'Tis not safe, you'll say,
To wrastle with the king.

1 Lord. More danger if the Cardinal be displeas'd,

Who sits at helm of state. Count d'Alvarez
Is wiser to obey the stream, than by

Insisting on his privilege to her love,
Put both their fates upon a storm.

2 Lord. If wisdom,
Not inborn fear, make him compose,<sup>1</sup> I like it.

How does the duchess bear herself?

1 Lord. She moves by the rapture<sup>2</sup> of another
wheel,

That must be obey'd; like some sad passenger,
That looks upon the coast his wishes fly to,

But is transported by an adverse wind,
Sometimes a churlish pilot.

2 Lord. She has a sweet and noble nature.

1 Lord. That<sup>3</sup> commends Alvarez; Hymen cannot tie
A knot of two more equal hearts and blood.

Enter ALPHONSO.

2 Lord. Alphonso!

Alph. My good lord.

1 Lord. What great affair
Hath brought you from the confines?

<sup>1</sup> Agree.

<sup>2</sup> Force, momentum.

Alph. Such as will Be worth your counsels, when the king hath read

My letters from the governor: the Arragonians,
Violating their confederate oath and league,

Are now in arms: they have not yet march'd towards us;

But 't is not safe to expect,<sup>3</sup> if we may timely Prevent invasion.

2 Lord. Dare they be so insolent? <sup>4</sup>

1 Lord. This storm I did foresee.

2 Lord. What have they, but

The sweetness of the king, to make a crime?
1 Lord. But how appears the Cardinal at this news?

Alph. Not pale, although He knows they have no cause to think him innocent,

As by whose counsel they were once surpris'd.

1 Lord. There is more Than all our present art can fathom in

This story, and I fear I may conclude

This flame has breath at home to cherish it. <sup>5</sup>
There's treason in some hearts, whose faces are Smooth to the state.

Alph. My lord, I take my leave.

2 Lord. Your friends, good captain. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>4</sup>

Enter DUCHESS, VALERIA, and CELINDA.

Val. Sweet madam, be less thoughtful; this obedience<sup>6</sup>

To passion will destroy the noblest frame
Of beauty that this kingdom ever boasted.

Cel. This sadness might become your other habit,

And ceremonies black, for him that died. <sup>7</sup>
The times of sorrow are expir'd; and all

The joys that wait upon the court, your birth,
And a new Hymen, that is coming towards you,
Invite a change.

Duch. Ladies, I thank you both;
I pray excuse a little melancholy <sup>8</sup>

That is behind; my year of mourning hath not
So clear'd my account with sorrow, but there
may

Some dark thoughts stay, with sad reflections,
Upon my heart, for him I lost. Even this

New dress and smiling garment, meant to show <sup>9</sup>

A peace concluded 'twixt my grief and me,
Is but a sad remembrance. But I resolve

To entertain more pleasing thoughts; and if You wish me heartily to smile, you must

Not mention grief, not in advice to leave it. <sup>10</sup>
Such counsels open but afresh the wounds

Ye would close up, and keep alive the cause, Whose bleeding you would cure. Let's talk of something

That may delight. You two are read in all
The histories of our court: tell me, Valeria, <sup>11</sup>

Who has thy vote for the most handsome

<sup>3</sup> Wait.

<sup>4</sup> A room in the Duchess's house.

[Aside.] Thus I must counterfeit a peace, when all Within me is at mutiny.

Val. I have examin'd
All that are candidates for the praise of ladies,
But find — may I speak boldly to your grace?
And will you not return it in your mirth, 31
To make me blush?

Duch. No, no; speak freely.
Val. I wo' not rack your patience, madam;
but

Were I a princess, I should think the Count d'Alvarez

Had sweetness to deserve me from the world. 35
Duch. [Aside.] Alvarez! she's a spy upon
my heart.

Val. He's young and active, and compos'd most sweetly.

Duch. I have seen a face more tempting.
Val. It had then

Too much of woman in 't: his eyes speak mov-
ingly,

Which may excuse his voice, and lead away 40
All female pride his captive; his hair, black,
Which, naturally falling into curls —

Duch. Prithee, no more; thou art in love with
him. —

The man in your esteem, Celinda, now?

Cel. Alvarez is, I must confess, a gentle-
man 45

Of handsome composition; but with
His mind, the greater excellence, I think

Another may delight a lady more,
If man be well considered, that's Columbo,

Now, madam, voted to be yours.
Dutch. [Aside.] My torment! 50

Val. [Aside.] She affects him not.
Cel. He has a person, and a bravery beyond
All men, that I observe.

Val. He is a soldier,
A rough-hewn man, and may show well at distance.

His talk will fright a lady; War, and grim- 55
Fae'd Honour are his mistresses; he raves

To hear a lute; Love meant him not his priest. —

Again your pardon, madam. We may talk,
But you have art to choose, and crown affection. [CELINDA and VALERIA walk aside.]

Duch. What is it to be born above these ladies, 60

And want their freedom! They are not con-strain'd,

Nor slav'd by their own greatness, or the king's,

But let their free hearts look abroad, and
choose

By their own eyes to love. I must repair
My poor afflicted bosom, and assume 65

The privilege I was born with, which now prompts me

To tell the king, he hath no power nor art
To steer a lover's soul. —

Enter Secretary [ANTONIO].

What says Count d'Alvarez?

Ant. Madam, he'll attend you.

Duch. Wait you, as I directed. When he comes, 70

Acquaint me privately.

Ant. Madam, I have news;
'Tis now arriv'd the court; we shall have wars.

Duch. [Aside.] I find an army here of killing
thoughts.

Ant. The king has chosen Don Columbo general,

Who is immediately to take his leave. 75

Duch. [Aside.] What flood is let into my heart! — How far

Is he to go?

Ant. To Arragon.
Duch. That's well

At first; he should not want a pilgrimage
To the unknown world, if my thoughts might convey him.

Ant. 'Tis not impossible he may go thither. 80
Duch. How?

Ant. To the unknown world; he goes to fight,
That's in his way: such stories are in nature.

Duch. Conceal this news.
Ant. He wo' not be long absent;

The affair will make him swift
To kiss your grace's hand. [Exit.]

Duch. He cannot fly 85
With too much wing to take his leave. — I must

Be admitted to your conference; you have
Enlarg'd my spirits; they shall droop no more.

Cel. We are happy, if we may advance one thought

To your grace's pleasure. 90
Val. Your eye before was in eclipse; these smiles

Become you, madam.
Duch. [Aside.] I have not skill to contain myself.

Enter PLACENTIA.

Pla. The Cardinal's nephew, madam, Don
Columbo.

Duch. Already! Attend him.
Exit PLACENTIA.

Val. Shall we take our leave? 95
Duch. He shall not know, [Celinda],<sup>1</sup> how you prais'd him.

[Cel.]<sup>2</sup> If he did, madam, I should have the confidence

To tell him my free thoughts.

Enter COLUMBO.

Duch. My lord, while I'm in study to requite
The favour you ha' done me, you increase 100
My debt to such a sum, still by a new honour-
ing

Your servant, I despair of my own freedom.

Colum. Madam, he kisseth your white hand, that must

Not surfeit in this happiness — and, ladies,
I take your smiles for my encouragement! 105
I have not long to practise these court tactics.

[Kisses them.]

Cel. He has been taught to kiss.

<sup>1</sup> Q. Valeria, but cf. vv. 45-57, above. <sup>2</sup> Q. Val.

Duch. There 's something, sir,
Upon your brow I did not read before.

Colum. Does the character please you, madam?

Duch. More,
Because it speaks you cheerful.

Colum. 'Tis for such 110
Access of honour, as must make Columbo Worth all your love; the king is pleas'd to think

Me fit to lead his army.

Duch. How! an army?

Colum. We must not use the priest, till I bring home

Another triumph that now stays for me, 115
To reap it in the purple field of glory.

Duch. But do you mean to leave me, and expose

Yourself to the devouring war? No enemy
Should divide us; the king is not so cruel.

Colum. The king is honourable; and this
grace 120

More answers my ambition, than his gift
Of thee, and all thy beauty, which I can
Love, as becomes thy soldier, and fight
To come again, a conqueror of thee.

Then I must chide this fondness.<sup>1</sup> She weeps. 125

Re-enter Secretary [ANTONIO].

Ant. Madam, the king, and my lord Cardinal.
[Exit.]

Enter KING, CARDINAL, and Lords.

King. Madam, I come to call a servant from
you,

And strengthen his excuse; the public cause
Will plead for your consent; at his return
Your marriage shall receive triumphant ceremonies; 130

Till then you must dispense.

Car. She appears sad
To part with him. — I like it fairly, nephew.

[Cel.]<sup>2</sup> Is not the general a gallant man?
What lady would deny him a small courtesy?

[Val.] Thou hast converted me, and I begin
To wish it were no sin. 135

[Cel.] Leave that to narrow consciences.

[Val.] You are pleasant.
[Cel.] But he would please one better. Do such men

Lie with their pages?

[Val.] Wouldst thou make a shift?
[Cel.] He is going to a bloody business; 140

'Tis pity he should die without some heir.
That lady were hard-hearted now, that would Not help posterity, for the mere good

O' th' king and commonwealth.

[Val.] Thou art wild; we may be observ'd.
Duch. Your will must guide me; happiness and conquest 145

Be ever waiting on his sword!

Colum. Farewell.

Exit KING, COLUMBO, CARDI-NAL and Lords.

Duch. Pray give leave to examine a few
thoughts;

Expect<sup>3</sup> me in the garden.

Ladies. We attend. Exit Ladies. 150

Duch. This is above all expectation happy.
Forgive me, Virtue, that I have dissembled,
And witness with me, I have not a thought
To tempt or to betray him, but secure
The promise I first made, to love and honour. 155

Re-enter Secretary [ANTONIO].

Ant. The Count d'Alvarez, madam.

Duch. Admit him,
And let none interrupt us. [Exit ANTONIO.] —

How shall I
Behave my looks? The guilt of my neglect,
Which had no seal from hence, will call up blood
To write upon my cheeks the shame and story 160
In some red letter.

Enter ALVAREZ.

Alv. Madam, I present
One that was glad to obey your grace, and come
To know what your commands are.

Duch. Where I once
Did promise love, a love that had the power
And office of a priest to chain my heart 165
To yours, it were injustice to command.

Alv. But I can look upon you, madam, as Becomes a servant; with as much humility,
In tenderness of your honour and great fortune,
Give up, when you call back your bounty, all
that 170

Was mine, as I had pride to think them favours.
Duch. Hath love taught thee no more assurance in

Our mutual vows, thou canst suspect it possible
I should revoke a promise, made to heaven
And thee, so soon? This must arise from some Distrust of thy own faith.

Alv. Your grace's pardon; 175
To speak with freedom, I am not so old
In cunning to betray, nor young in time,
Not to see when and where I am at loss,
And how to bear my fortune, and my wounds, 180
Which, if I look for health, must still bleed inward,

A hard and desperate condition.
I am not ignorant your birth and greatness
Have plac'd you to grow up with the king's grace
And jealousy, which to remove, his power 185
Hath chosen a fit object for your beauty
To shine upon, Columbo, his great favourite.

I am a man on whom but late the king
Has pleas'd to cast a beam, which was not meant
To make me proud, but wisely to direct, 190
And light me to my safety. Oh, dear madam!

I will not call more witness of my love
(If you will let me still give it that name)

Than this, that I dare make myself a loser,
And to your will give all my blessings up. 195

Preserve your greatness, and forget a trifle,
That shall, at best, when you have drawn me up,
But hang about you like a cloud, and dim
The glories you are born to.

<sup>2</sup> Q. transposes Cel. and Val. throughout this conversation.

<sup>3</sup> Await.

Duch. Misery
Of birth and state! That I could shift into 200
A meaner blood, or find some art to purge
That part which makes my veins unequal! Yet
Those nice distinctions have no place in us;
There's but a shadow difference, a title:
Thy stock partakes as much of noble sap 205
As that which feeds the root of kings; and he
That writes a lord hath all the essence of Nobility.

Alv. 'T is not a name that makes
Our separation; the king's displeasure
Hangs a portent to fright us, and the matter 210
That feeds this exhalation is the Cardinal's
Plot to advance his nephew; then Columbo,
A man made up for some prodigious act,
Is fit to be considered: in all three
There is no character you fix upon 215
But has a form of ruin to us both.

Duch. Then you do look on these with fear?

Alv. With eyes
That should think tears a duty, to lament
Your least unkind fate; but my youth dares boldly

Meet all the tyranny o' th' stars, whose black
Malevolence but shoots my single tragedy. 221
You are above the value of many worlds
Peopled with such as I am.

Duch. What if Columbo,
Engag'd to war, in his hot thirst of honour,
Find out the way to death?

Alv. 'T is possible. 225
Duch. Or say, (no matter by what art or motive,)

He give his title up, and leave me to My own election?

Alv. If I then be happy
To have a name within your thought, there can 230
Be nothing left to crown me with new blessing.
But I dream thus of heaven, and wake to find
My amorous soul a mockery. When the priest
Shall tie you to another, and the joys
Of marriage leave no thought at leisure to Look back upon Alvarez, that must wither 235
For loss of you; yet then I cannot lose
So much of what I was once in your favour,
But, in a sigh, pray still you may live happy.

Exit.

Duch. My heart is in a mist; some good star smile

Upon my resolution, and direct 240
Two lovers in their chaste embrace to meet!
Columbo's bed contains my winding sheet.

Exit.

ACT II

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>

General COLUMBO, HERNANDO, two Colonels, ALPHONSO, two Captains, and other Officers,
as at a Council of War.

Colum. I see no face in all this council that Hath one pale fear upon 't, though we arriv'd not <sup>1</sup> Before the walls of the frontier city.—Columbo's tent.

So timely to secure the town, which gives
Our enemy such triumph.

1 Col. 'T was betray'd.

Alph. The wealth of that one city
Will make the enemy glorious.<sup>2</sup>

1 Col. They dare
Not plunder it.

Alph. They give fair quarter yet:
They only seal up men's estates, and keep Possession for the city's use: they take up
No wares without security; and he, 10
Whose single credit will not pass, puts in Two lean comrades, upon whose bonds 't is not Religion to deny 'em.

Colum. To repair this
With honour, gentlemen?

Her. My opinion is
To expect awhile.

Colum. Your reason?
Her. Till their own 16

Surfeit betray 'em; for their soldier[s.]
Bred up with coarse and common bread, will show

Such appetites on the rich cates they find,
They'll spare our swords a victory, when their
own

Riot and luxury destroys 'em.

Col. That 20
Will show our patience too like a fear.

With favour of his excellence, I think
The spoil of cities takes not off the courage,

But doubles it on soldiers; besides,
While we have tameness to expect, the noise 25
Of their success and plenty will increase
Their army.

Her. 'T is considerable; we do not Exceed in foot or horse, our muster not

'Bove sixteen thousand both; and the infantry
Raw, and not disciplin'd to act.

Alph. Their hearts, 30
But with a brave thought of their country's
honour,

Will teach 'em how to fight, had they not seen
A sword. But we decline<sup>3</sup> our own too much;

The men are forward in their arms, and take
The use<sup>4</sup> with avarice of fame.

They rise, and talk privately.

Colum. — Colonel, 25
I do suspect you are a coward.

Her. Sir!
Colum. Or else a traitor; take your choice.

No more.

I call'd you to a council, sir, of war;
Yet keep your place.

Her. I have worn other names.
Colum. Deserve 'em. Such 40

Another were enough to unsoul an army.
Ignobly talk of patience, till they drink

And reel to death! We came to fight, and force
'em

To mend their pace: thou hast no honour in
thee,

Not enough noble blood to make a blush 45
For thy tame eloquence.

<sup>4</sup> Learn to use their arms.

Her. My lord, I know
My duty to a general : yet there are Some that have known me here. Sir, I desire
To quit my regiment.

Colum. You shall have license. —
Ink and paper !

[Enter Attendant with ink and paper, and exit.]

1 Col. The general's displeas'd.

2 Col. How is 't, Hernando ?

Her. The general has found out employment
for me ;

He is writing letters back.
Alph. and Capt. To his mistress ?

Her. Pray do not trouble me ; yet, prithee,
speak,

And flatter not thy friend. Dost think I dare
Not draw my sword, and use it, when a cause,
With honour, calls to action ?

Alph. and Col. With the most valiant man
alive.

Her. You'll do me some displeasure in your loves :

Pray to your places.

Colum. So ; bear those letters to the king ;
They speak my resolution, before
Another sun decline, to charge the enemy.

Her. [Aside.] A pretty court way
Of dismissing an officer. — I obey ; success
Attend your counsels !

Colum. If here be any dare not look on danger,

And meet it like a man, with scorn of death,
I beg his absence ; and a coward's fear
Consume him to a ghost !

1 Col. None such [are] here.

Colum. Or, if in all your regiments you find
One man that does not ask to bleed with hon-
our,

Give him a double pay to leave the army ;
There's service to be done will call the spirits
And aid of men.

1 Col. You give us all new flame.

Colum. I am confirm'd, and you must lose no
time ;

The soldier that was took last night, to me
Discover'd their whole strength, and that we
have

A party in the town. The river, that
Opens the city to the west, [']s unguarded ; —
We must this night use art and resolution
We cannot fall ingloriously.

1 Capt. That voice
Is every man's.

Enter Soldier and Secretary [ANTONIO] with a letter.

Colum. What now ?

Sold. Letters.

Colum. Whence ?

Sold. From the duchess.

Colum. They are welcome. — [Takes the letter.]
Meet at my tent again this evening ;

Yet stay, some wine. — The duchess' health !
See it go round.

Ant. It wo' not please his excellence.

1 Col. The duchess' health ! [Drinks.]

2 Capt. To me ! more wine.

Ant. The clouds are gathering, and his eyes shoot fire ;

Observe what thunder follows.
2 Capt. The general has but ill news. I suspect

The duchess sick, or else the king.

1 Capt. May be

The Cardinal.

2 Capt. His soul has long been look'd for.

Colum. She dares not be so insolent. It is The duchess' hand. How am I shrunk in fame

To be thus play'd withal ! She writes, and counsels,

Under my hand, to send her back a free
Resign of all my interest to her person,

Promise, or love ; that there's no other way,
With safety of my honour, to revisit her.

The woman is possess with some bold devil,
And wants an exorcism ; or, I am grown

A cheap, dull, phlegmatic fool, a post that's carv'd

I th' common street, and holding out my forehead

To every scurril wit to pin disgrace
And libels on't. — Did you bring this to me,
sir ?

My thanks shall warm your heart.

Ant. [Draws a pistol.]
Hold, hold ! my lord !

I know not what provokes this tempest, but Her grace ne'er show'd more freedom from a storm

When I receiv'd this paper. If you have
A will to do an execution,

Your looks, without that engine, sir, may serve. —

I did not like the employment.

Colum. Ha ! had she
No symptom, in her eye or face, of anger,

When she gave this in charge ?

Ant. Serene, as I
Have seen the morning rise upon the spring ;

No trouble in her breath, but such a wind
As came to kiss, and fan the smiling flowers.

Colum. No poetry.

Ant. By all the truth in prose,
By honesty, and your own honour, sir,

I never saw her look more calm and gentle.
Colum. I am too passionate ; you must forgive me.

I have found it out ; the duchess loves me
dearly ;

She express a trouble in her when I took My leave, and chid me with a sullen eye :

'T is a device to hasten my return ;
Love has a thousand arts. I'll answer it
Beyond her expectation, and put Her soul to a noble test. — Your patience, gentlemen ;

The king's health will deserve a sacrifice
Of wine. [Retires to the table and writes.]

Ant. [Aside.] I am glad to see this change, and thank my wit

For my redemption.

1 Col. Sir, the soldier's curse
On him loves not our master!

2 Col. And they curse <sup>140</sup>
Loud enough to be heard.

2 Capt. Their curse has the nature of gunpowder.

Ant. They do not pray with half the noise.
1 Col. Our general is not well mixt;
He has too great a portion of fire. <sup>145</sup>

2 Col. His mistress cool him, (her complexion Carries some phlegm,) when they two meet in bed!

2 Capt. A third may follow.
1 Capt. 'T is much pity <sup>140</sup>
The young duke liv'd not to take the virgin off.

1 Col. 'T was the king's act, to match two rabbit-suckers.<sup>1</sup>

2 Col. A common trick of state;
The little great man marries, travels then
Till both grow up, and dies when he should do
The feat; these things are still unlucky <sup>165</sup>
On the male side.

Colum. This to the duchess' fair hand.
[Gives ANTONIO a letter.]

Ant. She will think
Time hath no wing, till I return. [Exit.]

Colum. Gentlemen,
Now each man to his quarter, and encourage
The soldier. I shall take a pride to know <sup>160</sup>
Your diligence, when I visit all your Several commands.

All. We shall expect.
2 Col. And move

By your directions.
Colum. Y' are all noble. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter CARDINAL, DUCHESS, and PLACENTIA.

Car. I shall perform a visit daily, madam,
In th' absence of my nephew, and be happy
If you accept my care.

Duch. You have honour'd me;
And if your entertainment have not been
Worthy your grace's person, 't is because <sup>5</sup>
Nothing can reach it in my power; but where
There is no want of zeal, other defect
Is only a fault to exercise your mercy.

Car. You are boucteous in all. I take my
leave,

My fair niece, shortly, when Columbo has <sup>10</sup>
Purchas'd more honours to prefer his name
And value to your noble thoughts; meantime,
Be confident you have a friend, whose office
And favour with the king shall be effectual
To serve your grace.

Duch. Your own good deeds reward you, <sup>15</sup>
Till mine rise equal to deserve their benefit. —

Exit CARDINAL.
Exit PLACENTIA.

Leave me awhile. —
Do not I walk upon the teeth of serpents,
And, as I had a charm against their poison,
Play with their stings? The Cardinal is subtle,
Whom 't is not wisdom to incense, till I <sup>21</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Young rabbits, youngsters.

<sup>2</sup> A room in the Duchess's house.

Hear to what destiny Columbo leaves me.
May be the greatness of his soul will scorn
To own what comes with murmur; — if he can Interpret me so happily. — Art come? <sup>25</sup>

Enter Secretary [ANTONIO] with a letter.

Ant. His excellence salutes your grace.
Duch. Thou hast
A melancholy brow. How did he take my letter?

Ant. As he would take a blow; with so much sense

Of anger, his whole soul boi'd in his face;
And such prodigious flame in both his eyes, <sup>30</sup>
As they'd been th' only seat of fire, and at
Each look a salamander leaping forth,
Not able to endure the furnace.

Duch. Ha! thou dost
Describe him with some horror.

Ant. Soon as he Had read again, and understood your meaning, <sup>35</sup>

His rage had shot me with a pistol, had not
I us'd some soft and penitential language,
To charm the bullet.

Duch. Wait at some more distance. —
My soul doth bathe itself in a cold dew;
Imagine I am opening of a tomb; <sup>40</sup>

[Opens the letter.]

Thus I throw off the marble, to discover
What antic posture death presents in this Pale monument to fright me. — Ha! Reads.

My heart, that call'd my blood and spirits to Defend it from the invasion of my fears, <sup>45</sup>
Must keep a guard about it still, lest this Strange and too mighty joy crush it to nothing. —

Antonio.

Ant. Madam.
Duch. Bid my steward give thee

Two thousand ducats. Art sure I am awake?

Ant. I shall be able to resolve you, madam, <sup>50</sup>
When he has paid the money.

Duch. Columbo now is noble. Exit.
Ant. This is better

Than I expected, — if my lady be
Not mad, and live to justify her bounty. Exit.

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter KING, ALVAREZ, HERNANDO, and Lords.

King. The war is left to him; but we must
have

You reconcil'd, if that be all your difference.
His rage flows like a torrent, when he meets
With opposition; leave to wrestle with him,

And his hot blood retreats into a calm, <sup>5</sup>
And then he chides his passion. You shall back
With letters from us.

Her. Your commands are not
To be disputed.

King. Alvarez. [Takes him aside.]
1 Lord. Lose not

Yourselves by cool submission; he will find
His error, and the want of such a soldier. <sup>10</sup>

<sup>3</sup> An apartment in the palace.

2 Lord. Have you seen the Cardinal?
Her. Not yet.
 1 Lord. He wants no plot —
Her. The king I must obey;
 But let the purple gowman place his engines
 I' th' dark, that wound<sup>1</sup> me.
 2 Lord. Be assur'd
 Of what we can to friend you; and the king
 Cannot forget your service.
Her. I am sorry
 For that poor gentleman.
Alv. I must confess, sir,
 The duchess has been pleas'd to think me
 worthy
 Her favours, and in that degree of honour
 That has oblig'd my life to make the best
 Return of service, which is not, with bold
 Affiance in her love, to interpose
 Against her happiness, and your election.
 I love so much her honour, I have quitted
 All my desires; yet would not shrink to bleed
 Out my warm stock of life, so the last drop
 Might benefit her wishes.
King. I shall find
 A compensation for this act, Alvarez;
 It hath much pleased us.
Enter DUCHESS with a letter; Gentleman-Usher.
Duch. Sir, you are the king,
 And in that sacred title it were sin
 To doubt a justice: all that does concern
 My essence in this world, and a great part
 Of the other's bliss, lives in your breath.
King. What intends the duchess?
Duch. That will instruct you, sir. [Gives the letter.] — Columbo has,
 Upon some better choice, or discontent,
 Set my poor soul at freedom.
King. 'Tis his character. Reads.
 "Madam, I easily discharge all my pretensions to your love and person; I leave you to your own choice; and in what you have obliged yourself to me, resume a power to cancel, if you please. [41
 Columbo."
 This is strange!
Duch. Now do an act to make
 Your chronicle belov'd and read for ever.
King. Express yourself.
Duch. Since by divine infusion, —
 For 'tis no art could force the general to
 This change, second this justice, and bestow
 The heart you would have given from me, by Your strict commands to love Columbo, where
 'T was meant by Heaven; and let your breath return
 Whom you divorc'd, Alvarez, mine.
Lords. This is
 But justice, sir.
King. It was decreed above;
 And since Columbo has releas'd his interest,
 Which we had wrought him, not without some foree
 Upon your will, I give you your own wishes: 55
 Receive your own Alvarez. When you please
 To celebrate your nuptial, I invite Myself your guest.

<sup>1</sup> Q. wounds.

Duch. Eternal blessings crown you!
All. And every joy your marriage!
Exit KING, who meets the CARDI-NAL; they converse.
Alv. I know not whether I shall wonder
 most,
 Or joy to meet this happiness.
Duch. Now the king
 Hath planted us, methinks we grow already,
 And twist our loving souls, above the wrath
 Of thunder to divide us.
Alv. Ha! the Cardinal
 Has met the king! I do not like this conference;
 He looks with anger this way. I expect
 A tempest.
Duch. Take no notice of his presence;
 Leave me to meet, and answer it. If the king
 Be firm in 's royal word, I fear no lightning.
 Expect me in the garden.
Alv. I obey;
 But fear a shipwrack on the coast. Exit.
Car. Madam.
Duch. My lord.
Car. The king speaks of a letter that has brought
 A riddle in 't.
Duch. 'Tis easy to interpret.
Car. From my nephew? May I deserve the favour? [DUCHESS gives him the letter.]
Duch. [Aside.] He looks as though his eyes would fire the paper.
 They are a pair of burning glasses, and
 His envious blood doth give 'em flame.
Car. [Aside.] What lethargy could thus un-spirit him?
 I am all wonder. — Do not believe, madam,
 But that Columbo's love is yet more sacred
 To honour and yourself, than thus to forfeit
 What I have heard him call the glorious wreath
 To all his merits, given him by the king,
 From whom he took you with more pride than ever
 He came from victory: his kisses hang
 Yet panting on your lips; and he but now
 Exchang'd religious farewell to return,
 But with more triumph, to be yours.
Duch. My lord,
 You do believe your nephew's hand was not
 Surpris'd or strain'd to this?
Car. Strange arts and windings in the world!
 most dark
 And subtle progresses! Who brought this letter?
Duch. I enquir'd not his name; I thought it
 not
 Considerable<sup>2</sup> to take such narrow knowledge.
Car. Desert and honour urg'd it here, nor can
 I blame you to be angry; yet his person
 Oblig'd you should have given a nobler pause,
 Before you made your faith and change so violent,
 From his known worth, into the arms of one,
 However fashioned to your amorous wish, 101

<sup>2</sup> Important.

Not equal to his cheapest fame, with all
The gloss of love and merit.

Duch. This comparison,
My good lord Cardinal, I cannot think
Flows from an even justice; it betrays 105
You partial where your blood runs.

Car. I fear, madam,
Your own takes too much license, and will soon
Fall to the censure of unruly tongues.

Because Alvarez has a softer cheek,
Can, like a woman, trim his wanton hair, 110
Spend half a day with looking in the glass
To find a posture to present himself,
And bring more effeminacy than man,
Or honour, to your bed, must he supplant him?
Take heed, the common murmur, when it catches 115

The scent of a lost fame —

Duch. My fame, lord Cardinal?
It stands upon an innocence as clear
As the devotions you pay to Heaven.
I shall not urge, my lord, your soft indulgence
At my next shrift.

Car. You are a fine court lady! 120
Duch. And you should be a reverend church-
man.

Car. One
That, if you have not thrown off modesty,
Would counsel you to leave Alvarez.

Duch. 'Cause
You dare do worse than marriage, must not I
Be admitted what the church and law allows
me? 125

Car. Insolent! Then you dare marry him?
Duch. Dare!

Let your contracted flame and malice, with Columbo's rage, higher than that, meet us
When we approach the holy place, clasp'd
hand

In hand we'll break through all your force, and fix 130
Our sacred vows together there.

Car. I knew
When, with as chaste a brow, you promis'd
fair

To another, You are no dissembling lady!
Duch. Would all your actions had no falsen lights

About 'em! 135
Car. Ha!

Duch. The people would not talk, and curse
so loud.

Car. I'll have you chid into a blush for this.
Duch. Begin at home, great man, there's cause enough:

You turn the wrong end of the perspective<sup>1</sup> 140
Upon your crimes, to drive them to a far
And lesser sight; but let your eyes look right,
What giants would your pride and surfeit seem!
How gross your avarice, eating up whole families!

How vast are your corruptions and abuse 145
Of the king's ear! at which you hang a pen-dant,

Not to adorn, but ulcerate, while the honest

Nobility, like pictures in the arras,
Serve only for court ornament. If they speak,
'Tis when you set their tongues, which you wind up 150

Like cloaks, to strike at the just hour you
please.

Leave, leave, my lord, these usurpations,
And be what you were meant, a man to cure,
Not let in, agues to religion:
Look on the church's wounds.

Car. You dare presume, 155
In your rude spleen to me, to abuse the church?

Duch. Alas, you give false aim, my lord; 't is your

Ambition and scarlet sins, that rob
Her altar of the glory, and leave wounds
Upon her brow; which fetches grief and pale-
ness 160

Into her cheeks, making her troubled bosom Pant with her groans, and shroud her holy blushes

Within your reverend purples.

Car. Will you now take breath?

Duch. In hope, my lord, you will behold yourself

In a true glass, and see those unjust acts 165
That so deform you, and by timely cure
Prevent a shame, before the short-haired men<sup>2</sup>
Do crowd and call for justice; I take leave.

Exit.

Car. This woman has a spirit, that may rise
To tame the devil's: there's no dealing with
Her angry tongue; 't is action and revenge 170
Must calm her fury. Were Columbo here,
I could resolve; but letters shall be sent
To th' army, which may wake him into sense
Of his rash folly, or direct his spirit 175
Some way to snatch his honour from this flame.

All great men know the soul of life is fame.

Exit.

ACT III

[SCENE I.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter VALERIA and CELINDA.

Val. I did not think, Celinda, when I prais'd Alvarez to the duchess, that things thus
Would come about. What does your ladyship
Think of Columbo now? It staggers all
The court, he should forsake his mistress; I Am lost with wonder yet.

Cel. 'T is very strange,
Without a spell; but there's a fate in love; —
I like him ne'er the worse.

Enter two Lords.

1 Lord. Nothing but marriages and triumph
now!

Val. What new access of joy makes you, my
lord, 180
So pleasant?

<sup>2</sup> Apparently, an allusion to the Puritans.

<sup>3</sup> An apartment in the palace.

<sup>1</sup> Here, a telescope.

1 Lord. There's a packet come to court
Makes the king merry; we are all concern'd in't.
Columbo hath given the enemy a great
And glorious defeat, and is already
Preparing to march home. 15

Cel. He thriv'd the better for my prayers.

2 Lord. You have been
His great admirer, madam.

1 Lord. The king longs

To see him.

Val. This news exalts the Cardinal.

Enter Cardinal.

1 Lord. He's here!

He appears with discontent; the marriage 20
With Count d'Alvarez hath a bitter taste,
And not worn off his palate: but let us leave
him.

Cel. and Val. We'll to the duchess. Exeunt.

Car. He has not won so much upon the Arragon

As he has lost at home; and his neglect 25

Of what my studies had contriv'd to add
More lustre to our family by the access
Of the great duchess' fortune, cools his triumph,
And makes me wild.

Enter HERNANDO.

Her. My good lord Cardinal!

Car. You made complaint to th' king about your general? 30

Her. Not a complaint, my lord; I did but satisfy

Some questions o' the king's,

Car. You see he thrives
Without your personal valour or advice,
Most grave and learned in the wars.

Her. My lord,
I envy not his fortune.

Car. 'Tis above 35
Your malice, and your noise not worth his
anger;

'Tis barking 'gainst the moon.

Her. More temper would Become that habit.

Car. The military thing would show some spleen.

I'll blow an army of such wasps about 40

The world. — Go look your sting you left i' th' camp, sir.

Enter King and Lords.

Her. The king! — This may be one day counted for. Exit.

King. All things conspire, my lord, to make you fortunate.

Your nephew's glory —

Car. 'T was your cause and justice
Made him victorious; had he been so valiant 45

At home, he had had another conquest to invite, and bid her welcome to new wars.

King. You must be reconcil'd to providence,
My lord.

I heard you had a controversy with 50
The duchess; I will have you friends.

Car. I am not angry.

King. For my sake, then,

You shall be pleas'd, and with me grace the marriage.

A churchman must show charity, and shine
With first example: she's a woman. 55

Car. You shall prescribe in all things, sir.
You cannot

Accuse my love, if I still wish my nephew
Had been so happy, to be constant to
Your own, and my election; yet my brain
Cannot reach how this comes about; I know 60
My nephew lov'd her with a near affection.

Re-enter HERNANDO.

King. He'll give you fair account at his return. —

Colonel, your letters may be spar'd; the general

Has finish'd, and is coming home. Exit.

Her. I am glad on't, sir. — My good lord
Cardinal, 65

'T is not impossible but some man provok'd
May have a precious mind to cut your throat.

Car. You shall command me, noble Colonel;
I know you wo' not fail to be at the wedding.

Her. 'T is not Columbo that is married, sir.

Car. Go teach the postures of the pike and musket; 71

Then drill your myrmidons into a ditch,
Where starve, and stink in pickle. — You shall find

Me reasonable; you see the king expects me. [Exit.]

Her. So does the devil. — 75

Some desperate hand may help you on your journey. Exit.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter Secretary [ANTONIO] and Servants, [with masques, dresses, etc.]

Ant. Here, this; ay, this will fit your part:
you shall wear the slashes, because you are a soldier. Here 's for the blue mute.<sup>2</sup>

1 Serv. This doublet will never fit me; pox on't! Are these breeches good enough for a [5 prince too? Pedro plays but a lord, and he has two laces more in a seam.

Ant. You must consider Pedro is a foolish lord; he may wear what lace he please.

2 Serv. Does my beard fit my clothes well, [10
gentlemen?

Ant. Fox o' your beard!

3 Serv. That will fright away the hair.

1 Serv. This fellow plays but a mute, and he is so troublesome, and talks. 15

3 Serv. Master Secretary might have let Jaques play the soldier; he has a black patch
already.

2 Serv. By your favour, Master Secretary, I was ask'd who writ this play for us? 20

Ant. For us? Why, art thou any more than a blue mute?

2 Serv. And, by my troth, I said, I thought it was all your own.

<sup>1</sup> A room in the Duchess's house.

<sup>2</sup> I. e. For the mute who was to take the servant's part, blue being the general colour of a servant's livery.

Ant. Away, you coxcomb!

4 Serv. Dost think he has no more wit than to write a comedy? My lady's chaplain made the play, though he is content, for the honour and trouble of the business, to be seen in't.

5 Serv. Did anybody see my head, gentle-<sup>30</sup> men? 'T was here but now.—I shall have never a head to play my part in.

Ant. Is thy head gone? 'T was well thy part was not in't. Look, look about; has not Jaques it?<sup>35</sup>

4 Serv. I his head? 'T wo' not come on upon my shoulders.

Ant. Make haste, gentlemen; I'll see whether the king has supp'd. Look every man to his wardrobe and his part.

2 Serv. Is he gone? In my mind, a masque had been fitter for a marriage.

4 Serv. Why, mute? There was no time for 't, and the scenes are troublesome.

2 Serv. Half a score deal tack'd together<sup>45</sup> in the clouds, what's that? A throne, to come down and dance; all the properties have been paid forty times over, and are in the court stock;—but the secretary must have a play, to show his wit.<sup>50</sup>

4 Serv. Did not I tell thee 't was the chaplain's? Hold your tongue, mute.

1 Serv. Under the rose, and would this cloth of silver doublet might never come off again, if there be any more plot than you see in the<sup>55</sup> back of my hand.

2 Serv. You talk of a plot! I'll not give this for the best poet's plot in the world, an if it be not well carried.

4 Serv. Well said, mute.<sup>60</sup>

3 Serv. Ha, ha! Pedro, since he put on his doublet, has repeated but three lines, and he has broke five buttons.

2 Serv. I know not; but by this false beard, and here's hair enough to hang a reasonable<sup>65</sup> honest man, I do not remember, to say, a strong line indeed in the whole comedy, but when the chambermaid kisses the captain.

3 Serv. Excellent, mute!

5 Serv. They have almost supp'd, and I<sup>70</sup> cannot find my head yet.

4 Serv. Play in thine own.

5 Serv. Thank you for that! so I may have it made a property. If I have not a head found me, let Master Secretary play my part him-<sup>75</sup> self without it.

Re-enter Secretary [ANTONIO].

Ant. Are you all ready, my masters? The king is coming through the gallery. Are the women drest?

1 Serv. Rogero wants a head.<sup>80</sup>

Ant. Here, with a pox to you! take mine. You a player! you a puppy-dog. Is the music ready?

Enter Gentleman-Usher.

Gent. Gentlemen, it is my lady's pleasure that you expect till she call for you. There are<sup>85</sup> a company of cavaliers in gallant equipage, newly alighted, have offer'd to present their

Revels in honour of this Hymen; and 't is her grace's command, that you be silent till their entertainment be over.<sup>90</sup>

1 Serv. Gentlemen?

2 Serv. Affronted?

5 Serv. Master Secretary, there's your head again; a man's a man. Have I broken my sleep to study fifteen lines for an ambassa-<sup>95</sup> dor, and after that a constable, and is it come to this?

Ant. Patience, gentlemen, be not so hot; 'tis but deferr'd, and the play may do well enough cold.<sup>100</sup>

4 Serv. If it be not presented, the chaplain will have the greatest loss; he loses his wits.

(Hauddois.)

Ant. This music speaks the king upon entrance. Retire, retire, and grumble not.

Exeunt [all but ANTONIO].

Enter KING, CARDINAL, ALVAREZ, DUCHESS, CELINDA, VALERIA, PLACENTIA, Lords, and HERNANDO. They being set, enter COLUMBO and five more, in rich habits, vizarded; between every two a Torch-bearer. They dance, and afterwards beckon to ALVAREZ, as if desirous to speak with him.

Alv. With me! (They embrace and whisper.)<sup>105</sup>

King. Do you know the masquers, madam?

Duch. Not I, sir.

Car. There's one, — but that my nephew is abroad,

And has more soul than thus to jig upon Their hymeneal night, I should suspect<sup>110</sup>

'T were he. (The Masquers lead in ALVAREZ.)

Duch. Where's my Lord Alvarez?<sup>115</sup>

(Recorders.)

King. Call in the bridegroom.

Re-enter COLUMBO. Four Masquers bring in ALVAREZ dead, in one of their habits, and having laid him down, exeunt.

Duch. What mystery is this?

Car. We want the bridegroom still.<sup>120</sup>

King. Where is Alvarez?

COLUMBO points to the body; they unvizard it, and find ALVAREZ bleeding.

Duch. Oh, 't is my lord! He's murder'd!

King. Who durst commit this horrid act?

Colum. I, sir. [Throws off his disguise.]

King. Columbo? Ha!

Colum. Yes; Columbo, that dares stay<sup>125</sup>

To justify that act.

Her. Most barbarous!

Duch. Oh, my dearest lord!

King. Our guard seize on them all:

This sight doth shake all that is man within me.

Poor Alvarez, is this thy wedding day?<sup>130</sup>

Enter Guard.

Duch. If you do think there is a Heaven, or pains
To punish such black crimes i' th' other world,
Let me have swift, and such exemplar justice,

<sup>1</sup> Flageolets.

As shall become this great assassinate ; 120
 You will take off our faith else : and, if here
 Such innocence must bleed, and you look on,
 Poor men, that call you gods on earth, will doubt

To obey your laws, nay, practise to be devils,
 As fearing, if such monstrous sins go on,
 The saints will not be safe in Heaven.

King. You shall, 135
 You shall have justice.

Car. [Aside.] Now to come off were brave.

Enter Servant.

Serv. The masquers, sir, are fled ; their horse, prepar'd

At gate, expected to receive 'em, where
 They quickly mounted : coming so like friends,
 None could suspect their haste, which is secur'd 140

By advantage of the night.

Colum. I answer for 'em all ; 't is stake
 enough

For many lives ; but if that poniard
 Had voice, it would convince they were but all Spectators of my act. And now, if you 145
 Will give your judgments leave, though at the first

Face of this object your cool bloods were frighted,

I can excuse this deed, and call it justice ;
 An act your honours and your office, sir,
 Is bound to build a law upon, for others 160
 To imitate. I have but took his life,
 And punish'd her with mercy, who had both
 Conspir'd to kill the soul of all my fame.
 Read there ; and read an injury as deep
 In my dishonour, as the devil knew 165
 A woman had capacity or malice
 To execute : read there, how you were cozen'd,
 sir.

[*Gives the DUCHESS's letter to the
 KING.*]

Your power affronted, and my faith ; her
 smiles,

A juggling witchcraft to betray, and make
 My love her horse to stalk withal, and catch 160
 Her curled minion.

Car. Is it possible
 The duchess could dissemble so, and forfeit
 Her modesty with you, and to us all ?
 Yet I must pity her. My nephew has Been too severe ; though this affront would call 165

A dying man from prayers, and turn him tiger ;
 There being nothing dearer than our fame,
 Which, if a common man, whose blood has no
 Ingredient of honour, labour to Preserve, a soldier (by his nearest tie 170
 To glory) is, above all others, bound
 To vindicate : — and yet it might have been Less bloody.

Her. Charitable devil !

King. [Reads.] " I pray, my lord, release under your hand, what you dare challenge in 175
 my love or person, as a just forfeit to myself ;
 this act will speak you honourable to my thoughts ; and when you have conquered thus yourself, you may proceed to many victories, and after, with safety of your fame, visit 180

 again. The lost Rosaura."

To this your answer was a free resign ?

Colum. Flatter'd with great opinion of her
 faith,

And my desert of her (with thought that she,
 Who seem'd to weep and chide my easy will 185

To part with her, could not be guilty of

A treason, or apostasy so soon,

But rather meant this a device to make

Me expedite the affairs of war, I sent

That paper, which her wickedness, not justice,

Applied (what I meant trial,) her divorce. 190

I lov'd her so, I dare call heaven to witness,

I knew not whether I lov'd most ; while she,

With him, whose crimson penitence I pro-yok'd, 1

Conspir'd my everlasting infamy : 195

Examine but the circumstance.

Car. 'T is clear ;

This match was made at home, before she sent

That cunning writ, in hope to take him off,

As knowing his impatient soul would scorn

To own a blessing came on crutches to him. 200

It was not well to raise his expectation,

(Had you, sir, no affront ?) to ruin him

With so much scandal and contempt.

King. We have

Too plentiful a circumstance to accuse

You, madam, as the cause of your own sorrows ; 205

But not without an accessory more

Than young Alvarez.

Car. Any other instrument ?

King. Yes ; I am guilty, with herself, and Don

Columbo, though our acts look'd several ways,

That thought a lover might so soon be ran-som'd ; 210

And did exceed the office of a king,

To exercise dominion over hearts,

That owe to the prerogative of Heaven

Their choice or separation : you must, therefore,

When you do kneel for justice and revenge, 215

Madam, consider me a lateral agent

In poor Alvarez' tragedy.

1 Lord. It was your love to Don Columbo,
 sir,

Her. So, so ! the king is charm'd. Do you observe

How, to acquit Columbo, he would draw 220

Himself into the plot. Heaven, is this justice ?

Car. Your judgment is divine in this.

King. And yet

Columbo cannot be secure, and we

Just in his pardon, that durst make so great

And insolent a breach of law and duty. 225

2 Lord. Ha ! will he turn again ?

King. And should we leave

This guilt of blood to Heaven, which cries, and strikes

With loud appeals the palace of eternity ;

1 Brought about.

2 Bought off, transferred.

Yet here is more to charge Columbo than Alvarez' blood, and bids me punish it, 230
Or be no king.

Her. 'Tis come about, my lords.

King. And if I should forgive
His timeless<sup>1</sup> death, I cannot the offence,
That with such boldness struck at me. Has my Indulgence to your merits, which are great, 235
Made me so cheap, your rage could meet no
time

Nor place for your revenge, but where my eyes
Must be affrighted, and affronted with
The bloody execution? This contempt
Of majesty transcends my power to pardon, 240
And you shall feel my anger, sir.

Her. Thou shalt
Have one short prayer more for that.

Colum. Have I,
I' th' progress of my life,
No actions to plead me up deserving
Against this ceremony? 2

Car. Contain yourself. 245
Colum. I must be dumb then. Where is hon-
our,

And gratitude of kings, when they forget Whose hand secur'd their greatness? Take my head off;

Examine then which of your silken lords,
As I have done, will throw himself on dangers;
Like to a floating island move in blood; 251
And where your great defence calls him to stand

A bulwark, upon his bold breast to take
In death, that you may live: — but soldiers are Your valiant fools, whom, when your own securities 255

Are bleeding, you can cherish; but when once
Your state and nerves are knit, not thinking
when

To use their surgery again, you cast
Them off, and let them hang in dusty armor-
ies,

Or make it death to ask for pay.

King. No more; 260
We thought to have put your victory and merits
In balance with Alvarez' death, which, while
Our mercy was to judge, had been your safety;
But the affront to us, made greater by
This boldness to upbraid our royal bounty, 265
Shall tame, or make you nothing.

Lord. Excellent!

Her. The Cardinal is not pleas'd.
Car. Humble yourself
To th' king.

Colum. And beg my life? Let cowards do't
That dare not die; I'll rather have no head 269
Than owe it to his charity.

King. To th' castle with him! —
[COLUMBO is led off by the Guard.]
Madam, I leave you to your grief, and what
The king can recompense to your tears, or hon-
our 272

Of your dead lord, expect.

<sup>1</sup> Untimely.

<sup>2</sup> Formal justice.

ACT IV

[SCENE I.]<sup>3</sup>

Enter two Lords and HERNANDO.

1 Lord. This is the age of wonders.

2 Lord. Wondrous mischiefs!

Her. Among those guards, which some call tutelar angels,

Whose office is to govern provinces,
Is there not one will undertake Navarre?
Hath Heaven forsook us quite?

1 Lord. Columbo at large! 2

2 Lord. And grac'd now more than ever.

1 Lord. He was not pardon'd;
That word was prejudicial to his fame.

Her. But, as the murder done had been a dream

Vanish'd to memory, he's courted as Preserver of his country. With what chains 10
Of magic does this Cardinal hold the king?

2 Lord. What will you say, my lord, if they enchant

The duchess now, and by some impudent art,
Advance a marriage to Columbo yet?

Her. Say! 15

I'll say no woman can be sav'd; nor is't
Fit, indeed, any should pretend to Heaven,
After one such impiety in their sex:
And yet my faith has been so stagger'd, since
The king restor'd Columbo, I'll be now 20
Of no religion.

1 Lord. 'Tis not possible
She can forgive the murder; I observ'd
Her tears.

Her. Why, so did I, my lord;
And if they be not honest, 'tis to be Half damn'd, to look upon a woman weeping. 25
When do you think the Cardinal said his prayers?

2 Lord. I know not.

Her. Heaven forgive my want of charity!
But, if I were to kill him, he should have
No time to pray; his life could be no sacrifice,
Unless his soul went too.

1 Lord. That were too much. 30

Her. When you mean to dispatch him, you may give
Time for confession: they have injur'd me
After another rate.

2 Lord. You are too passionate, cousin.

Enter COLUMBO, Colonels, ALPHONSO, and Courtiers. They pass over the stage.

Her. How the gay men do flutter, to congratulate 35
His gaol delivery! There's one honest man:
What pity 'tis a gallant fellow should
Depend on knaves for his preferment!

1 Lord. Except this cruelty upon Alvarez,
Columbo has no mighty stain upon him; 40
But for his uncle —

Her. If I had a son
Of twelve years old that would not fight with
him,

<sup>3</sup> An apartment in the palace.

And stake his soul against his cardinal's cap,
I would disinherit him. Time has took a lease
But for three lives, I hope; a fourth may see Honesty walk without a crutch.

2 Lord. This is
But air and wildness.

Her. I will see the duchess.
[1 Lord.] You may do well to comfort her;
we must

Attend the king.
Her. Your pleasures. Exit.

Enter KING and CARDINAL.

1 Lord. A man of a brave soul.
2 Lord. The less his safety. — 60
The king and Cardinal in consult!

King. Commend us to the duchess, and employ

What language you think fit and powerful
To reconcile her to some peace. — My lords.

Car. Sir, I possess all for your sacred uses. 65
Exeunt severally.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter Secretary [ANTONIO] and CELINDA.

Ant. Madam, you are the welcom'st lady living.

Cel. To whom, Master Secretary?

Ant. If you have mercy
To pardon so much boldness, I durst say,
To me — I am a gentleman.

Cel. And handsome. 5
Ant. But my lady has Much wanted you.

Cel. Why, Master Secretary?

Ant. You are the prettiest, —

Cel. So!

Ant. The wittiest, —

Cel. So! 10

Ant. The merriest lady i' th' court.

Cel. And I was wish'd, to make the duchess pleasant? 2

Ant. She never had so deep a cause of sorrow;

Her chamber's but a coffin of a larger
Volume, wherein she walks so like a ghost, 15
'T would make you pale to see her.

Cel. Tell her grace
I attend here.

Ant. I shall most willingly. —

A spirited lady! would I had her in my closet!
She is excellent company among the lords.
Sure she has an admirable treble. — Madam. 20

Cel. I do suspect this fellow would be nibbling,

Like some, whose narrow fortunes will not rise
To wear things when the invention's rare and new:

But treading on the heel of pride, they hunt 24
The fashion when 't is crippled, like fell tyrants.
I hope I am not old yet; I had the honour
To be saluted by our Cardinal's nephew
This morning: there's a man!

Re-enter Secretary [ANTONIO].

Ant. I have prevail'd.
Sweet madam, use what eloquence you can
Upon her; and if ever I be useful 30
To your ladyship's service, your least breath commands me. [Exit.]

Enter Duchess.

Duch. Madam, I come to ask you but one question:

If you were in my state, my state of grief,
I mean, an exile from all happiness
Of this world, and almost of Heaven, (for my 35 Affliction is finding out despair,)

What would you think of Don Columbo?

Cel. Madam?

Duch. Whose bloody hand wrought all this misery.

Would you not weep, as I do, and wish rather
An everlasting spring of tears to drown 40
Your sight, than let your eyes be curst to see

The murderer again, and glorious?
So careless of his sin, that he is made

Fit for new paricide, even while his soul 44
Is purpled o'er, and reeks with innocent blood?

But do not, do not answer me; I know
You have so great a spirit, (which I want,

The horror of his fact<sup>3</sup> surprising all
My faculties), you would not let him live:

But I, poor I, must suffer more. There's not 50
One little star in Heaven will look on me,

Unless to choose me out the mark, on whom
It may shoot down some angry influence.

Enter PLACENTIA.

Pla. Madam, here's Don Columbo says he must

Speak with your grace.

Duch. But he must not, I charge you. 55
[Exit PLACENTIA.]

None else wait? — Is this well done,
To triumph in his tyranny? Speak, madam,

Speak but your conscience.

Enter COLUMBO and Secretary [ANTONIO].

Ant. Sir, you must not see her.

Colum. Not see her? Were she cabled up above

The search of bullet or of fire, were she 60
Within her grave, and that the toughest mine

That ever nature teem'd and groan'd withal,
I would force some way to see her. — Do not
fear

I come to court you, madam; y' are not worth
The humblest of my kinder thoughts. I come 65
To show the man you have provok'd, and lost,

And tell you what remains of my revenge. —
Live, but never presume again to marry;

I'll kill the next at th' altar, and quench all
The smiling tapers with his blood: if after, 70
You dare provoke the priest and Heaven so

much
To take another, in thy bed I'll cut him from Thy warm embrace, and throw his heart to ravens.

<sup>2</sup> Merry.

<sup>3</sup> Deed.

Cel. This will appear an unexampled cruelty.

Colum. Your pardon, madam; rage, and my revenge, 75

Not perfect, took away my eyes. You are
A noble lady, this not worth your eye-beam;
One of so slight a making, and so thin,
An autumn leaf is of too great a value
To play, which shall be soonest lost i' th' air. 80
Be pleas'd to own me by some name in your Assurance, I despise to be receiv'd
There; let her witness that I call you mistress;
Honour me to make these pearls your carka-
net. [Gives her a necklace.]

Cel. My lord, you are too humble in your thoughts. 85

Colum. [Aside.] There's no vexation too great to punish her. Exit.

Ant. Now, madam.

Cel. Away, you saucy fellow! — Madam, I Must be excus'd, if I do think more honourably
Than you have cause, of this great lord.

Duch. Why, is not 90
All womankind concern'd to hate what's impious?

Cel. For my part —

Duch. Antonio, is this a woman? 95

Ant. I know not whether she be man or wo-
man;

I should be nimble to find out the experiment.
She look'd with less state when Columbo came.

Duch. Let me entreat your absence. [Aside.]
I am cozen'd in her. — 100

I took you for a modest, honest lady.

Cel. Madam, I scorn any accuser; and Deducting the great title of a duchess,
I shall not need one grain of your dear honour
To me make full weight: if your grace be jealous, 105

I can remove. Exit.

Ant. She is gone.

Duch. Prithee remove My fears of her return. [Exit ANT.] — She is not worth

Considering; my anger's mounted higher. 110
He need not put in caution for my next
Marriage. — Alvarez, I must come to thee,
Thy virgin wife, and widow; but not till
I ha' paid those tragic duties to thy hearse Become my piety and love. But how?
Who shall instruct a way?

Enter PLACENTIA.

Pla. Madam, Don 115
Hernando much desires to speak with you.

Duch. Will not thy own discretion think I am Unfit for visit?

Pla. Please your grace, he brings Something, he says, imports your ear, and love
Of the dead lord, Alvarez.

Duch. Then admit him. [Exit PLACENTIA.] 120

Enter [PLACENTIA with] HERNANDO.

Her. I would speak, madam, to yourself.

Duch. Your absence. [Exit PLACENTIA.]

Her. I know not how your grace will censure so Much boldness, when you know the affairs I come for.

Duch. My servant has prepar'd me to receive it,
If 't concern my dead lord.

Her. Can you name 125

So much of your Alvarez in a breath,
Without one word of your revenge? O, madam,
I come to chide you, and repent my great
Opinion of your virtue, that can walk,
And spend so many hours in naked solitude; 130
As if you thought that no arrears were due
To his death, when you had paid his funeral charges,

Made your eyes red, and wept a handkerchief.
I come to tell you that I saw him bleed;
I, that can challenge nothing in his name 135
And honour, saw his murder'd body warm,
And panting with the labour of his spirits,
Till my amaz'd soul shrunk and hid itself:
While barbarous Columbo grinning stood,
And mock'd the weeping wounds. It is too
much, 140

That you should keep your heart alive so long
After this spectacle, and not revenge it.

Duch. You do not know the business of my
heart,

That censure me so rashly; yet I thank you;
And, if you be Alvarez' friend, dare tell 145
Your confidence, that I despise my life,
But know not how to use it in a service
To speak me his revenger: this will need
No other proof, than that to you, who may
Be sent with cunning to betray me, I 150

Have made this bold confession. I so much Desire to sacrifice to that hovering ghost
Columbo's life, that I am not ambitious
To keep my own two minutes after it.

Her. If you will call me coward, which is equal 155

To think I am a traitor, I forgive it
For this brave resolution, which time
And all the destinies must aid. I beg
That I may kiss your hand for this; and may
The soul of angry honour guide it —

Duch. Whither? 160

Her. To Don Columbo's heart.

Duch. It is too weak, I fear, alone.

Her. Alone? Are you in earnest? Why, will it not

Be a dishonour to your justice, madam,
Another arm should interpose? But that 165
It were a saucy act to mingle with you,
I durst, nay, I am bound in the revenge Of him that's dead, (since the whole world has
interest

In every good man's loss,) to offer it.

Dare you command me, madam?

Duch. Not command; 170

But I should more than honour such a truth
In man, that durst, against so mighty odds, Appear Alvarez' friend, and mine. The Cardinal —

Her. Is for the second course; Columbo must Be first cut up; his ghost must lead the dance: 175

Let him die first.

Duch. But how?

Her. How! with a sword; and, if I undertake it,

I wo' not lose so much of my own honour,
To kill him basely.

Duch. How shall I reward
This infinite service? 'Tis not modesty 176 While now my husband groans beneath his tomb,

And calls me to his marble bed, to promise,
What this great act might well deserve, myself,

If you survive the victor; but if thus
Alvarez' ashes be appeas'd, it must 180
Deserve an honourable memory;
And though Columbo (as he had all power,
And grasp'd the fates) has vow'd to kill the
man

That shall succeed Alvarez —
Her. Tyranny!

Duch. Yet, if ever 185
I entertain a thought of love hereafter,
Hernando from the world shall challenge it;
Till when, my prayers and fortune shall wait
on you.

Her. This is too mighty recompense.
Duch. 'T is all just.

Her. If I outlive Columbo, I must not 190
Expect security at home.

Duch. Thou canst
Not fly where all my fortunes, and my love
Shall not attend to guard thee.

Her. If I die —
Duch. Thy memory 194
Shall have a shrine, the next within my heart,
To my Alvarez.

Her. Once again your hand.
Your cause is so religious, you need not
Strengthen it with your prayers; trust it to me.

Re-enter PLACENTIA, and the CARDINAL.

Pla. Madam, the Cardinal.

Duch. Will you appear?
Her. An he had all the horror of the devil 200
In 's face, I would not baulk him.

He stares upon the CARDINAL in his exit.

Car. [Aside.] What makes Hernando here?
I do not like
They should consult; I'll take no note. — The
king

Fairly salutes your grace; by whose command
I am to tell you, though his will and actions 205
Illimited, stoop not to satisfy

The vulgar inquisition, he is Yet willing to retain a just opinion
With those that are plac'd near him; and although

You look with nature's eye upon yourself, 210
Which needs no perspective to reach, nor art
Of any optic to make greater, what
Your narrow sense applies<sup>1</sup> an injury, (Ourselves still nearest to ourselves,) but there's Another eye that looks abroad, and walks 215
In search of reason, and the weight of things,
With which, if you look on him, you will find
His pardon to Columbo cannot be
So much against his justice, as your erring
Faith would persuade your anger.

<sup>1</sup> Regards.

Duch. Good my lord, 220
Your phrase has too much landscape, and I cannot

Distinguish at this distance you present<sup>2</sup>
The figure perfect; but indeed my eyes
May pray your lordship find excuse, for tears
Have almost made them blind.

Car. Fair peace restore 'em! 225
To bring the object nearer, the king says,
He could not be severe to Don Columbo
Without injustice to his other merits,
Which call more loud for their reward and
honour,
Than you for your revenge; the kingdom
made 230

Happy by those; you only, by the last,
Unfortunate: — nor was it rational,
I speak the king's own language, he should die
For taking one man's breath, without whose
valour

None now had been alive without dishonour. 235
Duch. In my poor understanding, 't is the crown

Of virtue to proceed in its own track,
Not deviate from honour. If you acquit
A man of murder, 'cause he has done brave
Things in the war, you will bring down his val-
our 240

To a crime, nay, to a bawd, if it secure
A rape, and but teach those that deserve well
To sin with greater license. But dispute
Is now too late, my lord; 't is done; and you,
By the good king, in tender of my sorrows, 245
Sent to persuade me 't is unreasonable
That justice should repair me.

Car. You mistake;
For if Columbo's death could make Alvarez
Live, the king had given him up to law,
Your bleeding sacrifice; but when his life 250
Was but another treasure thrown away,
To obey a clamorous statute, it was wisdom
To himself, and common safety, to take off
This killing edge of law, and keep Columbo
To recompense the crime by noble acts, 255
And sorrow, that in time might draw your pity.

Duch. This is a greater tyranny than that Columbo exercis'd; he kill'd my lord;
And you have not the charity to let Me think it worth a punishment.

Car. To that, 260
In my own name, I answer; I condemn,
And urge the bloody guilt against my nephew;
'T was violent and cruel, a black deed;
A deed, whose memory doth make me shudder;
An act, that did betray a tyrannous nature, 265
Which he took up<sup>3</sup> in war, the school of vengeance;
And though the king's compassion spare him
here,

Unless his heart
Weep itself out in penitent tears, —

Duch. This sounds
As you were now a good man.

Car. Does your grace 270
Think I have conscience to allow the murder?

<sup>2</sup> Whether you present.

Although, when it was done, I did obey
The stream of nature, as he was my kinsman,
To plead he might not pay his forfeit life,
Could I do less for one so near my blood? 275
Consider, madam, and be charitable;
Let not this wild injustice make me lose
The character I bear, and reverend habit.
To make you full acquainted with my innocence,
I challenge here my soul, and Heaven to witness, 280

If I had any thought, or knowledge with
My nephew's plot, or person, when he came,
Under the smooth pretence of friend, to violate
Your hospitable laws, and do that act,
Whose frequent mention draws this tear, a
whirlwind 285
Snatch me to endless flames!

Duch. I must believe,
And ask your grace's pardon. I confess
I have not lov'd you since Alvarez' death,
Though we were reconcil'd.

Car. I do not blame
Your jealousy, nor any zeal you had 290
To prosecute revenge against me, madam,
As I then stood suspected, nor can yet
Implore your mercy to Columbo. All
I have to say is, to retain my first
Opinion and credit with your grace; 295
Which you may think I urge not out of fear,
Or ends upon you, (since, I thank the king,
I stand firm on the base of royal favour.)
But for your own sake, and to show I have Compassion of your sufferings.

Duch. You have clear'd 300
A doubt, my lord; and by this fair remonstrance,

Given my sorrow so much truce, to think
That we may meet again, and yet be friends.—
But be not angry, if I still remember
By whom Alvarez died, and weep, and wake 305
Another justice with my prayers.

Car. All thoughts That may advance a better peace dwell with you! Exit.

Duch. How would this cozening statesman
bribe my faith
With flatteries, to think him innocent!
No; if his nephew die, this Cardinal must
not 310

Be long-liv'd. All the prayers of a wrong'd
widow
Make firm Hernando's sword! and my own
hand

Shall have some glory in the next revenge.
I will pretend my brain with grief distracted,
It may gain easy credit; and beside 315
The taking off examination
For great Columbo's death, it makes what act
I do in that believ'd<sup>1</sup> want of my reason, Appear no crime, but my defence.—Look
down,

Soul of my lord, from thy eternal shade, 320
And unto all thy blest companions boast
Thy duchess busy to revenge thy ghost! Exit.

[SCENE III.]<sup>2</sup>

Enter [on one side] COLUMBO and ALPHONSO; [on the other,] HERNANDO and a Colonel.

Colum. Hernando, now I love thee, and do half

Repent the affront my passion threw upon thee.
Her. You will not be too prodigal o' your penitence.

Colum. This makes good thy nobility of birth; 4

Thou may'st be worth my anger and my sword,
If thou dost execute as daringly

As thou provok'st a quarrel. I did think Thy soul a starveling, or asleep.

Her. You'll find it
Active enough to keep your spirit waking;
Which, to exasperate, for yet I think 10

It is not high enough to meet my rage—
Do you smile?

Colum. This noise is worth it.—Gentlemen,
I'm sorry this great soldier has engag'd
Your travail; all his business is to talk.

Her. A little of your lordship's patience, 15
You shall have other sport, and swords that will

Be as nimble 'bout your heart as you can
wish.

'Tis pity more than our two single lives
Should be at stake.

Colum. Make that no scruple, sir.
Her. To him then that survives, if fate allow 20

That difference, I speak, that he may tell
The world, I came not hither on slight anger,
But to revenge my honour, stain'd and trampled
on

By this proud man; when general, he commanded
My absence from the field.

Colum. I do remember, 25
And I'll give your soul now a discharge.

Her. I come
To meet it, if your courage be so fortunate.
But there is more than my own injury
You must account for, sir, if my sword prosper; 30

Whose point and every edge is made more keen
With young Alvarez' blood, in which I had
A noble interest. Does not that sin benumb
Thy arteries, and turn the guilty flowings
To trembling jelly in thy veins? Canst hear Me name that murder, and thy spirits not 35
Struck into air, as thou wert shot by some Engine from Heaven?

Colum. You are the duchess' champion!
Thou hast given me a quarrel now. I grieve
It is determin'd all must fight, and I Shall lose much honour in his fall.

Her. That duchess, 40 (Whom but to mention with thy breath is sacri-
lege,

An orphan of thy making, and condemn'd
By thee to eternal solitude, I come
To vindicate; and while I am killing thee,

<sup>1</sup> Supposed.<sup>2</sup> A retired spot without the city.

By virtue of her prayers sent up for justice, 46
At the same time, in Heaven I am pardon'd
for 't.

Colum. I cannot hear the bravo.

Her. Two words more,
And take your chance. Before you all I must Pronounce that noble lady without knowledge
Or thought of what I undertake for her, 60
Poor soul! she's now at her devotions,
Busy with Heaven, and wearing out the earth
With her stiff knees, and bribing her good angel

With treasures of her eyes, to tell her lord
How much she longs to see him. My attempt 65
Needs no commission from her: were I
A stranger in Navarre, the inborn right
Of every gentleman to Alvarez' loss
Is reason to engage their swords and lives
Against the common enemy of virtue. 60

Colum. Now have you finish'd? I have an instrument

Shall cure this noise, and fly up to thy tongue,
To murder all thy words.

Her. One little knot
Of phlegm, that clogs my stomach, and I ha'
done:—

You have an uncle, call'd a Cardinal, 65
Would he were lurking now about thy heart,
That the same wounds might reach you both,
and send

Your reeling souls together! Now have at
you.

Alph. We must not, sir, be idle.

[They fight; COLUMBO's second
[ALPHONSO], slain.

Her. What think you now of praying?

Colum. Time enough. 70

He kills HERNANDO's second.

Command me to my friend; the scales are even.

I would be merciful, and give you time

Now to consider of the other world;

You'll find your soul benighted presently.

Her. I'll find my way i' the dark.

They fight, and close; COLUMBO gets both the swords, and HER-
NANDO takes up the second's weapon.

Colum. A stumble's dangerous. 75
Now ask thy life.—Ha!

Her. I despise to wear it,
A gift from any but the first bestower.

Colum. I scorn a base advantage.—

COLUMBO throws away one of the swords: they fight; HERNANDO
wounds COLUMBO.—

Ha!

Her. I am now
Out of your debt.

Colum. Thou 'st don't, and I forgive thee.

Give me thy hand; when shall we meet again?

Her. Never, I hope. 81

Colum. I feel life ebb apace: yet I'll look upwards,

And show my face to Heaven. [Dies.]

Her. The matter's done;
I must not stay to bury him. Exit.

ACT V

[SCENE I.]<sup>1</sup>Enter two Lords.

1 Lord. Columbo's death doth much afflict the king.

2 Lord. I thought the Cardinal would have lost his wits

At first, for 's nephew; it drowns all the talk
Of the others that were slain.

1 Lord. We are friends,
I do suspect Hernando had some interest, 5
And knew how their wounds came.

2 Lord. His flight confirms it,
For whom the Cardinal has spread his nets.

1 Lord. He is not so weak to trust himself at home

To his enemy's gripe.

2 Lord. All strikes not me so much
As that the duchess, most oppressed lady, 10
Should be distracted, and before Columbo
Was slain.

1 Lord. But that the Cardinal should be made

Her guardian, is to me above that wonder.

2 Lord. So it pleas'd the king; and she, with that small stock

Of reason left her, is so kind and smooth 15
Upon him.

1 Lord. She's turn'd a child again: a mad-
ness,
That would ha' made her brain and blood boil
high,

In which distemper she might ha' wrought
something—

2 Lord. Had been to purpose.

1 Lord. The Cardinal is cunning; and howe'er 20
His brow does smile, he does suspect Hernando Took fire from her, and waits a time to punish
it.

2 Lord. But what a subject of disgrace and mirth

Hath poor Celinda made herself by pride,

In her belief Columbo was her servant! 25

Her head hath stoop'd much since he died, and
she

Almost ridiculous at court.

Enter CARDINAL, ANTONELLI, and Servant.

1 Lord. The Cardinal

Is come into the garden, now—

Car. Walk off.—[Exeunt Lords.]

It troubles me the duchess by her loss
Of brain, is now beneath my great revenge. 30

She is not capable to feel my anger,

Which, like to unregarded thunder spent

In woods, and lightning aim'd at senseless trees,

Must idly fall, and hurt her not, not to

That sense her guilt deserves: a fatal stroke, 35

Without the knowledge for what crime, to fright her

When she takes leave, and make her tug with
death,

<sup>1</sup> A garden.

Until her soul sweat, is a pigeon's torment,
 And she is sent a babe to the other world.
 Columbo's death will not be satisfied,
 And I but wound her with a two-edg'd feather. 40
 I must do more : I have all opportunity,
 (She by the king now made my charge,) but she's
 So much a turtle, I shall lose by killing her,
 Perhaps do her a pleasure and preferment ; 45
 That must not be.

Enter CELINDA with a parchment.

Anton. [stopping her.] — Is not this she, that would be thought to have been Columbo's mistress? — Madam, his grace is private,
 And would not be disturb'd ; you may displease
 him.

Cel. What will your worship wager that he shall 50
 Be pleas'd again before we part?

Anton. I'll lay this diamond, madam, 'gainst
 a kiss,
 And trust yourself to keep the stakes.

Cel. 'Tis done. [Comes forward.]
Anton. I have long had an appetite to this
 lady ;
 But the lords keep her up so high — this toy 55
 May bring her on.

Car. This interruption tastes not of good manners.

Cel. But where necessity, my lord, compels,
 The boldness may meet pardon, and when you
 Have found my purpose, I may less appear 60 Unmannerly.

Car. To the business.

Cel. It did please
 Your nephew, sir, before his death, to credit me
 With so much honourable favour, I
 Am come to tender to his near'st of blood,
 Yourself, what does remain a debt to him. 65
 Not to delay your grace with circumstance.
 That deed, if you accept, makes you my heir
 Of no contemptible estate. — [Aside.] This way
He reads.

Is only left to tie up scurrile tongues
 And saucy men, that since Columbo's death 70
 Venture to libel on my pride and folly ;
 His greatness and this gift, which I enjoy Still for my life, (beyond which term a kingdom's

Nothing,) will curb the giddy spleens of men
 That live on impudent rhyme, and railing at 75
 Each wandering fame they catch.

Car. Madam, this bounty
 Will bind my gratitude, and care to serve you.

Cel. I am your grace's servant.

Car. Antonelli! — Whisper.
 And when this noble lady visits me,
 Let her not wait. 80

Cel. What think you, my officious sir? His
 grace

Is pleas'd, you may conjecture : I may keep Your gem ; the kiss was never yours.

Anton. Sweet madam —

Cel. Talk if you dare ; you know I must not
 wait ;

And so, farewell for this time. [Exit.] 85

Car. 'Tis in my brain already, and it forms
 Apace — good, excellent revenge, and pleasant!
 She's now within my talons : 't is too cheap
 A satisfaction for Columbo's death,
 Only to kill her by soft charm or force. 90
 I'll rifle first her darling chastity ;
 'T will be after time enough to poison her,
 And she to th' world be thought her own destroyer.

As I will frame the circumstance, this night
 All may be finished : for the colonel, 95
 Her agent in my nephew's death, (whom I Disturb'd at counsel with her,) I may reach him
 Hereafter, and be master of his fate.
 We starve our conscience when we thrive in state. Exeunt.

[SCENE II.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter Secretary [ANTONIO] and PLACENTIA.

Ant. Placentia, we two are only left
 Of all my lady's servants ; let us be true
 To her, and one another ; and be sure,
 When we are at prayers, to curse the Cardinal.
Pla. I pity my sweet lady. 5

Ant. I pity her too, but am a little angry ;
 She might have found another time to lose
 Her wits.

Pla. That I were a man !

Ant. What would'st thou do, Placentia? 10

Pla. I would revenge my lady.

Ant. 'T is better, being a woman ; thou may'st do
 Things that may prosper better, and the fruit
 Be thy own another day.

Pla. Your wit still loves
 To play the wanton.

Ant. 'T is a sad time, Placentia ; 15
 Some pleasure would do well : the truth is, I Am weary of my life, and I would have
 One fit of mirth before I leave the world.

Pla. Do not you blush to talk thus wildly? 20

Ant. 'T is good manners
 To be a little mad after my lady ;
 But I ha' done. Who is with her now?

Pla. Madam Valeria.

Ant. Not Celinda? There's a lady for my humour!

A pretty book of flesh and blood, and well 25
 Bound up, in a fair letter too. Would I
 Had her with all the errata!

Pla. She has not
 An honourable fame.

Ant. Her fame! that's nothing ;
 A little stain ; her wealth will fetch again
 The colour, and bring honour into her cheeks 30
 As fresh ; —

If she were mine, and I had her exchequer,
 I know the way to make her honest ;
 Honest to th' touch, the test, and the last trial.

Pla. How, prithee? 35

Ant. Why,
 First I would marry her, that's a verb material ;
 Then I would print her with an index
Expurgatorius ; a table drawn

<sup>1</sup> A room in the Duchess's house.

Of her court heresies ; and when she's read, 40
Cum privilegio, who dares call her whore ?

Pla. I'll leave you, if you talk thus.

Ant. I ha' done ;

Placentia, thou may'st be better company
 After another progress ; and now tell me,
 Didst ever hear of such a patient madness 45
 As my lady is possess with ? She has rav'd
 But twice : — an she would fright the Cardinal,
 Or at a supper if she did but poison him,
 It were a frenzy I could bear withal.
 She calls him her dear governor. —

Enter HERNANDO disguised, having a letter.

Pla. Who is this ? 50

Her. Her secretary ! — Sir,
 Here is a letter, if it may have so
 Much happiness to kiss her grace's hand.

Ant. From whom ?

Her. That's not in your commission, sir,
 To ask, or mine to satisfy ; she will want 55
 No understanding when she reads.

Ant. Alas !

Under your favour, sir, you are mistaken ;
 Her grace did never more want understanding.

Her. How ?

Ant. Have you not heard ? Her skull is 60 broken, sir,

And many pieces taken out ; she's mad.

Her. The sad fame of her distraction
 Has too much truth, it seems.

Pla. If please you, sir,
 To expect awhile, I will present the letter.

Her. Pray do. — Exit PLACENTIA. 65

How long has she been thus distemper'd, sir ?
Ant. Before the Cardinal came to govern
 here,

Who, for that reason, by the king was made
 Her guardian. We are now at his devotion.

Her. A lamb given up to a tiger ! May diseases 70

Soon eat him through his heart !

Ant. Your pardon, sir.

I love that voice ; I know it too a little.

Are not you — be not angry, noble sir,

I can with ease be ignorant again,

And think you are another man ; but if 75

You be that valiant gentleman they call —

Her. Whom ? what ?

Ant. That kill'd — I would not name him, if I thought

You were not pleas'd to be that very gentleman.

Her. Am I betray'd ?

Ant. The devil sha' not 80

Betray you here : kill me, and I will take

My death you are the noble colonel.

We are all bound to you for the general's
 death,

Valiant Hernando ! When my lady knows

You are here, I hope 't will fetch her wits,
 again. 85

But do not talk too loud ; we are not all

Honest<sup>1</sup> i' th' house ; some are the Cardinal's creatures.

Her. Thou wert faithful to thy lady. I am glad

<sup>1</sup> Loyal (to the Duchess).

'Tis night. But tell me how the churchman uses

The duchess. 90

Enter ANTONELLI.

Ant. He carries angels in his tongue and face,
 but I

Suspect his heart : this is one of his spawns. —
 Signor Antonelli.

Anton. Honest Antonio !

Ant. And how, and how — a friend of mine
 — where is 95

The Cardinal's grace ?

Her. [Aside.] That will be never answered.

Anton. He means to sup here with the duchess.

Ant. Will he ?

Anton. We'll have the charming bottles at my chamber. 100

Bring that gentleman ; we'll be mighty merry.

Her. [Aside.] I may disturb your jollity.

Anton. Farewell, sweet — [Exit.]

Ant. Dear Antonelli ! — A round pox confound you !

This is court rhetoric at the back-stairs. 105

Enter PLACENTIA.

Pla. Do you know this gentleman ?

Ant. Not I.

Pla. My lady presently dismiss Valeria,
 And bade me bring him to her bed-chamber.

Ant. The gentleman has an honest face.

Pla. Her words 110

Fell from her with some evenness and joy. —

Her grace desires your presence.

Her. I'll attend her.

Exit [with PLACENTIA].

Ant. I would this soldier had the Cardinal

Upon a promontory, with what a spring

The churchman would leap down ! It were a spectacle 115

Most rare, to see him topple from the precipice,

And souse in the salt water with a noise

To stun the fishes ; and if he fell into

A net, what wonder would the simple sea-gulls

Have, to draw up the o'ergrown lobster,<sup>2</sup> 120

So ready boil'd ! He shall have my good wishes.

This colonel's coming may be lucky ; I

Will be sure none shall interrupt 'em.

Enter CELINDA.

Cel.

Is

Her grace at opportunity ?

Ant. No, sweet madam ;

She is asleep, her gentlewoman says. 125

Cel. My business is but visit. I'll expect.<sup>3</sup>

Ant. That must not be, although I like your company.

Cel. You are grown rich, Master Secretary.

Ant. I, madam ? Alas !

Cel. I hear you are upon another purchase. 130

Ant. I upon a purchase !

Cel. If you want any sum —

<sup>2</sup> Referring, of course, to the color of the Cardinal's robes. <sup>3</sup> Wait.

Ant. If I could purchase your sweet favour,
madam.

Cel. You shall command me, and my fortune, sir.

Ant. [Aside.] How's this? 125

Cel. I have observ'd you, sir, a staid

And prudent gentleman — and I shall want —
Ant. Not me?

Cel. A father for some infant: he has credit
I' th' world. — [Aside.] I am not the first east
lady 140

Has married a secretary.

Ant. Shall I wait upon you?

Cel. Whither?

Ant. Any whither.

Cel. I may chance lead you then — 145

Ant. I shall be honour'd to obey. My blood
Is up, and in this humour I'm for anything.

Cel. Well, sir, I'll try your manhood.

Ant. 'Tis my happiness;

You cannot please me better.

Cel. [Aside.] This was struck

I' the opportunity.

Ant. I am made for ever. 160
[Exit, following her.]

[SCENE III.]<sup>1</sup>

Enter HERNANDO and DUCHESS.

Her. Dear madam, do not weep.

Duch. Y' are very welcome;

I ha' done; I wo' not shed a tear more

Till I meet Alvarez, then I'll weep for joy.

He was a fine young gentleman, and sung sweetly; 6

As you had heard him but the night before

We were married, you would ha' sworn he had been

A swan, and sung his own sad epitaph.

But we'll talk o' the Cardinal.

Her. Would his death

Might ransom your fair sense! he should not live 12

To triumph in the loss. Beshrew my manhood,
But I begin to melt.

Duch. I pray, sir, tell me, —

For I can understand, although they say

I have lost my wits; but they are safe enough,

And I shall have 'em when the Cardinal dies; —

Who had a letter from his nephew, too, 16

Since he was slain?

Her. From whence?

Duch. I know not where he is. But in some bower

Within a garden he is making chaplets,

And means to send me one; but I'll not take it;

I have flowers enough, I thank him, while I live.

Her. But do you love your governor? 22

Duch. Yes, but I'll never marry him; I am promis'd

Already.

Her. To whom, madam?

Duch. Do not you

Blush when you ask me that? Must not you be 28

My husband? I know why, but that's a secret.

Indeed, if you believe me, I do love

No man alive so well as you: the Cardinal

Shall never know 't; he'll kill us both; and yet

He says he loves me dearly, and has promis'd 30

To make me well again; but I'm afraid,

One time or other, he will give me poison.

Her. Prevent him, madam, and take nothing
from him.

Duch. Why, do you think 't will hurt me?

Her. It will kill you.

Duch. I shall but die, and meet my dearlov'd lord, 36

Whom, when I have kist, I'll come again and work

A bracelet of my hair for you to carry him,

When you are going to Heaven; the posy
shall

Be my own name, in little tears, that I

Will weep next winter, which congeal'd i' th'
frost. 40

Will show like seed-pearl. You'll deliver it?

I know he'll love, and wear it for my sake.

Her. She is quite lost.

Duch. I pray give me, sir, your pardon:

I know I talk not wisely; but if you had

The burthen of my sorrow, you would miss 46

Sometimes your better reason. Now I'm well;

What will you do when the Cardinal comes?

He must not see you for the world.

Her. He sha' not;

I'll take my leave before he come.

Duch. Nay, stay;

I shall have no friend left me when you go. 50

He will but sup; he sha' not stay to lie with me.

I have the picture of my lord abed;

Three are too much this weather.

Enter PLACENTIA.

Pla. Madam, the Cardinal.

Her. He shall sup with the devil.

Duch. I dare not stay;

The red cock <sup>2</sup> will be angry. I'll come again. 56

Exeunt [DUCHESS and PLACENTIA.]

Her. This sorrow is no fable. Now I find

My curiosity is sadly satisfied. —

Ha! if the duchess in her straggled wits

Let fall words to betray me to the Cardinal,

The panther will not leap more fierce to meet 60

His prey, when a long want of food hath parch'd

His starved maw, than he to print his rage,

And tear my heart-strings. Everything is fatal;

And yet she talk'd sometimes with chain of

sense,

And said she lov'd me. Ha! they come not yet.

I have a sword about me, and I left 66

My own security to visit death.

Yet I may pause a little, and consider

Which way does lead me to 't most honourably.

Does not the chamber that I walk in tremble?

What will become of her, and me, and all 71

The world in one small hour? I do not think

Ever to see the day again; the wings

Of night spread o'er me like a sable hearse-cloth;

The stars are all close mourners too; but I 76

Must not alone to the cold silent grave,

<sup>1</sup> Another room in the same.

<sup>2</sup> The Cardinal.

I must not. — If thou canst, Alvarez, open
That ebon curtain, and behold the man,
When the world's justice fails, shall right thy
ashes,
And feed their thirst with blood! Thy duchess is Almost a ghost already, and doth wear
Her body like an useless upper garment,
The trim and fashion of it lost. — Ha!

Re-enter PLACENTIA.

Pla. You need not doubt me, sir. — My lady prays

You would not think it long; she in my ear
Commanded me to tell you, that when last
She drank, she had happy wishes to your health.
Her. And did the Cardinal pledge it?

Pla. He was not
Invited to 't, nor must he know you are here.

Her. What do they talk of, prithee?
Pla. His grace is very pleasant

And kind to her; but her returns<sup>1</sup> are after
The sad condition of her sense, sometimes Unjoined.

Her. They have music.
Pla. A lute only,

His grace prepar'd; they say, the best of Italy,
That waits upon my lord.

Her. He thinks the duchess
Is stung with a tarantula.

Pla. Your pardon;
My duty is expected. Exit.

Her. Gentle lady! —
A voice too!

Song within.

Strep. Come, my Daphne, come away,
We do waste the crystal day;

'Tis Strephon calls. Dap. What says my love?
Strep. Come, follow to the myrtle grove,
Where Venus shall prepare

New chaplets for thy hair.
Dap. Were I shut up within a tree,
I'd rend my bark to follow thee.

Strep. My shepherdess, make haste,
The minutes slide too fast.

Dap. In those cooler shades will I,
Blind as Cupid, kiss thine eye.

Strep. In thy bosom then I'll stay;
In such warm snow who would not lose his
way?

Chor. We'll laugh, and leave the world behind,
And gods themselves that see,

Shall envy thee and me,
But never find

Such joys, when they embrace a deity.

Her. If at this distance I distinguish, 'tis not Church music; and the air's wanton, and no anthem

Sung to 't, but some strange ode of love and kisses.

What should this mean? — Ha? he is coming hither. [Draws his sword.]

I am betray'd; he marches in her hand.
I'll trust a little more; mute as the arras,

My sword and I here.

He [conceals himself behind the arras, and] observes.

<sup>1</sup> Replies.

Enter CARDINAL, DUCHESS, ANTONELLI, and Attendants.

Car. Wait you in the first chamber, and let none

Presume to interrupt us. —
[Exeunt [ANTONELLI and Attendants.]

She is pleasant;
Now for some art, to poison all her innocence.

Duch. I do not like the Cardinal's humour; he Little suspects what guest is in my chamber.

Car. Now, madam, you are safe.

[Embraces her.]
Duch. How means your lordship?

Car. Safe in my arms, sweet duchess.

Duch. Do not hurt me.

Car. Not for the treasures of the world! You
are

My pretty charge. Had I as many lives
As I have careful thoughts to do you service,
I should think all a happy forfeit, to Delight your grace one minute; 't is a Heaven
To see you smile.

Duch. What kindness call you this?
Car. It cannot want a name while you preserve

So plentiful a sweetness; it is love.

Duch. Of me? How shall I know 't, my lord?
Car. By this, and this, swift messengers to whisper

Our hearts to one another. Kisses her.

Duch. Pray, do you come a wooing?
Car. Yes, sweet madam;

You cannot be so cruel to deny me.

Duch. What, my lord?
Car. Another kiss.

Duch. Can you
Dispense with this, my lord? — [Aside.] Alas; I
fear

Hernando is asleep, or vanish'd from me.
Car. [Aside.] I have mock'd my blood into a flame; and what

My angry soul had form'd for my revenge,
Is now the object of my amorous sense.

I have took a strong enchantment from her lips,
And fear I shall forgive Columbo's death,

If she consent to my embrace. — Come, madam.

Duch. Whither, my lord?
Car. But to your bed or couch,

Where, if you will be kind, and but allow Yourself a knowledge, love, whose shape and raptures

Wise poets have but glorified in dreams,
Shall make your chamber his eternal palace;

And with such active and essential streams
Of new delights glide o'er your bosom, you

Shall wonder to what unknown world you are
By some blest change translated. Why d' ye pause,

And look so wild? Will you deny your governor?

Duch. How came you by that cloven foot?
Car. Your fancy

Would turn a traitor to your happiness.

I am your friend; you must be kind.

Duch. Unhand me,
Or I'll cry out a rape.

Car. You wo' not, sure?

Duch. I have been cozen'd with Hernando's shadow;
Here 's none but Heaven to hear me.— Help! a rape! <sup>170</sup>

Car. Are you so good at understanding?

Then,

I must use other argument.

He forces her. [HERNANDO rushes from the arras.]

Her. Go to, Cardinal.

Strikes him; exit DUCHESS.

Car. Hernando? Murder! treason! help!

Her. An army sha' not rescue thee. Your blood <sup>175</sup>

Is much inflam'd; I have brought a lancet wi' me

Shall open your hot veins, and cool your fever.— To vex thy parting soul, it was the same Engine that pierc'd <sup>1</sup> Columbo's heart.

Car. Help! murder! [Stabs him.]

Enter ANTONELLI and Servants.

Anton. Some ring the bell, 'twill raise the court;

My lord is murder'd! 'Tis Hernando.

The bell rings.

Her. I'll make you all some sport.— [Stabs himself.]— So; now we are even.

Where is the duchess? I would take my leave Of her, and then bequeath my curse among you.

He falls.

Enter KING, DUCHESS, VALERIA, Lords, and Guard.

King. How come these bloody objects? <sup>185</sup>

Her. With a trick my sword found out. I hope he 's paid.

1 Lord. [Aside.] I hope so too.— A surgeon For my lord Cardinal!

King. Hernando?

Duch. Justice! oh, justice, sir, against a ravisher! <sup>190</sup>

Her. Sir, I ha' done you service.

King. A bloody service.

Her. 'Tis pure scarlet.

Enter Surgeon.

Car. [Aside.] After such care to perfect my revenge,

Thus banded out o' th' world by a woman's plot!

Her. I have preserv'd the duchess from a rape. <sup>195</sup>

Good night to me and all the world for ever. <sup>Dies.</sup>

King. So impious!

Duch. 'Tis most true; Alvarez' blood Is now reveng'd; I find my brain return, And every straggling sense repairing home. <sup>200</sup>

Car. I have deserv'd you should turn from me, sir,

My life hath been prodigiously wicked; My blood is now the kingdom's balm. Oh, sir, I have abus'd your ear, your trust, your people,

1 Q. pinc'd.

And my own sacred office; my conscience <sup>205</sup> Feels now the sting. Oh, show your charity, And with your pardon, like a cool soft gale, Fan my poor sweating soul, that wanders through Unhabitable climes, and parched deserts. But I am lost, if the great world forgive me, <sup>210</sup> Unless I find your mercy for a crime

You know not, madam, yet, against your life, I must confess, more than my black intents Upon your honour; you 're already poison'd.

King. By whom? <sup>215</sup>

Car. By me,

In the revenge I ow'd Columbo's loss; With your last meat was mixt a poison, that By subtle, and by sure degrees, must let In death.

King. Look to the duchess, our physicians!

Car. Stay; <sup>221</sup>

I will deserve her mercy, though I cannot Call back the deed. In proof of my repentance,

If the last breath of a now dying man May gain your charity and belief, receive <sup>225</sup>

This ivory box; in it an antidote, 'Bove that they boast the great magistral medicine:

That powder, mixt with wine, by a most rare And quick access to the heart, will fortify it

Against the rage of the most nimble poison. <sup>230</sup> I am not worthy to present her with it.

Oh, take it, and preserve her innocent life.

1 Lord. Strange, he should have a good thing in such readiness.

Car. 'Tis that, which in my jealousy and state,

Trusting to false predictions of my birth, <sup>235</sup>

That I should die by poison, I preserv'd For my own safety; wonder not, I made

That my companion was to be my refuge.

Enter Servant with a bowl of wine.

1 Lord. Here 's some touch of grace.

Car. In greater proof of my pure thoughts, I take <sup>240</sup>

This first, and with my dying breath confirm My penitence; it may benefit her life,

But not my wounds. [He drinks.] Oh, hasten to preserve her;

And though I merit not her pardon, let not Her fair soul be divorc'd. <sup>245</sup>

[The DUCHESS takes the bowl and drinks.]

King. This is some charity; may it prosper, madam!

Val. How does your grace?

Duch. And must I owe my life to him, whose death

Was my ambition? Take this free acknowledgment;

I had intent, this night, with my own hand <sup>250</sup> To be Alvarez' justicer.

King. You were mad,

And thought past apprehension of revenge.

Duch. That shape I did usurp, great sir, to <sup>give</sup>

My heart more freedom and defence; but when Hernando came to visit me, I thought <sup>255</sup>

I might defer my execution;

Which his own rage suppli'd without my guilt,
And when his lust grew high, met with his blood.

1 Lord. The Cardinal smiles.

Car. Now my revenge has met
With you, nimble duchess! I have took <sup>260</sup>
A shape <sup>1</sup> to give my act more freedom too,
And now I am sure she 's poison'd with that dose
I gave her last.

King. Thou'rt not so horrid?

Duch. Ha! some cordial.

Car. Alas, no preservative
Hath wings to overtake it; were her heart <sup>265</sup>
Lock'd in a quarry, it would search and kill
Before the aids can reach it. I am sure
You sha' not now laugh at me.

King. How come you by that poison?

Car. I prepar'd it,
Resolving, when I had enjoy'd her, which <sup>270</sup>
The colonel prevented, by some art
To make her take it, and by death conclude
My last revenge. You have the fatal story.

King. This is so great a wickedness, it will Exceed belief.

Car. I knew I could not live. <sup>275</sup>

Surg. Your wounds, sir, were not desperate.

Car. Not mortal? Ha! were they not mortal?

Surg. If I have skill in surgery.

Car. Then I have caught myself in my own engine.

2 Lord. It was your fate, you said, to die by poison. <sup>280</sup>

Car. That was my own prediction, to abuse
Your faith; no human art can now resist it:
I feel it knocking at the seat of life;
It must come in; I have wrackt all my own
To try your charities: now it would be rare, <sup>285</sup>
If you but waft me with a little prayer;
My wings that flag may catch the wind; but <sup>tis</sup>

In vain, the mist is risen, and there 's none
To steer my wand'ring bark. Dies.

1 Lord. He 's dead.

King. With him

Die all deceived trust.

2 Lord. This was a strange <sup>290</sup>

Impiety.

King. When men
Of gifts and sacred function once decline
From virtue, their ill deeds transcend example.

Duch. The minute 's come that I must take my leave, too.

<sup>1</sup> Disguise.

Your hand, great sir; and though you be a king, <sup>295</sup>

We may exchange forgiveness. Heaven forgive,
And all the world! I come, I come, Alvarez. Dies.

King. Dispose their bodies for becoming funeral.

How much are kings abus'd by those they take
To royal grace, whom, when they cherish most
By nice indulgence, they do often arm <sup>301</sup> Against themselves! from whence this maxim springs:

None have more need of perspectives <sup>2</sup> than kings. Exeunt.

EPILOGUE

Within. Master Pollard! Where 's Master
Pollard, for the epilogue?

He is thrust upon the stage, and falls.

Epi. [rising.] I am coming to you, gentlemen; the poet

Has help'd me thus far on my way, but I 'll
Be even with him: the play is a tragedy,
The first that ever he compos'd for us, <sup>5</sup>
Wherein he thinks he has done prettily,

Enter Servant.

And I am sensible. — I prithee look,
Is nothing out of joint? Has he broke nothing?

Serv. No, sir, I hope.

Epi. Yes, he has broke his epilogue all to pieces. <sup>10</sup>

Canst thou put it together again?

Serv. Not I, sir.

Epi. Nor I; prithee be gone. [Exit Serv.] —
Hum! — Master poet,

I have a teeming mind to be reveng'd. —
You may assist, and not be seen in 't now, <sup>15</sup>
If you please, gentlemen, for I do know
He listens to the issue of his cause;
But blister not your hands in his applause;
Your private smile, your nod, or hem! to tell
My fellows that you like the business well; <sup>20</sup>
And when, without a clap, you go away,
I 'll drink a small-beer health to his second day;
And break his heart, or make him swear and
rage

He 'll write no more for the unhappy stage.
But that 's too much; so we should lose; faith,
shew it, <sup>25</sup>

And if you like his play, 't 's as well he knew
it.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON THE PLAYS

ENDYMION

Endymion was published in 1591, and the title-page states that it had been played "before the Queenes Maiestie at Greenwich on Candlemas day at night, by the Chyldren of Paules." It is fairly certain that this performance took place on Feb. 2, 1586. The present text is based on Bond's reprint of the quarto of 1591, with slight additions from the version included by Blount in his Six Court Comedies, 1632. Like most of Lyly's plays, Endymion is an allegory of the court, with a mythological basis. Very little, however, is here borrowed from the myth of the Moon-goddess and her lover, and the plot is evidently invented with a view to carrying contemporary allusions. Beginning with Halpin's paper in 1848, many attempts have been made to read the riddle, the latest and most ingenious being that of M. Feuillerat, who identifies Cynthia with Elizabeth, Tellus with Mary of Scots, and Endymion with her son, James VI. The credit of having disproved the Endymion-Leicester identification is shared with M. Feuillerat by Dr. P. W. Long, who seeks to read the play as mainly an allegory of Heavenly Beauty (Cynthia) and Earthly Beauty (Tellus), an interpretation perhaps not wholly incompatible with the more personal solution.

THE OLD WIVES TALE

The Old Wife's Tale, as the title should appear in modern spelling (the reference being, of course, to Madge), was first published in 1595, and on this quarto, as reprinted by Gummere, the present text is based. The precise date of production has not been definitely ascertained, but it was probably not far from 1590. Source, in the usual sense of the term, the play can hardly be said to have; it is a medley of a dozen themes from current English folk-tales. Realistic in diction, romantic in subject-matter, the play was a notable innovation in its day; and through the peculiar irony of the satire on romance, Peele introduced a new and subtler form of humor into English comedy. Both in its main theme, and in its use of the induction, this drama is an interesting forerunner of The Knight of the Burning Pestle.

FRIAR BACON AND FRIAR BUNGAY

This play was first printed in quarto in 1594, and that edition (Q<sub>1</sub>), as printed by Collins and Gayley, forms the basis of the present text. The existence of a second quarto, said to have been issued in 1599, has been rendered highly doubtful by Gayley. Later editions appeared in 1630 (Q<sub>2</sub>) and 1655 (Q<sub>3</sub>). The date of production was probably 1589-90. That part of the plot dealing with the marvelous exploits of Friar Bacon is drawn from The Famous Historie of Friar Bacon, a late sixteenth-century account of the legends that had gathered round the name of the Oxford Franciscan, Roger Bacon (born 1214). The love story is Greene's own. It seems probable that this comedy was conceived as a foil to Marlowe's tragedy of Doctor Faustus, some of the scenes approaching an actual parody, and stress being laid on the superiority of the English to the German necromancer.

TAMBURLAINE

Both parts of Tamburlaine were entered in the Stationers' Register on Aug. 14, 1590, and they appeared together in octavo in 1590, and again in 1592. The alleged existence of editions of 1593, 1597, and 1600 is unsupported by evidence; and the third edition seems to be that of 1605 (part i.) and 1606 (part ii.), printed from the first. The issue of 1590 is the basis of the present text. The first part of the play was probably produced three years before, in 1587, and the second part in the following year. All the early editions are anonymous, nor does there survive any pre-Restoration statement as to the authorship; yet so convincing is the internal evidence that the ascription to Marlowe may be regarded as indubitable.

The main source of part i. is Fortescue's Foreste, 1571, a translation of Pedro Mexia's Silva de varia lecion, 1543. Additional details were derived from The Notable History of the Saracens by Thomas Newton, 1575, and from Petrus Perondinus, 1553. The title-rôle was first acted by the gigantic Edward Alleyn.

DOCTOR FAUSTUS

Allusions to contemporary events in the Low Countries fix the limits for the date of Doctor Faustus as 1585 and 1590; and the evidence of style places it after Tamburlaine. A ballad which seems to be inspired by the play was licensed in February, 1589, so that it is generally agreed that the first production of the play fell in the winter of 1588-89. "A booke called the plate of Doctor Faustus" was entered in the Stationers' Register on Jan. 7, 1601, but if an edition was published in that year, no copy has survived. The earliest extant edition is that of 1604 (Q<sub>1</sub>), on which the present text is based. This version was reprinted in 1609 and 1611; and in 1616 appeared an enlarged form, followed in the later quartos of 1619, 1620, 1624, and 1631. An edition issued in 1683 has many additions and excisions, but none with any claim to authority. The question of the authorship of the amplifications in the quarto of 1616 is still under discussion; but recent opinion tends to the view that, except for a few scattered lines, the additions may well be the work of William Birde and Samuel Rowley, engaged by Henslowe in 1602 for this purpose. Marlowe's knowledge of the Faust legend is derived from the German Faustbuch, published at Frankfurt by Johann Spies in 1687, which he probably knew through an English translation.

THE JEW OF MALTA

The earliest mention of this play occurs in Henslowe's Diary, where a performance is noted as taking place on February 26, 1592, and it is implied that the tragedy was not then new. Its composition is conjecturally placed about 1590. On May 17, 1594, it was entered on the Stationers' Register, but no edition has come down to us earlier than a corrupt quarto of 1633, which is thus our sole authority for the text. As to the source from which Marlowe drew his material, nothing definite is known. Kellner (Englische Studien, x. 80) has elaborated a parallel between the career of Marlowe's hero and that of a sixteenth-century Portuguese Jew, Michesius, who is mentioned by a number of historians; but such accounts as have been found could have furnished only suggestions.

This play was one of the most popular on the Elizabethan stage, Henslowe recording thirty-six performances before June 21, 1596.

EDWARD II

When The Troublesom Reign and Lamentable Death of Edward the Second was entered in the Stationers' Register on July 6, 1593, the play had been already on the stage for some time; and it is probable that it was first produced in 1591 or 1592. No copy issued in 1593 is extant, and the earliest surviving quarto belongs to 1594. On this, the best of the early prints, the present text is based. Other editions followed in 1598, 1612, and 1622. Marlowe's main source for the historical basis of the play was Holinshed, Fabyan's and Stowe's Chronicles having also supplied some minor details. Chronological accuracy is often disregarded, yet in its main lines the action is substantially faithful to history. The play is Marlowe's ripest production, and we are fortunate in having the text preserved in a purer state than that of any of his other plays.

In the four plays by Marlowe, Tucker Brooke's reprints of the early editions have been used.

THE SPANISH TRAGEDY

The most definite indication of the date of this, one of the most popular of all Elizabethan plays, is found in an allusion in the Induction to Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair (1614), where it seems to be implied that The Spanish Tragedy was then twenty-five or thirty years old. This gives us the years 1584-89 as limits; and the absence of any reference to the Armada, in a play laid in Spain, has led critics to place it before 1588. The year 1586 may, perhaps, be fairly conjectured as coming within a year of the date of composition. In 1592 it was being successfully performed; and on October 6 of that year it was entered for publication. The first edition has disappeared entirely; and the earliest extant is an undated quarto in the British Museum. Other quartos appeared in 1594 and 1599; and in the edition of 1602 are first found the additions made to the play by Ben Jonson, and included in the later quartos of 1610, 1615, 1618, 1623, and 1633. The present text is based on the B. M. quarto for Kyd's part of the play, and on that of 1602 for the additions, which are pointed out in the foot-notes; and I have availed myself of the collations of both Manly and Boas. All the early editions are anonymous; and the ascription of the play to Kyd is made on the authority of a passage in Heywood's Apology for Actors, 1612.

BUSSY D'AMBOIS

The first quarto of Bussy D'Ambois appeared in 1607, and a second in 1608. In 1641 a third quarto appeared, which claimed to be "much corrected and amended by the author before his death," and this was reissued in 1646 and 1657. The present text is based on Boas's reprint of the quarto of 1641. The date of the production of the play is uncertain. Certain entries in Henslowe's Diary point to 1598, but if the play was on the stage as early as this, it must have been revised before its publication in 1607. Bussy D'Ambois belongs to the group of Chapman's plays dealing with almost contemporary French politics. D'Ambois himself was born in 1549, and was murdered by Monsoreau's retainers in 1579. The earliest extant accounts of his career are later in date than the play, and the precise sources of Chapman's information have not yet been found. But from the later descriptions it is clear that the action of the play, and the view given of the hero's character, are substantially historical.

EVERY MAN IN HIS HUMOUR

This play, the first example of the "comedy of humours," was performed in 1598 with great success. It was published in quarto in 1601, and in this version the characters bear Italian names, and the scene is laid in Italy. It was revised about 1606, and this second version, with the names and scene made English and with many other changes, was published in the folio of 1616. The present text is based directly on the folio. The plot, which seems to have been entirely of Jonson's invention, is constructed with a view to those classical standards of comedy, which Jonson sought to uphold against the prevailing romantic license.

SEJANUS, HIS FALL

Sejanus was first performed in 1603, but, as Jonson admits, failed to please the audience. It was published in 1605, and again in the folio of 1616. On this latter the present text is based. It is not necessary to discuss the sources of this impressive tragedy, since Jonson has supplied us in his ample foot-notes with documentary evidence for nearly every fact in the play. These notes have been reproduced in the present edition, through the first scene, which is probably as far as the modern reader will care to study them. The delineation of Tiberius is one of the most successful attempts in our literature to recreate a highly complex historical character.

VOLPONE, OR THE FOX

Volpone was performed in 1605 or 1606 at the Globe theatre and at both Oxford and Cambridge, and in 1607 was printed in quarto. It was included in the folio of 1616, on which the present text is based. The main plot is founded on an episode in the Satiricon of Petronius Arbitrator; but the parts of Celia and of Sir Politic and Lady Would-be are of Jonson's own invention. The song, "Drink to me only with thine eyes," is practically a translation from Philostratus, and "Come, my Celia" is imitated from Catullus. The comedy is a terrible satire on some of the most sordid aspects of human nature, and the superb skill with which it is constructed barely suffices to counteract the depressing effect of the types of character it displays.

THE ALCHEMIST

The Alchemist, which may, perhaps, be regarded as Jonson's supreme masterpiece in comedy, was performed in 1610, and published in quarto in 1612. The present text is based on that of the folio of 1616. It has been frequently stated that for the plot of this play Jonson was indebted to Plautus, but the borrowing is very slight. In the Mostellaria there is a scene which might have suggested the opening dialogue of The Alchemist, and another which bears a slight resemblance to Face's attempt to hoodwink his master in V. i. In the Poenulus, a man speaks Punic, and is misunderstood somewhat as Surly's Spanish is misunderstood in IV. iii. But the plot as a whole is Jonson's own, and the alchemical and astrological matter is drawn from a wide acquaintance with current treatises on these subjects. Attempts have been made to identify Subtle and Face with the famous Dee and Kelley, but identification is much too strong a word. Hathaway has pointed out a more striking correspondence with the activities of Simon Forman, a notorious quack of Jonson's day. The Alchemist has been credited with a considerable effectiveness in clearing London of the type of impostors which it ridicules and exposes so trenchantly and amusingly.

THE SHOEMAKERS' HOLIDAY

This, the first of Dekker's comedies, was acted in 1599, and printed in the following year. On the text of this quarto, as reprinted by Warnke and Proescholdt, the present text is based. The story of the partly historical Simon Eyre was found by Dekker in one of the tales in Thomas Deloney's Gentle Craft, 1597; but the main interest of the play lies in its picture of London tradespeople in the author's own day, and for this Dekker needed no literary source.

THE HONEST WHORE

From a passage in Henslowe's Diary it appears that Middleton had some share in the first part of The Honest Whore, but it is not supposed that he wrote any considerable portion of it. The second part is wholly Dekker's, and is generally regarded as superior to the first. The first edition of part i. appeared in 1604, of part ii. in 1630. Pearson's reprint, on which the present text is based, follows the 1605 quarto of part i. and the 1630 of part ii. A copy of the 1635 quarto of the double play has been used to check Pearson's text. No source of the plot has been discovered. The play is a highly characteristic product of the time, both in its picture of the vices of the city, and in its sound and straightforward, if somewhat coarse, handling of the moral issues involved. The character of Friscobaldo, in part ii., afforded Hazlitt the theme for what he himself justly regarded as one of his finest pieces of critical interpretation.

THE MALCONTENT

The Malcontent was first issued in 1604; and in the same year a second quarto appeared with the title-page, "The Malcontent. Augmented by Marston. With the Additions played by the Kings Maiesties servants. Written by Ihon Webster. 1604. At London Printed by V. S. for William Aspley, and are to be sold at his shop in Paules Church-yard." The title-page of the first edition gives John Marston as author; the date and publisher are the same. The second edition, on which the present text is directly based, contains, as new matter, the Induction and a number of additions, marked in the present text by brackets and specified in the foot-notes. Its title-page has proved highly misleading; the facts seem to be that Webster supplied the Induction when the play was revived by the King's men; and that the other additions are restorations of passages from Marston's original play which had been cut for acting purposes. Stoll, who has made this clear, places the composition of the play in 1600, and has given the tragi-comedy a new importance, in addition to its intrinsic vigor and effectiveness, by arguing forcibly for it as an influence on the characters of Shakespeare's Jaques and Hamlet. The source of the plot has so far not been discovered.

A WOMAN KILLED WITH KINDNESS

This tragedy, one of the earliest and most pathetic examples of domestic drama, was first published in 1607; and the present text is based on Pearson's reprint of this quarto. The play was acted in 1603, as appears from an entry in Henslowe's Diary. The title, like those of several other plays by Heywood, was a proverbial phrase. Creizenach (IV. 264) states that Heywood borrowed the two plots of this drama from Margaret of Navarre and from Bandello. The thirty-second tale in the Heptameron does indeed tell of a husband who refrained from killing a wife taken in adultery, but the resemblance is far from close.

THE KNIGHT OF THE BURNING PESTLE

The Knight of the Burning Pestle was printed in quarto in 1613, and on Murch's reproduction of this edition the present text is based. A second and a third quarto were issued in 1635, and the play was included in the second folio edition of Beaumont and Fletcher in 1679. The date of composition is uncertain, but recent opinion tends to place it about 1610. It cannot be said that there is as yet a general agreement as to the respective shares of the two authors in this comedy, but according to the most careful examination of the question so far made, that of Dr. Murch, most of the play should be ascribed to Beaumont, Fletcher having probably written only the three love scenes, I. i. 1-60; III. i.; and IV. iv. 18-93. In spite of the similarity between the satirical purpose of this play and of Don Quixote, it has not been shown that the authors had any knowledge of the work of Cervantes, or that they could read Spanish. (The first English translation of Don Quixote appeared in 1612.) In the mock-heroic part of the play, the object of the satire was the type of play founded upon medieval romance and popular at that time among the tradespeople of London; and of this type, Heywood's Four Prentices of London seems to have been especially in view. Koeppl has pointed out the resemblance between the coffin scene in Act IV. and an episode in Marston's Antonio and Mellida (1602). The love-plot is too commonplace to have a definitely assignable source, and the scenes between Merrythought and his wife, like those of the Induction, are, one may be sure, due to direct observation of contemporary life and manners.

PHILASTER

The first quarto of Philaster, issued in 1620, seems to have been unauthorized, and to have been made up in part from a report taken down at a performance. At the beginning and end it is quite different from the other quartos. The second quarto, 1622, as reprinted by Thorndike, is the basis for the present text, with occasional readings from the later quartos and the folio of 1679. The play was probably written about 1608-10. The respective shares of the two authors are difficult to assign. Olyphant and Thorndike give to Fletcher I. i. 99-369; II. ii.; II. iv. 69-203; passages in III. ii.; V. iii.; and V. iv.; the rest to Beaumont; the prose scenes with less assurance. Macaulay gives little beyond V. iii., iv. to Fletcher. This distribution is made mainly on the grounds of the characteristics of the metre; it does not exclude the probability of intimate collaboration in plot and characterization. The story of the play seems to have been original, though several of the motives are common enough. There is marked indebtedness to Hamlet, and much resemblance to Cymbeline, though Thorndike has argued plausibly for the view that in the latter case Shakespeare was the borrower.

THE MAID'S TRAGEDY

As in the case of Philaster, the first quarto of the The Maid's Tragedy (1619) is corrupt and unauthorized. The second quarto (1622), with Thorndike's collations of the first and third (1630), is the basis for the present text. The date of composition is probably about 1609-11. There is more agreement here than in the case of Philaster as to the respective shares of the joint authors. Most critics give Fletcher II. ii.; IV. i.; V. i. 1-111; V. ii.; the rest to Beaumont, with the exception of I. ii, which is uncertain. Macaulay gives II. ii. also to Beaumont. The source of the plot has not been found, though minor resemblances have been noted, such as that of the duel between Aspatia and Amintor, to the fight between Parthenia and Amphialus in Sidney's Arcadia, book iii, and that of the quarrel between Melantius and Amintor to that between Brutus and Cassius in Julius Caesar.

THE FAITHFUL SHEPHERDESS

The first quarto of The Faithful Shepherdess is undated, but it was certainly issued before May, 1610, and the play had been unsuccessfully produced not long before, perhaps in 1608 or 1609. The present text is based on the first edition, and is dependent on the collations in the Glover and Waller edition of Beaumont and Fletcher. Fletcher's chief model in this pastoral seems to have been Guarini's Pastor Fido, and some few details are borrowed from Spenser; but the plot itself seems to be original. The play, as Fletcher confesses in his address To the Reader, was unsuccessful on the stage, but the beauty of its lyric and descriptive poetry has given it, in spite of its weak dramatic quality, a distinguished place in literature. It is notable also as having in part suggested Milton's Comus.

THE WILD-GOOSE CHASE

The Wild-Goose Chase, we are told by the publisher of the first folio edition of Beaumont and Fletcher, was lost when that volume was compiled; it reappeared later, and was issued separately, in folio, in 1652. A second edition appeared in the folio of 1679. The present text is based on the reprint of Waller, following, however, the edition of 1652 in preference to that of 1679. The comedy is known to have been acted as early as 1621. No source for the plot seems as yet to have been found. Farquhar based on it his comedy of The Inconstant, a fact which points to the obvious relationship between the Fletcherian comedy, of which this is a typical example, and the drama of the Restoration.

THE DUCHESS OF MALFI

The first edition of The Duchess of Malfi appeared in quarto in 1623, and was followed by others in 1640, 1678, and 1708. The present text follows chiefly the Harvard copy of the first quarto, with occasional readings supplied by Sampson's collation of the other editions. The date of first performance cannot be later than 1614, since the actor who created the part of Antonio died in that year. The main plot is taken from Painter's Palace of Pleasure, vol. II, Nov. 23 (1567). Painter translated his story from Belle-Forest's paraphrase (1565) of the twenty-sixth novella of Bandello (1554). The story appears in many places, and had been dramatized by Lope de Vega. Crawford (Notes and Queries, Sept. 17-Nov. 12, 1904) has shown many incidental and even literal borrowings from Sidney's Arcadia. Among the elements in the play not found in Painter are the underplot of Julia and the Cardinal, the scenes of torture, and the most of the fifth act. Some of these are derived from the tradition of the tragedy of revenge, especially as represented by Shakespeare, Marston, and Tourneur; but, in spite of frequent echoes, this impressive tragedy, almost the last of its kind, derives its vitality mainly from the powerful and sombre imagination of Webster.

A TRICK TO CATCH THE OLD ONE

This comedy was licensed October 7, 1607, and published in quarto in 1608. A second edition appeared in 1616. The present text is based directly on the copy of the first quarto in the Boston Public Library, with the aid of the readings from the second quarto given by Bullen. The plot is supposed to have given Massinger a suggestion for A New Way to Pay Old Debts, but where Middleton found it, if he did not originate it, is not known. This play is an excellent example of Middleton's comedies of intrigue and manners, full of bustle and fun, more careful of theatrical effect than of moral or aesthetic consistency.

THE CHANGELING

The Changeling was performed as early as 1623, but did not appear in print till 1653. On a copy of this quarto in the Harvard Library the present text is based. The source of the tragic plot is the fourth history in book i. of John Reynolds's Triumph of God's Revenge against Murder (1621), but the prose narrative is not followed closely. The under-plot, which gives its title to the play, may be original. Miss Wiggin assigns to Rowley the whole under-plot, and the opening and closing scenes of the main plot. Symons finds the greatness of the play as a whole due to the collaboration of the two authors, and beyond the powers of either alone (Cf. Camb. Hist. of Eng. Lit., vi. 76-7).

A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS

This play, Massinger's masterpiece in comedy, appeared in quarto in 1633, and on the Harvard Library copy of this edition the present text is based. The play was acted before 1626, and Fleay places it as early as 1622. Few plays of this whole period have held the English stage so continuously or so long as this. The central idea of the plot seems to have been taken from Middleton's A Trick to Catch the Old One; but there is almost as great a difference in the dramatic method between the two plays as there is in moral tone. Massinger's didacticism here finds eloquent expression, without destroying theatrical effectiveness. Prototypes of Sir Giles Overreach and Greedy have been found in the notorious monopolist, Sir Giles Mompesson and his tool, Michael.

THE BROKEN HEART

The only early edition of The Broken Heart was published in 1633, and the present text is based on a copy of this quarto in the Boston Public Library. There is no evidence as to the date of composition except the hitherto unnoted fact that The Garland of Good Will, mentioned in IV. ii. 15, was published in 1631. The prologue seems to imply that the plot of the play is founded on fact, and Sherman has argued plausibly that the reference is to the story of Penelope Devereux, Sidney's "Stella," whose second husband Ford had eulogised in his first publication, Fame's Memorial (1606). It is certain that Ford was interested in both Sidney and Stella, and there are many correspondences between their situation and that of Orgilus and Penhea. The catastrophe is, of course, entirely changed; but in the spiritual situation there is much to recall the sonnets of Astrophel to Stella. There are traces of the influence of the Arcadia also in the play, such as the laying of the plot in Sparta; and in the delineation of the jealousy of Bassanes Ford draws upon Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy.

THE LADY OF PLEASURE

The Lady of Pleasure was published in quarto in 1637, and the present text is based on a copy of this edition in the Harvard Library. The play, a good example of Shirley's comedy of manners, was produced in 1635. No source has been discovered for the plot. Like Fletcher's Wild-Goose Chase, this type of Shirley's comedies is important in measuring the approach made toward the Restoration comedy before the Puritan Revolution.

THE CARDINAL

This tragedy, regarded by Shirley as his greatest play, and in fact no unworthy piece to close a volume representing the drama of that age, appeared in a volume of Six New Plays in 1653, the date on the title-page of The Cardinal being 1652. On a copy of this octavo in the Harvard Library the present text is based. The play was acted in 1641, and thus belongs to the last few months before the theatres were closed by the Long Parliament. It is probable that Webster's Duchess of Malfi afforded more than a suggestion for the plot, but otherwise no source has been found. The play was popular both on its first appearance and when it was revived after the Restoration.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES

JOHN LYLY

John Lyly was born in Kent about 1554. His father was Peter Lyly, Registrar of Canterbury, and his grandfather the well-known grammarian, William Lyly, the friend of Colet and More. He entered Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1569, whence he graduated B. A. in 1573, and M. A. in 1575. Here he was more distinguished for wit than for scholarship. Going up to London, and living at first under the protection of Burleigh, he produced in 1578 his Euphues: the Anatomy of Wit, which was followed in 1580 by Euphues and his England, both of which gained a great and immediate popularity. He was now attached to the Earl of Oxford. Campaspe, his first play, was performed in 1581, and most of his dramatic work was done in that decade. The Woman in the Moon, however, may have been produced as late as 1594-5. In 1583, Lyly married Beatrice Browne, a well-connected lady, who bore him eight children. From 1588 he seems to have held an honorary position as Esquire of the Body to the Queen, and he lived for years in the vain hope of succeeding to the office of Master of the Revels. Between 1589 and 1601 he sat in four parliaments, and in his Pappe with an Hatchet (1589) he took part with the Bishops in the Marprelate controversy. In spite of the distinction which Lyly won by his literary work, he failed to obtain from the Queen the substantial preferment which he craved, and he died in 1606, a disappointed place-seeker. Lyly's reputation has depended largely on the extraordinary vogue of his Euphues, and the immense influence of the style of that work on the prose of the time; but he holds also a highly important position in the development of polite comedy in England.

GEORGE PEELE

The date of Peele's birth is unknown, but is conjecturally placed about 1558. In 1565 he was a free scholar at Christ's Hospital, of which his father was clerk, and in 1571 he went to Oxford. He was a student first at Broadgates Hall (now Pembroke College), and later at Christ Church, whence he graduated B. A. in 1577, and M. A. in 1579. From the University, where he had already achieved some reputation as a poet, he went to London, and apparently plunged at once into the irregularities that wrecked his career, for in the same year the governors of Christ's Hospital forced his father to turn him out of the precincts of the hospital. His wife, whom he had married by 1583, brought him some property, which he soon dissipated; and he became a member of that group of authors who wrote plays, pageants, and all sorts of occasional productions, in the uncertain hope of earning a living. The famous Jests, fathered on Peele, are probably quite unauthentic; but there is an unfortunate appropriateness in many of them to his known mode of life. He seems to have been an actor as well as a playwright. Meres mentions him in Palladis Tamia (1598) as dead.

Peele's claims to distinction rest upon his treatment of metre, and on his humor. He did much to refine and supple the diction of the drama, and before Marlowe placed his stamp upon blank verse, Peele was writing it with great sweetness and a charming musical quality. In the present play, the realistic element in the dialogue is more notable than the decorative, and this realism is employed in the service of a new type of humor. "He was the first," says Gummere, "to blend romantic drama with a realism which turns romance back upon itself, and produces the comedy of subconscious humor."

ROBERT GREENE

Greene was much given to the mingling of autobiography with his fiction, and this has resulted in a much larger body of possibly true biographical details than we possess concerning most of his contemporaries. He was born in Norwich of a respectable family, probably about 1560; entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1575; graduated B. A. in 1578; travelled in Spain and Italy, and, by his own account, lived up to the proverbial reputation of the Italianate Englishman; returned to Cambridge and took his M. A. in 1581; and during the rest of his short life busied himself in the production of the very considerable mass of romances, tracts, songs, and plays which to-day give him his place in literature. About 1585 he married a Lincolnshire woman, who bore him a son, and whom he deserted after spending her portion. The annals of literature hardly bear the record of a more sordid career than that of this university-bred man of letters; and his death was only too fitting a close to it. He died in 1592 in the house of a poor shoemaker, to whom he gave a bond for ten pounds, leaving the following letter to his deserted wife: "Doll, I charge thee by the love of our youth and by my soul's rest that thou wilt see this man paid, for if he and his wife had not succored me I had died in the streets."

Robert Greene." Following his own wish, the shoemaker's wife crowned his head with a garland of bay.

In spite of the self-confessed wickedness of his ways, Greene was not a hardened criminal, and no themes are more frequent in his tracts than moral exhortation and repentance. It is further notable that his work is freer from grossness than that of most of his contemporary playwrights, and he is distinguished for the freshness and purity of his female creations. He seems also, to judge from his plays, to have retained a love for the country, where he often chose to lay his scenes; and he ranks high among the lyrists of the time. The vivacity and variety of his humor are well exemplified in the play here printed.

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE

Christopher Marlowe was the eldest son of a substantial burgess of Canterbury, and he was born in that city on February 6, 1564. He entered the King's School in January, 1579, and two years later became a scholar of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, whence he graduated B. A. in 1584, and M. A. in 1587. As Tamburlaine was acted in that year, it appears that Marlowe's academic and his literary life overlapped. Little is certainly known of his later life, apart from the production of his plays and poems. He belonged to a circle of which Sir Walter Raleigh was the centre, and which contained men like the Earl of Oxford, and Harriot, the mathematician. These men seem to have engaged in scientific and theological speculation, and were suspected of atheism by the narrower spirits of the time. This connection was probably the basis for certain extreme charges made against Marlowe after his death; but there is little evidence worthy of consideration. Even the documents connected with Kyd, in which that author seeks to save his own reputation for orthodoxy at Marlowe's expense, are under suspicion in point of genuineness. Marlowe died by the hand of a certain Francis Archer, at Deptford, in 1593, but the circumstances are obscure. The later reports, such as that according to which he was stabbed by a serving man in a brawl over a mistress, are inconsistent with one another, and are little worthy of credit. The prevailing impression of the dissoluteness of Marlowe's life is not based on substantial evidence such as we have, for example, in the case of Greene.

No such uncertainty as surrounds his character and career attaches to the quality of his work. Born in the same year as Shakespeare, he left behind him at twenty-nine work which far surpasses anything his great contemporary had written by that time. In the vastness and intensity of his imagination, the splendid dignity of his verse, and the dazzling brilliance of his poetry at its best, Marlowe exhibited the greatest genius that had so far appeared in the English drama.

THOMAS KYD

The date of Kyd's birth may with practical certainty be placed in 1558. His father was a London scrivener, and the son was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, which he entered in 1565. Mulcaster was then headmaster, and Edmund Spenser was among his schoolfellows. He does not seem to have attended a university. A habit of anonymity has thrown a cloud over the extent of Kyd's literary activity, and the list of his plays and translations has been compiled with difficulty and much less than complete certainty. His fame depends upon The Spanish Tragedy, and upon the importance of his contribution to the Senecan tragedy of revenge in this play and probably in the lost pre-Shakespearean Hamlet, which is now usually ascribed to him.

The later years of his life seem to have been unfortunate, and he was arrested on charges of sedition and atheism in 1593. From the latter he sought, if the letter to Puckering (Boas, p. cviii.) is genuine, to clear himself by ascribing the ownership of the incriminating documents to the dead Marlowe, and he endeavored to minimise the closeness of his intimacy with his great contemporary. These charges, it appears, lost him his patron, and perhaps in some degree his theatrical popularity. He died in 1594.

Kyd seems to have been a man of gloomy temperament, and the vividness and intensity with which he presents in his work the darker sides of human nature and experience are probably in some degree the outcome of his own disposition. In spite of tendencies to melodrama that, to the modern taste, border on the ludicrous, Kyd rises at times to the utterance of genuine passion, and even his sensationalism is frequently impressive. But his historical importance in the development of the type of tragedy of which Hamlet is the climax must be granted to be greater than his intrinsic value.

GEORGE CHAPMAN

George Chapman was born in Hitchin, Hertfordshire, in 1557 or 1559, and was educated at Oxford, and perhaps also at Cambridge. His earliest extant work is The Shadow of Night (1594), which was followed in 1595 by Ovid's Banquet of Sense, The Amorous Zodiac, and other poems, works curiously obscure and contorted in style, though containing distinguished passages. In 1598, he finished Marlowe's incomplete Hero and Leander, and when Meres published his Palladis Tamia in that year, Chapman was already well-known as a playwright. His reputation, however, is most firmly based on his translations from Homer, issued in detachments in 1598, 1609, 1611, and 1614, and complete in folio in 1616. In this work he was encouraged by Prince Henry, to whom he was "sewer in ordinary." He was imprisoned in 1605 along with Jonson and Marston on account of the passages against the Scots in Eastward Ho! and in 1608 he again had difficulties with the authorities on account of a scene in Charles, Duke of Byron. He continued his work in translation and in the drama till his death in 1634.

Though one can hardly feel that Chapman's natural gifts were those of a dramatist, the evidences of intellectual power, and the almost Shakespearean splendor of the poetry in occasional passages throughout his work, entitle him to an honorable place among the writers of the time.

BEN JONSON

Ben Jonson came of an Annandale family, and was born at Westminster in 1573. He followed his stepfather's trade of bricklaying for a short time, and later served as a soldier in Flanders. He probably began play-writing about 1595, and two years later we find him in the Admiral's Company of actors. In 1598 he is mentioned by Meres as a writer of tragedy, and in the same year he killed a fellow-actor in a duel. In prison he became a Roman Catholic, but returned to the Church of England twelve years later. He scored a success with Every Man in his Humour in 1598, Shakespeare acting a part in the play. After several years of work on satirical drama, Jonson turned to tragedy; and on the accession of James I, he began his long series of masques and court entertainments. In 1605 he was again in prison, this time for his share in Eastward Ho! From this date till about 1617 Jonson was at the height of his fame, and was the leading literary figure in London. He visited France in 1613 as tutor to Raleigh's son; and in 1616 issued a folio edition of his works. In 1618, he visited Scotland, and held his famous conversations with Drummond of Hawthornden; and, on his return, Oxford made him an M. A. After the death of James I, Jonson was less fortunate in court favor, suffered from ill health, and was unsuccessful at the theatre. In 1628, however, he succeeded Middleton as chronologer to the city of London, and the King sent him £100 in his sickness, later raising his salary. But fortune turned against him again; he lost his city office, made further attempts to regain theatrical favor, and died August 6, 1637. Besides plays, he left an interesting prose work, Timber, or Discoveries, and a considerable amount of non-dramatic verse. A second folio edition of his Works appeared in 1640.

Jonson's artistic ideals were classical rather than romantic, and he stands, in significant respects, in opposition to some of the main literary currents of his time. The plays in the present volume include an example of the "comedy of humours" introduced by him, a typical example of his tragedy, and two of his satirical masterpieces. In these alone one can find abundant evidence that, despite a lack of charm and geniality, one is dealing with the work of a deep student of human nature, a vigorous and independent thinker, and a master of eloquent and virile expression.

THOMAS DEKKER

Dekker's career is an extreme instance of the hazardous life led by the professional author in the time of Shakespeare. Born in London about 1570, Dekker first appears certainly as a dramatist about 1597, when we find him working on plays in collaboration with other dramatists in the pay of Henslowe. He wrote, in partnership or alone, many dramas; and when the market for these was dull, he turned to the writing of entertainments, occasional verses, and prose pamphlets on a great variety of subjects. No writer of the time gives us a more vivid picture of Elizabethan London. But all his activity seems to have failed to supply a decent livelihood, for he was often in prison for debt, at one time for a period of three years; and most of the biographical details about him which have come down to us are connected with borrowing money, or getting into jail or out of it. He disappears from view in the thirties of the seventeenth century.

In spite of the impression of gloom left by such a record, Dekker's plays abound in high spirits, and their general tendency in plot and characterization is sane and wholesome. Evidences of hasty and careless workmanship are easily found, yet he was far from an uninspired hack, and passages of a noble and delicate poetry are frequent throughout his work.

JOHN MARSTON

John Marston came of an old Shropshire family, and was born, probably at Coventry, about 1575. His father, who bore the same name, was lecturer of the Middle Temple, and there is evidence that the son was trained for the law. He entered Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1592, and, according to Bullen, graduated B. A. in 1594. His first work in poetry was his Metamorphosis of Pigmalion's Image and Certain Satires, 1598; and later in the same year appeared his Scourge of Villany. In the following year both books were burned on account of their licentiousness by the order of the Archbishop of Canterbury, though Marston had professed a reformatory purpose in both. In 1599 he turned to play-writing; but the turgid style of his Antonio and Mellida and Antonio's Revenge brought down on him the ridicule of Jonson in The Poetaster. The Malcontent was written during a period of reconciliation with Jonson, and in 1605 Marston collaborated with him and Chapman in Eastward Ho, a comedy containing a passage reflecting on the Scots, which landed all three dramatists in prison.

Marston gave up play-writing in 1607, and later became a clergyman. From 1616 to 1631 he held the living of Christ Church, Hampshire, and in 1634 died in London, and was buried in the Temple Church.

The extreme tendency to fustian which Jonson had attacked in Marston's early work no longer appears to any great extent in The Malcontent, and the play exhibits favorably Marston's capacity for the creation of well marked character and effective stage situations. An attempt has recently been made to show that he exerted a considerable influence on Shakespeare, especially in Hamlet.

THOMAS HEYWOOD

The early records of this, the most prolific of the dramatic writers of the time, are extremely scanty. The date of his birth is conjecturally placed about 1575, and he refers to himself as a native of Lincolnshire, and at one time resident at Cambridge. He begins to figure in Henslowe's accounts in 1596, and he appears as a member of the Lord Admiral's Company in 1598. He began writing plays with The Four Prentices of London, and in the Address to the Reader prefixed to his English Traveller (1633) he claims to have written or had a "main finger" in two hundred and twenty plays. Outside of the drama, he tried his hand at almost all sorts of literature, and the quality of his work is extremely uneven. He was still alive in 1648, but probably died soon thereafter.

Heywood's characteristic power of eliciting powerful emotions by a sympathetic treatment of everyday conditions and events, is well illustrated by the play here printed. While much is perfunctory in his work, one constantly finds evidences of a genuine and pious spirit moved by a keen appreciation of the pathos of human life.

FRANCIS BEAUMONT

Francis Beaumont was born 1584, the son of Sir Francis Beaumont of Grace-Dieu, Leicestershire, a judge of the common pleas. He was educated at Broadgates Hall (now Pembroke College), Oxford, which he entered in 1597. On the death of his father in 1598, he left the university without a degree, and in 1600 became a member of the Inner Temple. The law, however, if he ever really studied it, was soon abandoned for poetry; and Beaumont became an intimate of Jonson and his circle at the Mermaid. His collaboration with Fletcher began early, and seems to have been brought about by personal preference, not, like most collaboration at that time, by the exigencies of the theatrical manager. Aubrey has preserved the tradition of their domestic intimacy and similarity of tastes. Their joint-production seems to have begun about 1605, and there is no evidence that Beaumont wrote any plays after 1612. About 1613 he married, and three years later died and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He had achieved a high contemporary reputation for his non-dramatic poetry, but he survives as a dramatist.

JOHN FLETCHER

John Fletcher came of a family which has given many distinguished names to English literature. His father was Richard Fletcher, Bishop of London. Giles Fletcher the elder was his uncle, and Giles and Phineas Fletcher his cousins. The dramatist was born at Rye, Sussex, in 1579, and entered Benet College (now Corpus Christi), Cambridge, in 1591; but of the details of his life from this time till his appearance as a dramatist little is known. He collaborated with Beaumont from about 1605 till 1612; and, after Beaumont's withdrawal, with Shakespeare, Jonson, Massinger, and others. He died of the plague in 1625.

The men who laid the foundations of the Elizabethan drama were generally of somewhat obscure origin; and though some of them had been educated at the universities, they were all poor. Beaumont and Fletcher were the first recruits to the profession of play-writing who came of distinguished families and habitually moved in wealthy circles; and this social environment was early suggested as an explanation of their power of representing naturally the conversation of high-born ladies and gentlemen. The general style of their plays has been thus admirably characterized by Thorndike: "Their plots, largely invented, are ingenious and complicated. They deal with royal or noble persons, with heroic actions, and are placed in foreign localities. The conquests, usurpations, and passions that ruin kingdoms are their themes, there are no battles or pageants, and the action is usually confined to the rooms of the palace or its immediate neighborhood. Usually contrasting a story of gross sensual passion with one of idyllic love, they introduce a great variety of incidents, and aim at constant but varied excitement. . . . The plays depend for interest not on their observation or revelation of human nature, or the development of character, but on the variety of situations, the clever construction that holds the interest through one suspense to another up to the unravelling at the very end, and on the naturalness, felicity, and vigor of the poetry."

JOHN WEBSTER

The dates 1580-1625 are usually given as conjectures for Webster's birth and death, exact information being entirely lacking. His father was a member of the Merchant Taylors' Company, of which the son was likewise a freeman; but this does not imply that he was actually a tailor. In 1602, we find him collaborating with seven others in the production of four plays for Henslowe, and the rest of his biography consists in the discussion of the dates of his works.

Webster's tragedies come towards the close of the great series of tragedies of blood and revenge in which The Spanish Tragedy and Hamlet are landmarks, but before decadence can fairly be said to have set in. Webster, indeed, loads his scene with horrors almost past the point which modern taste can bear; but the intensity of his dramatic situations, and his superb power of flashing in a single line a light into the recesses of the human heart at the crises of supreme emotion, redeem him from mere sensationalism, and place his best plays in the first rank of dramatic writing.

THOMAS MIDDLETON

The date of Middleton's birth is unknown, but is conjecturally placed about 1570. He came of good family, and his writings indicate that he received a good education. We know, however, nothing about his early training before his entering Gray's Inn, probably in 1593. His plays abound in allusions to law and pictures of lawyers.

The earliest evidence of his writing for the stage is in the date of The Old Law, which was probably composed by Middleton about 1599, and later revised by Massinger and W. Rowley. He was much employed in the writing of pageants and masques, especially by the city, and in 1621 he obtained the post of city chronologer. In 1624 he gave expression to the popular hatred of Spain in his allegorical play, A Game at Chess, which scored a great success, but which was ultimately suppressed at the instigation of the Spanish ambassador, and led to a warrant for Middleton's arrest. He died in 1627.

In his comedies Middleton shows himself a keen observer of contemporary life and manners, and few writers of the time have left a more vivacious picture of the London of James I. "His later plays," says Herford, "show more concentrated as well as more versatile power. His habitual occupation with depraved types becomes an artistic method; he creates characters which fascinate without making the smallest appeal to sympathy, tragedy which harrows without rousing either pity or terror, and language which disdains charm, but penetrates by remorseless veracity and by touches of strange and sudden power."

WILLIAM ROWLEY

William Rowley was born about 1585. He was an actor as well as a dramatist, and is sometimes confused with two other actors, Ralph and Samuel Rowley. In his earlier years he wrote some non-dramatic verse, mostly of a conventional kind. His most important work was done in collaboration with Middleton, with whom he worked from 1614, but he had many other literary partners. His verse is apt to be rough and irregular, his humor broad and rollicking rather than fine, his serious scenes tending to extravagance and bombast. But his constant employment to cooperate with greater men, or revise their work, points to a general serviceableness and a capacity for theatrical effectiveness. His death is conjecturally placed about 1642.

PHILIP MASSINGER

Philip Massinger was born at Salisbury, in November, 1583. His father was in the service of the Earls of Pembroke, and it has been conjectured that the future dramatist was named after the Countess's brother, Sir Philip Sidney. He entered St. Alban Hall, Oxford, in 1602, and left four years later without a degree, having, according to Wood, "applied his mind more to poetry and romances than to logic and philosophy." On coming to London he seems to have turned at once to writing for the stage; and, after Beaumont retired from play-writing, Massinger became Fletcher's chief partner and warm friend. All Massinger's relations with his fellow-authors of which we have record seem to have been pleasant; and the impression of his personality which one derives from his work is that of a dignified, hard-working, and conscientious man. He seems to have been much interested in public affairs, and he at times came into collision with the authorities on account of the introduction into his plays of more or less veiled allusions to political personages and events. He died in 1640, and was buried in St. Saviour's, Southwark, in the same grave, it is said by Cokayne, as his friend Fletcher.

Massinger's great merit lies in his masterly conduct of plot. His characters are usually of a somewhat conventional type, his pictures of passion tend to sheer extravagance, and his ethical quality has in it something mechanical. His verse is often eloquent, but the dialogue is often preposterously remote from life. Yet so skillful was he in the manipulation of the action that he usually holds the attention without difficulty; and in the present play this power is combined with a singularly forceful presentation of the main character and a fairly obvious didacticism that together kept the drama on the stage almost down to modern times.

JOHN FORD

John Ford was born at Ilington in Devonshire in April, 1586, of good family. A man of his name entered Exeter College, Oxford, in 1601; but if this was our Ford, his stay was short, for he became a member of the Middle Temple in November, 1602. Of the rest of his career we know almost nothing, except the names of people to whom he dedicated his plays and verses. He disappears after the publication of his last play in 1639. He seems to have been a man of a somewhat melancholy temperament, independent in his attitude towards the public taste, and capable of espousing unpopular causes.

Ford's dramas show a tendency to deal with illicit and even incestuous love in a peculiar mood, the dramatist frequently creating strong sympathy for the tempted and the sinner, and leaving the question of guilt open. This, along with his fondness for the theatrical and the sensational, has led to his being frequently chosen as an example of the decadence of the drama. The charge is not to be denied; but in spite of these defects, he shows a power of insight into suffering and perplexity, and writes at times poetry of such beauty and tenderness, that he remains a figure of much intrinsic interest as well as historical importance.

JAMES SHIRLEY

James Shirley, often called "the last of the Elizabethans," was born in London in September, 1596, and was educated at Merchant Taylors' School and St. John's College, Oxford. Later he went to Catherine Hall, Cambridge, whence he graduated. About 1619 he took orders, and obtained a living at St. Albans, Hertfordshire; but resigned to enter the church of Rome, and became master of the St. Albans grammar school in 1623. His first play was licensed in 1625, and from this time till the closing of the theatres he devoted himself to the writing of plays and masques, gaining both popular success and the patronage of the court. With the outbreak of the Civil War, Shirley followed his patron, the Earl of Newcastle, to the field; but after Marston Moor he returned to London, published some of his earlier writings, and resumed teaching. Some of his plays were revived at the Restoration, but he wrote no more. He and his second wife were driven from their home by the fire of London in 1666, and both died from shock on the same day.

Shirley wrote many non-dramatic poems, graceful enough but conventional; few of them are read to-day. Out of nearly forty dramas, seven are tragedies, the rest chiefly romantic comedies and comedies of manners. He was a careful student of the work of his predecessors, and he reproduced many of their dramatic effects with skill. He had a distinct comic gift, and his power in tragedy may be judged by The Cardinal. With Shirley, more than with any of his fellow-playwrights, one feels the disadvantage of coming so late in the development of this phase of the drama that originality of conception seems almost impossible. That he is still able to amuse and to thrill with the old instruments is proof of his capacity as a literary workman; and he should not be denied the possession of passages where he displays touches of imagination all his own.
